✓66128

THE Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

66128

VOLUME CXLV

JULY 3, 1937, to DECEMBER 25, 1937

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

INDEX TO VOLUME CXLV

JULY 3, 1937, to DECEMBER 25, 1937

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
Arc	Architecture
C	Correspondence
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1- 28	July 3	333-360	October 2
29- 56	July 10	361-388	October 9
57- 84	July 17	389-416	October 16
85-112	July 24	417-460	October 23
113-140	July 31	461-488	October 30
141-160	August 7	489-516	November 6
161-180	August 14	517-544	November 13
181-208	August 21	545-572	November 20
209-228	August 28	573-600	November 27
229-248	September 4	601-628	December 4
249-276	September 11	629-672	December 11
277 304	September 18	673-700	December 18
305-332	September 25	701-728	December 25

A

AFL. See American federation of labor
Abyssinia. See Ethiopia
Academic freedom
    Daughters of the American revolution in the schoolroom, M. B. Schnapper; S.. 288
    Freeman, E., discharged because of American legion opposition to liberal views. J. M. Dannenfelser, junior; C. 459
    Interference by the government; EP 463 see also C.......... 699
Accidents; ambulance chasing. L. Miller; S.. 129
Adamic, Louis
    Raper, Jack; S.......... 42
    Steel man O.K.'s C.I.O.; S.......... 582
Aggressors, bounty for; E.......... 633
Agriculture
    Bill likely to hold over; EP.......... 674
    Farm tenants, loans for; E.......... 89
    Mexican. See Mexico
    Mortgages, farm, interest on; congress overrides veto; EP.......... 86
    National economic planning involved in farm bill; EP.......... 602
    Relief plans; E.......... 676
Aldrich, Winthrop W., speech on business; EP.......... 418
Al-Ford Ibn Roose
    "Epistles," not "letters"; C.......... 544
Algic, steamship, strike on; EP.......... 517
Allen, Harland H.
    Slump on Wall street; S.....397; see also C.......... 487
Allen, James S.
    Japan and Philippine independence; S.......... 611
Allen, Robert S.
    "Exposure" of H. L. Black; responsibility for; S....311; see also E.... 365
    New deal fights for life; S.......... 35
    Roosevelt fights back; Black appointment and other measures; S.......... 187
    Roosevelt's western trip; S.......... 340
    Supreme Court, fight over; S.......... 63
    Supreme court; Roosevelt defeat; S... 123
    Tax cabal in congress; S.......... 606
    Wage-hour bill; S.......... 63
    Wall street and White house; S...... 467
Allis-Chalmers case; decision of N. L. R. B.; EP.......... 630
Ambulance chasing; L. Miller; S.......... 129
American, New York, passing of; E...... 6
American civil liberties union; fight told in "Let freedom ring"; EP.......... 87
American federation of labor
    Attacks National labor relations board; C.......... 362
    Controversy with C. I. O. in National Electrical Products case; E.......... 252
    "Militancy." S. Hertzberg; S.......... 425
    Peace conference with C. I. O.; E..420; EP..........462, 491, 518, 630
    Struggle with C. I. O.; EP.......210; E.......... 392
    Versus Seattle labor. C. Stevens; S... 239
American ides of March. A. MacLeish; S.......... 617
American legion
    Cartoons. J. Groth.......... 339
    Convention in New York; EP.......... 305
    Freeman, Doctor E., discharged because of Legion opposition to liberal views. J. M. Dannenfelser, junior; C...... 459
    Legionism; E.......... 338
    "Neutrality"; EP.......... 306
American medical association. See Medicine
American newspaper guild. See Newspapers
American press society. See Newspapers
American telephone and telegraph company; investigation ends; EP.......... 59
America's cup yacht races; EP.......... 163
"Among" and "between." S. T. Byington; C.......... 160
Amphitryon 38. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 539
Anarchists, the real. O. G. Villard; S.... 322
Anderson, Paul Y.
    Rebellion, capitalist, against United States government; S.......... 146
Anderson, William K.
    Johnstown strike; reporting of; C..........138; see also 37
Angel island. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 484
Angell, James Rowland, and the radio; EP.......... 142
Anti-British hysteria; E......253; see also C.......... 331
Antony and Cleopatra. J. W. Krutch; D... 567
Arab countries inflamed by Italy; E...... 547
Arbaiza, G.
    Aggressive good neighbor, the; S...... 285
    Latin America; fascism loses ground; C.......... 159
Architecture, German. D. Haskell; Arc.... 457
Armstrong, O. K.
    Peonage, legal; S......195; EP...... 182
Art
    In the new Germany. J. Groth; Ct... 433
    Popular. D. Haskell; A.......... 725
    Under the swastika. E. Berry; C...... 359
Arts, bureau of; Coffee bill; E.......... 705
Arts projects, W. P. A.; E. McCausland; S.......... 67
Ascoli, Max
    Rosselli brothers, murder of; S....... 10
Ashton, E. B.
    Fascism; militance and realism; C..........139; see also 50
Authors
    Explanations of. J. W. Krutch; S..... 132
    German. See Germany
    Needy, help for. N. L. Lederer; C.... 180
Automobiles; violence by "service men" and police; EP.......... 57
    See also United automobile workers of America
Awful truth, the. M. Van Doren; MP...... 566

B

Bacchelli, Riccardo
    Frightful case of the Mary Bonfield; S.......... 380
Bach, Julian, junior
    Greece, mailed fist in; S.......... 197
Baker, H. E.
    Butash, P. case of; C.......... 180
Baldwin, Roger
    Spain, tour of, proposed; C.......... 110
Balkan countries, panic in. M.E. Ravage; S.......... 215
Baltic deputy. B. Belitt; MP.......... 274
Bandelier, Adolphe F., and L. H. Morgan; letters sought. L. A. White; C.... 180
Bankers, source of power. H. C. Dekker; C.......572; see also 446; C....... 700
Barclay, Hartley W., and Weirton; EP... 674
Barkley, Frederick R.
    Taxation; yachts and taxes; S....... 9
Barksdale, Lena
    Children's books, a selected list; S.... 569
Bayonne Times. See Newspapers
Beaufort-Palmer, F.
    Ethiopia, Italy's disgrace; C.......... 488
Beck, L. Allen
    Epstein, A., on social security; C...699; see also EP.......... 463
Belitt, Ben
    Baltic deputy; MP.......... .274
    Colophon; P.......... 653
    Death as basilisk; P.......... 439
    Moving pictures and contemporary history; S.......... 557
Bennington dance festival. P. Love; S.... 226
Benson, Governor. See Minnesota
Bergdorf, Pearl L. See Strikebreaking
Bernstein, Philip S.
    Fate of German Jews; S.423; see also C.......... 516
    Pogroms or partition in Palestine; S.. 607
Berry, Elizabeth
    Art under the swastika; C.......... 359
Bethlehem steel, and Johnstown; EP..... 362
    Defends its labor policies; EP...... 306
"Between" and "among." S. T. Byington; C.......... 160
Bingham, Alfred M.
    War as means of stopping fascism; C..........571; see also 495
Birkhead, L. M.
    Request for permission for anti-Nazi propaganda in Germany; C.......... 179
Birth control; leagues raided in Massachusetts; EP.......... 162
Black, Hugo L.
    Appointment to Supreme court; E.... 183
    Appointment. R. S. Allen; S.......... 187
    Attack on; E.......... 308
    Attacks continue; statement by Black; EP.......... 361
    Connection with the Ku klux klan; EP.........278; see also C.......... 359
    Education of; E..........337; see also C.......... 515
    "Exposure," responsibility for. R. S. Allen; S......311; see also E....... 365
    Personal history. M. Lerner; S..........367; see also 515
    Seat not in danger; EP.......... 417
    "Unconditional support" of. N. Thomas; C..........387; see also 459
Black labor-standards bill. See Labor
Bloch-Hiller, Walter
    Swiss democracy; C......727; see also 290
Blow ye winds. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 356
Bogan, Louise
    New moon; P.......... 153
Books
    Children's. C. Rourke; S.......... 562
    Children's, a selected list. L. Barksdale; S.......... 569
    Reviewers, H. Hansen and others. M. Marshall; S.......... 479
    Of 1937, notable.......... 666
"Boondogglers." See Unemployment relief
Boycott of Japanese goods. See Chinese-Japanese war
Brawleyism. L. Miller; C....571; see also 437
Brazil; dictatorship of president Vargas; E.......... 548
    Swastika over. N. Weyl; S.......... 528
    Trade with the United States and Germany. G. Arbaiza; S.......... 285
Brenner, Anita
    Spain, leftist prisoners; C.......... 206
    Spanish anarchists and the government; C.......... 26
Brevis, Harry J.
    Radio and the steel strike; C.......... 54
Brindze, Ruth
    Food, high cost; S.......... 612
    Freedom of the press again; S...... 98
British trades union congress. H. J. Laski; S.........343; see also C.......... 487
Brooklyn Daily Eagle; strike; EP.......... 602
Broun, Heywood
    Girdler takes the stand; S.......... 19
    God and the liberals; S.......... 173
    Newspaper publishers and the guild; S..........47; see also C.......... 248
    Broun moves to the New republic; EP.......... 252
Brown, Peter
    Swiss democracy in retreat; S.....290; see also C.......... 727
Brussels conference. See Chinese-Japanese war
Buchman, Doctor Frank D. See Oxford group
Budget. See Finance, public
Buell, Raymond Leslie
    Failure of isolation; S.........709; see also E..........704; 707
Burke, Owen
    Dance, ideology of; C.......... 139
Burlingham, Charles C.
    Character of Judge Black; C, with reply by M. Lerner.......515; see also 337
Business
    Big and little; EP.......... 3
    Recession frightens the new deal. M. Lerner; S.......... 551
    Recession; government may step in; EP.......... 545
Butash, Paul, acquitted of criminal syndicalism charge in Indiana. H. E. Baker; C.......... 180
Butchers. See Meat
Byington, Steven T.
    "Among" and "between"; C.......... 160

66128

C

- C., B. L.
  - Socialism not wanted; C. ... 487
- C. I. O. See Committee for industrial organization; Labor unions
- Caesar. A. MacLeish; D. ... 617
- Cairo, Illinois; demonstration; E. Parker in peril; E. ... 31
- California
  - Chain-store tax, repeal. H. Woodward; S. ... 638; correction, 728
  - Japanese mistreated. J. E. Ford; C. ... 516
  - Liberals meet. F. Ragle; C. ... 600
- Cameras. See Photography
- Cameron, W. J.; radio pastor of Dearborn. H. Pinney; S. ... 374
- Canada; right turn in. J. McNeil; S. ... 497
- Capitalist international, the. E. Janeway; S. ... 312; see also C. ... 672; EP. ... 703
- Carnevali, Dalmo
  - Poverty in Italy; C. ... 359
  - Terror in Cremona; C. ... 488
- Catalans. See Spain
- Catholic church. See Roman catholic church
- Cecil of Chelwood, Viscount, award of Nobel peace prize; EP. ... 576
- Censorship, moving pictures; Spanish earth, the, censored in Pennsylvania; EP. ... 307
- Central America, dictatorships; E. ... 548
- Central Europe; effects of Delbos visit; EP ... 703
  - Little entente, bigger, movement for. M. E. Ravage; S. ... 258
- Chadbourne, William M.
  - Relief for China; C. ... 388
- Chain-store tax, California repeal. H. Woodward; S. ... 638; correction, 728
- Chamberlain. Neville. See Great Britain
- Chautemps, Camille. See France
- Chiang Kai-shek. See Chinese-Japanese war
- Chicago massacre. See Steel—Strikes—Republic steel corporation
- Chicago women shoppers. E. J. Mohr; C. ... 700
- Children's reading. See Books
- Chinese-Japanese war
  - American neutrality; EP. ... 181
  - Begins; EP ... 58
  - Behind the conflict. M. S. Stewart; S ... 100
  - Blockade of Japan proposed. D. Pearson; S ... 394
  - Boycott of Japanese goods; E, 211; E, 335; 341; E, 364; EP, 390; EP, 418; 427; EP, 462; E, 492 (see also 627); C, 516; EP, 546; EP, 675
  - Feared by Japan. F. Utley; S. ... 341
  - Brussels conference. O. G. Villard; S ... 505
    - Brussels conference; EP. ... 461
    - Condemns Japanese; EP. ... 546
    - Failure; EP ... 574
    - Prospects dark; EP. ... 490
    - Quick action needed; E. ... 421
  - Chiang Kai-shek; will he fight? E. ... 164
  - China's chance against Japan. M. S. Stewart; S. ... 262
  - China's hope; E. ... 677
  - Chinese defeat at Shanghai; EP. ... 546
  - Chinese resistance; EP. ... 209
  - Chinese resistance breaking; EP. ... 362
  - Chinese resistance firm; EP. ... 418
  - Course for United States, recommended. O. G. Villard; S. ... 292
  - Effect on Japanese homes. J. Groth; Ct ... 678
  - Embargo against China; E. ... 309
  - Fighting; EP ... 333
  - Hull and Eden seek a rabbit hole. Low; Ct ... 494
  - Invasion of north China by Japanese; EP ... 141
  - Japan loves China. J. Groth; Ct. ... 404
  - Japanese aims; E. ... 185
  - Japanese attacks continue; EP. ... 113
  - Japanese invasion of China; E. ... 231
  - Japanese progress slow; EP. ... 306
  - Japanese-Italian-Nazi alliance; E. ... 520
  - Knatchbull-Hugessen, Sir H., wounding by Japanese aviators; EP. ... 229
  - League of nations; feebleness. R. Dell; S ... 472
  - Mass murder in China; British and American "regret." Low; Ct. ... 587
  - Militarists, extreme, in Japan; EP. ... 701
  - Nanking, capture by Japanese, and atrocities; E. ... 677; EP. ... 701
  - Neutrality, American; E. ... 144
  - Panay, gunbot, sinking by Japanese; EP ... 673, 701
  - President Hoover, steamship, bombed by Chinese aviators; EP. ... 229
  - Relief for Chinese civilians. W. M. Chadbourne; C. ... 388
  - Setbacks for China in campaign; EP. ... 278
  - Shanghai, bombing of International settlement; EP. ... 181
  - Situation grave for China; E. ... 605
  - Stimson urges boycott of Japan; EP. ... 389; E. ... 391
  - War—east and west; E. ... 279
  - War in the east; E. ... 89
- Churches accused of Marxism, by Hearst and Hitler. I. F. Stone; S. ... 345
- Citizens' national committee, Johnstown; EP ... 86
  - Appeal to middle class; E. ... 117
- Civil liberties union. See American civil liberties union
- Civil rights
  - Anti-vigilante conferences in Flint; EP ... 182
  - Criminal syndicalism charge against P. Butash in Indiana dismissed. H. E. Baker; C. ... 180
  - LaFollette subcommittee work and report. O. G. Villard; S. ... 172
  - "Let freedom ring," issued by American civil liberties union; EP. ... 87
  - Southern attacks on; EP. ... 250
- Cleaners' strike. K. Dunn; C. ... 728
- Cleveland's best citizen, J. W. Raper. L. Adamic; S. ... 42
- Clough, Susan Pew
  - Seeks material for Pew biography; C. ... 208
- Coal mining, British. See Great Britain
- Coffee, Representative; bill for bureau of fine arts; E. ... 705
- Coffee. H Woodward; S. ... 717
- Coleman, McAlister
  - Hague—worried dictator; S. ... 687
- Colleges and universities, women's. O. G. Villard; S. ... 131
- Committee for industrial organization
  - American newspaper guild members approve affiliation; EP. ... 279
  - And independent steel companies; E. ... 5
  - Armistice with A. F. L., move for; E. ... 420
  - Assailed by American Nazis; EP. ... 86
  - Attack by General motors; EP. ... 141
  - Attack by Constitutional educational league; EP. ... 143
  - British, needed. H. J. Laski; S. ... 16
  - Controversy with A. F. L. in National Electric Products case; E. ... 252
  - Dallas tries terror against C. I. O. By G. Lambert; S. ... 376
  - Hague's declaration of war. M. Coleman; S. ... 687
  - Lewis radio report; EP. ... 249
  - Lippmann, W., the C. I. O. and a farmer-labor party; E. ... 143
  - Marine workers begin organization; EP ... 59
  - Michigan and Pittsburgh; difference between; EP. ... 30
  - O. K.'d by a steel man. L. Adamic; S ... 582
  - Peace conference with A. F. L.; EP, 462; EP, 491; EP, 518; EP, 630
  - Republic steel collects money from employees to fight C. I. O.; EP. ... 251
  - Seattle; struggle between Committee and Federation. C. Stevens; S. ... 239
  - Steel, big and little, and the C. I. O. By B. Stolberg; S. ... 119
  - Struggle with A. F. L.; E. ... 392
  - Tactics examined; E. ... 59
- Common Sense, changes view on third party. O. G. Villard; S. ... 267
- Communism; churches accused of Marxism, by Hearst and Hitler. I. F. Stone; S ... 345
- "Communists" at sea. F. Reisenberg; S. ... 432
- Cone, Governor, and Shoemaker case; E. ... 466
- Conflict, industrial, psychology of; material sought. G. W. Hartmann; C. ... 600
- Congress
  - Bills, desirable, killed; EP. ... 181
  - Committees of sabotage. M. Lerner; S ... 214
  - Filibuster, senate, government by; EP ... 29
  - Inquest; E. ... 212
  - Last-minute bills; EP. ... 161
  - Message to; EP. ... 545
  - Program for; E. ... 604
  - Sabotage, committees of. M. Lerner; S ... 214
  - Special session, do-nothing; E. ... 576
    - Issues before; EP. ... 518
    - Issues shaping themselves; EP. ... 489
    - Program; EP. ... 417
  - Tax cabal in. R. S. Allen; S. ... 606
- "Congress of American industry"; E. ... 677
- Consolidated Edison case, N. L. R. B. action in; EP. ... 547
- Constitution, American; sesquicentennial; needs change; EP. ... 277
  - Views of President Roosevelt; EP. ... 306; see also 416
- Constitutional educational league, and the C. I. O.; EP. ... 143
- Corporation tax. See Finance, public
- Country life; no time for work. O. G. Villard; S. ... 241
- Cremona, terror in. D. Carnevali; C. ... 488
- Crimes, sex, and the law. S. Glueck; S. ... 318
- Criminal syndicalism. See Civil rights
- Crippen, Harlan R.
  - Material on R. F. Pettigrew sought; C ... 416
- Cuba
  - Propaganda for Batista regime, in New York Herald Tribune; EP, 576; E. ... 603
  - Ruling on "American" goods from Japan. W. Robinson; C. ... 627
  - Terrorism continues; EP. ... 87
- Czecho-Slovakia;
  - Death of Masaryk; EP. ... 307
  - In memory of Masaryk. T. Mann; S. ... 373
  - Menaced by Nazis. H. C. Wolfe; S. ... 502
  - "Provokes" the Nazis. J. Groth; Ct. ... 504
  - Sudeten movement in danger; M. E. Ravage; S. ... 713

D

- Dabney, Virginius
  - Dixie rejects lynching; S. ... 579
- Daily Eagle, Brooklyn. See Brooklyn Daily Eagle
- Dallas tries terror. G. Lambert; S. ... 376
- Damsel in distress, a. M. Van Doren; MP. ... 696
- Dance
  - Bennington festival. P. Love; S. ... 226
  - Ideology. O. Burke; C. ... 139
  - Monte Carlo season. L. Kirstein; S. ... 541
- Dannenfelser, John M., junior
  - Discharge of Doctor E. Freeman because of American legion opposition to liberal views; C. ... 459
- Danube river. See Balkan countries
- Danubian states. See Central Europe
- Danzig, Spartakus in. H. Solow; C. ... 54
- Daughters of the American revolution in the schoolroom. M. B. Schnapper; S. ... 288
- Day at the races, a. M. Van Doren; MP. ... 53
- Death and politics; E. ... 88
- Dekker, H. C.
  - Bankers, source of power; C. ... 572; see also 446; C. ... 700
- Delbos tour of central Europe; EP. ... 703
- Dell, Robert
  - Fascism's debt to Paris; S. ... 552; see also C. ... 727
  - Feeble Geneva; S. ... 472
  - France, syndicalism possible; S. ... 188
  - Hitler and Halifax; S. ... 685
  - Vansittart, Sir R., Europe's arbiter; S ... 93
- Democracy; stolen ride by Japan, Germany and Italy. J. Groth; Ct. ... 550
- Democratic party, cleavage in; EP. ... 209
- Denmark. See Scandinavia
- Deportations; Goepel case; EP. ... 519
  - Sallitto and Ferrero cases; EP. ... 519
- Depression. See Economic conditions
- Detroit
  - C. I. O. candidate defeated for mayor; EP ... 489
  - Case against attackers of labor organizers dismissed; EP. ... 602
  - Election, primary; labor vote divided; EP ... 390
  - Labor slate. J. Seidman; S. ... 260; See also C. ... 360
- Dewey, Thomas E. See New York city
- deWilde, John C.
  - Doctor Schacht and Germany's future; S ... 402
- Dictatorships; Roosevelt's Chicago speech; E ... 391
- Diplomatic service, American. O. G. Villard; S ... 689
  - Shake-up; EP. ... 674
- Divorce. See Great Britain
- Dodd, William E., resignation; EP. ... 674
- Dominican republic; killing of Haitians on border and plans of Trujillo; EP. 518; E ... 577
- Doriot, Jacques, would-be French fuehrer. L. Lore; S. ... 369
- Douglas, William O. By M. Lerner; S. ... 429
  - New head of SEC; EP. ... 334
- Drug, fatal; EP. ... 462
- Druker, Harry
  - New wrinkle in picketing; C. ... 159
- Duel, Robert W.
  - Mass mind, awakening; C. .304; see also 176
- Duffield, Margaret
  - Volunteers in Spain; C. ... 700; see also C ... 599
- Duker, Samuel
  - God and Doctor Buchman; S. ... 150
- Dunn, Katharine
  - Cleaners' strike; C. ... 728
- Dust bowl, the. W. Gropper; S. ... 194

E

- Eagle, Daily, Brooklyn. See Brooklyn Daily Eagle
- Earhart, Amelia; EP. ... 58, 59
- Economic conditions; economy, no time for. K. Hutchison; S. ... 640
- Economic planning, national, involved in farm bill; EP. ... 602
- Economy, no time for. K. Hutchison; S. ... 640
- Education. See Colleges and universities; Great Britain; Schools
- Ekern, H. O.
  - Wheeler of Montana; C. ... 415
    - see also ... 217, 304

- Electric power. See Power and power industry
- Elk City community hospital. M. Schadid; C 55
- Embassies, picketing of; EP........ 182
- "End poverty in the United States," Epius movement. T. A. Johnson; C...... 276
- England. See Great Britain
- "Epius" emerges. T. A. Johnson; C...... 276
- Epstein, Abraham, inconsistent on social security. L. A. Beck; C..........699; see also EP........ 463
- Ethiopia; Italy's disgrace. F. Beaufort-Palmer; C........ 488
- Europe
  - Arbiter, Sir Robert Vansittart. R. Dell; S 93
  - Central. See Central Europe
  - Hope in; E........ 364
  - Map of today; E........ 33
  - War, preparation for. L. Lore; S...91, 127
- Evans, Mrs. Glendower; death; life and work. O. G. Villard; S........ 719

F

- Far-off hills, the. J. W. Krutch; D........ 484
- Farm bill. See Agriculture
- Farmer-labor party; Lippmann, W., the C. I. O. and a farmer-labor party; E 143
- Farmers and farms. See Agriculture
- Fascism
  - Aided by French foreign policy. R. Dell; S.......552; see also C....... 727
  - Latin-American; loses ground. G. Arbaiza; C........ 159
  - Militance and realism. E. B. Ashton; C..........139; see also........ 50
  - Outrages, "minor"; EP........ 334
  - War as means of stopping spread. A. M. Bingham; C.....571; see also.... 495
  - See also Italy
- Father Malachy's miracle. J. W. Krutch; D 624
- Federal housing administration. See Housing
- Feinfeld, T.
  - Boycott of Japanese goods; C......516; see also 427
- Fendt, Francis Kane
  - Catholic layman on Spain; C........ 275
- Ferrero, Vincent, deportation case; EP... 519
- Feuchtwanger, Lion
  - German persecution of writers; S...... 103
- Filene, Edward A., death; EP........ 335
- Filibuster, government by; EP........ 29
- Films. See Moving pictures
- Finance, bankers, source of power. H. C. Dekker; C...571; see also 446; C... 700
  - Money, goods and bankers; book review......446; see also.........572, 700
  - Money, source of power of bankers; H. C. Dekker; C...572; see also 446; C 700
- Finance, public
  - Balancing of budget, by cutting relief appropriations; EP........ 629
  - California chain-store tax, repeal. H. Woodward; S....638; correction.... 728
  - Corporation tax, movement against; EP 574
  - Economy, no time for. K. Hutchison; S 640
  - Tax bill, impending; EP........ 461
  - Tax on foreigners' capital earnings, no solution for American gold problem; EP........ 3
  - Tax cabal in congress. R. S. Allen; S 606
  - Tax reduction, movement for; E...... 493
  - Taxation; dodgers. F. R. Barkley; S.. 9
  - Taxation; Wall street and White house. R. S. Allen; S........ 467
- Fischer, Louis
  - Lesson for the democracies; Nyon and Geneva conferences on Spain; S..... 395
  - Loyalist Spain gathers strength; S.... 7
  - Loyalist Spain takes offensive; S....62; see also EP........ 58
  - Madrid's foreign defenders; S........ 235
  - Pirates and British policy; S........ 282
  - Spain; Franco cannot win; S........ 148
  - Spain, internal politics; S.........470; see also C........ 543
- Flint, Michigan; anti-vigilante conferences; EP 182
- Florida; peonage, legal. O. K. Armstrong; S............195; EP........ 183
  - Shoemaker case; E........ 466
- Food, high cost. R. Brindze; S........ 612
- Ford, Julia Ellsworth
  - Cruelty toward Japanese in California; C 516
- Ford motor company; violence by "service men"; EP........ 57
- Foundations, time to make hay; EP....... 675
- France
  - Anglo-French negotiations; EP........ 601
  - Blackmailed by Italy in the Mediterranean; E........ 547
  - Cabinet, new, faces financial crisis; EP 1
  - Chautemps, Camille; after him, what? M. E. Ravage; S........ 71
  - Doriot, would-be fuehrer. L. Lore; S.. 369
  - Financial crisis; EP........ 1
  - Foreign policy's aid to fascism. R. Dell; S..........552; see also C........ 727
  - Foreign policy; effects of Delbos tour of central Europe; EP........ 703
  - Nazi instructions to newspaper men in France. J. Mullen; C........ 179
  - Politics; troubled; EP........ 603
  - Politics, what next? M. E. Ravage; S 580
  - Popular front program let down; EP.. 363
  - Syndicalism possible. R. Dell; S...... 188
- Franco, General. See Spain
- Frank, Jerome, appointment to S. E. C.; EP 631
- Freed, Grace
  - Brother a prisoner of Franco; C...599; see also C........ 700
- Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
- Freedom of the press. See Newspapers
- Freeman, Doctor Ellis, discharged because of American legion opposition to liberal views, J. M. Dannenfelser, junior; C 459
- French without tears. J. W. Krutch; D.... 411
- Frivold, Hjalmer E.
  - Presidential timber; Hull suggested; C. 415

G

- G., M.
  - Pins and needles; D........ 697
- Gadsden, Alabama. M. S. Stewart; S...... 69
- Gaw, Arthur
  - Money, goods and bankers; C......700; See also 446; C........ 572
- General motors corporation, profits for quarter; EP........ 141
- Geneva. See League of nations
- George and Margaret. J. W. Krutch; D... 356
- Germany
  - Aggression, bounty for; E........ 633
  - Alliance with Italy and Japan; E...... 520
  - Architecture. D. Haskell; Arc...... 457
  - Art in the new Germany. J. Groth; Ct. 433
  - Art under the swastika. E. Berry; C... 359
  - Authors, persecution of. L. Feuchtwanger; S 103
  - Churches accused of Marxism. I. F. Stone; S........ 345
  - Concessions, possible, to Hitler; EP... 601
  - Czechoslovakia "provokes" the Nazis. J. Groth; Ct........ 504
  - Finances; Schacht steps out; EP...... 490
  - Freedom, campaign against; EP...... 30
  - Future, and Doctor Schacht. J. C. deWilde; S........ 402
  - Göttingen, ghost of. E. J. Lasky; C... 84
  - Great Britain, relations with; EP..... 601
  - Great Britain, relations with; Halifax talks with Hitler; EP........ 574
  - Hitler and Halifax. R. Dell; S....... 685
  - Hitler and Mussolini meet; E........ 336
  - Jews. See Jews
  - Königsberg, cruiser, suppressed revolt on; EP 31
  - Loan, American, sought; EP........ 2
  - Mussolini, tool of Hitler. M. E. Ravage; S........ 713
  - Nazi "champions of minority rights." J. Groth; Ct........ 504
  - Nazi exhibitionism; E........ 90
  - Nazi instructions to newspaper men in France. J. Mullen; C........ 179
  - Nazi "journalism" abroad; E........ 213
  - Nazis demand recognition of party men in foreign lands; EP........ 210
  - News service, Nazi. A. Henderson; C.. 599
  - Nürnberg Nazi congress; American presence at; EP........ 230
  - Nürnberg congress; foreign diplomats countenance attacks on democracy; EP 278
  - Opposition to nazism, underground. S. Spero; C........ 699
  - Protestant church, campaign against; EP 30
  - Religion; persecution of Catholic church continues; EP........ 87
  - Religion; Protestant revolt against Hitler grows; EP........ 162
  - Request for permission for anti-Nazi propaganda in Germany. L. M. Birkhead; C........ 179
  - Strain seen in various relations; EP... 631
  - Stuttgart congress on Germans living abroad, and propaganda in foreign countries; EP........ 250
  - Turns to the east. H. C. Wolfe; S..... 502
  - War, preparation for. L. Lore; S..... 91
- Ghost of Yankee Doodle. J. W. Krutch; D.. 663
- Gipsy labor. W. Gropper; S........ 321
- Girdler, Tom. See Republic Steel corporation
- Gitin, Joseph
  - Pogrom in Germany; C...516; see also 423
- Glueck, Sheldon
  - Sex crimes and the law; S........ 318
- God and the liberals. H. Broun; S....... 173
- Godwin, R. L.
  - Perilous times; praise for The Nation; C 360
- Goepel, Hans, deportation case; EP........ 519
- Gold; holdings, American; tax on foreigners' capital earnings no solution; EP.. 3
  - Liberated by United States treasury; EP 278
- Golden boy. J. W. Krutch; D........ 539
- Gonorrhea. See Venereal disease
- Göttingen university; bicentenary; speech against democratic freedom; EP..... 30
  - Ghost of. E. J. Lasky; C........ 84
- Government of lawyers; E........ 366
- Great Britain
  - Anglo-French negotiations, and relations with Germany; EP........ 601
  - Anti-British hysteria in the United States; E......253; see also C...... 331
  - Blackmailed by Italy in the Mediterranean; E........ 547
  - Chamberlain policy toward fascist rulers; EP 142
  - Coal bill; government to buy mines; EP.........546; see also C........ 628
  - Divorce; Herbert bill; EP........ 3
    - Herbert plan wins; EP........ 115
  - Education in. G. Samuels; C........ 572
  - Germany, relations with; Halifax talks with Hitler; EP........ 574
  - Halifax, Lord, talks with Hitler; EP... 574
  - Hitler and Halifax. R. Dell; S....... 685
  - Labor needs a C. I. O. By H. J. Laski; S........ 16
  - Labor party and the Trade union congress. Low; Ct........ 560
  - Labor party comes to life. H. J. Laski; S 559
  - Labor party in retreat. H. J. Laski; S.........343; see also C........ 487
  - Pirates in the Mediterranean, and British policy. L. Fischer; S........ 282
  - Trade pact with the United States, negotiations; EP........ 573
  - Vansittart, Europe's arbiter. R. Dell; S 93
- Greece, mailed fist in. J. Bach, junior; S.. 197
- Grobin, Allen
  - Johnstown, story of; S.....37; see also C 138
- Gropper, William
  - Dust bowl, the; S........ 194
  - Gipsy labor; S........ 321
  - Out west; S........ 96
  - Visit to Youngstown; S............14, 15
- Grosz, George
  - Manifest destiny; drawing........ 712
- Groth, John
  - Art in the new Germany; Ct........ 433
  - "Champions of minority rights"; Ct... 504
  - Chinese-Japanese war; effect on Japanese homes; Ct........ 678
  - Christmas, 1937; return of the three wise men; Ct........ 706
  - Democracy; stolen ride by Japan, Germany and Italy; Ct........ 550
  - Japan loves China; Ct........ 404
  - Legion comes to town; Ct........ 339
  - Mussolini plan for withdrawing volunteers from Spain; Ct........ 474
  - Spain; behind the enemy lines; Ct... 378
  - War, bumper crop foreseen; Ct........ 614
- Guérard, Albert
  - France, foreign policy; C.........727; see also 552

H

- Haggin, B. H.
  - Music, recorded; S............25, 81, 137, 178, 247, 274, 414, 484, 540, 596, 666, 726
  - Salzburg, 1937; M........ 301
- Hague, Mayor Frank, worried dictator. M. Coleman; S........ 687
  - Ordnance against civil liberty; EP.... 602
- Haiti. See Dominican republic
- Halifax, Lord. See Great Britain
- Hanes, John W., appointment to S. E. C.; EP 631
- Hanighen, Frank C.
  - McFadyean, A., and Spain; C....... 110
- Harlem. See Negroes
- Hartmann, George W.
  - Seeks material on psychology of industrial conflict; C........ 600
- Haskell, Douglas
  - Architecture, German; Arc........ 457
  - Art, popular; A........ 725
  - Photography, candid; S........ 597
- Hayden planetarium shows end of the world; EP 420
- Hazell, Cecil
  - End of a red-cap; S...499; see also C.. 628
- Hearst, William Randolph; accuses churches of Marxism. I. F. Stone; S........ 345
  - New York American, passing of; E... 6
  - Withdrawal of proposed bond issues; EP 250
- Henderson, Alexander
  - Nazi news service; C........ 599

Henson, Matthew. C. McKay; C......571; see also 437
Herald Tribune, New York. See New York Herald Tribune
Herbert, A. P.; divorce bill; EP...3; EP... 115
Herbst, Josephine
  Spanish village; S.......... 169
Herskovits, Melville J.
  Replies to criticism of review; C...728; see also 382, 516
Hertzberg, Sidney
  A. F. of L. gets "militant"; S.......... 425
Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
Hoffman, Charles N.
  How to make Girdler sign; C.......... 275
Hook, Sydney; his review of "The conquest of power," by A. Weisbord; C...416; see also 270
Hooray for what. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 697
Hoover, Mrs. C. M.
  Johnstown strike, reporting of; C..138; see also.......... 37
Hoover, Herbert; honorary membership in American press society; EP.......... 547 Housing
  and confidence. C. Slater; C.......... 727
  Ickes record a public scandal; E...254; see also C.......... 275
  New York city; dispute between mayor and housing authority; EP.......... 630
  Politics and public housing, New York city; E.......... 578
  Politics lifts head in the question; EP.. 602
  Straus, N., appointment; EP......462; correction 516
  Wagner-Steagall bill passed; EP.......... 162
Howard, Kinsey
  Wheeler, Senator Burton K.; C....304; see also 217, 415
Howe, Edgar Watson, death; EP.......... 390
Howe, Quincy
  Great Britain and the United States; C..........331; see also.......... 253
Hudeburg, Charles
  Matinal; P.......... 200
Hughan, Jessie Wallace
  Pacifists' dilemma over Spanish civil war; C.......82; see also C.......... 387
Hughes, Charles Evans; honorary membership in American press society; EP.. 547
Hull, Cordell, suggested for president. H. E. Frivold; C.......... 415
Humphries, Rolfe; review of book, "And Spain sings"; credit to M. J. Benardete; C........276; see also.......... 226
Hutchison, Keith
  No time for economy; S.......... 640

I

I. W. W. See Industrial workers of the world
Ickes, Secretary Harold, and housing; E..........254; C.......... 275
I'd rather be right. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 567
Ides of March, American. A. MacLeish; S 616
Illinois; silicosis cause for discharge. N. Nuttall; C.......... 331
Immigration, lowering of bars opposed. F. B. Latham; C.......... 670
Index, New York trust company, on immigration and labor; C.......... 670
Indiana; criminal syndicalism charge against P. Butash dismissed. H. E. Baker; C 180
Industrial conflict, psychology, material sought. G. W. Hartmann; C.......... 600
Industrial workers of the world, and Scandinavian labor parties. F. Johnson and L. Lore; C.....459; see also.......... 315
  In the northwest; lumber strike. R. M. K.; letter.......... 543
Institute of human relations, Williamstown. O. G. Villard; S.......... 199
International capitalism. E. Janeway; S....312; see also C....672; EP.... 703
International relations; America's aloofness; New York Times editorial. O. G. Villard; S.......... 6
  Bounty for aggressors; E.......... 633
International relief association. S. Spero; C 699
Irish free state; constitution adopted; EP.. 58
Irwin, Ben
  Station wagon needed to aid touring company presenting plays on Spain; C 600
Isolation. See Neutrality
Italy
  Alliance with Germany and Japan; E.. 520
  Blackmails Great Britain and France in Mediterranean; E.......... 547
  Cremona, fascist terrorism in. D. Carnevali; C 488
  Fascists celebrate "march on Rome"; EP 491
  Loan, American, sought; EP.......... 2
  Mussolini and Hitler meet; E.......... 336
  Mussolini, tool of Hitler. M. E. Ravage; S.......... 713
  Poverty. D. Carnevali; C.......... 359
  Rosselli brothers, murder. M. Ascoli; S 10
  Withdrawal from League of nations; EP 673
It's love I'm after. M. Van Doren; MP.... 566

J

Jackson, Sidney L.
  Imperialism in Palestine; C......179; see also E.......... 61
  Socialism or labor control? C......628; see also 546
Janeway, Eliot
  Capitalist international, the; S.....312; see also C..........672; EP.......... 703
  Denbigh, earl of, favors Franco; C..........672; see also.......... 312
  Japan's dilemma; S.......... 39
  Railroads, ruin of; S.......... 555
Japan
  Alliance with Italy and Germany; E... 520
  "American" goods from Japan. W. Robinson; C.......... 627
  And the Philippines. J. S. Allen; S.. 610
  Dilemma. E. Janeway; S.......... 39
  Militarists, extreme; EP.......... 701
    See also Chinese-Japanese war; Russo-Japanese relations
Japanese in California, mistreated. J. E. Ford; C.......... 516
Jehovah's witnesses; win and lose in fight for religious liberty; EP.......... 631
Jersey City: Mayor Hague, worried dictator. M. Coleman; S.......... 687 Ordinance against civil liberty; EP.... 602
Jews
  Anti-semitism; threat to liberty everywhere; EP.......... 603
  German, fate of. P. S. Bernstein; S.........423; see also C.......... 516
  German; persecutions continue; EP.... 363
  Polish persecution; EP.......... 463
Jingoes. See War
Johnson, Frank
  Scandinavian labor parties and the I. W. W.; C......459; see also.......... 315
Johnson, Theodore A.
  "Epius" emerges; C.......... 276
  Johnstown, Pennsylvania. See Steel—Strikes
Journalism. See Newspapers
Julius Caesar. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 594

K

K., R. M.
  Wobblies in the northwest; lumber strike; C.......... 543
Kennedy, Joseph P.; appointment as ambassador; EP.......... 674
  See also Shipping
Kirstein, Lincoln
  Dance, Monte Carlo season; S.......... 541
Knatchbull-Hugessen, Sir Hughe, wounding by Japanese aviators; EP.......... 229
Königsberg, cruiser. See Germany
Krutch, Joseph Wood
  Amphitryon 38; D.......... 539
  Angel island; D.......... 484
  Antony and Cleopatra; D.......... 567
  "Beauty's rose"; explanations of an author; S.......... 132
  Blow ye winds; D.......... 356
  Far-off hills, the; D.......... 484
  Father Malachy's miracle; D.......... 624
  French without tears; D.......... 411
  George and Margaret; D.......... 356
  Ghost of Yankee Doodle; D.......... 663
  Golden boy; D.......... 539
  Hooray for what; D.......... 697
  I'd rather be right; D.......... 567
  Julius Caesar; D.......... 594
  Madame Bovary; D.......... 624
  Many mansions; D.......... 514
  Of mice and men; D.......... 663
  Processional; D.......... 455
  Star wagon, the; D.......... 411
  Susan and God; D.......... 455
  To Quito and back; D.......... 411
  Virginia; D.......... 303
Ku klux klan. See Black, H. L.

L

Labor
  Black labor-standards bill; E..........144
  British. See Great Britain
  Control of industry, or socialism? S. L. Jackson; C......628; see also.......... 546
  Gipsy. W. Gropper; S.......... 321
  Harlem. C. McKay; S.......... 399
  Immigration, lowering of bars opposed. F. B. Latham; C.......... 670
  In politics; unity needed; E.......... 522
  In the elections; EP.......... 489
  National association of manufacturers, attitude; E.......... 677
  Railway. See Railroads
  "Right to work." F. Lundberg; C.... 672
  Skilled, "protecting." F. B. Latham; C. 670
  Wages-and-hours bill. R. S. Allen; S.. 63
    Ceiling and floor; E.......... 632
    Likely to pass; EP.......... 67
    Party splits; EP.......... 702
Labor party, British. See Great Britain
Labor relations board. See National labor relations board
Labor unions
  Consolidated Edison case, N. L. R. B. action in; EP.......... 547
  Gadsden, Alabama, tough city. M. S. Stewart; S.......... 69
  Ohio labor tries the ballot. D. M. Pond; S 219
  Organizers beaten by Ford "service men"; EP.......... 57
  Picketing; new wrinkle in. H. Druker; C 159
  Picketing; New York state decision a virtual victory for labor; EP.......... 674
  Violence, law, and labor; E.......... 59
    See also Strikes: American federation of labor; Committee for industrial organization
LaFollette subcommittee. See Steel—Strikes
Lafontaine, Henri
  Ossietzky, case of; C.......... 388
LaGuardia, Mayor Fiorello H. See New York city
Lambert, George
  Dallas tries terror; S.......... 376
Lancer spy. M. Van Doren; MP.......... 566
Laski, Harold J.
  British labor comes to life; S.......... 559
  British labor in retreat; S......343; see also C.......... 487
  Wanted: A British C. I. O.; S.......... 16
Lasky, Elvin J.
  Göttingen, ghost of; C.......... 84
Late Mathias Paschal. M. Van Doren; MP 627
Latham, Frank B.
  "Protecting" skilled labor; C.......... 670
Latin America; dictatorships; E.......... 548
  United States—aggressive good neighbor. G. Arbaiza; S.......... 285
Lawson, H. N.
  Silicosis, prevention; C............600; see also 331; C.......... 554
Lawyers, government of; E.......... 366
League of nations
  Failure to re-elect Spain to council; EP 306
  Feebleness in face of Chino-Japanese and Spanish situations. R. Dell; S.. 473
  Withdrawal of Italy; EP.......... 673
League of women shoppers of Chicago; C.. 700
Lederer, N. C.
  Help for needy authors; C.......... 180
Left prepares for war. L. Lore; S.......... 643
Legion, American. See American Legion
Lehman, Herbert H., opposes Roosevelt supreme court plan; EP.......... 85
Lerner, Max
  Black, Hugo—a personal history; S.. 367; see also 515
  "Black Tuesday"; S.......... 468
  Congress, committees of sabotage; S.... 214
  Fear hits the new deal; S.......... 551
  Roosevelt's next move; S.......... 679
  Tammany's last stand; S.......... 255
  Third party for 1940?; S.......... 234
  Wall street's new mentor; S.......... 429
"Let freedom ring," issued by American civil liberties union; EP.......... 87
Levenson, Gabriel H.
  Attacks on Soviet Russia; C......627; see also 531
Levenstein, Aaron
  Maine is not in the union; S.......... 97
Levin, Harry
  Minnesota, divided front in; S.......... 346
Lewis, John L. See Committee for industrial organization
Liberal party, new; postponement of. O. G. Villard; S.......... 267
Liberals
  American, and the Spanish war. H. F. Reissig and O. G. Villard; C...110; see also 46; C.......... 208
  And God. H. Broun; S.......... 173
  California, meet. F. Ragle; C.......... 600
  Liberalism, definition of. O. G. Villard; S 588
  Organization for writing letters advocated. A. Schenkel; C.......... 360
Liberties, civil. See Civil rights
Liberty, religious. See Religious liberty
Life of Emile Zola, the. M. Van Doren; MP 246
Lindner, H. M.
  Aid for silicotics; C......544; see also 331; C.......... 600
Lippmann, W., the C. I. O. and a farmer-labor party; E.......... 143
Lips, Julius E. See Book review section of the index
Little entente. See Central Europe
Loans, American, sought for Germany and Italy; EP.......... 2
Longo, John R.
  Injunction against Hudson county newspaper strikers; C.......... 670

- Look, liberalism; EP 363
- Lord and Thomas, defeat of California chain-store tax. H. Woodward; S.....634; correction 728
- Lore, Ludwig
  - France's would-be fuehrer; S........ 369
  - Left prepares for war; S........ 643
  - Scandinavia's "new democracy"; S..315; see also C........ 459
  - Will Europe go to war?; S..........91, 127
- Love, Paul
  - Bennington dance festival; S........ 226
- Low
  - British labor party and the Trade union congress; Ct........ 560
  - Hull and Eden seek a rabbit hole; Ct.. 494
  - Mass murder in China; Ct........ 587
- Ludendorff, General, death; EP........ 703
- Ludlow resolution for referendum on war; EP 702
- Lumber; strike in the northwest by the I. W. W. Letter by R. M. K....... 543
- Lundberg, Ferdinand
  - "Right to work"; C........ 672
  - Stock market crash, cause of; C.. 487; see also 397
- Lynchings; anti-lynching bill, senate filibuster against; EP........ 574
  - South rejects lynching. V. Dabney; S.. 579
- Lyon, Jean
  - Shopping guide for boycotters; S.. 427; see also C........ 516

M

- M——, Mary
  - Catholic speaks her mind; S........ 683
- MacDonald, Ramsay; career and death. O. G. Villard; S........ 561
- MacLeish, Archibald
  - Caesar; D 617
- Madame Bovary. J. W. Krutch; D........ 624
- Madrid. See Spain
- Maine not in the union. A. Levenstein; S.. 97
- Mann, Thomas
  - In memory of Masaryk; S........ 373
- Manufacturers' association and labor; E.... 677
- Many mansions. J. W. Krutch; D........ 514
- Map of today; E........ 31
- Marine, merchant. See Shipping
- Marine workers. See Shipping
- Maritime commission. See Shipping
- Marshall, Margaret
  - Hansen, H., and other book reviewers; S 479
- Marx, Karl T
  - Denies connection with Nazism; C..... 54
- Marxism. See Communism
- Mary Bonfield, the, frightful case of. R. Bacchelli; S........ 380
- Marzani, Carl A.
  - Executions, soviet; C..206; see also.. 46
- Masaryk, Thomas G., death; EP........ 307
  - In memory. T. Mann; S........ 373
- Mass mind, awakening. R. W. Duel; C..304; see also 176
- Massachusetts; publication of WPA guidebook revives Sacco-Vanzetti case; EP. 211
- Massengill, S. E., Co., elixir sulfanilamide; EP 462
- Mayors' conference discusses employment; EP 573
- McCausland, Elizabeth
  - Save the arts project; S........ 67
- McFadyean, Andrew
  - Spain, views on; C........ 110
- McFeeters, Alan
  - Contended red cap; C............628; see also 499
- McKay, Claude
  - Labor in Harlem; S........ 399
  - Negroes; heroes and valets. M. Henson; C...........571; see also........ 437
- McNeil, James
  - Right turn in Canada; S........ 497
- Meat; strike of kosher butchers in New York; EP 419
- Medicine
  - Cooperative, proposed for New York state; EP 675
  - "Organized medicine" sees red. J. Rorty; S..........500; see also C........ 670
  - Social; war in the American medical association; EP 519
  - Survey by California medical association and Works progress administration; report; E 634
- Mediterranean, blackmail in; E........ 547
- Mellon, Andrew W., death; E........ 232
- Memorial day massacre in Chicago. See Steel—Strikes—Republic steel corporation
- Memphis Press-Scimitar, attitude on supreme court. D. Mullen; C..248; see also.. 47
- Mencken, Henry L., and O. G. Villard. O. G. Villard; S........ 379
- Mentally ill in America. D. Perea; C..304; see also 225
- Merchant marine. See Shipping
- Mexico
  - American money in Mexico. L. O. Prendergast; S 585
  - Farm marketing, government to control; EP 3
  - New deal in. L. O. Prendergast; S..... 237
  - Railways nationalized; EP........ 3
- Michigan, industrial relations bill, and Governor Murphy; EP........ 142
- Mickey mouse causes furore in Yugoslavia; EP 631
- Middle class, open letter to; E........ 117
- Miller, Arthur
  - On makers of the United States constitution; C.....416; see also EP..... 306
- Miller, Loren
  - Ambulance chasing; S........ 129
  - Negroes; Brawleyism; C..571; see also 437
- Minnesota; Benson shuts out Pinkertons; EP 142
  - Divided front in. H. Levin; S........ 346
- Mohr, Esther J
  - Chicago women shoppers; C........ 700
- Money. See Finance
- Montana; Wheeler faces the music. R. L. Neuberger; S....217; see also C.... 304
- Morgan, Lewis Henry, and A. F. Bandelier; letters sought. L. A. White; C...... 180
- Mortgages, farm. See Agriculture
- Morocco, nationalist movement; EP........ 490
- Mother-love; Dr. Neilson's opinion; EP... 575
- Moving pictures
  - Pictures of the year; estimate of. M. Van Doren; S........ 158
  - Writing contemporary history. B. Belitt; S 557
    - See also Belitt, B; Van Doren, M. (for reviews)
    - See also Censorship
- Mullen, Dale
  - Memphis Press-Scimitar; C........248; see also 47
- Mullen, J.
  - Nazi instructions to newspaper men in France; C........ 179
- Murphy, Frank. See Michigan
- Murray, Robert Hammond
  - Old Gold mine; C....331; see also.... 231
- Music; Salzburg, 1937. B. M. Haggin; M... 301
- Music, recorded. See Haggin, B. H.
- Mussolini, Benito. See Italy
- Mussolini, Vittorio, visit to America; E.... 393

N

- NLRB. See National labor relations board
- Nansen office, passing; EP 3
- Nation, The
  - And Mr. Black. M. Weker; C......359; see also 278
  - Appraisal by the New Masses; EP..... 631
  - Attitude toward Soviet Russia attacked by the New Masses; EP........ 631
  - Broun, H., moves to the New Republic; EP 252
  - Changes, editorial; EP........ 183
  - Critical view of. L. Rosenthal; C...... 208
  - "Epistles," not "letters." Al-Ford Ibn Roose; C........ 544
  - History. O. G. Villard; S........ 18
  - Praised for aid in perilous times. R. L. Godwin; C 360
  - Praised for article on Detroit. P. H. O'Brien; C......360; see also...... 260
- National association of manufacturers, and labor; E 677
- National citizens' committee, Johnstown, Pennsylvania; EP 86
- National electric products corporation; A. F. L. and C. I. O. controversy; E 252
- National labor relations board
  - Action in Consolidated Edison Case; EP 547
  - Attacks by A. F. L.; EP........ 362
  - Attacks on; EP.........114; E........ 252
  - Deficit appropriation; EP........ 210
  - No interference with liberty of the press; decision in Allis-Chalmers case; EP 630
- National resources committee on technological trends and social policy report; EP 86
- Nazis
  - American; camps; EP..............86, 114
  - American; challenge to American labor; E 310
  - American; two denials. G. S. Viereck and K. T. Marx; C........ 54
  - And British labor. R. Vambery; C..487; see also 343
  - "German-American." O. G. Villard; S. 530
    - See also Germany
- Negroes
  - Brawleyism. L. Miller; C..571; see also 437
  - Harlem; labor steps out. C. McKay; S. 399
  - Heroes and valets; M. Henson. C. McKay; C........571; see also....... 437
  - Red-cap, end of a. C. Hazell; S..499; see also C........ 628
  - Scottsboro case:
    - Behind the scenes. M. Shapiro; S.. 170
    - Four defendants freed; battle only half won; EP........ 114
    - Wright, A., letter from; C........ 159
- Neilson, William A., opinion on mother-love; EP 575
- Neuberger, Richard L.
  - Wheeler faces the music; S.......217; see also C........ 304
  - A Portland, Oregon, man. A. A. Tarlow; C 140
- Neutrality
  - Failure of isolation. R. L. Buell; S 709; see also E 704, 707
  - Far east, neutrality in; E 144
  - Myth, dangerous. G. Stone; S....283; see also C 331
  - Plus socialism. N. Thomas; S.....707; see also E......................704, 709
  - Roosevelt's Chicago speech. O. G. Villard; S 434
  - United States isolation; case against. I. F. Stone; S...495; see also C... 571
- New deal. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
- New masses on The Nation; EP........ 631
- New York American, passing of; E....... 6
- New York city
  - Election:
    - City or tiger?; E........ 464
    - Dewey candidacy; EP........ 182
    - Downfall of Tammany and future of LaGuardia; E........ 491
    - Features of the election; EP...... 390
    - Vote frauds found in counting of ballots on proportional representation offices; EP 519
  - Mayoralty election; LaGuardia, Mayor, re-election supported. O. G. Villard; S 101, 478
    - Mayoralty election; Tammany's last stand. M. Lerner; S........ 255
    - Mayoralty primary campaign; Wagner besought by Tammany; EP. 29
    - Mayoralty primary campaign; EP 57, 114, 162
    - Mayoralty primary campaign; national issues in primary campaign; EP 230
    - Mayoralty primary campaign; result; E 309
  - Housing, public and politics; E........ 578
    - Dispute between mayor and housing authority; EP 630
  - LaGuardia, Fiorello H., future of; E... 491
- New York Herald Tribune, propaganda for Batista regime; EP.....576; E..... 603
- New York state; constitutional convention. O. G. Villard; S........ 615
  - Insurance law, proposed amendment for cooperative medicine; EP 675
- New York stock exchange. See Stocks
- New York Times; "America's aloofness"; editorial on. O. G. Villard; S....... 646
- New York trust company's Index on immigration and labor; C........ 670
- New York university; government interference with academic freedom; EP..463; see also C........ 699
- Newspaper guild. See Newspapers
- Newspapers
  - American newspaper guild:
    - Brooklyn Daily Eagle strike; EP.. 602
    - Members approve affiliation with CIO; EP 279
    - Publishers' statement on. H. Broun; S........47; see also C........ 248
    - Referendum on joining C. I. O. and other questions; E 165
    - Rival organization, American press society; EP 547
    - Strike against Bayonne Times; injunction. J. R. Longo; C....... 670
  - American press society, organized to fight Newspaper guild; EP........ 547
  - Freedom of the press; no interference by N. L. R. B.; EP..............630, 674
    - Not threatened in Barclay-Weirton case; EP 674
    - Publishers and "free press." H. Broun; S....47; see also C.... 248
    - "Threatened" again—by the radio. R. Brindze; S 98
  - Nazi instructions to German newspaper men in France. J. Mullen; C........ 179
    - See also Germany
- Nine-power conference, Brussels. See Chinese-Japanese war
- Nobel peace prize, award to Viscount Cecil; EP 576
- Noona, Fred; EP 58, 59
- Norway. See Scandinavia
- Nothing sacred. M. Van Doren; MP....... 696
- Nürnberg congress. See Germany
- Nuttall, Nelson
  - Fired for silicosis; C..............331; see also C......................544, 600
- Nyon conference. See Spain

O

- O'Brien, Patrick H.
  - Thanks The Nation for article on Detroit; C........360; see also........ 260
- O'Brien, R. C.
  - Radio reviewers suggested; C........ 699
- Of mice and men. J. W. Krutch; D....... 663
- Ohio labor tries the ballot. D. M. Pond; S 219
- Ohio league for constitutional rights, an authentic civil-liberties organization. R. E. Matthews; C..248; see also.. 166
- Old-age pensions; Washington state old-age pension union; EP 211

Old Gold puzzle contest; EP...........231; see also C 331
Ortner, Harry
  Against boycott of Japanese goods; C...........627; see also........... 492
Ossietzky, case of. H. Lafontaine; C....... 388
Out west. W. Gropper; S.................. 96
Oxford conference on church, community and state; EP...................... 87
Oxford group; God and Doctor Buchman. S. Duker; S 150

P

Pacificism, and revolution. J. W. Hughan on Spain. S. Romer; C.........387; see also C......................... 82
  Dilemma, over Spanish civil war. J. W. Hughan; C......82; see also C...... 387
Palestine
  Disorders and possibilities; EP........ 419
  Partition, proposed, between Arabs and Jews; EP..3; E..61 (see also C..179); EP 115
  Partition plan gains ground; EP...... 210
  Pogroms or partition. P. S. Bernstein; S 607
  Zionism in extremis. H. Solow; S...... 125
Pan America. See Latin America
Panay, gunboat, sinking by Japanese; EP 673, 701
Parker, Ed, in peril following Cairo demonstration; EP 31
Party, new, liberal; chances for establishment, for 1940. M. Lerner; S....... 234
Peace. See also Neutrality
Peace movement, American. O. G. Villard; S 349
Pearson, Drew
  Blockade of Japan, proposed; S........ 394
Pedersen, H. Winding
  Planning in Denmark; C..........543; see also 315
Pegler, Westbrook, record of. W. L. Werner; C 416
Pensions, old-age. See Old-age pensions
Peonage. See Florida
Perea, Della
  Psychiatry too exclusive; C........304; see also 225
Perilous times; praise for The Nation. R. L. Godwin; C 360
Pettigrew, Richard F., biographical material sought. H. R. Crippen; C........... 416
Pew, Marlen E.; material for biography sought. S. P. Clough; C........... 208
Philippine islands; independence act altered; EP 115
  Independence, and Japan. J. S. Allen; S 610
Phonograph records. See Haggin, B. H.
Photo-History; EP 576
Photography, candid. D. Haskell; S....... 597
Picketing, labor. See Labor unions
Picketing of embassies; EP 182
Pinkertons shut out from Minnesota; EP... 142
Pinney, Harvey
  Radio pastor of Dearborn; W. J. Cameron; S 374
Pins and needles. M. G.; D.............. 697
Pla, Joan del
  Catalans and Franco; C............... 140
Planning, economic, involved in farm bill; EP 602
Plays. See G., M.; Krutch, J. W.; MacLeish, A.
Poems
  Colophon. B. Belitt 653
  Death as basilisk. B. Belitt............ 439
  Matinal. C. Hudeburg 200
  New moon. L. Bogan................. 153
Poland; foreign relations; EP............ 6[illegible]
    See also Jews
Police chiefs' convention, attention called to Memorial day massacre; EP......... 391
Politics and death; E 88
Pond, Donald M.
  Ohio labor tries the ballot; S.......... 219
Porter, Fairfield
  No putsch in Barcelona; C........543; see also 470
Porters; end of a red-cap. C. Hazell; S..499; see also C..................... 628
Power and power industry; yardstick; E... 116
Prendergast, L. O.
  American money in Mexico; S......... 585
  New deal in Mexico; S................ 237
President Hoover, steamship, bombed by Chinese aviators; EP.............. 229
Presidential campaign of 1940; candidates, possible; EP 251
  Presidential timber; Hull suggested. H. E. Frivold; C.................... 415
Press. See Newspapers
Processional. J. W. Krutch; D............ 455
Proportional representation. See New York city
Psychiatry too exclusive. D. Perea; C..304; see also 225
Public finance. See Finance, public
Public housing. See Housing
Public utilities; rates and valuation, argument on; EP 575

R

Radio
  And the steel strike. H. J. Brevis; C.. 54
  Angell, J. R., as educational counselor; EP 142
  Commission holds press conference; EP 419
  Government regulation of industry to be extended; EP...................... 419
  Reviewers suggested. R. C. O'Brien; C 699
  "Threatens" freedom of the press. R. Brindze; S 98
Ragle, Florence
  California liberals meet; C............ 600
Railroads
  Labor; mediation by national board; EP 231
  Mexican. See Mexico
  Ruin, causes of. E. Janeway; S........ 555
Rand, James H. See Strikebreaking
Raper, John W. By L. Adamic; S......... 43
Ravage, M. E.
  After Chautemps; S.................. 71
  France, politics; S 580
  Little entente, bigger, movement for; S 258
  Mussolini, tool of Hitler; S............ 713
  Panic on the Danube; S.............. 215
Readers' union advocated. A. Schenkel; C.. 360
Reading. See Books
Rebellion, capitalist, against United States government. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 146
Records, phonograph. See Haggin, B. H.
Red-cap, end of. C. Hazell; S........499; see also C 628
Referendum on war, Ludlow resolution; EP 702
Refugees, political; passing of Nansen office; EP 3
Reissig, Herman F.
  Liberals and the Spanish war; C..110; see also 46; C..................... 208
Relief, unemployment. See Unemployment relief
Religion, Germany. See Germany
Religious liberty; Jehovah's witnesses win and lose; EP 631
Renald, Joseph P.
  Venereal disease—treatment or prevention?; S.......................... 699
Republic steel corporation
  Collects money from employees to fight CIO; EP 251
  Girdler takes the stand. H. Broun; S.. 19
  Gropper visits Youngstown; S........14-15
  How to make Girdler sign. C. N. Hoffman; C 275
  See also Steel and Iron—Strikes, for Chicago massacre, etc.
Republican party; plight; E.............. 705
Return of Maxim, the. M. Van Doren; MP 566
Reviews, books. See Books; also Book section of the Index
Riesenberg, Felix
  "Communists" at sea; S.............. 432
Rights, civil. See Civil rights
River, the. M. Van Doren; MP........... 485
Roberts, Glyn
  Time in England; C 55
Robinson, Senator Joseph Taylor, death; E [illegible]
Robinson, W. R.
  West coast vigilantism; C............. 359
Robinson, William
  "American" goods from Japan; C..... 627
Roman catholic church
  Catholic speaks her mind. M. M——; S 683
  Layman on Spain. F. K. Fendt; C..... 275
    See also Germany; Spain
Romer, Samuel
  Pacifism and revolution; J. W. Hughan's views [illegible] Spain; C..387; see also C 82
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
  Administration:
    Failure to enforce labor statutes; EP 249
    Foreign policy; Chicago speech in condemnation of dictatorships; EP..........364; E........... 391
    Chicago speech. O. G. Villard; S.. 405
    Chicago speech, and neutrality. O. G. Villard; S............... 434
    Frightened by business recession. M. Lerner; S 551
    Labor policy; letter president ought to write; letter abused. O. G. Villard; S......................... 74
    Message to congress; EP.......... 545
    Move toward the right; EP....... 545
    New deal fights for life. R. S. Allen; S 35
    Next move. M. Lerner; S......... 677
    Policy remains firm; EP.......... 230
    President fights back; Black appointment and other measures. R. S. Allen; S 187
    Program; EP 417
    Program aided by death of Senator Robinson; E 88
    Retreat?; E 576
    Showdown with enemies coming; EP 489
    Supreme court still supports New deal; EP 417
    Third term; E 4
  American press society; president accepts honorary membership; EP..... 547
    Constitution day speech; EP......306; see also 416
    Jefferson island picnic; EP........... 2
    Supreme court proposals. See Supreme court, United States
    Trip to the west; EP..............230, 333
    Trip to the west. R. S. Allen; S...... 340
Rorty, James
  "Organized medicine" sees red; S..500; see also C 670
Rosenthal, Lessing
  Criticizes The Nation; C 209
Rosselli brothers, murder. M. Ascoli; S.... 10
Rourke, Constance
  Traditions for young people; S........ 562
Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Russo-Japanese relations; Amur river clash; EP 30

S

SEC. See Securities and exchange commission
Sacco-Vanzetti case, history revived by publication of WPA Massachusetts guidebook; EP 211
  Material sought. S. Small; C.......... 360
Sailors. See Shipping
Sallito, Domenick, deportation case; EP.... 519
Salzburg, 1937. B. M. Haggin; M......... 301
Samuels, Gertrude
  Education in Great Britain; C......... 572
Sann, Paul
  "Purged" from the WPA; S.......... 526
Santo Domingo. See Dominican republic
Saper, Dorothy
  Thompson, Dorothy, anti-labor bias; C 84
Saroyan, William
  Writers, dumb?; C....248; see also.... 203
Saul, C. Dudley, M. D.
  Group practice of medicine; C....670; see also 500
Saunders, Dero A.
  Revolution in the deep south; S....... 264
Save the arts projects. E. McCausland; S.. 67
Scandinavia, "new democracy." L. Lore; S........315; see also C........459, 543
Schacht, Hjalmar, and Germany's future. J. C. deWilde; S.................. 402
  Out of government; EP............... 490
Schenkel, Arthur
  Readers' union advocated; C.......... 360
Schnapper, M. B.
  Daughters of the American revolution in the schoolroom; S............... 288
Schools, British; lack of provision for secondary education. G. Samuels; C.... 572
Scottsboro case. See Negroes
Seamen. See Shipping
Seattle; American federation of labor versus Committee for industrial organization. C. Stevens; S 239
Securities and exchange commission
  Appointments of Hanes and Frank; EP 631
  Douglas, W. O., new head; EP........ 334
  Douglas, W. O., new head. M. Lerner; S 429
  Eye on doings of Sofina; EP....703; see also 312, 672
  Permission to Hearst to withdraw proposed bond issues; EP.............. 250
Seidman, Joel
  Detroit's labor slate; S..260; see also C 360
Senate, United States. See Congress
Sender, Ramon
  Peasants' war; S 475
Sex crimes and the law. S. Glueck; S...... 318
Sexton, Brendan
  Jingoes of 1937; C.................. 599
Shadid, M.
  Fees at Elk City community hospital; C 55
Shanghai. See Chinese-Japanese war
Shapiro, Morris
  Scottsboro, behind the scenes; S....... 170
Shipping
  American merchant marine, greater, not needed; EP 307
  C. I. O. organizing workers; EP...... 59
  Maritime commission; report of chairman Kennedy on status and outlook of shipping; E 549
  Seamen; "communists" at sea. F. Riesenberg; S 433
  Strikes; Algic, strike on; EP.......... 517
Shoemaker, Joseph, case; E............... 466
Shoppers, women, of Chicago. E. J. Mohr; C 700
Silicosis; cause for discharge. N. Nuttall; C........331; see also C........544, 600
  Prevention. H. N. Lawson; C....600; see also 331, C...................... 544
Silk. See Chinese-Japanese war—Boycott
Silverman, F. A., Jr.
  Liberalism and ideals; the Black case; C...........459; see also........... 387
Slade, Mrs. Caroline, sends relief workers' writings to magazines as her own; EP 675
Slater, Charles
  Housing and confidence; C............ 727

- Sloan, Alfred P., foundation; EP.......... 675
- Small, Sasha
  - Seeks material on Sacco-Vanzetti case; C 360
- Social security; inconsistency of A. Epstein. L. A. Beck; C..699; see also EP.. 463
- Socialism not wanted. B. L. C.; C.......... 487
- Socialism or labor control, of industry. S. L. Jackson; C......628; see also...... 546
- Sofina; dealings under eye of SEC; EP 703; see also 312, 672
- Solow, Herbert
  - Spartakus in Danzig; C.......... 54
  - Zionism in extremis; S.......... 125
- South, the; attacks on civil liberties; EP... 250
  - Deep, revolution in. D. A. Saunders; S 264
- South America, dictatorships; E.......... 548
- Spain
  - Anarchists and the government. A. Brenner; C 26
  - Behind the enemy lines. J. Groth; Ct... 378
  - Bishops issue pastoral letter against government; EP 251
  - Blockade running. A. Weisbord; S.... 64
  - British commercial envoy to Franco, proposed; EP.......... 518
  - British proposals; EP..85; see also.. 93
  - Catalans and Franco. J. del Pla; C.... 140
  - Catholic and Protestant controversy over Franco; EP 363
  - Catholic layman's views. F. K. Fendt; C 275
  - Catholic speaks her mind. M. M——; S 683
  - Denbigh, earl of, favors Franco. E. Janeway; C......672; see also...... 312
  - Disaffection in both camps; EP........ 161
  - Discussion by Hitler and Mussolini; E 336
  - England and France must act; EP.... 389
  - Fascist aid for rebels pours in; EP.... 113
  - Franco cannot win. L. Fischer; S...... 148
  - Franco offers Spanish art for sale; EP.. 4
  - Hitler and Mussolini show their hands; EP 1
  - League of nations' failure to re-elect Spain to seat in council; EP........ 306
  - League of nations feebleness. R. Dell; S 472
  - Leftist prisoners. A Brenner; C....... 200
  - Liberals, American, and the war. H. F. Reissig and O. G. Villard; C..110; see also 46, 208
  - Loyalist dilemma; E.......... 185
  - Loyalist Spain gathers strength. L. Fischer; S..7; EP..58; see also.. 62
  - Loyalist successes; EP....230; E.... 336
  - Madrid's foreign defenders. L. Fischer; S 235
  - McFadyean, A., views of; C.......... 110
  - Non-intervention, deadlock over; EP... 30
  - Nyon and Geneva conferences. L. Fischer; S 395
  - Pacifists' dilemma. J. W. Hughan; C..........82; see also C.......... 387
  - Patrol, Mediterranean, Italian and British; EP 306
  - Peasants' war. R. Sender; S.......... 475
  - Politics, internal. L. Fischer; S....470; see also C.......... 543
  - Prisoner of Franco. G. Freed; C..599; see also C 700
  - Rebellion in rebel Spain. L. White; S.. 635
  - Relief organizations, American, investigated; EP 251
  - Soviet charge of submarine "piracy"; EP 249
  - "Spanish earth, the"; film; EP........ 210
  - Station wagon needed to aid touring company presenting plays on Spain. B. Irwin; C.......... 600
  - Submarine piracies; Nyon and Geneva conferences. L. Fischer; S.......... 395
  - Submarine pirates and British policy. L. Fischer; S 282
  - Teruel, capture by loyalists; EP....... 702
  - Tour, proposed. R. Baldwin; C........ 110
  - Village life. J. Herbst; S.......... 169
  - Volunteers. M. Duffield; C.......700; see also C 599
  - Volunteers, proposal for withdrawal; E 422, 463
  - Volunteers; Mussolini plan for withdrawal. J. Groth; Ct.......... 474
  - War—east and west; E.......... 279
  - What Madrid reads. B. Wertheim; S.. 506
- "Spanish earth, the"; film, EP.......... 210
  - Censored in Pennsylvania; EP......... 307
- Spartakus in Danzig. H. Solow; C......... 54
- Spero, Sterling
  - Germany, underground opposition to nazism; C 699
- Stage door. M. Van Doren; MP.......... 485
- Star wagon, the. J. W. Krutch; D......... 411
- Steamships. See Shipping
- Steel and iron
  - Industrialist O. K.'s the C. I. O. By L. Adamic; S 582
  - Steel, big and little, and the C. I. O. By B. Stolberg; S 119
  - Strikes:
    - Independent companies and the C. I. O.; E.......... 5
    - Johnstown, Pennsylvania, and Bethlehem steel; EP.......... 362
    - Johnstown national citizens' committee; EP.......... 86
    - Johnstown, story of. A. Grobin; S.........37; see also C........ 138
    - Michigan and Pittsburgh, difference between; EP.......... 30
    - Radio and the strike. H. J. Brevis; C 54
    - Republic steel corporation; Chicago massacre, as seen by school children. A Chicago teacher; C... 26
      - Chicago massacre; LaFollette subcommittee work and report. O. G. Villard; S.......... 172
      - Chicago massacre; report of Senators LaFollette and Thomas; EP 162
      - Chicago massacre brought to attention of police chiefs' convention; EP 391
      - Rebellion against United States government. P. Y. Anderson; S 146
      - War in Youngstown. R. M. Stein; S.......... 12
  - See also Bethlehem Steel company; Republic steel corporation
- Steel workers' organizing committee; accomplishments, and trials ahead; EP 702
- Stein, Rose M.
  - War in Youngstown; S.......... 12
  - Demands retraction of The Nation's statements in Black case; E....365; see also 311
- Stevens, Cole
  - American federation versus Seattle labor; S.......... 239
- Stewart, Maxwell S.
  - Behind China's conflict; S.......... 100
  - China's chance against Japan; S...... 262
  - Gadsden, Alabama; S.......... 69
  - Soviet union; twenty years of progress; S.......... 522
- Stimson, Henry L., urges boycott of Japan; EP 389
- Stocks
  - Aldrich speech on business and effect of government policies; EP........ 418
  - Break brings lowering of margin requirement; EP.......... 490
  - Crash in Wall street; EP.......... 461
  - Crash; "Black Tuesday." M. Lerner; S 468
  - Decline; EP........278; EP.......... 334
  - Negotiations between New York stock exchange and S. E. C.; EP.......... 631
  - Slump on Wall street. H. H. Allen; S..........397; see also C.......... 487
  - Wall street and White house. R. S. Allen; S.......... 467
  - Wall street's new mentor. M. Lerner; S 429
- Stolberg, Benjamin
  - Steel and the C. I. O.; S.......... 119
  - Vigilantism, 1937; S........166; 191; see also C.......... 248
- Stone, Geoffrey
  - Neutrality—a dangerous myth; S...283; see also C.......... 331
- Stone, Geoffrey, two with same name but different beliefs; C..........331; see also 283
- Stone, I. F.
  - Churches accused of Marxism, by Hearst and Hitler; S.......... 345
  - Isolation, United States; case against; S..........495; see also C.......... 571
- Straus, Nathan; appointment as housing administrator; EP..462; correction.. 516
- Strikebreaking. J. H. Rand and P. L. Bergdorf acquitted; EP.......... 575
- Strikes
  - LaFollette committee, investigation of vigilantism; EP.......... 335
  - "Law and order"; E.......... 5
  - Psychology of; material sought. G. W. Hartmann; C.......... 600
  - Radio and the steel strike. H. J. Brevis; C.......... 54
  - Violence by "service men" and police; EP 57
    - See also Cleaners; Labor Unions; Lumber; Shipping; Steel and Iron
- Stuttgart congress of Germans living abroad. See Germany
- Sulfanilamide, fatal drug; EP.......... 462
- Supreme court, United States
  - Defeat of reform bill. O. G. Villard; S 150
  - Fight for reform; a recess; E.......... 163
  - Fight over bill. R. S. Allen; S...... 63
  - Filibuster against bill; EP.......... 29
  - Lehman opposes Roosevelt plan; EP... 85
  - Roosevelt defeat, inside story. R. S. Allen; S.......... 123
  - Roosevelt plan defeated; E.......... 115
  - Still supports New deal; EP.......... 417
  - Villard, O. G., announces candidacy; S.........221; see also EP.......... 211
    - See also Black, H. L.
- Susan and God. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 455
- Sutich, Anthony
  - Democratic nations; C............208; see also 46, 110
- Sweden. See Scandinavia
- Switzerland; democracy. W. Bloch-Hiller; C..........727; see also.......... 290
  - Democracy in retreat. P. Brown; S.... 290
- Syphilis. See Venereal disease

T

- Tammany. See New York city
- Tarlow, Arthur A.
  - Neuberger, R. L., a Portland, Oregon man; C.......... 140
- Taxation. See Finance, public
- Teacher, Chicago
  - Letters on Chicago massacre; C...... 26
- Technological unemployment. See Unemployment
- Tennessee valley authority; yardstick; E... .117
- Third party. See Party, new, liberal
- This is China. M. Van Doren; MP....... 413
- Thomas, Norman
  - Black, H. L., "unconditional support" of; C........387; see also C........ 459
  - Neutrality plus socialism; S......707; see also E.......... 704
- Thompson, Dorothy, anti-labor bias. S. Saper; C.......... 84
- Tide, advertising paper, on J. R. Angell and radio; EP.......... 142
- Time in England. G. Roberts; C......... 55
- Times, Bayonne. See Newspapers
- Times, New York. See New York Times
- To Quito and back. J. W. Krutch; D...... 411
- Trade unions. See Labor unions
- Trades union congress, British. H. J. Laski; S......343; see also C...... 487
- Trotsky, Leon, "verdict" presented by commission of inquiry; EP.......... 703
- Trujillo, President. See Dominican republic
- Twentieth century fund, survey of business; EP.......... 3

U

- U. A. W. A. See United automobile workers of America
- U. S. S. R. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Unemployment
  - Discussed at mayor's conference; EP.. 573
  - "Right to work." F. Lundberg; C...... 672
  - Technological, planning against; EP... 86
- Unemployment relief
  - "Boondogglers," record of. J. Wechsler; S 680
  - Cuts; W. P. A. workers protest in New York; EP.......... 2
  - "Purged" from the W. P. A. By P. Sann; S.......... 526
  - Relief workers' writings sent to magazines by Mrs. C. Slade as her own; EP 675
  - Works progress administration, scuttling of; E.......... 233
- Union of soviet socialist republics
  - And the world; E.......... 521
  - Attacks on. G. H. Levenson and W. Wilson; C.......627; see also....... 531
  - Executions. O. G. Villard; S.......46; see also C..........110, 206, 208
  - Nation's attitude attacked by the New Masses; EP.......... 631
  - Progress in twenty years. M. S. Stewart; S.......... 523
  - Trotsky, Leon, case of; "verdict" presented by commission of inquiry; EP.. 703
    - See also Russo-Japanese relations
- Unions, labor. See Labor unions
- United automobile workers of America; progress in one year; E.......... 232
- United States
  - Aggressive good neighbor in Latin America. G. Arbaiza; S.......... 285
  - Anti-British hysteria; E..........253; see also C.......... 331
  - Arts bureau; Coffee bill for; E........ 705
  - Diplomatic service. O. G. Villard; S... 689
  - Diplomatic service, shake-up; EP..... 674
  - Foreign policy; America must choose; E.........704; see also..........707, 709
  - Government of lawyers; E.......... 366
  - International relations; Roosevelt's Chicago speech; EP.......... 364
    - See also Roosevelt, F. D.
  - Isolation policy; New York Times editorial. O. G. Villard; S.......... 646
  - Map of today; E.......... 31
  - Neutrality. See Neutrality
  - Trade pact with Great Britain, negotiations; EP.......... 573
- Utilities, public. See Public utilities
- Utley, Freda
  - Japan fears a boycott; S.......... 341

V

- Vambery, R.
  - British labor and nazism; C......487; see also 343
- Van Doren, Mark
  - Awful truth, the; MP.......... 566
  - Damsel in distress, a; MP.......... 696
  - Day at the races, a; MP.......... 53
  - Estimate of moving pictures of the year; S 158
  - It's love I'm after; MP.......... 566
  - Lancer spy; MP.......... 566
  - Late Mathias Pascal; MP.......... 626
  - Life of Emile Zola, the; MP.......... 246
  - Nothing sacred; MP.......... 696
  - Return of Maxim, the; MP.......... 566
  - River, the; MP.......... 485
  - Stage door; MP.......... 485
  - This is China; MP.......... 413
  - West of Shanghai; MP.......... 566
- Vansittart, Sir Robert, Europe's arbiter; S 93
- Vargas, president, dictatorship; E.......... 548
- Venereal disease, treatment or prevention? J. P. Renald; C.......... 699
- Viereck, George Sylvester
  - Denies acceptance of nazism; C.......... 54
- Vigilantism, 1937. B. Stolberg; S..166; 191; see also C.......... 248
  - La Follette committee investigation; EP 335
  - West coast. W. R. Robinson; C...... 359
- Villard, Oswald Garrison
  - Issues and men:
    - "America's aloofness"; New York Times editorial; S.......... 646
    - Anarchists, the real; S.......... 322
    - Candidate for United States supreme court; S....221; see also EP.... 211
    - Chinese-Japanese war; Brussels conference; S.......... 505
    - College education for women; S... 131
    - Country life; no time for work; S.. 241
    - Diplomatic service; S.......... 689
    - Evans, Mrs. Glendower; death; life and work; S.......... 719
    - Getting old, a word on; S.......... 379
    - Japan and China, course for United States recommended; S.......... 292
    - LaFollette subcommittee work and report; S.......... 172
    - LaGuardia, Mayor, re-election supported; S.......... 101
    - "Letter F. D. R. ought to write"; abused; S.......... 74
    - Liberalism, definition of; S....... 588
    - MacDonald, Ramsay, death of; S.. 561
    - Mencken, Henry L., and O. G. Villard; S.......... 379
    - Nation, The; history; S.......... 18
    - Nazis, "German-American"; S.... 530
    - Neutrality; Roosevelt's Chicago speech; S.......... 434
    - New York city election; S.......... 478
    - New York state constitutional convention; S 615
    - Peace movement, American; S..... 349
    - Roosevelt's Chicago speech on international relations; S.......... 405
    - Soviet executions; S...46; see also C 110, 206, 208
    - Supreme court bill, defeat of; S.. 152
    - Third party, postponement of; S.. 267
    - Williamstown institute of human relations; S.......... 199
- Violence, law, and labor; E.......... 59
- Virginia. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 303

W

- W. P. A. See Works progress administration
- Wages-and-hour bill. See Labor
- Wagner, Senator Robert F.; besought by Tammany to take mayoralty nomination; EP.......... 29
- Wagner-Steagall bill. See Housing
- Wall street. See Stocks
- War
  - Aggressors, bounty for; E.......... 633
  - As means of stopping fascism. A. M. Bingham; C......571; see also...... 495
  - Bumper crop foreseen. J. Groth; Ct.... 614
  - East and west; E.......... 279
  - European, preparation for. L. Lore; S 91, 127
  - Isolation of the United States; case against. I. F. Stone; S..........495; see also C.......... 571
  - Jingoes of 1937. B. Sexton; C....... 599
  - Left prepares. L. Lore; S.......... 643
  - Ludlow resolution for referendum; EP.. 702
    - See also Neutrality
- Warburg, Felix, death; EP.......... 463
- Washington, letters from..........35, 63, 123, 146, 214, 234, 311, 394, 467, 551, 679
- Washington state; old-age pension union; EP 211
  - Vigilantism. W. R. Robinson; C...... 359
- Watwood, Arthur W., head of "Epius" movement. T. A. Johnson; C.......... 276
- Wechsler, James
  - "Boondogglers," record of; S.......680, 715
- Weirton company and the Barclay pamphlet; EP.......... 674
- Weisbord, Albert
  - On Hook review of "The conquest of power"; C......415; see also...... 270
  - Spain, blockade, running; S.......... 64
- Weker, Meyer
  - Nation, The, and Mr. Black; C.....359; see also 278
- Wells, H. G. on education in Great Britain. G. Samuels; C.......... 572
- Werner, W. L.
  - Pegler, Westbrook, record; C.......... 416
- Wertheim, Barbara
  - What Madrid read; S.......... 506
- West, the. W. Gropper; S.......... 96
- West of Shanghai. M. Van Doren; MP... 566
- Weyl, Nathaniel
  - Swastika over Brazil; S.......... 528
- Wharton, Edith; death; EP.......... 183
- Wheeler, Senator Burton K., of Montana. K. Howard; C..........304; see also 217, 415
  - Faces the music. R. L. Neuberger; S.........217; see also C.......... 304
- White, Leigh
  - Rebellion in rebel Spain; S.......... 635
- White, Leslie A.
  - Seeks letters from or to L. H. Morgan and A. F. Bandelier; C.......... 180
- Williamstown institute of human relations. O. G. Villard; S.......... 199
- Wilson, Winslow; attacks on Soviet Russia; C..........627; see also.......... 531
- Windsor, duke of, cancels American visit; EP 519
  - Sympathy with nazism; E.......... 463
- Wolfe, Henry C.
  - Nazi eyes turn east; S.......... 502
- Women; college education. O. G. Villard; S 131
- Woodward, Helen
  - California repeal of chain-store tax; S..........638; correction.......... 728
  - Coffee; S.......... 717
- Workmen's compensation; silicosis, cause for discharge. N. Nuttall; C.......... 331
  - See also Silicosis
- Works progress administration
  - Arts projects. E. McCausland; S..... 67
  - Cuts in personnel; protests in New York; EP.......... 2
  - Dismissal of workers; EP.......... 86
  - Future at stake. J. Wechsler; S...680, 715
  - "Purge." P. Sann; S.......... 526
  - Scuttling of; E.......... 233
- World conference on church, community and state, Oxford; EP.......... 87
- World's end shown by Hayden planetarium; EP 420
- Wright, Andy. See Negroes—Scottsboro case
- Writers. See Authors

Y

- Yacht races for America's cup; EP...... 163
- Young people, reading for. See Books
- Youngstown, Ohio. See Republic steel corporation
- Yugoslavia; Mickey mouse causes furore; EP 631

Z

- Zeeland, Paul van; seeks American loan for Germany and Italy; EP.......... 2
- Zionism. See Palestine
- Zola, Emile, moving picture. M. Van Doren; MP 246

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some [illegible] under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B	Book review
AN	Brief annotation
R	Reviewer

A

- A. E. Housman: A sketch. A. S. F. Gow; AN 273
- Adair, Douglass, and W. H. Hamilton
  - Power to govern, the: The constitution—then and now; B.......... 106
- Adamic, Louis
  - House in Antigua, the; B.......... 444
- Adams, Mildred; R.......... 536
- Alfred Edward Housman. Recollections by various hands; B.......... 690
- Alpher, Isadore M., M. D., and R. L. Palmer
  - 40,000,000 guinea pig children; B...... 693
- Altounyan, E. H. R.
  - Ornament of honor; AN.......... 328
- American civil war, the: An interpretation. C. E. Fish. Edited by W. E. Smith; B 692
- American dream. M. Foster; B.......... 79
- American medicine: Expert testimony out of court. The American foundation; B. 134
- American stuff: An anthology of prose and verse by members of the Federal writers' project, with sixteen prints by the Federal art project; B.......... 272
- Anatole France, 1844-1896. E. P. Dargan; B 51
- And so—Victoria. V. Wilkins; B.......... 135
- And Spain sings . . . Edited by M. J. Benardete and R. Humphries; B..226; see also C.......... 276
- Anders, G. S.; R.......... 592
- Andrews, Edward Deming, and Faith Andrews
  - Shaker furniture. The craftsmanship of an American communal sect; B...... 175
- Anointed, the. C. B. Davis; AN.......... 177
- Appel, Benjamin
  - Run around; AN.......... 273
- Asch, Nathan
  - Road, the: In search of America; B... 24
- Asch, Sholem
  - Mother, the. E. Krauch, translator; B. 724
- Ashton, E. B.
  - Fascist, the: His state and his mind; B.........50; see also C.......... 139
- Assignment in Utopia. E. Lyons; B....... 531
- Attitudes toward history. K. Burke; B.... 723
- Auden, W. H., and L. MacNeice
  - Letters from Iceland; B.......... 658
- Audubon, John James
  - Birds of America. With introduction and descriptive text by W. Vogt; B..... 722
- Augustus. J. Buchan; B.......... 724

B

- Backward art of spending money, the, and other essays. W. C. Mitchell; B..... 135
- Barksdale, Lena
  - Children's books, a selected list; S... 569
- Barnes, Harry Elmer
  - Intellectual and cultural history of the western world, an; B.......... 721
- Baron, Salo Wittmeyer
  - Social and religious history of the Jews, a; B.......... 327
- Barzun, Jacques
  - Race: A study in modern superstition; B 480
- Bates, Ralph; R.......... 593
- Beal, Fred E.
  - Proletarian journey; B..........384, 531
- Becker, S. William, M. D.
  - Ten million Americans have it!; B..... 325
- Belitt, Ben; R..........327, 508
- Bemelmans, Ludwig
  - My war with the United States; B.... 136
- Beres, David; R.......... 325
- Bernanos, Georges
  - Life of a country priest, the; B...... 724
- Beware of Europe's wars. A. M. Bingham. Preface by J. Dos Passos; B....... 269
- Beyond humanism. Essays in the new philosophy of nature. C. Hartshorne; B. 24
- Bingham, Alfred M.
  - Beware of Europe's wars. Preface by J. Dos Passos; B.......... 269
- Biology of human conflict, the: An anatomy of behavior, individual and social. T. Burrow; B.......... 204
- Birds of America, the. J. J. Audubon, With introduction and descriptive text by W. Vogt; B.......... 722
- Boccaccio, Giovanni, biography. C. Carswell; B.......... 350
- Bogan, Louise; R..........223, 324, 442, 658
- Bonaparte. E. Tarlé; B.......... 20
- Books of 1937, notable.......... 666
- Borgese, G. A.
  - Goliath, the march of fascism; B...... 443
- Bothwell, Lord, biography. R. Gore-Browne; B.......... 108
- Bourke-White, Margaret, and E. Caldwell
  - You have seen their faces; B.......... 620
- Brady, Robert A.
  - Spirit and structure of German fascism, the. Foreword by H. J. Laski; B... 50
- Bramah, Ernest
  - Return of Kai Lung, the; AN.......... 454
- Brawley, Benjamin
  - Negro builders and heroes; B.....437; see also C......571 (two letters)
- Bread and circuses: A story of federal theater. W. Whitman; B.......... 442
- Brenner, Anita; R..........104, 154
- Brewster, Dorothy; R.......... 453
- Briffault, Robert
  - Europa in limbo; B.......... 354
- Brindze, Ruth
  - Not to be broadcast: The truth about radio; B.......... 78
- Brindze, Ruth; R..........177, 693
- Brooks, Robert R. R.
  - When labor organizes; B.......... 509
- Broughton, James; R.......... 453

Brown, Charles Armitage
    Life of John Keats. Edited with introduction and notes by D. H. Bodurtha and W. B. Pope; B................ 327
Brown, Henry Collins
    Mind mislaid, a; B.................... 385
Brown, J. F.; R....................21, 204, 408
Brown, Sterling A.; R.................... 409
Browne, Lewis
    Oh, say, can you see! AN............ 202
Browning, Robert, and Julia Wedgwood. Edited by R. Curle; B............ 444
Buchan, John
    Augustus; B.......................... 724
Burke, Kenneth; R....................134, 201
Burrow, Trigant
    Biology of human conflict, the: An anatomy of behavior, individual and social; B........................... 204

C

C. I. O.: Industrial unionism in action. J. R. Walsh; B...................... 722
Caldwell, Erskine, and M. Bourke-White
    You have seen their faces; B......... 620
Calkins, Clinch
    Spy overhead; B..................... 352
Capek, Karel
    War with the newts. M. and R. Weatherall, translators; B................. 482
Carswell, Catherine
    Tranquil heart, the. A portrait of Giovanni Boccaccio; B................ 350
Case of Leon Trotsky: report of hearings; B 648
Caste and class in a southern town. J. Dollard; B.......................... 77
Céline, Louis Ferdinand
    Mea culpa. R. A. Parker, translator; B 174
Chapman, John Jay, and his letters. M. A. DeWolfe Howe; B.................. 440
Child workers in America. K. du P. Lumpkin and D. Douglas; B.............. 78
Children of strangers. L. Saxon; B...... 205
Children's books, a selected list. L. Barksdale; S.............................. 569
Churchill, Winston S.
    Great contemporaries; B............. 720
Chute, the. A. Halper; B................ 511
Citadel, the. A. J. Cronin; B........... 268
Civil war, the, and reconstruction. J. G. Randall; B........................ 692
Clark, Evans; R......................... 722
Claude. By G. Fauconnier. Translated by L. Ford; AN......................... 329
Cloete, Stuart
    Turning wheels, the; B.............. 508
Cold morning sky. M. Zaturenska; B...... 325
Collected poems. J. Joyce; B............ 382
Collected poems of Edwin Arlington Robinson; B.............................. 222
Commerce clause under Marshall, Taney, and White, the. F. Frankfurter; B...... 134
Commerce power vs. states rights, the. E. S. Corwin; B....................... 76
Complete works of John Webster, the. Edited by F. L. Lucas; B.......... 243
Conquest of power, the. Liberalism, anarchism, syndicalism, socialism, fascism, and communism. A. Weisbord; B...........270; see also........... 415
Conversation at midnight. E. St. V. Millay; B 174
Corwin, Edward S.
    Commerce power and states rights, the; B 76
Counter-attack in Spain. R. Sender. Translated by Sir P. C. Mitchell; B....... 536
Country men. J. Hearst; B.............. 109
Covarrubias, Miguel
    Island of Bali, the; B............... 654
Craigin, Elisabeth
    Either is love; AN.................. 177
Crobaugh, Mervyn
    Economics for everybody; B.......... 725
Cronin, A. J.
    Citadel, the; B...................... 268

D

Darby, Hugh H.; R...........22, 134, 512, 661
Dargan, Edwin Preston
    Anatole France, 1844-1896; B......... 51
Dàuli, Gian
    Wheel turns, the; B................. 106
Davis, Clyde Brion
    Anointed, the; AN................... 177
Day, Clarence
    Life with mother; B................. 202
Death in Dublin. F. O'Connor; B.......... 355
Delacroix, Eugene
    Journal. W. Pach, translator; B...... 660
Depths and the heights, the. J. Romains. Translated by G. Hopkins; B...... 381
Desmond, Robert W.
    Press and world affairs, the. Introduction by H. J. Laski; B........... 298
Deutsch, Albert
    Mentally ill in America, the; B....225; see also C........................ 304
Deutsch, Babette; R..................... 20
Diary of a country priest, the. G. Bernanos; B 724
Dick, Everett
    Sod house frontier, the, 1845-1890; B.. 483
Dictionary of American English on historical principles, a. Part II, baggage-smasher-blood. Edited by Sir W. Craigie and J. R. Hulbert; B...... 243
Diktatur der lüge: Eine abrechnung. W. Schlamm; B.......................... 648
Dollard, John
    Caste and class in a southern town; B.. 77
Douglas, Dorothy, and K. Du P. Lumpkin
    Child workers in America; B......... 78
Down east. L. Pendleton; AN.......... 329
Down the proud stream. C. Fallas; AN... 454
Duranty, Walter
    One life, one kopeck; B.............. 244

E

East goes west. The making of an oriental Yankee. Y. Kang; B.............. 482
Economics for everybody. M. Crobaugh; B. 725
Edge of Taos desert. M. D. Luhan; B.... 326
Education of Hyman Kaplan, the. L. Q. Ross; B.............................. 224
Edward Gibbon. D. M. Low; B............ 153
Eisenschiml, Otto
    Why was Lincoln murdered? AN...... 177
Either is love. E. Craigin; AN.......... 177
Elliott, W. Y.; R....................... 443
En U. R. S. S., 1936. P. Herbart; B...... 531
Ends and means. A. Huxley; B........... 656
Enemy gods, the. O. La Farge; B......... 538
Enemy within, the: The inside story of German sabotage in America. Captain Henry Landau; B.................... 449
Ephraim, Jerome W.
    Take care of yourself; AN.......... 177
Ernst, Margaret S.
    Words: English roots and how they grow; AN........................... 273
Escape to the present. J. Steel; B.......... 242
Europa in limbo. R. Briffault; B......... 354
Europe in arms. Liddell Hart; B......... 200
Everyday science. A. W. Haslett; AN...... 512
Eve's doctor. S. Toksvig; AN............ 177

F

Faithful wife, the. S. Undset; B......... 481
Fallas, Carl
    Down the proud stream; AN.......... 454
Famine. L. O'Flaherty; B............... 355
Farley, Miriam S.; R.................... 245
Fascism, two books on; B..50; see also C... 139
Fascist, the: His state and his mind. E. B. Ashton; B......50; see also C...... 139
Fast, Howard
    Place in the city; AN.............. 177
Fauconnier, Genevieve
    Claude. L. Ford, translator; AN...... 329
Feuchtwanger, Lion
    Moscow, 1937; B.................... 531
Fifteen-thirty. The story of a tennis player. H. Wills; B...................... 623
First Russian revolution, the, 1825, the decembrist movement, its origins, development and significance. A. G. Mazour; B.......................... 175
Fish, Carl Russel
    American civil war, the: An interpretation. Edited by W. E. Smith; B... 692
Fitts, Dudley
    Poems: 1929-1936; B................. 76
Fletcher, John Gould
    Life is my song; B.................. 723
Fodor, M. W.
    Plot and counter plot in central Europe; B 618
Force or reason: Issues of the twentieth century. H. Kohn; B................ 225
40,000,000 guinea pig children. R. L. Palmer and I. M. Alpher, M. D.; B.. 693
"40,000 against the arctic." H. P. Smolka; B 268
Foster, Michael
    American dream; B................... 79
Fowler, Gene
    Salute to yesterday; B.............. 406
France, Anatole, 1844-1896. E. P. Dargan; B.............................. 51
Frank, Bruno
    Lost heritage. C. Brooks, translator; AN 513
Frankfurter, Felix
    Commerce clause under Marshall, Taney, and White, the; B.................. 134
Free speech and plain language. A. J. Nock; B............................ 507
Freud, Goethe, Wagner. T. Mann; B..... 270
Friendly tree, the. C. D. Lewis; B...... 80
From Anne to Victoria. Edited by B. Dobrée; B 154
Furnas, C. C., and S. M. Furnas
    Man, bread and destiny; B........... 661
Future of liberty, the. G. Soule; B....... 156

G

GT-99
    Labor spy; B..........................352
Galantière, Lewis; R.................... 381
Gannett, Lewis; R....................... 298
Gantt, W. Horsley
    Medical review of soviet Russia, a; B.. 531
Gassner, John W.; R..................... 442
Gauguin, Pola
    My father, Paul Gauguin; B.......... 50
Geismar, Maxwell; R..............226, 350, 482
Gentile, Giovanni, the idealism of. R. W. Holmes; B........................... 410
Genzmer, George; R..................243, 273
Gervais, Albert
    Madame Flowery Sentiment. C. Dixon, translator; AN...................... 202
Ghent, W. J.; R......................... 483
Gibbon, Edward, biography. D. M. Low; B 153
Gide, André
    Retouches à mon retour de l'U. R. S. S.; B 531
Giles, Ray
    How to beat the high cost of living; B.. 693
Gilmore, William; R..................... 246
Giono, Jean
    Song of the world, the. H. Fluchère and G. Myers, translators; B........ 226
Glittering death. J. Peyré. Translated by J. Whitall; AN..................... 157
Goldwyn, Samuel, biography. A. Johnston; B 75
Goliath, the march of fascism. G. A. Borgese; B............................ 442
Goncourt journal, the: 1851-1870. Edited and translated by L. Galantière; B... 294
Good society, the. W. Lippmann; B...... 589
Gore-Browne, Robert
    Lord Bothwell and Mary Queen of Scots; B.......................... 108
Great contemporaries. W. S. Churchill; B.. 721
Great Goldwyn, the. A. Johnston; B....... 75
Greatest American woman, the: Lucretia Mott. L. C. M. Hare; B........... 299
Greenhood, David; R.................202, 408
Gregory, Horace; R..............272, 355, 694
Grierson, Sir Herbert J. C.
    Milton and Wordsworth. poets and prophets. A study of their reactions to political events; B............... 22
Gruening, Martha; R..................205, 296
Guérard, Albert; R...................507, 721
Guggenheims, the: The making of an American dynasty. H. O'Connor; B...446; see also 572, 700

H

Hacker, L. M., R. Modley, and G. R. Taylor
    United States, the: A graphic history; B 660
Hacker, Louis M.; R...446 (see also 572, 700); 692
Hall of mirrors. L. G. Marshall; AN..... 453
Halper, Albert
    Chute, the; B....................... 511
Hamilton, Walton H.; R...............76, 134
Hamilton, Walton H., and D. Adair
    Power to govern, the; The constitution—then and now; B............ 106
Hanighen, Frank C.; R...............200, 328
Hare, Lloyd C. M.
    Greatest American woman, the: Lucretia Mott; B..................... 299
Harp that once, the. H. M. Jones; B...... 694
Harris, Abraham L.; R.................. 156
Harrisson, Tom
    Savage civilization; B.............. 441
Hart, Liddell
    Europe in arms; B................... 200
Hartshorne, Charles
    Beyond humanism. Essays in the new philosophy of nature; B............ 24
Haslett, A. W.
    Everyday science; AN............... 512
He swung and he missed. E. O'Brien; AN 453
Hearst, James
    Country men; B...................... 109
Heinrich Heine; Paradox and poet. L. Untermeyer; B.................... 647
Hemingway, Ernest
    To have and have not; B............ 439
Herbart, Pierre
    En U. R. S. S., 1936; B............. 531
Henry of Navarre, biography. H. Mann. Translated by E. Sutton; B........ 350
Herbst, Josephine; R.................... 354
Hero, the. A study in tradition, myth, and drama. Lord Raglan; B............ 201
Herskovits, Melville J.; R............382; (see also 516, 728); 480
High, Stanley
    Roosevelt—and then?; B............ 564
Hill, Frank Ernest
    Listen and learn; B................. 566
Hillyer, Robert
    Letter to Robert Frost and others, a; B 538
Hobbs, W. H.; R........................ 268
Höllering, Franz; R..................242, 618
Holmes, Roger W.
    Idealism of Giovanni Gentile, the; B.. 410
Home is where you hang your childhood, and other stories. L. Zugsmith; AN.. 156
Hook, Sidney; R....48, 270 (see also 415); 451, 656

Horace Walpole's correspondence with the reverend William Cole. Edited by W. S. Lewis and A. D. Wallace; B.. 653
Horney, Dr. Karen
  Neurotic personality of our time, the; B 21
Hounds on the mountain. J. Still; B....... 109
House in Antigua, the. L. Adamic; B..... 444
Housman, A. E.: A sketch. A. S. F. Gow; AN......................... 273
Housman, Alfred Edward. Recollections by various hands; B.................. 690
How to beat the high cost of living. R. Giles; B.......................... 693
Howe, M. A. DeWolfe
  John Jay Chapman and his letters; B.. 440
Huberman, Leo
  Labor spy racket, the; B............ 352
Humphries, Rolfe; R....................... 293
Hurston, Zora Neale
  Their eyes were watching God; B..... 409
Huxley, Aldous
  Ends and means; B.................. 656

I

I knew Hitler. The story of a Nazi who escaped the blood-purge. K. G. W. Lüdecke; B........................ 618
Idealism of Giovanni Gentile, the. R. W. Holmes; B........................ 410
Ilf, Ilya, and E. Petrov
  Little golden America. C. Malamuth, translator; B...................... 326
Imperial city. E. Rice; B............... 565
Importance of living, the. L. Yutang; B... 654
Integrity, the life of George W. Norris. R. L. Neuberger and S. B. Kahn; B.. 75
Intellectual and cultural history of the western world, an. H. E. Barnes; B..... 721
International monetary issues. C. R. Whitlesey; AN 329
Ireland, three books on; B............... 355
Ishii, Ryoichi
  Population pressure and economic life in Japan; B...................... 245
Island of Bali, the. M. Covarrubias; B.... 654

J

Jeffers, Robinson
  Such counsels you gave to me; B...... 442
John Jay Chapman and his letters. M. A. DeWolfe Howe; B.................. 440
Johnston, Alva
  Great Goldwyn, the; B............... 75
Jonathan Swift. B. Newman; B........... 223
Jones, Edgar M.; R...................... 78
Jones, Howard Mumford
  Harp that once, the; B.............. 694
Journal of Eugene Delacroix, the. Translated by W. Pach; B.............. 660
Joyce, James
  Collected poems; B.................. 382

K

Kafka, Franz
  Trial, the; B........................ 448
Kahn, Stephen B., and R. I. Neuberger
  Integrity, the life of George W. Norris; B 75
Kaiser on trial, the. G. S. Viereck; B...... 691
Kang, Younghill
  East goes west: The making of an oriental Yankee; B..................... 482
Kang, Younghill; R....................... 654
Kaufman, George S.; R.................... 75
Keats, John, biography. C. A. Brown, Edited with introduction and notes by D. H. Bodurtha and W. B. Pope; B 327
Kerstein, Lincoln; R...................... 618
Kirby, J., and G. C. M. McGonigle
  Poverty and public health; B......... 22
Kohn, Hans
  Force or reason: Issues of the twentieth century; B......................... 225
Krauch, Elsa
  Mind restored, a; B.................. 385
Krinkin, David; R......................... 328
Kronenberger, Louis; R...202, 439, 511, 566, 690
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R..153, 224, 243, 350, 653

L

Labby—the life of Henry Labouchere. H. Pearson; B......................... 296
Labor spies, three books on; B............ 352
Labor spy. GT 99; B...................... 352
Labor spy racket, the. L. Huberman; B.... 352
Labouchere, Henry, biography. H. Pearson; B 296
La Farge, Oliver
  Enemy gods, the; B.................. 538
Laidler, Harry W.; R..................... 406
Lament for the death of a bullfighter, and other poems. F. G. Lorca. Translated by A. L. Lloyd; B................. 292
Landau, Captain Henry
  Enemy within, the: The inside story of German sabotage in America; B... 449
Last look, the, and other poems, M. Van Doren; B......................... 537
Lawrence, T. E. By his friends; B........ 246
Lazare, Christopher; R.....24, 80, 106, 328, 538
Lena. R. Vercel. Translated by W. B. Wells; AN 202
Lerner, Max; R..176 (see also C..304).. 589
Letter to Robert Frost and others, a. R. Hillyer; B.......................... 538
Letters from Iceland. W. H. Auden and MacNeice; B...................... 658
Letters of an old bolshevik: The key to the Moscow trials; B.................... 648
Levenstein, Aaron; R..................... 696
Levin, Harry; R...........51, 154, 279, 482, 720
Levinson, Edward; R...................... 352
Lewinsohn, Richard
  Profits of war. the; AN............. 328
Lewis, Cecil Day
  Friendly tree, the; B................. 8
Liddell Hart
  Europe in arms; B................... 200
Life and death of a Spanish town, the. E. Paul; B........................ 354
Life is my song. J. G. Fletcher; B...... 723
Life of John Keats. C. A. Brown. Edited with introduction and notes by D. H. Bodurtha and W. B. Pope; B...... 327
Life with mother. C. Day; B............ 202
Linton, Ralph; R.....................441, 654
Lippmann, Walter
  Good society, the; B................. 589
Lips, Julius E.
  Savage hits back, the; B..........382; see also 516, 728
Listen and learn. F. E. Hill; B.......... 566
Little children. W. Saroyan; B.......203; see also C.......................... 248
Little golden America. I. Ilf and E. Petrov. Translated by C. Malamuth; B 326
Livingston, Arthur; R.................... 20
Lorca, Federico Garcia
  Lament for the death of a bullfighter, and other poems. A. L. Lloyd, translator; B......................... 293
Lord Bothwell and Mary, Queen of Scots. R. Gore-Browne; B............... 108
Lore, Ludwig; R...50 (see also C..139); 449, 690
Lost heritage. B. Frank. Translated by Cyrus Brooks; AN................. 513
Love, Paul; R........................... 177
Low, D. M.
  Edward Gibbon; B.................. 153
Lowenthal, Marvin; R..................... 647
Lüdecke, Kurt G. W.
  I knew Hitler. The story of a Nazi who escaped the blood-purge; B......... 618
Luhan, Mabel Dodge
  Edge of Taos desert; B.............. 326
Lumpkin, Katharine Du Pre, and D. Douglas
  Child workers in America; B......... 78
Lynd, Helen Merrill; R................... 77
Lyon, Leverett S.; R..................... 135
Lyons, Eugene
  Assignment in Utopia; B............. 531

M

MacNeice, Louis, and W. H. Auden
  Letters from Iceland; B............. 658
Madame Flowery Sentiment. A. Gervais. Translated by C. Dixon; AN...... 202
Making of a hero, the. N. Ostrovski. Translated by A. Brown; B......... 79
Man, bread and destiny. C. C. Furnas and S. M. Furnas; B................. 661
Man with the blue guitar, the, and other poems. W. Stevens; B.............. 508
Mann, Heinrich
  Young Henry of Navarre. E. Sutton, translator; B....................... 350
Mann, Thomas
  Freud, Goethe, Wagner; B.......... 270
Mansfield, Katherine
  Short stories; B..................... 435
Marshall, Lenore G.
  Hall of mirrors; AN................ 453
Marshall, Margaret; R.................... 620
Masters, Edgar Lee
  Tide of time, the; B................ 300
Mazour, Anatole G.
  First Russian revolution, the, 1825, the decembrist movement, its origins, development and significance; B...... 175
McAlmon, Robert
  Not alone lost; B.................... 76
McCarthy, Mary; R................79, 296, 454
McGonigle, G. C. M., and J. Kirby
  Poverty and public health; B......... 22
Mea culpa. L. F. Céline. Translated by R. A. Parker; B................... 174
Medical review of soviet Russia, a. W. H. Gantt; B.......................... 531
Memoirs of Sir Ronald Storrs, the; B...... 620
Menninger, Karl A.; R..225 (see also C, 304), 385
Mentally ill in America, the. A. Deutsch; B.........225; see also C.......... 304
Millay, Edna St. Vincent
  Conversation at midnight; B.......... 174
Milton and Wordsworth, poets and prophets. A study of their reactions to political events. Sir H. J. C. Grierson; B... 22
Mims, Edwin, junior; R................... 106
Mind mislaid, a. H. C. Brown; B......... 385
Mind restored, a. E. Krauch; B.......... 385
Minstrel boy, the. L. A. G. Strong; B..... 694
Miss Weeton: Journal of a governess, 1807-1811; B.......................... 324
Mitchell, Broadus
  World's wealth, the: Its use and abuse; B.........481; see also C......... 544
Mitchell, Wesley C.
  Backward art of spending money, the, and other essays; B................. 135
Modley, Rudolph, L. M. Hacker, and G. R. Taylor
  United States, the: A graphic history; B 660
Moore, Thomas, two biographies; B......... 694
Morell, Peter
  Poisons, potions, and profits; B........ 693
Moscow, 1937. L. Feuchtwanger; B...... 531
Mother, the. S. Asch. Translated by E. Krauch; B.......................... 724
Mott, Lucretia, biography. L. C. M. Hare; B 299
Museum. J. L. Phelan; B................ 355
My father, Paul Gauguin. P. Gauguin; B.. 50
My war with the United States. L. Bemelmans; B.......................... 136

N

National debt and government credit, the. Factual findings. P. W. Stewart and R. S. Tucker; B.................... 406
Negro builders and heroes. B. Brawley; B......437: see also C, 571 (two letters)
Neuberger, Richard L., and S. B. Kahn
  Integrity, the life of George W. Norris; B 75
Neurotic personality of our time, the. Dr. K. Horney; B..................... 21
New frontiers of the mind. J. B. Rhine; B 592
Newman, Bertram
  Jonathan Swift; B.................. 223
Niebuhr, Reinhold; R..................... 662
Nock, Albert Jay
  Free speech and plain language; B.... 507
Norris, George W., biography. R. L. Neuberger and S. B. Kahn; B.......... 75
Northwest passage. K. Roberts; B........ 106
Not alone lost. R. McAlmon; B......... 76
Not to be broadcast: The truth about radio, R. Brindze; B..................... 78

O

O'Brien, Eugene
  He swung and he missed; AN........ 453
O'Brien, Justin; R....................696, 724
O'Connor, Frank
  Death in Dublin; B.................. 355
O'Connor, Harvey
  Guggenheims, the: The making of an American dynasty; B..........446; see also 572, 700
O'Flaherty, Liam
  Famine; B........................... 355
Oh, say, can you see! L. Browne; AN.... 202
One life, one kopeck. W. Duranty; B...... 244
Ornament of honor. E. H. R. Altounyan; AN 328
Ostrovski, Nicholas
  Making of a hero, the. A. Brown, translator; B........................... 79

P

Palmer, Rachel Lynn, and I. M. Alpher, M. D.
  40,000,000 guinea pig children; B..... 693
Parran, Thomas, M. D.
  Shadow of the land: Syphilis; B...... 325
Paul, Elliot
  Life and death of a Spanish town, the; B............................ 354
Pearson, Hesketh
  Labby—The life of Henry Labouchere; B 296
Pendleton, Lewis
  Down east; AN...................... 329
Petrov, Eugene, and I. Ilf
  Little golden America. C. Malamuth, translator; B...................... 326
Peyré, Joseph
  Glittering death. J. Whitall, translator; AN 157
  Rehearsal in Oviedo; AN........... 694
Phelan, James L.
  Museum; B.......................... 355
Phillips, William; R...............135, 203 (see also C, 248); 448
Pierce, Ross Edward
  Poems; AN......................... 513
Pity the tyrant. H. O. Storm; B......... 408
Pius XI, pope, and world affairs. W. Teeling; B.......................... 662
Place in the city. H. Fast; AN........... 177
Plot and counter-plot in central Europe. M. W. Fodor; B.................. 618

Poems. R. E. Pierce; AN................ 513
Poems: 1929-1936. D. Fitts; B........... 76
Poisons, potions, and profits. P. Morell; B 693
Pope Pius XI and world affairs. W. Teeling; B........................... 662
Population pressure and economic life in Japan. R. Ishii; B................ 245
Porteous, S. D.
  Primitive intelligence and environment; B 480
Porter, Katherine Anne; R.............. 435
Portrait of Mexico. B. Wolfe; B.......... 154
Poverty and public health. G. C. M. McGonigle and J. Kirby; B.......... 22
Power to govern, the: The constitution—then and now. W. H. Hamilton and D. Adair; B...................... 106
Press and world affairs, the. R. W. Desmond. Introduction by H. J. Laski; B 299
Primitive intelligence and environment. S. D. Porteous; B............. 480
Primitive religion: Its nature and origin. P. Radin; B...................... 408
Prismatic ground. M. Young; AN......... 455
Profits of war, the. R. Lewinsohn; AN.... 328
Prokosch, Frederic
  Seven who fled, the; B............... 296
Proletarian journey. F. E. Beal; R.....384, 531

R

Race: A study in modern superstition. J. Barzun; B......................... 480
Radin, Paul
  Primitive religion: Its nature and origin; B........................... 408
Raglan, Lord
  Hero, the. A study in tradition, myth and drama; B..................... 201
Rahv, Philip; R.......79, 156, 174, 244, 326, 354
Randall, J. G.
  Civil war, the, and reconstruction; B.. 691
Ratcliffe, S. K.; R...................... 721
Raushenbush, Stephen and Joan Raushenbush
  War madness; B..................... 269
Rehearsal in Oviedo. J. Peyré; AN....... 696
Retouches à mon retour de l'U. R. S. S. By A. Gide; B..................... 531
Return of Kai Lung, the. E. Bramah; AN.. 454
Rhine, J. B.
  New frontiers of the mind; B......... 592
Rice, Elmer
  Imperial city; B..................... 565
Rice, Philip Blair; R.............174, 325, 537
Rich, Louis; R......................454, 513
Riding, Laura
  Trojan ending, a; B.................. 271
Road, the: In search of America. N. Asch; B.......................... 24
Robert Browning and Julia Wedgwood. Edited by R. Curle; B............ 444
Roberts, Kenneth
  Northwest passage; B................ 106
Robinson, Edwin Arlington
  Collected poems; B.................. 222
Rogers, F. Theo.
  Spain: A tragic journey; B........... 104
Romains, Jules
  Depths and the heights, the. G. Hopkins, translator; B................. 381
Roosevelt—and then? S. High; B........ 564
Rorty, James; R......................... 384
Ross, Leonard Q.
  Education of Hyman Kaplan, the; B... 224
Rosten, Leo C.
  Washington correspondents, the; B.... 589
Run around. B. Appel; AN............... 273
Russia, seven books on; B................ 531
Russia, twenty years after. V. Serge; B... 531

S

Salute to yesterday. G. Fowler; B......... 406
Salvemini, Gaetano; R.................... 225
Saroyan, William
  Little children; B..203; see also C.. 248
Savage civilization. T. Harrisson; B....... 441
Savage hits back, the. J. E. Lips; B..382; see also 516, 728
Saxon, Lyle
  Children of strangers; B.............. 205
Sayers, Michael; R....................... 329
Schapiro, Meyer; B.....................50, 323
Schlamm, Willi
  Diktatur der lüge: Eine abrechnung; B 648
Selected poems, with an essay on her own poetry. E. Sitwell; B.............. 20
Selected supreme court decision. Edited by M. Cohen, with introduction by A. Meiklejohn; B...176; see also C... 304
Sender, Ramon
  Counter-attack in Spain. Sir P. C. Mitchell, translator; B.............. 536
Serge, Victor
  Russia, twenty years after; B......... 531
Seven who fled, the. F. Prokosch; B....... 296
Shadow on the land: Syphilis. T. Parran, M.D.; B........................... 325
Shaker furniture. The craftsmanship of an American communal sect. E. D. Andrews and F. Andrews; B........... 175
Shakespeare's young lovers. E. E. Stoll; B 720
Share-cropper, the. C. M. Simon; AN...... 696
Shepard, Odell; R........................ 594
Shopping guide, the. Edited by E. B. Weiss and M. Mermey; B................. 693
Short stories of Katherine Mansfield, the; B 435
Simon, Charlie May
  Share-cropper, the; AN............... 696
Sitwell, Edith
  Selected poems, with an essay on her own poetry; B...................... 20
Slesinger, Donald; R..................... 566
Smolka, H. P.
  "40,000 against the arctic"; B......... 268
Snyder, Charles Lee; R.................. 177
Social and cultural dynamics. P. Sorokin; B 48
Social and religious history of the Jews, a. S. W. Baron; B.................... 327
Sod-house frontier, the, 1854-1890. E. Dick; B 483
Sommerfield, John
  Volunteer in Spain; B................ 593
Song of the world, the. J. Giono. Translated by H. Fluchère and G. Myers; B 225
Sorkin, Pitirim
  Social and cultural dynamics; B....... 48
Soule, George
  Future of liberty, the; B.............. 156
Soviet Russia, seven books on; B..531 (see also C..627); five books on......... 648
Spain: A tragic journey. F. T. Rogers; B 104
Spaulding, Edward Gleason
  World of chance, a; B................ 451
Spies, labor, three books on; B........... 352
Spirit and structure of German fascism, the. R. A. Brady. Foreword by H. J. Laski; B........................... 50
Spy overhead. C. Calkins; B.............. 352
Squire, Tom; R.........................136, 157
Stalin school of falsification, the. L. Trotsky; B 648
Stalinism and bolshevism. L. Trotsky; B.. 648
Star-begotten. H. G. Wells; AN........... 157
Steel, Johannes
  Escape to the present; B.............. 242
Stein, Rose M; R........................ 269
Stevens, Wallace
  Man with the blue guitar, the, and other poems; B........................ 508
Stewart, Maxwell S; R.................78, 329
Stewart, Paul W., and R. S. Tucker
  National debt and government credit, the. Factual findings; B............. 406
Still, James
  Hounds on the mountain; B........... 109
Stillman, Clara Gruening; R............. 108
Stolberg, Benjamin; R..437; see also (two letters) 571
Stoll, E. E.
  Shakespeare's young lovers; B......... 720
Storm, Hans Otto
  Pity the tyranny; B.................. 408
Storrs, Sir Ronald
  Memoirs; B 620
Strauss, Harold; R...................... 724
Strong, L. A. G.
  Minstrel boy, the; B................. 694
Such counsels you gave to me. R. Jeffers; B 442
Surrealism. Edited by H. Read; B......... 323
Sweezy, Paul M; R..481 (see also C..544); 660, 725
Swift, Jonathan, biography. B. Newman; B 223

T

T. E. Lawrence. By his friends; B......... 246
Take care of yourself. J. W. Ephraim; AN 177
Tarlé, Eugene
  Bonaparte; B 20
Taylor, G. R., L. M. Hacker, and R. Modley
  United States, the: A graphic history; B 660
Teeling, William
  Pope Pius XI and world affairs; B.... 662
Ten million Americans have it! S. W. Becker, M.D.; B....................... 325
Their eyes were watching God. Z. N. Hurston; B 409
This room and this gin and these sandwiches. E. Wilson; B 133
Thomas, Norman; R...................... 564
Thoreau, two books on; B................ 594
Thoreau, works of. Selected and edited by Henry S. Canby; B................. 594
Tide of time, the. E. L. Masters; B........ 300
To have and have not. E. Hemingway; B.. 439
Toksvig, Signe
  Eve's doctor; AN..................... 177
Tranquil heart, the. A portrait of Giovanni Boccaccio. C. Carswell; B........... 350
Trial, the. F. Kafka; B.................. 448
Trojan ending, a. L. Riding; B............ 271
Trotsky, Leon
  Stalin school of falsification, the; B.... 648
  Stalinism and bolshevism; B........... 648
Trotsky hearings, book on; B............. 648
Tucker, Rufus S., and P. W. Stewart
  National debt and government credit, the. Factual findings; B............. 406
Tunis, John R.; R........................ 623
Turning wheels, the. S. Cloete; R.......... 508
Twelve poets of the Pacific. Edited by Y. Winters; B 76

U

Undset, Sigrid
  Faithful wife, the; B................. 481
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, seven books on; B..531 (see also C..627); five books on 648
United States, the: A graphic history. Text by L. M. Hacker. Pictorial statistics by R. Modley. Statistical research by G. R. Taylor; B.................... 660
Untermeyer, Louis
  Heinrich Heine: Paradox and poet; B.. 647

V

Van Doren, Mark
  Last look, the, and other poems; B.... 537
Van Doren, Mark; R..22, 175, 271, 329, 440, 508
Vercel, Roger
  Lena. W. B. Wells, translator; AN.... 202
Viereck, George Sylvester
  Kaiser on trial, the; B................ 691
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R........75, 299, 590
Vivas, Eliseo; R....................24, 410, 723
Volunteer in Spain. J. Sommerfield; B..... 593

W

Wade, Mason; R.......................... 300
Walden, and other writings of Henry David Thoreau. Edited by Brooks Atkinson; B 594
Walpole, Horace
  Correspondence with the reverend William Cole. Edited by W. S. Lewis and A. D. Wallace; B.................... 653
Walsh, J. Raymond
  C. I. O.: Industrial unionism in action; B 722
Walton, Eda Lou; R..76 (see also C..276); 326, 444, 481, 538, 723
War madness. S. and J. Raushenbush; B.. 269
War with the newts. K. Capek. Translated by M. and R. Weatherall; B........ 482
Washington correspondents, the. L. C. Rosten; B 590
Webster, John
  Complete works. Edited by F. L. Lucas; B 243
Weisbord, Albert
  Conquest of power, the. Liberalism, anarchism, syndicalism, socialism, fascism, and communism; B......270; see also 415
Weller, George; R........................ 444
Wells, H. G.
  Star-begotten; AN.................... 157
Wheel turns, the. G. Dàuli; B............ 106
When labor organizes. R. R. R. Brooks; B 509
Whitman, Willson
  Bread and circuses: A story of federal theater; B........................ 442
Whittlesey, Charles R
  International monetary issues; AN..... 329
Why was Lincoln murdered? O. Eisenschiml; AN 177
Wilkins, Vaughn
  And so—Victoria; B.................. 135
Williams, William Carlos; R.............. 268
Willison, G. F.; R........................ 406
Wills, Helen
  Fifteen-thirty. The story of a tennis player; B 623
Wilson, Edmund
  This room and this gin and these sandwiches; B 133
Wilson, Edmund; R..531 (see also C..627); 648
Wolfe, Bertram
  Portrait of Mexico; B................ 154
Words: English roots and how they grow. M. S. Ernst; AN 273
World of chance, a. E. G. Spaulding; B.... 451
World's wealth, the: Its use and abuse. B. Mitchell; B.....481; see also C..... 544

Y

Yarmolinsky, Avrahm; R.................. 175
Yellen, Samuel; R.....................509, 722
You have seen their faces. E. Caldwell and M. Bourke-White; B................. 622
Young, Marguerite
  Prismatic ground; AN................ 455
Young, Stanley; R............109, 273, 455, 513
Young Henry of Navarre. H. Mann. Translated by E. Sutton; B.............. 350
Yutang, Lin
  Importance of living, the; B........... 654

Z

Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R.....222, 294, 382, 660
Zaturenska, Marya
  Cold morning sky; R................. 325
Zugsmith, Leane
  Home is where you hang your childhood, and other stories; AN........ 156

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 3, 1937 NUMBER 1

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 1

EDITORIALS:

THIRD TERM: BAD MEDICINE 4

"LAW AND ORDER" 5

TWILIGHT OF HEARST 6

A CABLE FROM VALENCIA by Louis Fischer 7

YACHTS AND TAXES by Frederick R. Barkley 9

THE ROSSELLI BROTHERS by Max Ascoli 10

IT'S WAR IN YOUNGSTOWN by Rose Stein 12

GROPPER VISITS YOUNGSTOWN 14
Words and Pictures

WANTED: A BRITISH C. I. O. by Harold J. Laski 16

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 18

BROUN'S PAGE 19

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

BONAPARTE: THROUGH MARXIST EYES
by Arthur Livingston 20

CREATIVE SENSIBILITY by Babette Deutsch 20

TODAY'S NEUROTICS by J. F. Brown 21

THE COMMON HEALTH by Hugh H. Darby 22

THE POET AS PROPHET by Mark Van Doren 22

PROFESSOR HARTSHORNE'S GOD by Eliseo Vivas 24

IN SEARCH OF AMERICA by Christopher Lazare 24

RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 25

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER
Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
Editorial Associates
HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

*

AFTER AN ANXIOUS WEEK EUROPE HAS resumed its state of watchful anticipation of a new crisis. Hitler's first impulse of violent retaliation against Spain after the alleged attack on the Leipzig was again checked by wiser counsels. It spent itself in a vain demand, backed by Mussolini, that the patrolling powers make a display of naval strength in Spanish waters as a warning to the Valencia government. The flat refusal of England and France staved off active trouble for the moment. Germany and Italy again withdrew from the non-intervention patrol (but remained in the non-intervention committee) stating that they would henceforth consider themselves free to take any necessary action to protect their interests. And their interests have since been clearly defined. Hitler has announced flatly that Franco must win because Germany needs the ores in northern Spain. Farinacci's article in Régime Fascista, practically demanding war with England now, was followed by a declaration in Il Popolo d'Italia by Il Duce himself that Italy had not been neutral in the Spanish struggle but had fought, "and victory therefore will be hers." Both powers have turned down the proposal that the British and French carry on the entire patrol and their ships have moved into strategic positions. On Monday of this week the Valencia coast was bombarded by unidentified war vessels. The only encouraging aspect of these developments is the change in England's attitude. The British were determined against all the evidence to think well of Hitler and his fellow provocateurs. They had prepared the stage for a friendly agreement on Spain, including, no doubt, an arrangement regarding Spanish economic resources. There are indications that Italy was to be frozen out of the new friendship. But Hitler ignored the cues, forgot his lines, and exposed to all eyes the bald reality of Nazi policy which is in sharp conflict with British policy, especially as it relates to the ores of northern Spain. We have moved into a period of uneasy respite during which the diplomats search for a new formula; but trouble lurks just outside Spain's three-mile limit.

*

SUSPENSION OF GOLD PAYMENTS AND THE closing of the Bourse in France emphasized the gravity of the financial crisis facing the new Chautemps Cabinet. With an empty treasury and an exhausted stabilization fund, drastic action is necessary to avert a panic which

- Poems. R. E. Pierce; AN................ 513
- Poems: 1929-1936. D. Fitts; B.......... 76
- Poisons, potions, and profits. P. Morell; B 693
- Pope Pius XI and world affairs. W. Teeling; B............................ 662
- Population pressure and economic life in Japan. R. Ishii; B............... 245
- Porteous, S. D.
  - Primitive intelligence and environment; B 480
- Porter, Katherine Anne; R............. 435
- Portrait of Mexico. B. Wolfe; B........ 154
- Poverty and public health. G. C. M. McGonigle and J. Kirby; B.......... 22
- Power to govern, the: The constitution—then and now. W. H. Hamilton and D. Adair; B...................... 106
- Press and world affairs, the. R. W. Desmond. Introduction by H. J. Laski; B 299
- Primitive intelligence and environment. S. D. Porteous; B................. 480
- Primitive religion: Its nature and origin. P. Radin; B..................... 408
- Prismatic ground. M. Young; AN......... 455
- Profits of war, the. R. Lewinsohn; AN.... 328
- Prokosch, Frederic
  - Seven who fled, the; B............... 296
- Proletarian journey. F. E. Beal; R.....384, 531

R

- Race: A study in modern superstition. J. Barzun; B......................... 480
- Radin, Paul
  - Primitive religion: Its nature and origin; B.......................... 408
- Raglan, Lord
  - Hero, the. A study in tradition, myth and drama; B..................... 201
- Rahv, Philip; R.......79, 156, 174, 244, 326, 354
- Randall, J. G.
  - Civil war, the, and reconstruction; B.. 691
- Ratcliffe, S. K.; R...................... 721
- Raushenbush, Stephen and Joan Raushenbush
  - War madness; B.................... 269
- Rehearsal in Oviedo. J. Peyré; AN....... 696
- Retouches à mon retour de l'U. R. S. S. By A. Gide; B..................... 531
- Return of Kai Lung, the. E. Bramah; AN.. 454
- Rhine, J. B.
  - New frontiers of the mind; B......... 592
- Rice, Elmer
  - Imperial city; B.................... 565
- Rice, Philip Blair; R.............174, 325, 537
- Rich, Louis; R.......................454, 513
- Riding, Laura
  - Trojan ending, a; B.................. 271
- Road, the: In search of America. N. Asch; B.......................... 24
- Robert Browning and Julia Wedgwood. Edited by R. Curle; B............ 444
- Roberts, Kenneth
  - Northwest passage; B............... 106
- Robinson, Edwin Arlington
  - Collected poems; B.................. 222
- Rogers, F. Theo.
  - Spain: A tragic journey; B........... 104
- Romains, Jules
  - Depths and the heights, the. G. Hopkins, translator; B................. 381
- Roosevelt—and then? S. High; B........ 564
- Rorty, James; R......................... 384
- Ross, Leonard Q.
  - Education of Hyman Kaplan, the; B... 224
- Rosten, Leo C.
  - Washington correspondents, the; B.... 589
- Run around. B. Appel; AN................ 273
- Russia, seven books on; B............... 531
- Russia, twenty years after. V. Serge; B... 531

S

- Salute to yesterday. G. Fowler; B......... 406
- Salvemini, Gaetano; R.................... 225
- Saroyan, William
  - Little children; B..203; see also C.. 248
- Savage civilization. T. Harrisson; B....... 441
- Savage hits back, the. J. E. Lips; B..382; see also 516, 728
- Saxon, Lyle
  - Children of strangers; B.............. 205
- Sayers, Michael; R....................... 329
- Schapiro, Meyer; B.....................50, 323
- Schlamm, Willi
  - Diktatur der lüge: Eine abrechnung; B 648
- Selected poems, with an essay on her own poetry. E. Sitwell; B............. 20
- Selected supreme court decision. Edited by M. Cohen, with introduction by A. Meiklejohn; B...176; see also C... 304
- Sender, Ramon
  - Counter-attack in Spain. Sir P. C. Mitchell, translator; B.............. 536
- Serge, Victor
  - Russia, twenty years after; B......... 531
- Seven who fled, the. F. Prokosch; B....... 296
- Shadow on the land: Syphilis. T. Parran, M.D.; B.......................... 325
- Shaker furniture. The craftsmanship of an American communal sect. E. D. Andrews and F. Andrews; B........... 175
- Shakespeare's young lovers. E. E. Stoll; B 720
- Share-cropper, the. C. M. Simon; AN...... 696
- Shepard, Odell; R........................ 594
- Shopping guide, the. Edited by E. B. Weiss and M. Mermey; B................. 693
- Short stories of Katherine Mansfield, the; B 435
- Simon, Charlie May
  - Share-cropper, the; AN.............. 696
- Sitwell, Edith
  - Selected poems, with an essay on her own poetry; B.................... 20
- Slesinger, Donald; R..................... 566
- Smolka, H. P.
  - "40,000 against the arctic"; B......... 268
- Snyder, Charles Lee; R................... 177
- Social and cultural dynamics. P. Sorokin; B 48
- Social and religious history of the Jews, a. S. W. Baron; B.................... 327
- Sod-house frontier, the, 1854-1890. E. Dick; B 483
- Sommerfield, John
  - Volunteer in Spain; B................ 593
- Song of the world, the. J. Giono. Translated by H. Fluchère and G. Myers; B 225
- Sorkin, Pitirim
  - Social and cultural dynamics; B....... 48
- Soule, George
  - Future of liberty, the; B............. 156
- Soviet Russia, seven books on; B..531 (see also C..627); five books on......... 648
- Spain: A tragic journey. F. T. Rogers; B 104
- Spaulding, Edward Gleason
  - World of chance, a; B................ 451
- Spies, labor, three books on; B............ 352
- Spirit and structure of German fascism, the. R. A. Brady. Foreword by H. J. Laski; B............................... 50
- Spy overhead. C. Calkins; B............... 352
- Squire, Tom; R........................136, 157
- Stalin school of falsification, the. L. Trotsky; B 648
- Stalinism and bolshevism. L. Trotsky; B.. 648
- Star-begotten. H. G. Wells; AN........... 157
- Steel, Johannes
  - Escape to the present; B.............. 242
- Stein, Rose M; R......................... 269
- Stevens, Wallace
  - Man with the blue guitar, the, and other poems; B.......................... 508
- Stewart, Maxwell S; R..................78, 329
- Stewart, Paul W., and R. S. Tucker
  - National debt and government credit, the. Factual findings; B............ 406
- Still, James
  - Hounds on the mountain; B.......... 109
- Stillman, Clara Gruening; R.............. 108
- Stolberg, Benjamin; R..437; see also (two letters) 571
- Stoll, E. E.
  - Shakespeare's young lovers; B......... 720
- Storm, Hans Otto
  - Pity the tyranny; B.................. 408
- Storrs, Sir Ronald
  - Memoirs; B 620
- Strauss, Harold; R....................... 724
- Strong, L. A. G.
  - Minstrel boy, the; B.................. 694
- Such counsels you gave to me. R. Jeffers; B 442
- Surrealism. Edited by H. Read; B.......... 323
- Sweezy, Paul M; R..481 (see also C..544); 660, 725
- Swift, Jonathan, biography. B. Newman; B 223

T

- T. E. Lawrence. By his friends; B......... 246
- Take care of yourself. J. W. Ephraim; AN 177
- Tarlé, Eugene
  - Bonaparte; B 20
- Taylor, G. R., L. M. Hacker, and R. Modley
  - United States, the: A graphic history; B 660
- Teeling, William
  - Pope Pius XI and world affairs; B.... 662
- Ten million Americans have it! S. W. Becker, M.D.; B................... 325
- Their eyes were watching God. Z. N. Hurston; B 409
- This room and this gin and these sandwiches. E. Wilson; B 133
- Thomas, Norman; R....................... 564
- Thoreau, two books on; B................. 594
- Thoreau, works of. Selected and edited by Henry S. Canby; B................ 594
- Tide of time, the. E. L. Masters; B......... 300
- To have and have not. E. Hemingway; B.. 439
- Toksvig, Signe
  - Eve's doctor; AN..................... 177
- Tranquil heart, the. A portrait of Giovanni Boccaccio. C. Carswell; B........... 350
- Trial, the. F. Kafka; B.................... 448
- Trojan ending, a. L. Riding; B............ 271
- Trotsky, Leon
  - Stalin school of falsification, the; B.... 648
  - Stalinism and bolshevism; B........... 648
- Trotsky hearings, book on; B.............. 648
- Tucker, Rufus S., and P. W. Stewart
  - National debt and government credit, the. Factual findings; B............ 406
- Tunis, John R.; R......................... 623
- Turning wheels, the. S. Cloete; R.......... 508
- Twelve poets of the Pacific. Edited by Y. Winters; B 76

U

- Undset, Sigrid
  - Faithful wife, the; B................. 481
- Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, seven books on; B..531 (see also C..627); five books on 648
- United States, the: A graphic history. Text by L. M. Hacker. Pictorial statistics by R. Modley. Statistical research by G. R. Taylor; B...................... 660
- Untermeyer, Louis
  - Heinrich Heine: Paradox and poet; B.. 647

V

- Van Doren, Mark
  - Last look, the, and other poems; B.... 537
- Van Doren, Mark; R..22, 175, 271, 329, 440, 508
- Vercel, Roger
  - Lena. W. B. Wells, translator; AN.... 202
- Viereck, George Sylvester
  - Kaiser on trial, the; B................ 691
- Villard, Oswald Garrison; R.........75, 299, 590
- Vivas, Eliseo; R...................24, 410, 723
- Volunteer [illegible] Spain. J. Sommerfield; B..... 593

W

- Wade, Mason; R........................... 300
- Walden, and other writings of Henry David Thoreau. Edited by Brooks Atkinson; B 594
- Walpole, Horace
  - Correspondence with the reverend William Cole. Edited by W. S. Lewis and A. D. Wallace; B..................... 653
- Walsh, J. Raymond
  - C. I. O.: Industrial unionism in action; B 722
- Walton, Eda Lou; R..76 (see also C..276); 326, 444, 481, 538, 723
- War madness. S. and J. Raushenbush; B.. 269
- War with the newts. K. Capek. Translated by M. and R. Weatherall; B........ 482
- Washington correspondents, the. L. C. Rosten; B 590
- Webster, John
  - Complete works. Edited by F. L. Lucas; B 243
- Weisbord, Albert
  - Conquest of power, the. Liberalism, anarchism, syndicalism, socialism, fascism, and communism; B......270; see also 415
- Weller, George; R......................... 444
- Wells, H. G.
  - Star-begotten; AN.................... 157
- Wheel turns, the. G. Dàuli; B.............. 106
- When labor organizes. R. R. R. Brooks; B 509
- Whitman, Willson
  - Bread and circuses: A story of federal theater; B............................ 442
- Whittlesey, Charles R
  - International monetary issues; AN..... 329
- Why [illegible] Lincoln murdered? O. Eisenschiml; AN 177
- Wilkins, Vaughn
  - And so—Victoria; B.................. 135
- Williams, William Carlos; R............... 268
- Willison, G. F.; R......................... 406
- Wills, Helen
  - Fifteen-thirty. The story of a tennis player; B 623
- Wilson, Edmund
  - This room and this gin and these sandwiches; B 133
- Wilson, Edmund; R..531 (see also C..627); 648
- Wolfe, Bertram
  - Portrait of Mexico; B................. 154
- Words: English roots and how they grow. M. S. Ernst; AN 271
- World of chance, a. E. G. Spaulding; B.... 451
- World's wealth, the: Its use and abuse. B. Mitchell; B.....481; see also C..... 544

Y

- Yarmolinsky, Avrahm; R................... 175
- Yellen, Samuel; R........................509, 722
- You have seen their faces. E. Caldwell and M. Bourke White; B................ 622
- Young, Marguerite
  - Prismatic ground; AN................ 455
- Young, Stanley; R.............109, 273, 455, 513
- Young Henry of Navarre. H. Mann. Translated by E. Sutton; B................ 350
- Yutang, Lin
  - Importance of living, the; B........... 654

Z

- Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R.....222, 294, 382, 660
- Zaturenska, Marya
  - Cold morning sky; R.................. 325
- Zugsmith, Leane
  - Home is where you hang your childhood, and other stories; AN........ 156

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 3, 1937 NUMBER 1

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 1
EDITORIALS:
THIRD TERM: BAD MEDICINE 4
"LAW AND ORDER" 5
TWILIGHT OF HEARST 6
A CABLE FROM VALENCIA by Louis Fischer 7
YACHTS AND TAXES by Frederick R. Barkley 9
THE ROSSELLI BROTHERS by Max Ascoli 10
IT'S WAR IN YOUNGSTOWN by Rose Stein 12
GROPPER VISITS YOUNGSTOWN Words and Pictures 14
WANTED: A BRITISH C. I. O. by Harold J. Laski 16
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 18
BROUN'S PAGE 19
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
BONAPARTE: THROUGH MARXIST EYES by Arthur Livingston 20
CREATIVE SENSIBILITY by Babette Deutsch 20
TODAY'S NEUROTICS by J. F. Brown 21
THE COMMON HEALTH by Hugh H. Darby 22
THE POET AS PROPHET by Mark Van Doren 22
PROFESSOR HARTSHORNE'S GOD by Eliseo Vivas 24
IN SEARCH OF AMERICA by Christopher Lazare 24
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 25

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER
Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
Editorial Associates
HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

*

AFTER AN ANXIOUS WEEK EUROPE HAS resumed its state of watchful anticipation of a new crisis. Hitler's first impulse of violent retaliation against Spain after the alleged attack on the Leipzig was again checked by wiser counsels. It spent itself in a vain demand, backed by Mussolini, that the patrolling powers make a display of naval strength in Spanish waters as a warning to the Valencia government. The flat refusal of England and France staved off active trouble for the moment. Germany and Italy again withdrew from the non-intervention patrol (but remained in the non-intervention committee) stating that they would henceforth consider themselves free to take any necessary action to protect their interests. And their interests have since been clearly defined. Hitler has announced flatly that Franco must win because Germany needs the ores in northern Spain. Farinacci's article in Régime Fascista, practically demanding war with England now, was followed by a declaration in Il Popolo d'Italia by Il Duce himself that Italy had not been neutral in the Spanish struggle but had fought, "and victory therefore will be hers." Both powers have turned down the proposal that the British and French carry on the entire patrol and their ships have moved into strategic positions. On Monday of this week the Valencia coast was bombarded by unidentified war vessels. The only encouraging aspect of these developments is the change in England's attitude. The British were determined against all the evidence to think well of Hitler and his fellow provocateurs. They had prepared the stage for a friendly agreement on Spain, including, no doubt, an arrangement regarding Spanish economic resources. There are indications that Italy was to be frozen out of the new friendship. But Hitler ignored the cues, forgot his lines, and exposed to all eyes the bald reality of Nazi policy which is in sharp conflict with British policy, especially as it relates to the ores of northern Spain. We have moved into a period of uneasy respite during which the diplomats search for a new formula; but trouble lurks just outside Spain's three-mile limit.

*

SUSPENSION OF GOLD PAYMENTS AND THE closing of the Bourse in France emphasized the gravity of the financial crisis facing the new Chautemps Cabinet. With an empty treasury and an exhausted stabilization fund, drastic action is necessary to avert a panic which would sweep away all the economic gains achieved by the first Popular Front government. While the emergency powers asked by the new Finance Minister Georges Bonnet are almost identical with those which the Senate denied to the Blum government, there is every reason to believe that they will be granted this time. The hatred and suspicion with which the financial community regarded Blum and his Socialist finance minister do not apply to the more conservative Radicals. Thus it may be possible for Chautemps to restore confidence where Blum was foredoomed to failure. Politically, however, the new government has a more difficult row to hoe. Although Chautemps has so far shown no signs of departing from the Popular Front program in either the domestic or the international field, it has won only lukewarm support from the left Socialists and the Communists. The trade unions will not tolerate an indefinite extension of the "breathing spell" proclaimed by Blum. Yet French capitalism cannot readily adapt itself to the increased costs of production which have resulted from the Blum New Deal without imposing a reduction in real wages by devaluation or by increasing taxes, either of which will be bitterly resisted by the working class. With its present makeup, the Chautemps government cannot possibly be expected to adopt the Socialist solution of the crisis and it dare not adopt the orthodox capitalist solution. Ultimately it will have to give way to a government which is not so constrained. But as a stop-gap it has already served a useful purpose. With Hitler ready to take advantage of any weakness in France, the speedy formation of the Chautemps Cabinet may have helped to avert a general European conflict.

*

PAUL VAN ZEELAND WAS GIVEN A DEGREE by Princeton, presumably for his services to democracy. It should have been awarded to him for sheer cheek. For the Belgian Premier, according to the financial pages, came to America to persuade us to make a loan to Germany and Italy. Stated baldly, the mission seems fantastic. In diplomatic circles such matters are never stated baldly. Where the whole mission has not been surrounded by genteel generalities, there has been vague talk of another international conference, as with Walter Runciman's visit of some months back. The actual truth is that we are being asked to help the fascist powers with our money. But how? Doesn't the Johnson Act stand in the way? The answer is a pretty little scheme to get around the Johnson Act. We are to make a huge deposit in the Bank for International Settlements, earmark certain gold in our Kentucky catacombs for that purpose, and then let the B. I. S. hand the money over to Germany and Italy. But why should we do this? Again, a pretty little argument. Unless we lend the money, Germany and Italy will be driven to war by their financial difficulties; if we lend it, the hand of the conservatives in Germany will be strengthened as against the extremists. The whole thing would be incredible if it were not true. The one thing that keeps the fascists from complete domination and open war is lack of raw materials for further armaments. The idea is for America to supply the credits. Did Van Zeeland think this up by himself? No, the idea was obviously Dr. Schacht's, who sold it to England and France. And they, lacking the nerve to make a direct approach, have sent the supposedly anti-fascist Belgian premier as their emissary. We know that Congress would be bitterly opposed to any such proposal. And we hope that Mr. Roosevelt sends the young premier home with his ears stinging.

*

MR. ROOSEVELT ENTERTAINED LAST WEEK at Jefferson Island. The guests were three batches of Democratic Congressmen. The party was a success. The President knows how to do this sort of thing, and if there were any that came to scoff they remained to pay homage to his wit and geniality. It was the newspapermen, however, who could most truthfully write back, "Having wonderful time." They had a real field day, and did justice to it, with their description of the induction of the President into the Demagogues Club and of the hog-calling contest, at the end of which all the ham sandwiches were found to have vanished. But the Jefferson Island weekend was more than an orgy of charm and high spirits. We tend to forget that an American president is not only chief executive, but party leader as well. It is the function of a leader to keep a few steps ahead of his party, never outdistancing them too far, but never submitting passively to their drift. But who are the President's followers? Are they the Democrats in Congress or the large masses of democrats out of Congress? There is little doubt that the President is now far ahead of Congress, and must woo them wholesale and cajole them to keep his pace. But he is by no means out of step with the people. It is rather Congress and the press that have fallen behind the country.

*

THE HARDSHIP IMPOSED BY THE WPA CUTS was dramatized last week by two important demonstrations in New York. On June 26, five thousand persons, most of them women, picketed the City Hall in an effort to persuade Mayor La Guardia to oppose the cuts and to request more adequate home-relief allowances. Two days previously, eight hundred WPA artists, writers, and musicians had held Harold Stein, administrative officer of the WPA, in protest against the threatened dismissal of 2,848 persons on the five arts projects. Following an all-night vigil, Mr. Stein agreed to recommend the establishment of a neutral board of review which will have the power to retain persons for whom dismissal would mean severe hardship. The arts projects furnish a glaring example of the injustice of the Administration's cross-section cut in relief personnel which disregards both need and the value of the work performed. With the exception of a few supervisors, all members of the projects are genuine relief cases for whom the meager WPA salary is the sole source of livelihood. The WPA administration may not be responsible for the fact that an obstreperous Congress has denied funds for continuing the projects, but it is responsible for the manner in which the cuts are carried out. The least it can do it to grant a public hearing at which the plight of the dismissed workers can be brought to the attention of the country.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE PROPOSED INCREASE IN THE TAX ON THE capital earnings of foreigners, while justifiable, can scarcely be considered a solution of this country's "gold problem." The United States already holds more than half of the world's stock of monetary gold. A heavy tax on the profits of foreigners would discourage the import of capital for speculative purposes, and thus curtail the influx of gold, but it would also tend to "freeze" the huge sums which have already been invested in the American market. It would not bring about the needed redistribution of our gold stocks, nor would it contribute toward reducing our excess reserves. Any measure directed against foreigners has the added disadvantage of inviting retaliation. Further modification of our commercial policy and repeal of legislation such as the Johnson Act, which prevents foreign lending, would seem a much more satisfactory approach to the basic disequilibrium which the New Deal gold policy has created.

✶

MEXICO MADE TWO IMPORTANT STRIDES IN its long-delayed economic revolution last week when it nationalized its railways and established strict government control over farm marketing. To say that either step implies socialism, however, is to misread the facts. As in most European countries the railways were already operated by the government. The principal significance of nationalization is that the foreign bondholders, long unable to obtain interest on their investment, are to receive compensation. The new Mexican agricultural program goes beyond our own AAA only in that it involves price-fixing and a more rigid control over distribution. There is to be no collectivization, and no drastic measure to overcome Mexico's greatest curse—the concentration of land ownership. A legal mechanism has been created whereby agriculture and industry may be brought into a more balanced relationship. It still remains to be seen how this mechanism will be operated.

✶

PARTITION OF PALESTINE BETWEEN ARABS and Jews has long been rumored as the solution which the British Royal Commission will recommend to the Mandates Commission of the League of Nations in July. The Zionists have already expressed their violent opposition to the plan. While it would give the Jews the fertile plains along the Mediterranean coast, it would be a denial of their historic claim to all of Palestine as their national home, it would cut them off permanently from Trans-Jordan, it would deprive them of Jerusalem (which, as a sacred city, would be directly administered by the British), and it would leave them with an intractable Arab minority within their own narrow borders. Despite strong objections from the Mufti, who is president of the Arab High Committee and does not want to play second to the Emir of Trans-Jordan, the Arabs, according to press reports, are likely to favor the plan. In a state of their own united with Trans-Jordan, they would no longer fear Jewish domination. Sooner or later the Jews must concede that, no matter how valid their claims, the Balfour Declaration has not been workable for all of Palestine. Fifteen years of striving for collaboration between Jews and Arabs has only resulted in a bitter and bloody feud. Neither group will be wholly satisfied with a measure that meets only a fraction of its claims, but some compromise is inevitable. Whether or not partition is the best compromise possible, the plan should at least be examined without undue hostility and weighed against alternatives which are also certain to arouse antagonism.

✶

THE LIQUIDATION OF THE NANSEN OFFICE will pass almost unnoticed but the world can ill afford to lose it. Under the auspices of the League of Nations, it has cared for thousands of political refugees who had neither homes nor citizens' rights in any land. Existing precariously as an international charity, it was scheduled to be dissolved by 1938. Michael Hansson of Norway, present director of the office, now reports that "a truly appalling number of refugees" (some 700,000) will continue to need assistance after 1938. To them will be added a flood of victims of the Spanish war. It is sad to see the League, crumbling under the weight of its own futility, deliberately cut short a still useful function.

✶

A. P. HERBERT'S "HOLY DEADLOCK" IS BROKEN at last; or all but broken. His marriage bill has passed the House of Commons in spite of the epistolary guns mobilized by the bishops in the Times. It is now under fire in the House of Lords, meeting the bishops face to face. The events of last December dramatized the prickly horror which divorce seems to inspire in the British mind. When it came to voting on Mr. Herbert's bill, nearly two-thirds of the House of Commons found it prudent to be absent. As long ago as 1912 a royal commission recommended making desertion, cruelty, incurable insanity, incurable drunkenness, and imprisonment under a commuted death sentence grounds for divorce. Yet British law stubbornly refused to recognize that anything but adultery could be valid reason for dissolving a marriage. Even now, twenty-five years later, only three of the commission's recommendations have been adopted. The House of Commons could not bring itself to acknowledge that an incurable drunkard or a person imprisoned for life was an undesirable mate. And they added a provision that no divorce at all could be granted in the first five years of marriage. Although the bill was thus badly trimmed the fact that it was passed at all was a victory over the Church of England conscience. If it now gets by the Lords British morals will have taken a long delayed step toward modern times.

✶

THE COMMON ASSUMPTION THAT AN ETHICAL distinction exists between big business and small business is not borne out by the Twentieth Century Fund's two-year survey of "bigness" in American industry. While some of the great trusts are shown to have piled up huge profits over many years, the majority made very modest sums—less, proportionately, than profitable smaller enterprises. However, the large businesses made a better record in bad years and contributed to economic stability by distributing a larger proportion of their earnings in dividends. Because of the superior methods of financing available to large corporations, big business proved the more stable during the depression. The larger banks, especially, were much less susceptible to failure than the smaller institutions. The study is timely in view of the wide-spread belief that the evils inherent in the present economic system can be curbed by breaking up the chain stores and other large-scale enterprises. It would be more realistic to accept the greater efficiencies of the big manufacturing, distributing, and financial combinations, but to make certain that the rewards of this efficiency accrue to society as a whole rather than to a few individuals.

*

"THE BURIAL OF COUNT ORGAZ," PERHAPS El Greco's greatest painting, was reported lost when the Rebels took Toledo. Now the Spanish Ambassador to England has stated that Franco is offering the picture for public sale in London. Selling Spain's art abroad for money to destroy the Spanish nation may well qualify the General to call himself a "Nationalist."

Third Term: Bad Medicine

WE never took the third-term talk about President Roosevelt seriously until Governor Earle's pronouncement last week that he was not a candidate, and that he would "unqualifiedly and finally" support Mr. Roosevelt in 1940. This is open to several interpretations. It might be construed as a trial balloon sent up, with or without the President's knowledge. Or it might be a gesture on the Governor's part, aimed at getting his chief's support in the race for the nomination. Or again it might be a subtle move to clear the ground for his own nomination by eliminating the possibility of Roosevelt's candidacy. For there can be no doubt that this is the least opportune time that could have been chosen to bring the third-term talk into the open. The air is filled with charges of dictatorship. Nothing could play more directly into the hands of the opposition than this, especially since the pronouncement comes from a governor who is closely associated with the Lewis cohorts.

We have never blanched at the bogy of a "Roosevelt dictatorship." Nor are we generally given to cherishing the sanctity of political traditions or conventions for their own sake. But the two-term tradition has a relevance for today which makes it more than a tradition: it is a living safeguard of our values.

Viewed merely as a tradition, the third-term taboo will not stand severe historical scrutiny. There is nothing on it in the Constitution, and Number 68 of the Federalist offers evidence that the Founding Fathers would not have opposed a third term. For they tended, as a group, to favor a strong central government; and some, like Hamilton, were close to being monarchists. Washington's refusal to serve more than two terms is generally regarded as the beginning of the tradition. Yet the fact is that Washington did not base his refusal on either political or moral grounds. The relevant passage in his "Farewell Address" is not so much a warning against the third term as an apology for not continuing in office. It was left to Jefferson to speak vigorously on the subject. He retired after eight years in the Presidency as a matter of principle. He believed in the need for rotation in office in a democracy. His principal fear about the Constitution was that it did not expressly forbid the indefinite continuance of the President in office, and that it thus invited bureaucracy and despotism. And Jefferson's example was followed by the others of the Virginia dynasty—Madison and Monroe. The question was not again raised until Grant, in 1880, sought nomination for a third term; and his defeat in the convention, due largely to the appeal to the two-term tradition, established it more strongly. Not so strongly, however, but that Theodore Roosevelt sought to overcome it in 1912. He was defeated, and yet the chances are that if he had received the Republican nomination he would have won, third term or no third term.

Franklin D. Roosevelt could probably be reelected, despite the third-term taboo, unless other factors intervened to defeat him. If America should find itself in a severe depression in 1940, as John T. Flynn and others have argued, that would dispose of Mr. Roosevelt more effectively than a tradition of such dubious historical antecedents. The real question is not how authentic the tradition is historically, but how wise it would be to break it. We agree with Jefferson that to leave the Presidential term unlimited would be to open the gates wide to bureaucracy and despotism. And whatever may have been true in the past, this is no time to venture on such a course. The dictatorships of Europe have drawn the issue with democratic government. Their emphasis is always on the indispensability of a particular leader. If Mussolini goes, the whole fabric of power that he has built up goes with him. Democracies do not function that way. They seek to draw upon the resources of leadership in the people themselves. Despite the high regard we have for the character, abilities, and programs of Mr. Roosevelt, we feel that no man is indispensable for the future of America.

But, many will ask, is it not true that two terms are too short to work out a program such as Mr. Roosevelt has undertaken? That may well be. But a real program is not an individual tour de force: it is a collaboration. Any program that will realize the potentialities of American life must be the product of decades of faithful and courageous work by many people. If the President drives ahead with vigor he will get the greater part of his program enacted. If he keeps a third term always in mind, he will be sorely tempted to compromise and coast along easily, deferring the crucial reforms until after 1940.

But suppose that in 1940 the alignment is such that no Democrat except Roosevelt looks strong enough to beat a reactionary Republican? In that event we should still feel the same way. First, because it is always easy to maneuver the situation so that the choice seems crucial. Second, because we regard the precedent of an indefinite Presidential term as bad medicine, even for such a disease. It is medicine that could be used as easily, and much more harmfully, by someone in the near future who really has fascist leanings.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

It is interesting in this connection to note that even Thomas Jefferson, the stubborn enemy of indefinite Presidential tenure, made an exception that would apply to a fascist threat. "There is but one circumstance," he wrote in 1805, "which could engage my acquiescence in another election, to wit, such a division about a successor as might bring in a monarchist." Substitute "fascist" for "monarchist," and you have the argument that will be used for President Roosevelt in 1940; the argument that will crop up everlastingly, each time in a different guise. It is, as we have said, an argument fraught with danger. There is only one thing for Mr. Roosevelt to do. He must "unqualifiedly and finally" announce that he will not be a candidate in 1940 to succeed himself.

"Law and Order"

DURING the month-old battle between the C. I. O. and little steel we have seen worked out and impressed upon the public consciousness patterns of law and order, as they pertain to capital and labor, that have great immediate and even greater future significance. Most of the devices brought into play have appeared before within the recent past. Martial power in various forms has been used by various governors. Vigilantes are an old story. Combined with back-to-work movements and a systematic coordination of the local press, the business community, and town and county officials, they add up to the formula perfected, articulated, and put into practice by Remington Rand. But all of these devices have been used on a new large scale during the past weeks.

In each case where martial power has been used the relationship of the troops to labor has been determined by the attitude of the governor involved, which is in turn determined more or less by the extent to which he has owed his position to labor. In Michigan the governor's debt to labor was clear, as it is in Pennsylvania and as it was in Minnesota. The difficulty, from the long point of view, is that governors pass and military precedents remain. Governor Davey's behavior in the steel strike is more to be studied than denounced by those concerned with the future of labor and liberty. In Ohio is to be found perhaps the apotheosis of the Middle Western middle class. Governor Davey has acted as he has in direct response to the opinion of that class—and the record holds important implications.

It was to be expected that typical patterns of law and order would become defined and take on a national character in the contest between the new labor movement and the steel industry; it was not foreseen that big steel would give in gracefully and that the crucial contest would be joined in the deep Middle West between the C. I. O. and the independent steel companies headed by men who are rugged individualists in a ruthless, primitive, and peculiarly American sense in which U. S. Steel, enmeshed in the highly sophisticated collectivism of international finance, is not. Big steel settled peacefully on the basis of what might be called a modern world view of labor and capital. The automobile industry was won because it is so highly organized that it must operate as a unit or not at all, because the strike had a metropolitan setting, and because Governor Murphy has definite convictions concerning the necessity of negotiation between capital and labor. In little steel the C. I. O. is up against an industry which is not conveyorized and can operate in much smaller individual units, an industry with an atavistic labor policy based on the set-up and psychology of the American small town completely dominated—mayor, department stores, and all—by the Girdlers, the Graces, and the Purnells. This is one paradox of the present fight—that the C. I .O., an industrial union built on modern lines, is engaged in a battle with a section of industry intrenched in the natural social backwardness not only of American independent business and middle-class opinion but of great sections of American workers. The second paradox is that the C. I. O., though advanced from an organizing point of view, is itself politically and socially backward. If we add to this the fact that the pressure on the C. I. O. from groups wanting to be organized is so great than the organization has not been able to keep up with it in any sense, it is easy to understand why the unions have been plagued with wild-cat strikes and other forms of indiscipline which play so neatly into the hands of the reactionaries.

Considering the odds, the C. I. O. is fighting a magnificent fight on straight trade-union lines; but as far as "law and order" is concerned it is passing through a grave crisis. It has actually been cheering the use of martial law and from all appearances it is counting far too much on the federal government, particularly on Roosevelt. According to one report, union workers in Johnstown were gathering signatures for a petition to President Roosevelt asking for compulsory arbitration of labor disputes. The C. I. O. official in the locality stated that while organized labor as a rule had opposed compulsory arbitration, this petition was not being opposed. This may be an erroneous report, yet it fits all too well with the present mood of labor. Moreover, it is easy to understand this attitude in the face of Girdler's truculence and the difficulties under which the strike is being conducted. But such precedents, forged in the heat of battle, may well cool into steel nets for restricting labor's rights, and with them the rights of citizens in general.

On the other side, meanwhile, we have the traditional phenomenon that the employers are thoroughly class conscious and are turning against the socially unarmed C. I. O. all the weapons of class warfare. Little steel is using middle-class opinion in the form of vigilante and back-to-work movements—which are largely stimulated through the intimidation of workers and their wives; it is maintaining a neo-fascist terror in the towns it controls—as witness Miss Stein's account of the atmosphere of Youngstown; and now with the help of state troops it is opening plants. At the same time it is closing whole communities to "outsiders" in order to keep out union forces, and in the process is searching cars, making arrests, and otherwise interfering with the rights of citizens, all the while attacking the outsiders as "invaders." Little steel is, in a word, freely using the language as well as the methods of civil war; and it has behind it the support of the nation's conservative press, which has united in an anti-union, anti-government campaign as self-righteous as it is misleading.

The one hope in the present crisis is that Tom Girdler has overplayed his hand. His insolence before the Senate Post Office Committee and, more particularly, his clear admission that he has no intention of bargaining collectively with his employees are a challenge that the Administration cannot ignore. The proposal for a settlement made by the steel mediation board was reasonable and conciliatory. The union has shown complete readiness to cooperate. It is a feeble democracy which cannot bring Tom Girdler to book; it will be an even feebler one if it fails to do so.

Twilight of Hearst

THE passing of the New York American will leave all eyes dry. It was not one of the worst Hearst papers; indeed, it made an obvious effort to establish a reputation for relative intelligence and sobriety. But it was essentially a "yellow journal" because it could not be anything else; it spoke the mind of its master. Since 1895 it has shared with the rest of the Hearst press the heavy responsibility of promoting international suspicion and inflaming jingoist emotion, of hounding radicals and attacking freedom in every form. And recently it has exhibited all the symptoms of incipient fascism.

Much more is involved, however, than the passing of a Hearst newspaper. We may be witnessing the beginning of the fall of an empire, and our first concern is with the lives and fates of the persons who will be affected by it. The American is said never to have made money except in one year. It set a record last year, with a deficit of a million dollars. But Hearst was able to pour into it money made by other enterprises. Now things are different. The consolidated income statement of nine of his important newspapers shows a decrease in earnings from $10,000,000 in 1929 to $4,000,000 in 1936. In the past decade Hearst has marketed $90,000,000 worth of securities. Some of these bonds are falling due and that fact, along with the Hearst boycott and the slipping of circulation and advertising, has operated to put the Hearst ventures into serious straits. Miss Marion Davies, according to credible reports, is not scheduled to make any pictures during 1937-1938. Since Hearst has put up the money for Miss Davies's pictures, which have consistently produced a box-office deficit, this minor item takes on significance.

Nation readers are acquainted, through the articles by James Smith and Oswald Garrison Villard in the issue of June 19, with the details of the Hearst registration statement filed with the SEC with a view to selling to the public $35,500,000 worth of securities. The commission has yet to pass definitely on the Hearst issue, but the causes of its delay are clear. Hearst is hastening to liquidate his least profitable units, hoping thus to salvage the main structure of his empire.

The consolidation of the American with the Journal is said to be only the beginning of Hearst's efforts to this end. Other unprofitable units will probably meet a similar fate. It is common talk that papers in five or six other cities will be consolidated or suspended—in Chicago, Boston, Baltimore, Pittsburgh, Seattle, and possibly Atlanta. Some 1,600 American employees are affected, of whom about 200 are editorial workers and the rest in the business and mechanical departments. If the management is allowed to have its way, about a thousand of these will lose their jobs. Using the same proportion for the other cities, five thousand workers in all will face unemployment. We do not have to underline what this prospect means. For the newspaper profession is today a highly restricted field, incapable of absorbing many additional workers.

The labor tactics of the management have been clever. It gave no general notice of discharge to the American employees: that would have allowed a solid front to be formed quickly. Men learned about their fates one by one through confidential tips, and no one knew where he stood. The management steadfastly avoided seeing a Newspaper Guild committee until all plans had been completed. It replaced some of the Journal men with transfers from the American, but left the Mirror unaffected, thus seeking to play one guild unit against the others.

Against these splitting tactics and this policy of delay, the guild has taken a firm stand. At a meeting of the Sunday American and Journal units, the executive committee of the Newspaper Guild was empowered to call a strike if the management rejects their demands. The guild position is that the case of the American is not that of a plant going out of business, but one of consolidation, with the same management carrying on. The guild insists that its aim can be effected if not only the Journal but the Mirror and the Hearst wire services as well absorb the American employees; and if a five-day, forty-hour week is instituted.

From a broad social standpoint it would be intolerable if Hearst, in his desperate attempts to bolster his overcapitalized newspaper empire, with its enormous salaries at the top, its large feature expenditures, its stuffed-shirt outlays, should be allowed to place the principal burden on his workers. Hearst cannot, in his present condition, stand a strike in all his New York newspapers and wire services. He must economize, but he must find other methods of economy. The air of American journalism is fresher for the disappearance of the New York American, but the newspaper workers must not be made the victims of the cleansing process.

Loyalist Spain Gathers Its Strength

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Valencia, June 28

THE fall of Bilbao has been skilfully used by the Negrin government to stimulate enthusiasm at the front and in the rear. This is less strange than would at first appear, for the authorities have only to appeal to the indices of progress known to most Spaniards but ignored or underestimated by those outsiders who see the civil war as an unbroken chain of Loyalist defeats.

The government's army is now 520,000 strong, excluding several brigades in training camps. This force is magnificent in defense and, with the exception of some brigades on the Aragon front, its soldiers have fought well in all the abortive offensives; but these forward thrusts failed, and the army, generally speaking, still lacks offensive abilities, less because of insufficient equipment than by reason of poor staff work and undependable commanders. As late as a few weeks ago the Loyalists had no general staff which really functioned as such (until Negrin came into office, General Rojo, chief of staff, was not even in Valencia but on active service at one front), and numerous individual units had no staffs of their own. The great victory over the Italians in the remarkable battle of Brihuega last March was in large measure due to the brilliant tactics of the three experienced generals who directed operations from a hill overlooking the field.

Despite bad staff work and an inadequate officers' corps, a year has sufficed to transform green milicianos who ran whenever the Moors appeared, into courageous, stubborn warriors whose new regular army uniform is symbolic of the passing of the early amateurish improvisation and chaotic if colorful eclecticism. Officers who remained with the Loyalists after the revolt frequently proved politically unreliable. Moreover, since the old-time generals who first commanded the government army favored petty bourgeois types over proletarians and peasants for promotion to officer's rank, even the new commanders were often of doubtful quality and loyalty. Under Prieto, Negrin's Minister of National Defense, the officers' corps is being purged, but substitutes must be found and trained to take the place of those who go into the discard or into less pivotal work, and this is a slow process. Men like Lister, Modesta, and Campesino, all Communists (the bulk of fresh talent is Communist), who as division commanders ought to be generals, are still majors, partly in conformity with the pre-revolutionary Spanish army code and partly because of their politics.

This is a problem whose solution takes time. The predictions of government leaders about the date of the much-needed big offensive vary from three months to next winter or spring, and estimates regarding the probable duration of the civil war run from a minimum of ten months to the frightening maximum of three years.

In the Bilbao campaign the indifferent politics of the Basque middle-class nationalist officers, hundreds of whom have since deserted to Franco, and the inferiority of the non-commissioned officers were almost as great handicaps as the decisive shortage of airplanes and other weapons. It was physically impossible to provide the Basques with enough aviation equipment, hence the collapse of their valiant defense. Yet, though the loss of Bilbao depresses the ministers whose pasts have been intimately connected with it, a Loyalist army of ultimate triumph is being steadily forged.

The Loyalist importation of arms has been undiminished in recent months. In addition, new and old Spanish plants are yielding a broader flow of modern weapons, and it is confidently expected that the Loyalists, who are already assembling airplane parts and manufacturing excellent airplane motors, will shortly be turning out one home-made plane daily. Negrin and Prieto are putting all their energy behind this phase.

However, purchases in places far removed geographically from Spain, even when augmented by domestic production, will not soon equal the shipments to Franco which Germany and Italy can make if they are uncurbed. Since the latest non-intervention agreement went into effect in February Hitler and Mussolini have vastly increased their supplies of war material to the rebels.

In the recent international crisis when Germany and Italy again withdrew from the international patrol on the fantastically flimsy pretense of the Leipzig attack, Valencia remained perfectly calm despite the Nazi threat to blow it to bits à la Almeria; and again the other night, when sirens at three-fifteen heralded an attack on the citizens by German shelling which had been threatened, the people stood around in front of their houses instead of running to find shelter. The Loyalist navy and air force were prepared to meet the German attack, and a battle with heavy enemy losses, followed by open warfare between Spain, Germany, and Italy, did not seem farfetched. Although the extension of the civil war to involve all Europe is the favorite topic of the café intellectuals, who think it might relieve Spain from the inequalities in the present struggle, no statesman views such a prospect without dread, if only because there is no guaranty that the democracies would care to defend Spanish democracy against fascist aggression. They have not cared to in the past year.

The recent crisis in non-intervention affairs is being interpreted here as follows: Germany, which had previously cooled toward Franco owing to the heavy cost of carrying him to victory, was encouraged by the fall of Bilbao to believe it would be possible to crush the Loyalists quickly, close a burdensome debit ledger, and open a credit account for her Spanish adventure by blocking the government's importation of arms. This could be done by smashing the Loyalist fleet which convoys merchant vessels when necessary. The Reich fleet therefore sought a naval encounter. As far as one can judge from this angle of vision, England and France prevented such a catastrophic development by their sudden firmness, and in Valencia it is supposed and hoped that this unusually strong attitude may ultimately lead to the scrapping of the entire farcical non-intervention scheme and bring about the unhindered sale of munitions to the legitimate Spanish authorities.

Neither the danger of foreign attack nor the obvious necessity of straining every muscle to win the civil war has deterred the Spanish Loyalists from engaging in the expensive game of party politics which is forcing some able persons into inactivity and even obstruction. At present the Caballero-led Left Socialists, with the exception of Del Vayo, who retained his post as war commissar in charge of the army's political commissars and as Spain's ambassador-at-large, and the Anarchists are in active opposition. This means that they carry on whispering campaigns and sometimes intrigues against the Negrin regime. However, it is characteristic of Caballero's fundamental honesty that he did not try to upset the Cabinet on the Bilbao issue, for he must have realized that he himself was more responsible than Negrin.

The members of the government attribute this forbearance more to weakness than to charity. It is doubtful whether the UGT executive could vote against the Cabinet without provoking a serious split in its ranks. But members of the government in conversation with me have stated that not even the two big trade-union federations together could overthrow the government, because it enjoys the staunch support of the Left Republicans, the Right Socialists, and the Communists, and already has visible achievements to its credit. The fact is that neither federation has committed an overt act against Negrin, and one CNT member even petitioned to be taken into the Cabinet. From being until very recently the most violent critics of the CNT, the Left-Socialists have suddenly discovered a great affection for it, while the Anarcho-Syndicalists, in turn, feign a new-found love for Caballero, whose life in office they embittered. This uneasy and unnatural fellowship sows seeds of discord when unity is most needed to defeat fascism, but its power is diminished by Caballero's waning popularity, Del Vayo's loyalty to the new Cabinet, and Negrin's rigorous campaign against arbitrary acts of the Anarchists. To find surcease from it, the Anarchists seem ready to escape even into the Cabinet, but simultaneously they are instructing their followers to sabotage Negrin's work, and Negrin, therefore, probably wishes first to complete disarmament of the Anarchists, which is proceeding.

Caballero began to lose his hold on the people when he allowed the enemy to approach a Madrid unprepared for defense. The government's hasty departure to Valencia further lowered his prestige. Since then, his retention of a high officer whose inability or treachery explains and is partially responsible for the surrender of Toledo and Malaga, his isolation from the masses whom he refused, despite friendly pressure, to address even once during the months he was Prime Minister, his haughty behavior toward his own colleagues and the slowness and inflexibility with which he met the problems heaped mountain-high around him, all caused many of his supporters to turn against him. This is particularly true of the Communists. Their membership rose buoyantly in the spring. Caballero resented this as though it were aimed against him. His relationship to Russia wavered. He began late in March to manifest an open hostility toward the Communists in the army and a tendency to check the growth of their influence. Thereupon the Communists, who had previously protected him from the slightest blame, attacked him. He accordingly sought the Anarchists as allies. His consequent leniency toward the Anarchists, his present critics declare, culminated in the uprising in Barcelona the first week in May. To be sure, Caballero and his four Anarchist ministers prevented that bloody adventure from taking even more than its terrible toll of fourteen hundred dead and six hundred wounded.

Negrin believes that the essence of wisdom in this case and for the time being is strength. He may treat with the Anarchists when they are purged and weaker. The Communists overthrew Caballero. They are working hand in hand with Negrin.

Negrin is an excellent executive, and that is what the conduct of the war needed. Things are now getting done quickly where millions can see the results—in the army. The people also know that he has wiped out private violence, introduced order on the highways and streets, and created an atmosphere conducive to civil and military discipline. These innovations are facilitating the fulfillment of the Cabinet's social program.

Negrin regards himself as a Marxist. He laughed when I told him that foreign dispatches had reported that he would return the property confiscated from pro-rebel owners. On the contrary, he believes that the exigencies of war and of Spain's social system require the nationalization of all heavy industrial enterprises—metallurgical, chemical, electrical, mining, etc.—even when tiny; that the government should own all plants employing more than, say, fifty workers, which produce for popular consumption, and that city transport systems should be owned by the municipalities. Fascist properties will be seized outright but Loyalist and, of course, foreign owners will receive compensation in slowly maturing bonds. Negrin equally favors voluntary collectivization, and the Communist Party proposes intensified propaganda for it. Loans totalling 60,000,000 pesetas have been granted to such collectives, and further funds are available. Lately they have also been receiving farm equipment imported from the Soviet Union. At the same time Negrin contemplates the early reopening of some of the churches whose members wish to worship in them. This is in accordance with the democratic principle to which the new Loyalist government is passionately devoted. It is to be hoped that further internal political clashes and friction will not bring about a dictatorship.

Yachts and Taxes

BY FREDERICK R. BARKLEY

Washington, June 27

TOM GIRDLER'S one-night stand in the revival of "Louis the Fourteenth" (l'état, c'est moi!) was the week's best show, but the great tax-dodger drama really had a better cast—at least in the wings. How earnest the actual performers are about playing out the full script sent down to them by the impresario at the other end of the Avenue remains to be seen. Two weeks ago an all-summer run, with a plug in every loophole at the end, was in prospect, but somehow the actors do not seem to have their hearts in their work. Hot summer weather is trying; but even more moving is a desire of some members to get out of town without having to face the issues of court reorganization and the wages-and-hours bill. The Joint Congressional Committee on Tax Avoidance and Evasion, of course, could go on even if Congress adjourned, but that would take a measure of devotion not now in evidence.

Furthermore, there is a little irritation among the committeemen over the implication, as broadly hinted by J. P. Morgan, that they are too dumb to write a hog-tight tax bill, when in fact the Treasury, which is now pointing out this loophole and that, is itself largely responsible for a good many of them. As committee members have mentioned, the Treasury nagged them last year into lowering some tax rates to a point which foreign recipients of American income have found very fruitful to themselves; and the Treasury was also largely responsible for a rewriting of the personal-holding-company tax provisions which have made those provisions—even though the assumed intent was otherwise—more useful to the richer tax avoiders than they were before.

But, as has already been mentioned in the hearings, the Treasury has been the West Point of many captains in that army of 45,000 or more smart lawyers and accountants who tell the super-wealthy how to eat their cake and hardly scratch the frosting, and there is no indication that the present staff members may not also be looking forward to the time when they can retire to private life and build up a competence for their children. Even Mr. Under Secretary Roswell Magill, who is field marshal in the presentation of evidence, has been disclosed as the author of two or three expensive books showing the wealthy how taxes can legally be avoided. The Treasury's outspoken thesis, of course, is that the process of plugging loopholes is always a stern chase anyway, which probably is comforting to those of its staff who may hope ultimately to be guiding the incorporated yachts which flit fleetly ahead. At least five names are current here as the possessors of such lucrative pleasure craft, and Treasury officials have intimated that they know of four.

Incidentally, the only articulate Republican on the committee, bumbling old Allen Treadway, of Massachusetts, tried to flutter his Democratic colleagues on the second day with intimations that the names to be presented had been picked with gross political purpose, but finally wound up, when the diversion did not go well, with an admission that he was as keen for names as anyone—"if we get the right ones." Evidently taking his cue from columnists who have been assiduous for two weeks in suggesting questions and tactics to the fragile G. O. P. remnant, Treadway also tried out the charge that the hearings are an Administration effort to show why the budget is not in balance. After asserting that he did not want to accuse Administration officials of trying to "mislead" the public in this way, the old Yankee roared out his accusation at least six times. Under the twittings of the opposition, and the evident realization that his dialectics were not working, he finally rumbled over the horizon.

But despite one thing and another, the first five days' hearings did finally produce the names of as choice a gang of tax dodgers as ever scuttled a fiscal policy. A few of them employed the foreign corporation or phony insurance-company loan rackets, but the rest had plumped for the personal-holding-company scheme, which is now almost hallowed with age. There were some amusing angles to these revelations; one of the du Pont wives, for example, hides her tax savings in the Still Pond Corporation; Mr. Andrew W. Mellon turns out to have been in the tobacco business—or at least collecting coupons—for six years or more; and a Newfoundland Corporation, with offices in Paris, France, was the snug harbor of a Mr. Brown, of New York.

When the week ended, it also had been shown that seventeen out of the many thousand known existing personal holding companies had paid out $44,000 in 1934 on an aggregate net income of nearly $5,000,000, as against the $1,638,000 the owners of these corporations would have paid as individuals; that one New York lawyer, a former partner of the Chief Justice of the United States, through use of the insurance-loan scheme, had paid but $299 over four years on an income for that period of more than half a million; that eighty holding companies in 1936 had paid but $735,000 on aggregate income of nearly $25,000,000, and that in 1935 less than $2,000,000 in surtax was paid by a group of holding companies with net income of more than $115,000,000—a rate of less than 2 per cent.

And these figures merely scratched the surface. They dealt with evasions—or avoidances, as the Treasury politely puts it—which it has been able to discover; at the same time it was admitted that the same companies, by paper transactions among themselves and their owners, which the Treasury cannot hope to find, probably saved their owners many additional millions.

Along with these general statements, of course, the Treasury witnesses also produced half a hundred names which read like a roster of the Union Club or the American Liberty League. Eight du Ponts, John J. Raskob, Thomas W. Lamont and wife, Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., and Mrs. Sloan, Alisie (sic) Mellon Bruce, two elder Mellons, Paul Block, Robert P. Scripps, Roy W. Howard and wife, and four Fishers—all possessors of personal holding companies—looked so easy that no one at the press tables had trouble identifying most of them.

Not so the Treasury witnesses, however. Although both Secretary Morgenthau and Under Secretary Magill had started off with announcements that publicity—which would seem to mean names—was expected to be as effective in checking the dodgers as new legislation, the under-officials who presented these lists seemed strangely reluctant or unable to say just who these persons were. Thus, while Robert P. Scripps was identified as head of the Scripps-Howard chain, Roy W. Howard was just a name. Paul Block, whose Consolidated Publishers Corporation enabled him to bring his tax on $1,100,000 income down to $11,000, was likewise passed over. What relation the four Fishers were to each other the Treasury said it had no idea. Committee quizzing wangled out an identification of Andrew W. Mellon and of his deceased brother, R. B., but Mrs. Mellon Bruce, with a $5,000,000 income from the Coalesced Corporation, on which she saved $332,000 in taxes, was passed over in silence.

Treasury officials explained, of course, that the practice of some personal holding companies of filing returns from a different place each year, as well as other devices, makes identification of their "beneficial owners" not always easy. George Westinghouse, Jr., for example, was just "a young man with $3,000,000 who jumps around like a bug," according to Mr. Magill.

But one possible result of this vagueness was that the report of the United Press, of which one Mr. Roy W. Howard is head, could bury this name, with no further specification, down deep in the list along with those of W. W. Hawkins, James Hammond, and Thomas L. Sidlo, other potent names in U. P. and Scripps-Howard headquarters. Some other newspapers, it is understood, also decided it was unsafe to go beyond identifications actually made, although it must be said that the Associated Press showed no hesitancy in deciding just who Thomas W. Lamont, Alfred P. Sloan, the Fisher brothers, and most of the rest of them were.

Another result was the voicing of suspicion that the Treasury was pulling its punches, and the spreading of rumor that the Justice Department had warned it to be careful of legal entanglements. And there is no doubt that Treasury officials were a little nervous about charges, spread notably by some of the big publishers named in the list, that the whole inquiry is just a political witch hunt; one official after another insisted that the names revealed were chosen "purely at random" or from groups of cases previously under investigation; and that "examples are more important than names."

Senator La Follette, however, put through a resolution without dissent providing that all names be given lest the committee be charged with discrimination. The Treasury came back with the plea that it dared not shoot until it was sure. But, said La Follette a bit later, the officials had not mentioned one case of evasion or avoidance through the personal-holding-company device which it revealed in secrecy to the Senate Finance Committee last year and which was "far more shocking" than it had disclosed so far.

The prospect of legislation to plug loopholes at this session seems uncertain, and in fact the point in urging it is not quite clear, for the thing could be done at the next session before next year's tax returns are due.

The Rosselli Brothers

BY MAX ASCOLI

WHEN Italian Fascism started its drive for power in 1919, Carlo Rosselli was 20 years old and his brother Nello was 19. They were two healthy, generous boys who had been brought up in Florence in an atmosphere of ease and culture. Their mother, Amelia Rosselli, was one of the best Italian women writers. Republican traditions and an ideal of social justice were a heritage of their family, and came to them from Mazzini, who for years had lived in close contact with their grandparents and had died in their house. Around the two brothers, among their friends in Florence, the strongest moral and intellectual influence was that of Gaetano Salvemini. When Matteotti was murdered, Carlo Rosselli joined the Socialist Party. When the press began to be muzzled he directed his activity to the printing and circulation of a clandestine paper, Non Mollare (Don't Give In), which from 1924 to 1926 exasperated the Fascist police. During the same years Carlo was a professor of economics at the University of Genoa, editor of a journal of opinion, Il Quarto Stato, and the leader of an underground movement.

After the Matteotti murder it became clear to the Rossellis that the fight was a deadly one. Carlo plunged into action, while Nello stayed at home, keeping alive with uncompromising integrity their center of influence.

PUBLIC LIBRARY Burling

In 1926 Carlo carried Filippo Turati, the Socialist leader, to Corsica in a motorboat to rescue him from Fascist persecution. Then he went back to Italy in order to bring more old leaders to safety abroad. He was caught and thrown into jail, and later sent to the island of Lipari. He escaped from Lipari in 1929.

During these years of confinement he saw that Fascism was something more than a matter of illegitimate seizure of power, or political gangsterism, or popular hallucination. It had a meaning which its leaders and theorists were far from having fathomed; it marked the collapse of the whole social and moral structure of the Italian people. It was really a revolution, a terribly inhuman revolution, still unthinkable even after its triumph. Between the past and the future of Italy there was this block, this hard fact. It was impossible to go back to the old political parties, to dream of the old order. It was necessary to recognize Fascism as a reality and to destroy this reality. The solution, he thought, was an integral revolution; not only political, but social and economic.

From these ideas in Carlo's mind the movement Giustizia e Libertà (G.L.) was born. Many workmen and intellectuals found in it their organ—people dissatisfied with the old parties, liberals who had turned revolutionists, old revolutionaries who had grown weary of Communist discipline. G.L. was then an underground organization working in Italy with headquarters in Paris. Nuclei of G.L. were established in every Italian center, in factories and universities. The letters G.L. were scribbled on the walls of villages, on the blackboards of schoolrooms. Once they were printed in big characters in an advertisement in the Corriere della Sera, and did the police get mad!

It took two years for the Italian secret service to discover the main centers of the G.L. in Italy. Several times the organization had to be rebuilt, while the Special Tribunal was sending its leaders one after the other to jail. The work went on, but there were no substitutes for men like Ernesto Rossi or Riccardo Bauer, who are now spending their lives in isolated cells. Carlo Rosselli had to recognize that the revolutionary attempt had failed for the time being. Yet the struggle had to go on. But how? Against a ruthless tyrannical regime there are two possibilities: either to remain fastened to old political posts or to be dragged into the movement of the totalitarian party, trying if possible to bore from within. G.L. rejected both possibilities. It also rejected the Communist solution as too dogmatic and undemocratic. G.L. was one of the many attempts to find "something between," a "new plan" which was to be at the same time democracy and social justice. This is hard and risky enough in countries where the political struggle is kept within the frame of institutions and where it is possible to discover the needs and the moods of the people. But when the institutions which make the political struggle possible are smashed, and there is no way to reach the people, then such striving tends to move in a vacuum. There is no point of reference left. There is only sheer will that soon appears as quixotic. Almost everybody loses heart and gives in.

Carlo Rosselli was not a man to give in. G.L. became after 1932 a center of conspiracies and a testing ground for ideas. The new Italy that G.L. envisaged was a highly decentralized and possibly federal republic with public ownership of the main branches of production and private ownership of small and medium-sized farms. It wanted to reconcile the poor people with the state in which they never, under any regime, had had any part. Above all it wanted to realize what Carlo called a new humanism, a new trust in man, in his capacity to be free and to master economic forces, an absolute belief in the spiritual wealth of the Italian man. There was little abstruseness in these discussions. The contributions came chiefly from Italy, and were often written by workers.

The movement was, as Carlo liked to say, the first anti-Fascist organization in Europe, the first that was not a continuation of pre-Fascist trends. It saw that the anti-fascist revolution had to be European and perhaps universal in scope, because Fascism was a cancer of institutions and of minds—that it had to be a revolution not only of the forms of government and the modes of production, but a transformation of character as well. In the vacuum where exiled political movements dissolve, G.L. survived and grew. It was the first group to organize a battalion that fought for the Spanish government. Carlos, who led the column of G.L., was wounded near Huesca.

He was the first leader to arise out of the post-war generation in Italy. He gained his power in jail and in revolutionary activity. His name meant to thousands of young Italians personal bravery and forthright thinking. He was born endowed with intelligence and wealth and social prestige, but he preferred to gain his power as if his only asset had been his generous will. He sacrificed fortune and leisure and the opportunities of intellectual life. His designation to national leadership was his sentence of death.

His brother Nello was no less an anti-Fascist. He worked for the new Italy in a way that no police could stop: he offered the example of his life and his painstaking study of the Risorgimento. His two books, one on Mazzini and Bakunin, the other on Pisacane, are the best on those subjects. He was generally recognized as the most mature and brilliant historian of his generation. He had neither academic position nor hope for any recognition. He enjoyed telling the truth about the recent history of Italy without fear of the consequences.

No tyranny could confuse Nello Rosselli or cast him into dejection. He had an unconcerned, disarming way of his own for answering every pressure or violence. He had been twice in the islands and many times in jail. They could send him there forever. He laughed his clear ringing laugh. He could have lived and worked more freely in exile, but he felt it was better for him to live a retired life in the country of his beloved Tuscany. There was a sunny quality about him, in his smile, in his wisdom, in his sustained, undertoned intelligence. Carlo conquered his right to leadership; Nello had it by nature in the intellectual and moral sphere.

Nello went to France to visit his brother for a few days. They were both killed there June 9. A Fascist dagger of Florentine make was found near their bodies.

It's War in Youngstown

BY ROSE M. STEIN

Youngstown, Ohio, June 24

MONDAY night, June 21, was a crucial night in the life and history of Youngstown, Ohio. All factions agreed that nothing short of a miracle would prevent serious trouble. Few people went to sleep. Near the mills, and away from them, people were gathered in groups and talked of only one thing—the strike. It had become more than a strike. War was in the air. The weeks of preparation were bound to bear fruit this night. There would be bloodshed and murder. Some time between midnight and seven the next morning the forces opposing the C. I. O. were scheduled to go "over the top," and to break through the union lines. The union people carried signs reading "They Shall Not Pass" and gathered in large numbers to guard the gates. The city and county increased their respective police forces and added to their store of munitions.

A preliminary battle had taken place two nights before. Some union men say that it was deliberately staged in an effort to test the probable extent of union resistance in the real fight. This trial skirmish took place on Saturday, June 19. Late that night, without warning or serious provocation, deputies fired upon a crowd of people, mostly workers' wives, at the Poland Avenue Republic gate. Across from that gate there is a cinder-covered empty lot where strikers not engaged in active picket duty, their families, and sympathizers were accustomed to gather. The company rented this lot and plastered "no trespassing" signs all over it. On this particular Saturday evening a number of the men were called to attend a special meeting at a spot some 200 feet away from the gate; and the women were asked to help with the picketing. A few of the women got tired and sat down to rest upon the boxes bearing "No Trespassing" signs. The police began to chase them and an argument ensued. "We'll show you," growled one of the officers, and began to shoot tear-gas. There were screams, shouts, turmoil, and in the midst of this excitement bullets began to fly. The crowd rushed down from the meeting, was greeted with more bullets, people began to fall, among them Mary Heaton Vorse, who received a bad blow in her left temple. The toll of this attack was two dead, thirty-one wounded. Scores were thrown into jail in an effort to pin the blame upon the workers, although any number of eye-witnesses saw that the gunfire came from deputies beyond the railroad tracks.

Feeling ran high. The workers were enraged by this unwarranted attack, knew that the one scheduled for Monday would be worse, and were determined to resist the onslaught, come what might. Company partisans, which included Youngstown city and Mahoning county officialdom, were equally determined to make this a decisive blow, for to them this determined resistance was not just a strike, it was organized rebellion. There is not even a pretense of impartiality in Youngstown. Tom Girdler and Frank Purnell hate the C. I. O., and are openly at war with it. Sheriff Ralph Elser and Mayor Lionel Evans just as frankly hate the C. I. O., and are just as openly waging war upon it. Then just as everything was in readiness for what was expected to be a decisive battle, word came of Governor Davey's declaration of martial law and his order to keep the mills closed. City and county officials felt outraged. All their plans and maneuvers were demolished like a house of blocks. They had to take it out on somebody, somehow. What better way than to clamp into jail all the workers they could possibly lay hands on?

If on this night of June 21 you happened to drive into Youngstown in a car bearing other than an Ohio state license, you were regarded as an undesirable foreigner, full, no doubt, of evil intentions. If you happened to have a Pennsylvania license, you were particularly suspected because, as every cop and official in Youngstown will tell you, Pennsylvania has gone Bolshevik, and no one knows from one day to the next what radical action its Governor may take. But if in addition to having a Pennsylvania license you happened to come from Aliquippa, then you were regarded as a red, a criminal, an enemy of the state, and were subject to immediate arrest. The reason for this attitude is not far to seek.

Tom Girdler spent fourteen years converting Aliquippa into the blackest hell on this side of the Mason and Dixon line. Then, seven years after his departure, Aliquippa became a free town, its workers organized, and the company recognized their organization. This was an out-and-out defeat of Girdler's terrorist policies, a defeat which plagues him privately and is cast up to him publicly. Little wonder that he hates Aliquippa workers, one and all, and wants none of them to come to Youngstown, as they had, for instance, the preceding Sunday, bringing two truck loads of food to the strikers and making public speeches about how they licked Girdler's methods in their own town. Whomever Girdler hates, the Youngstown police hate. It was not altogether surprising, therefore, that these same police should stop a car driven by an official of the Aliquippa steel workers' union, and arrest all six occupants of the car, even though two of them were Pittsburghers, one of them myself.

At 4:00 a. m. on Tuesday, as we were passing through the downtown section, on our way home, we were stopped by a police car, searched, and ordered to drive to the police station. The station ante-room was mobbed with people who had just been arrested, so that we had to wait our turn outside, just at the foot of the stairs.

While we were waiting, we saw a police officer shove a man toward the basement cells. "Don't shove me," the man pleaded, "I'll walk down." The officer knocked him over and the man rolled down with a heavy thud. At the bottom of the flight another officer picked him up, dragged him away, and the moment he was out of our sight we heard a piercing cry of pain.

Up to this time the whole thing had seemed like something of a joke. I had credentials. None of us had done anything. Surely they would dismiss us with apologies. But the treatment of that man cast a new light upon the situation. As we were lined up in front of the desk to give our names to the clerk, a husky officer called over two matrons and ordered them "to search this woman real good." They each grabbed me by an arm and dragged me upstairs to a private room. One of them examined my purse minutely, while the other pulled away at my clothes, and in earnest surprise turned to her companion saying, "She's clean, all right." Then in a more stern voice to me, "So you thought you'd pull a fast one, just before the militia got here."

Two officers escorted me to the county jail. I learned afterwards that this was a concession, as the city jail is a real hell hole. "Humph," said one of the escorting officers, "so you pick up five men; not just one, but five." I said nothing. "I know you, all right," he continued, "I saw you in Aliquippa." I was tempted to ask how he had happened to see me in Aliquippa while serving on the Youngstown police force, unless perchance he was one of Girdler's "gas-pipe gang" sent down to Aliquippa during the Jones and Laughlin strike.

At the county jail the belligerent officer turned back and the other guarded me until the sheriff's office could record my name. I thought this might be an opportunity to plead my case. "There must be some mistake," I said to the officer. "I am a reporter, and would like to know by what right you arrest me." "Oh, so that's what you are, a reporter. Well, it's too bad you got mixed up with these Bolsheviks," and after a pause, again, "it's too bad." I thought for a moment that he was genuinely sorry I had gone so far astray. When the sheriff's clerk recorded my name, I again pleaded that I was a reporter, but all he said was "I know nothing about it," and the first thing I knew I was in the hoosegow.

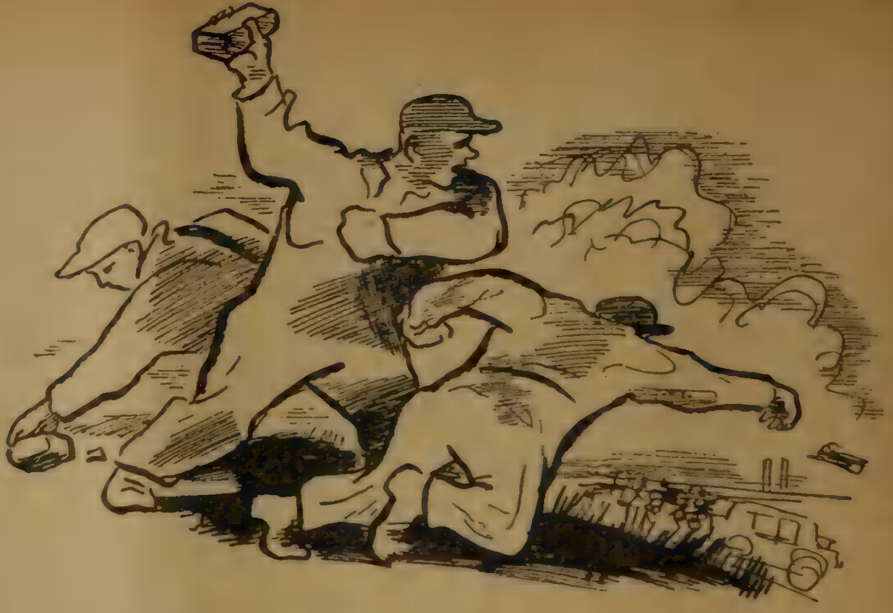
It was a medium sized room, with two barred windows, rather airy and tolerably clean. There were four cots, three of them unoccupied and without sheets. A woman was sleeping in the fourth cot. She seemed delighted to have company, and invited me to share her cot, since it alone had sheets. I assured her that I was not sleepy. In that case neither was she sleepy. She was wide awake in a moment. "You know why I am here?" she asked. "I'm safer here than anywhere else because the C. I. O. is after me. They want to kill me." She got up, began to rush around and shout. For five hours I was subjected to this nightmare. The woman was a raving maniac. As she related the various fights she had had with the police, with hotel proprietors who had tried to oust her and who were "nothing but dirty foreigners," she would rush at me as if I were the object of her wrath. I retreated carefully, politely, pleaded with her to get some sleep, only to make her all the more angry because nobody ever wants to hear her story when in reality it was worth $500 to any magazine. I succeeded in pacifying her for about fifteen minutes while she took my pencil and paper and proceeded to write out her life's story. "When you write about me," she said, "don't call me Harriet, call me Marie. I don't want the C. I. O. to recognize me, they'll get after me again." I promised anything and everything.

The five men arrested with me were kept in the city jail and during the morning were questioned separately or in pairs. Clifford Shorts, union official and driver of the car, and Frank Fernbach, a teacher for the Workers' Schools, were called out together. "Good morning, comrades," snorted the plainclothesman who escorted them into the office of the district attorney, "how are the rest of the Russians today?" The boys let that pass. "What were you doing in Youngstown?" asked the district attorney. "Sightseeing," the boys replied. "Sightseeing, eh? Back to the hoosegow with you."

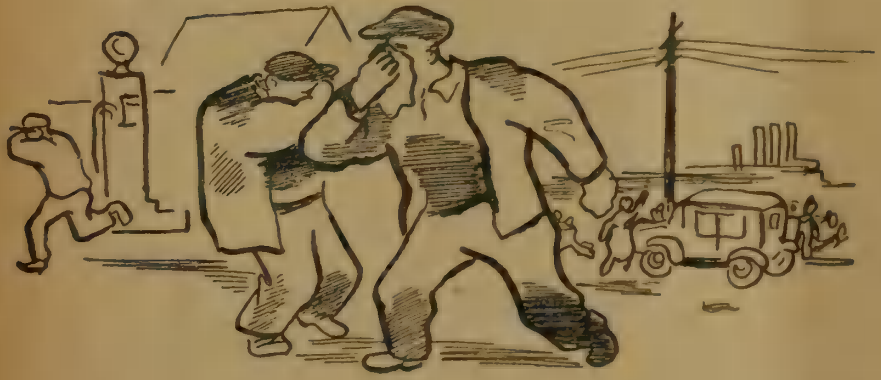
"Wise guys," said the officer who led them back to their cell, "you need to have your ears knocked in, then you'll talk." Many ears have been "knocked in," and many eyes almost knocked out. Several hundred have been arrested in Youngstown alone since the strike began May 26. A number of men were picked up during the Saturday night riot; some of these have wounds which have received no medical attention, and the men are being held incomunicado, and without trial. It is impossible for the union to keep track of all the arrests or to take proper care of them. As it is, the amount of bail furnished by the union is reaching staggering proportions.

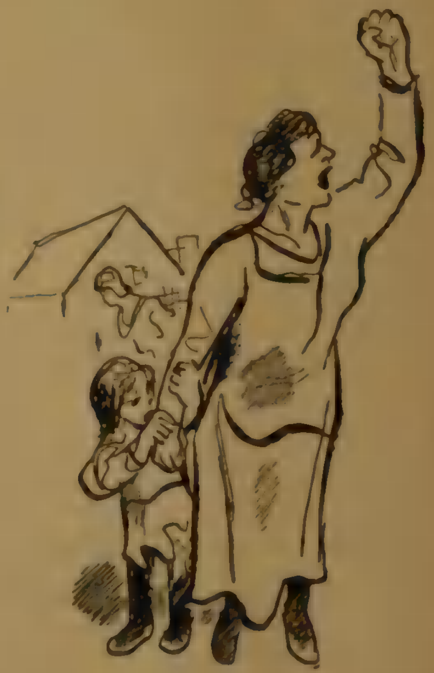
Twelve hours after our arrest, and after pressure had been brought by a number of influential people, all six of us were released without hearing. The district attorney was apologetic. "We are simply going crazy here," he explained. "I'll tell you frankly," he said, "I'm afraid of the C. I. O. I am very much afraid of it. I am afraid that if this keeps up, in another year or two people like me will be put up against the wall and shot." Mayor Daniel Shields of Johnstown, and the Chamber of Commerce officials, who backed him in his shortlived attempt to incite a riot against the "greasers" and "hunkies," were equally worried when Governor Earle ordered the Bethlehem plant closed. Officials who do the dirty work for the Girdlers, the Schwabs, and the Purnells fear for their own heads. It is no longer a question in these towns of enforcing the law, of doing what is right or what is one's duty. Non-partisanship does not exist. They are all partisan. If someone is discovered carrying a club or a gun, he is arrested and beaten not because he has violated a specific statute, but because he belongs to the enemy side. Sides have been definitely chosen. On the one hand is the C. I. O., fighting desperately to maintain and to augment the phenomenal strength and power it has so far attained; on the other are the enraged employers and frightened, muddle-headed, subservient officials, whose absolute power is being curbed. The war of resistance is in full swing.

Gropper Visits Youngstown

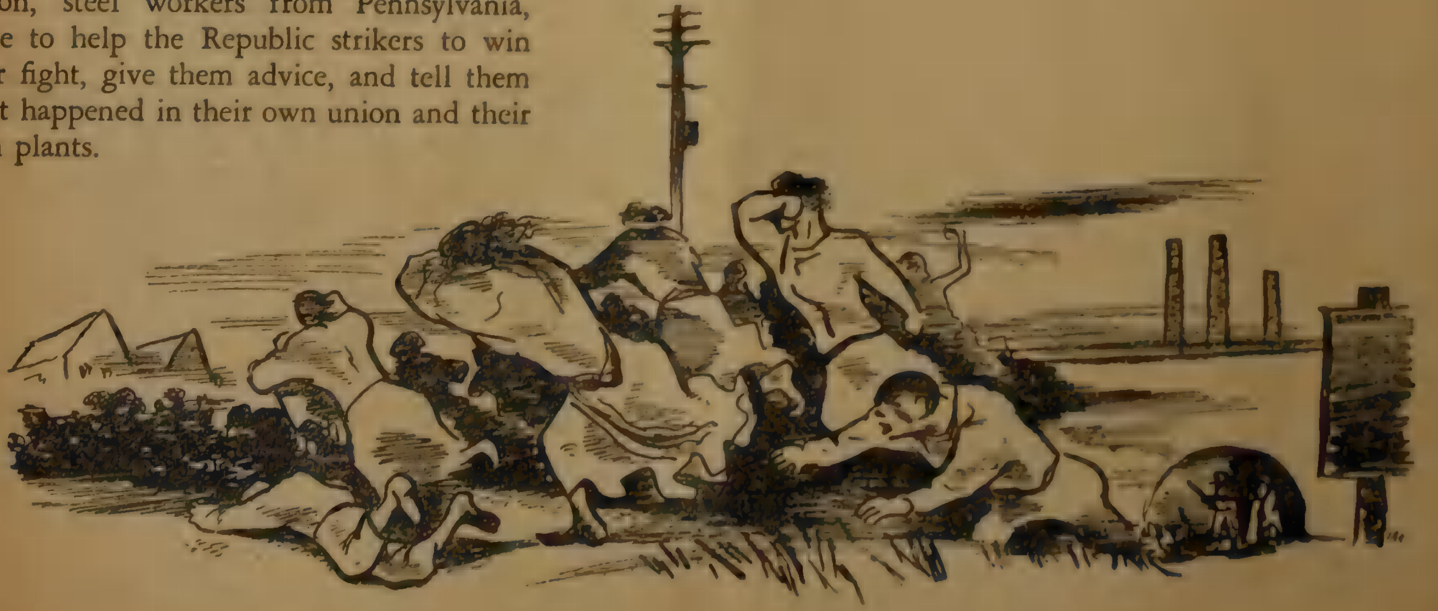


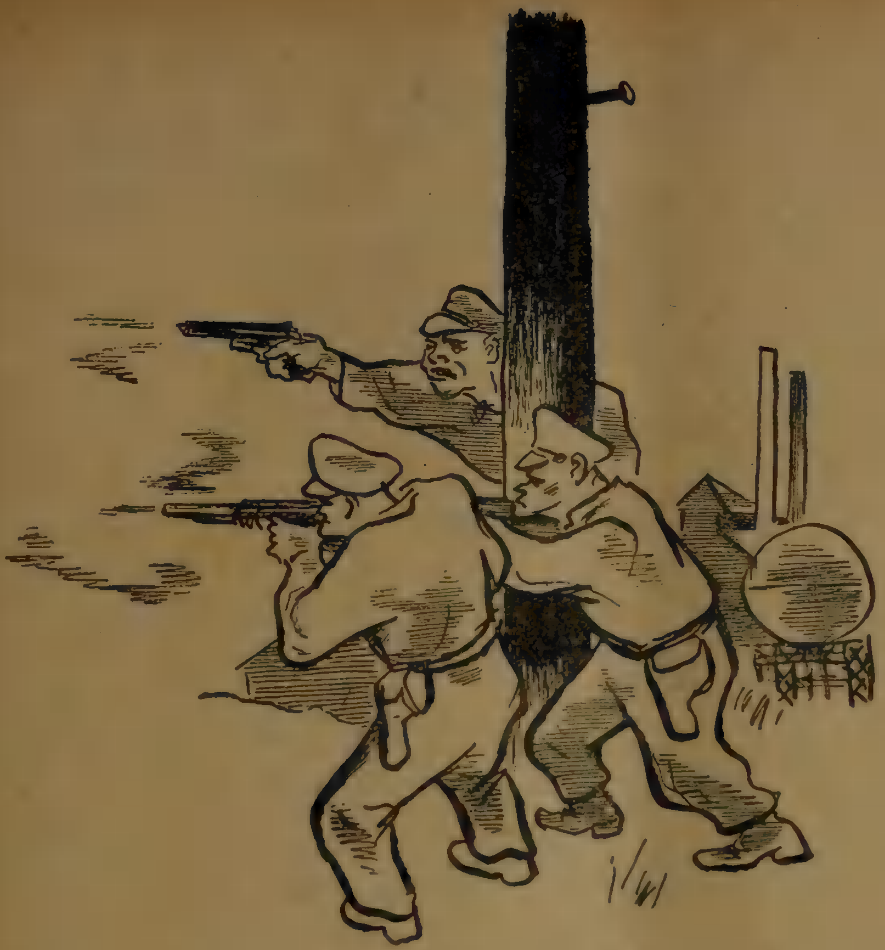
YOUNGSTOWN is bounded on the north by mill owners, on the south by the steel mills, on the east by a dingy section where workers live, and on the west by more workers' houses. Police and deputies in armed motor cars ride through the city looking for action. Near the entrances to the mills the striking pickets walk or sit day and night. Not far off stand deputized police armed with guns, clubs, and cartridge belts—one of these deputized policemen is the son of a mill worker who is on the picket line. Open meetings are held every night; women and children as well as the strikers attend these meetings. Speeches are delivered through loud speakers from the C. I. O. trucks by union leaders and other strike sympathizers.





Union people from other industries and other localities mingle with the Youngstown strikers and their families. Rubber workers from Akron, steel workers from Pennsylvania, come to help the Republic strikers to win their fight, give them advice, and tell them what happened in their own union and their own plants.



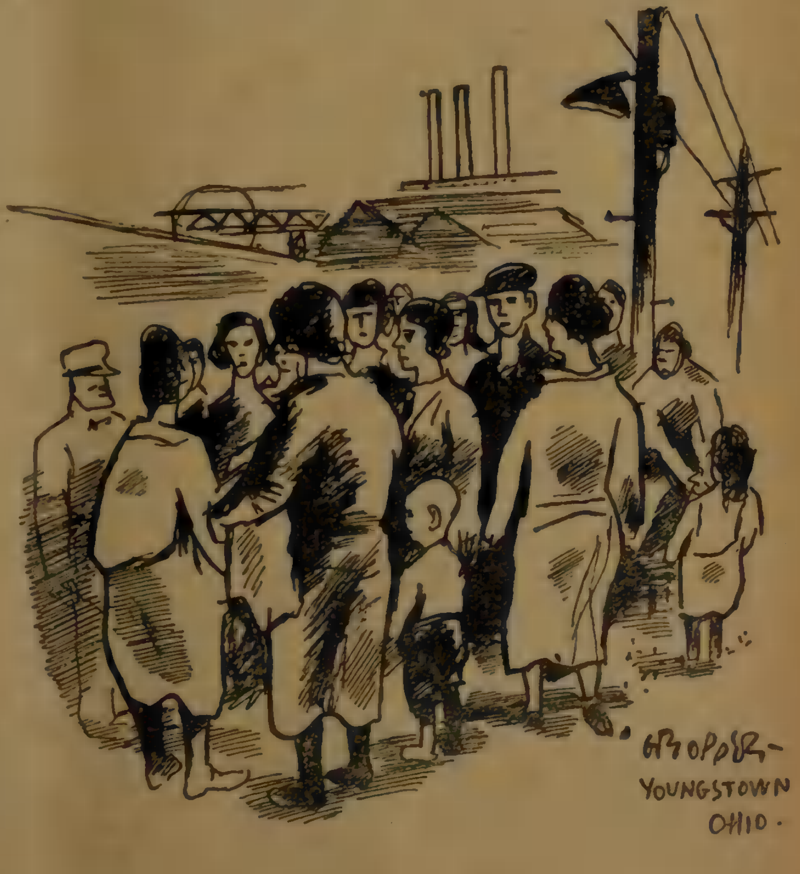


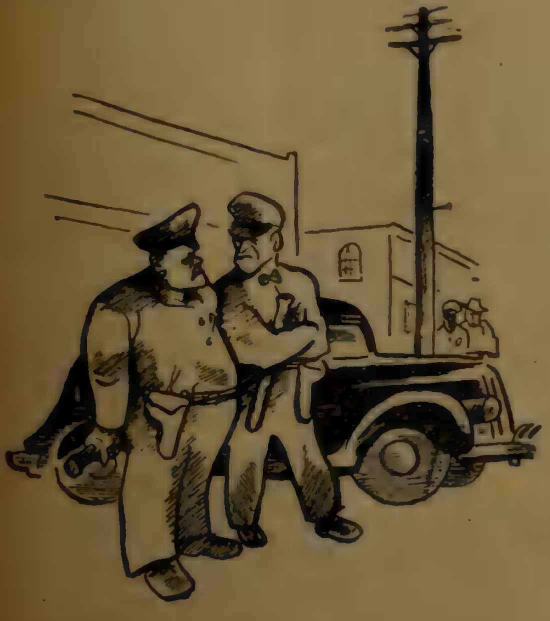
On East Federal Street, in a poor colored section of Youngstown, is the headquarters of the truck drivers' union, which has been actively supporting the strike. This union supplies thousands of loaves of bread a day to the striking families; the truck drivers also have their own sound truck in which they ride around the city giving the latest news and announcing the time and place of union meetings. Radio broadcasting privileges are denied to the strikers.

Saturday was women's day on the picket lines. Some of them had children in their arms.

At about nine o'clock in the evening, in front of Gate 5 of the Republic plant, the police got into an argument with the women and ordered them to leave. The women refused, and three shots of tear gas were fired into the crowd. Across the street strikers were holding a meeting. Screams were drowned out by shell fire. Strikers ran in every direction; many of them hurled rocks at the police, others ran to find weapons. More blasts from the police rifles—and then cars full of special police drove by, firing low at the mass of people. Tear bombs were thrown into nearby houses, and women and children came running out with tears in their eyes, choking and looking for a place to hide. The shooting continued until after midnight. According to the next morning's paper, two were killed and twenty-eight hurt. This was my introduction to Youngstown, the first stop on my trip West.

William Gropper





Wanted: A British C. I. O.

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, June 2

THE London bus strike ended, after a month, in the return of the men to work without any of their objectives gained. The government tribunal of inquiry reported that the effect of the hours of labor on the health of the men should be investigated by a special court of experts and suggested that some of the working schedules were onerous and needed readjustment. It added that, where the ordinary negotiations fail, an arbitration tribunal within the enterprise seemed desirable. On the men's demands for the seven-hour day it expressed no view at all.

The busmen themselves showed a hundred per cent solidarity throughout the strike. On three occasions they rejected the proposed settlement by overwhelming majorities; they demanded, instead, an extension of the strike to the trams and the subway. This was refused by the executive of the Transport Workers' Union (of which the busmen are a section). Last Thursday, the executive took the conduct of the strike into its own hands. It accepted the terms of the Transport Authority and ordered the men back to work. Some time in the near future, no doubt, the discussions between the union and the Transport Board (which have already dragged along for two years) will be resumed.

The return to work has been hailed by the capitalist press as a great victory for Mr. Bevin, the secretary of the union, over his own extremists. If that is so, it seems to me a Pyrrhic victory. The men are not convinced that the union has given them a square deal. It was obvious that, so long as the busmen struck alone, they had no chance of success; and the union's refusal to call out the other transport workers put the means of victory in their opponents' hands. They will have their grievances looked at again; they have no assurance at all that they will be remedied. They know that this reexamination could have taken place without a strike; they therefore do not understand why their executive permitted them to embark upon a fruitless adventure which has cost their funds something like half a million dollars. Nor are they satisfied with Mr. Bevin's conduct of their case before the tribunal. His major argument was the effect of the long hours, under strain of modern traffic conditions, upon the health of the men. He has been urging this on the Transport Board for two years. But when he came to make his argument, he had no organized evidence of a weighty character to put before the tribunal. He relied upon the superficial impressions of three medical men who had made no scientific study of the problem. What it called for, clearly, was something akin to the famous Brandeis brief in Muller v. Oregon. Mr. Bevin had two years in which to prepare such a brief; he had taken no serious steps to that end. Members of his union have impressed on me their dismay at the inadequacy of the case he made.

The men's case seems to me a powerful one; and as Mr. Bevin has, so far, issued no detailed reply to it, his policy remains unexplained. Some say that he attributes the strike movement to Communist influences in the union, and that he has taught them a salutary lesson. But Communist influences could not have produced so remarkable a solidarity among the men unless the grievances had been profoundly felt; and the settlement Mr. Bevin has negotiated still leaves their remedy a largely open question. An outsider cannot but think that Mr. Bevin went into the dispute without any hope of success and took the shortest road to its conclusion. His attitude is typical of a spirit of defeatism which pervades the leadership of British trade unionism at the present time. In a boom period of British industry there is no organized movement for improved conditions. There is a tendency to avoid disputes at all costs. Prices and profits rise everywhere; but just as in the political field, there is no thorough-going opposition from the Labor Party, so, in industry, the tendency of trade-union leadership is to acquiescence in the status quo. Criticism of this attitude is declared to be due to communism. That, rather than capitalism, seems, at the moment, to be the enemy with which the trade-union leaders are concerned. Certainly Mr. Bevin and Sir Walter Citrine know, and speak, their minds far more freely about the sins of Communists than about any other aspect of our social organization.

This episode, I think, is important as an example of the position in which British trade unionism finds itself at the present time. Today, there are somewhat more than 3½ million trade unionists; but there are rather more than 13½ million insured persons in industry. Trade unionism is strong in railways, mining, ship-building, and textiles; in, that is to say, the old established industries with a long tradition of organization. But in the trades concerned with food, drink, and tobacco the percentage of trade unionism is only five; in the miscellaneous metal trades it is only three; in the distributive trades it is only eleven. There is hardly any trade-union organization among clerical workers, in hotels and restaurants, or in laundries. There is probably still less in the new motor and allied metal industries. Trade unionism is weak in the building trade and in the expanding industry of artificial silk. It is weak in agriculture, in clothing, and in the furnishing trades. It has no great hold on road transport outside the great urban centers of population. All this, moreover, must be set against the 8½ million trade unionists who were affiliated to the Trades Union Congress in 1920.

What are the reasons for this decline? They are certainly susceptible of no simple explanation. (i) In part, it is due to the fact that government, through the social services, now performs for the worker many of the functions previously performed by the unions. (ii) In part, it is the outcome of the new machine-technology. The semi-skilled of the new factories do not require the long apprenticeship the old crafts called for, and can be transferred fairly easily from one occupation to another. The hold of the unions on such workers is relatively small. (iii) In part, again, it is due to the increasing employment of women, who are notoriously more difficult to organize. (iv) Partly, it is due to the transfer of industry to the South, where the tradition of trade-union organization is much weaker than in the North. (v) The development of transport has had an important influence. Workers have much less contact than previously outside the factory because they live in a much more scattered area. (vi) There has been no great forward drive for organization among the newer industries. The unions have consolidated their efforts in the trades where they already have a hold rather than sought to tackle unexplored and difficult territory. Where they have made the effort, as in the distributive trades, the return has been small outside the cooperative movement. (vii) Long depression has wrought a good deal of havoc. Unemployment, as always, has meant lapses from membership on a gigantic scale. (viii) The form of trade-union organization is rarely suited to the new conditions of industry. Its basis is still mainly the craft; and the relegation of skill to a very minor place in the new technology of mass production requires an adaptation of trade-union forms which is not being seriously attempted. (ix) The existence of an immense reserve of labor untouched by trade unions tends to diminish the sense of trade-union solidarity. The power of the employer to resist trade-union encroachment has been greatly increased by this consideration. In its turn, this has meant an unaggressive policy on the part of the unions; and this has been a cause, naturally enough, of declining faith in its protective ability. (x) The concentration, finally, of trade-union effort on standard conditions for each craft in a world where each factory or shop tends to a distinctive technique of production makes the old ideal of uniformity inapplicable. New methods are required; and the trade-union leaders do not like to face the need of new methods. That is why so many modern strikes tend to be unofficial. These are discouraged by the unions as subversive of discipline; and this, in its turn, has the effect of persuading the workers that, at the critical point of conflict, they cannot rely on the union.

This is, of course, a too brief analysis of a much more complicated position; any full analysis would require to expand each of these causes, and to take into account political and psychological considerations for which I have here no space. The essential point I want to make is that the Trades Union Congress is rapidly drifting in British industry into the same position as the American Federation of Labor in American industry. There is the same craft basis, the same inability to expand, the same incapacity of adaptation to new conditions, the same tendency to dismiss the spontaneous expression of mass grievance as due to subversive influences, the same inability to realize that technological change has made this aristocracy an oasis in a largely unexplored desert. The power of the great unions is shrinking rapidly in proportion to the whole industrial field. The ability of the employers to be aggressive or, alternatively, to receive aggression with equanimity is correspondingly greater. It is noteworthy that, in the London bus strike, beyond the formal act of constituting the Court of Inquiry, the government never needed to intervene at all. Once the strike was confined to the busmen, public inconvenience was never sufficient, granted alternative means of conveyance, to compel the attention of the Minister of Transport or of Parliament. It is not improbable, moreover, that the union was anxious to avoid this attention lest it brought the dispute within the ambit of the Trades Disputes Act of 1927—one of Mr. Baldwin's contributions to the cause of that industrial peace for which he loved to plead.

My point is the simple one that either there must be a renovation of trade-union foundations in Great Britain, or its decay is certain. I do not need to dwell upon the consequences of that decay except to insist that it would open a wide door to fascism in this country, since it would emphasize the inability of the workers to resist the worsening of their conditions. Renovation means a new spirit, and new methods; perhaps it means also new men. Certainly it will require a new relation between the crafts and the unskilled, the acceptance of the factory as a unit of organization, the revival of the shop stewards and the works committees which played so signal a part in the maintenance of trade-union committees during the war. There will have to be much greater decentralization if the national executives are not to develop into a bureaucracy remote from the lives of ordinary workers; here it is not insignificant that the sons of working-class leaders do not tend to stay in the class to which their fathers belonged when they began in mine or factory. And the unions will have to learn ways of impressing their claims upon public opinion far more direct and skillful than any which they now employ. Unless they realize in time their diminishing hold upon the loyalty of the working class they will be unable, within a generation, to perform their essential function even within the framework of the capitalist system.

It is not, finally, enough to say that this diminishing hold in the industrial field is being replaced through the Labor Party by a new sense of political solidarity. The strength of the Labor Party depends upon the strength of the trade unions. Any failure adequately to organize the workers in industry has immense and immediate ramifications on their power of political expression. And, in any case, the power of the political movement has been gravely weakened in these last six years by nothing so much as the defeatism of the trade unions. A new spirit is needed in the whole labor effort. It will not come unless the movement begins to win victories; and organization is the secret of victory. The British labor movement needs something like the energy and will of the C. I. O.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE change in The Nation's ownership has given me great satisfaction. I agree with Mr. Wertheim and Miss Kirchwey that if the ownership and editorship of a journal can be combined it is by all odds the best arrangement. That was my fortunate situation from 1918 to 1932; indeed, I have been favored beyond most journalists in that in all my forty years in newspapers I have never had to take orders from anybody; I cannot put the responsibility for my failures and mistakes upon anyone else. I am proud of the fact that Miss Kirchwey practically began her training with me and has spent nineteen years with The Nation. It was natural, right, and proper that she should have the opportunity to take over the paper to which she has given so much of herself and so many years of able journalistic service.

I must, however, correct, for the sake of historical accuracy, certain slips which appeared in the editorials in the issues of June 12 and 19. Thus it is not true that The Nation began its career "first as an affiliate of the New York Evening Post." The Nation of Edwin L. Godkin and Wendell P. Garrison was not allied to the Evening Post until 1881, sixteen years after its first issue appeared. Then Mr. Godkin became editor of the Evening Post and Mr. Garrison succeeded to the editorship of The Nation, and held it for twenty-six years. Its first sixteen years as an independent organization, from 1865 to 1881, constitute the most brilliant period of its long life. Indeed, its influence upon American literature, our universities, and the political world, from 1865 to 1900, can never be overestimated. It is attested by the fact that even today no history of this period is written without the most copious reference to The Nation. No other journal in all our history has printed such authoritative foreign and domestic correspondence, and none has had so distinguished a group of authoritative reviewers as The Nation in those years. No other weekly in the English language ever set higher critical standards or labored so to obtain the best expert opinions available in England or the United States. They have never been approached since, by The Nation or any other journal. This is no idle boasting, but merely echoing the words of authority on both sides of the Atlantic. Unfortunately, few such scholars and experts are available today.

Next, as to the financial record of The Nation. During its first independent existence, from 1865 to 1881, The Nation repeatedly paid its way; there is no record known to me of new capital being put in after 1872. To claim, therefore, that The Nation from 1932 to 1934 achieved a state of self-support reached only once before in its history—in 1928—is obviously quite erroneous. During the affiliation of The Nation with the Evening Post there were many years when it met all of its out-of-pocket expenses and maintained itself. It is only fair to point out, however, that because of the association with the Evening Post great economies were possible and its overhead extremely small—The Nation's book reviews appeared in the Evening Post also, and the Evening Post's editorials were used by The Nation. As for the period of my editorship, The Nation was again established as an independent journal and the foundation laid for its present prosperity. Annual surpluses could often have been forced if the purpose had not been to produce the best possible magazine with a full staff. So much for history.

As for the future I, too, believe that the times are more favorable for liberal magazines to pay their own way than ever before. It is hard to recall the public state of mind when The Nation began its second independent career and especially after the Peace Conference. When The Nation attacked the treaty of peace on its publication, and called it the "madness of Versailles" friends implored me to be careful. They really believed that, although the war was over, I and my associates were in danger of jail. Even three years later the editor was mobbed in Cincinnati on the ground that he had been in the pay of the Kaiser all through the war! College teachers who then subscribed to The Nation carefully hid their copies in their bedrooms. One man was actually arrested and jailed in Denver because the police found "dangerously Communistic literature" in his room—as photographed in the press the next day the incriminating documents were all back numbers of The Nation. We have come a long distance since then. Certainly no one today would stand up for the Treaty of Versailles, or call it else than a bundle of abominations.

Finally, much as I rejoice at The Nation's present prosperity, a word of caution may still be in place. Nothing is so changeable as fashions in magazines. The more I regard The Nation's history the more remarkable does it seem to me that it has lived to be seventy-two years old. Dead are all its original rivals and contemporaries, notably the Independent, the Outlook, the Observer, Harper's Weekly, Leslie's Weekly, and many more, while the religious weeklies wield, with one or two fine exceptions, only a shadow of their former influence. And how many have perished which started up during this period! Sometimes I feel that The Nation may have survived strictly because the profit motive was completely secondary, because its owners were persons who wished to better human society rather than to make money. Undoubtedly its essential courage and honesty counted largely, too. And these qualities, I know, the fine, old paper will have under Freda Kirchwey.

BROUN'S PAGE

Tom Girdler Takes the Stand

IN my forced role of being under obligation to read a great many newspapers, the first of the workday week is generally Blue Monday to me because that is the morning when both Dorothy Thompson and George E. Sokolsky try to be funny in the New York Herald Tribune. And to make it even tougher, the two columnists have adopted the same device for their humorous effects—an interview with Mr. Babbitt.

Tom Girdler, the rough guy, was very nervous when he began his testimony before the Senate Post Office Committee in spite of the fact there were no saber-toothed tigers among the inquisitors. He seemed to be a little slow and ill-informed in recognizing those particular Senators who were stooges for his cause. For instance, it took him almost five minutes to realize that Rush Holt, the backward boy from West Virginia, was trying to fan him with a towel at a time when he, Tom Girdler, was just a little groggy because of a few light left jabs. When the chairman of Republic Steel awoke to the fact that Rush was definitely in his corner and that Bailey, of North Carolina, was approaching with a water bucket and the smelling salts he grew more confident and began to strut his stuff. And at this point he larded his testimony with one of the tallest sob-stuff yarns which has ever been introduced to a Congressional committee. It seems, according to Mr. Girdler's story, that one of the "loyal workers" in one of the "beleaguered plants" had not missed mass in twenty-nine years. Mr. Girdler, as he drew a self-portrait of the chairman of Republic, intimated that while Tom might seem tough in certain situations he actually possessed a heart of gold underneath it all. And it was Tom Girdler in person, according to the tale, who scurried about and found a priest who "at the risk of his life" was willing to pass through the C. I. O. picket lines in order to see that a record of never-a-missed-mass-in-twenty-nine-years should be preserved. This sounded somewhat implausible, since a very heavy proportion of C. I. O. members in both steel and motors are themselves good Catholics, and so it was hard to accept the estimate that a priest would be interfered with in any mission. Moreover, Tom Girdler seemed to sense the fact, belatedly, that it might be a mistake to raise the religious issue without rounding it out. And so as an afterthought he threw in, "And I also took occasion to procure Protestant ministers for those loyal workers who could not get to church on account of the menacing attitude of the C. I. O."

One observer at the press table was gravely tempted to break through the decorum which quite properly surrounds the working newspapermen. He wanted to cup his hands and shout at Tom, "What! No rabbis?"

As a matter of fact, the histrionic attempts of Girdler set a new dramatic low since the days of "Abie's Irish Rose." It seems unlikely that he is qualified to fill the role of the romantic tough guy. He is not the type. If I may be permitted to digress, it has been said that you can't make a silk purse out of a sow's ear, and I am very skeptical as to whether any other portion of the pig can be made into a kind of Captain Flagg of finance capital.

In a recent syndicated column called (I'm sorry, but the title escapes me) Westbrook Pegler mentioned the fact that he had been able to get a long interview with John L. Lewis through the good offices of General Johnson. He also intimated that it took some doing because Lewis was "sore" at some of Pegler's columns. I suspect that Westbrook Pegler went to slightly more trouble than he needed to. The president of the United Mine Workers reads papers voraciously, and in all likelihood he had seen Mr. Pegler's comments or had them "called to his attention." However, it is a familiar fact among the working newspapermen and women of Washington that John L. Lewis sees all reporters who want to talk to him, utterly regardless of whether they happen personally to be for or against him. Of all public figures in Washington Lewis is by all odds the most accessible. Seeing John L. is just about as easy as seeing the Washington Monument. General Johnson, what with one thing and another, is a very busy man. "Peg" need not have put him to all that trouble.

Girdler is not at the moment popular with Washington reporters. He refused steadfastly to talk to any newspapermen on the day he appeared before a Senate Committee. He did not uphold the democratic tradition set by J. P. Morgan which was very useful to headline writers during the munitions hearings. Mr. Morgan made all his worst slips in talking to the reporters. To be sure, as a matter of sheer realism Girdler might say, "Why should I take a chance with the reporters? After all, they are a good deal smarter than the Senators." That would be all right if Tom Girdler had not entered so wholeheartedly into the build-up of himself as the bold and frank defender of human liberty who is never afraid to speak his piece. And on top of that he used one of those unfortunate compromises. Just before he took a plane for Cleveland a few reporters nailed him at the airport. As soon as he landed he issued one of those blanket "I was misquoted" statements, which always makes a good reporter sore because he is right in thinking that the man who hollers "misquoted" in very many cases is merely crawling because he does not like his own words when he sees them in cold type.

In fact, I hear a rumor that some of the Washington fraternity are planning to run Tom Girdler for All-American Heel this autumn in the hope that he can carry all the usual states and also Maine and Vermont.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

Bonaparte: Through Marxist Eyes

BONAPARTE. By Eugene Tarlé. Translated from the Russian by John Cournos. Knight Publications. $4.50.

EUGENE TARLE is professor of history at the university in Leningrad. He has made a special investigation of Napoleon's "European System" in its economic aspects, and the fruits of that research are included in the present "Bonaparte." To reduce Tarlé's results to a word, they show that even in Napoleon's day the economic interdependence of the countries of Europe was enough of a fact to be visible to the eye, and especially to Napoleon's eye. The Emperor took for his economic thermometer the silk industry at Lyons and he observed that to plunder conquered countries or impoverish them with heavy indemnities ruined the foreign luxury market of France, so that the national treasury lost more income from taxes than it gained by indemnities. In the Russian campaign an interesting economic triangle developed between Russia, England, and France. After cutting off her market for luxuries in Russia, France could not get enough money to buy cheap textiles from England, which the Emperor was obliged to introduce by contraband, so that the Russian war ruined French industry and at the same time reduced the standard of living of the French masses. There were moments, and even periods, in the Napoleonic wars when Paris gained economically from the conquest of other countries, and Napoleon sometimes had the support of the financial classes in his wars. But just as often he had them against him. The feelings of the mob in Paris also exhibit considerable fluctuations of war sentiment in correlation with hard times and prosperous times. But, on the whole, the farther one presses the economic interpretation of the Napoleonic wars, the more evident it becomes that sentimental pressures were far more important than any others in producing those titanic convulsions, and more than anything else, the bitter-end resolve of Europe not to accept the Revolution, whatever the cost. That was Napoleon's own sober conclusion as he looked back on his career from St. Helena.

One cannot touch the Napoleonic epic at any point without becoming engrossed in the drama of it, and once Professor Tarlé has made his dutiful Marxian gesture, not excluding a number of attacks in his earlier pages on Napoleon as a murderer of proletarians, he feels free to let himself go and fall in with the rhythm of the legend. I have never been able to decide whether the Columbus story or the Napoleon story is the best story in history. Perhaps, in view of the vast size of its canvas and the complexity of the elements that it touches, the Napoleon story is the one that can most often be reread with delight. Professor Tarlé has certainly caught the story aspect of Napoleon's career in a fine adjustment of brevity to adequacy, and of color to historical generality, and all of the readableness of the Russian original must have come over in the smooth and forceful translation of Mr. Cournos.

The moralistic judgment that Napoleon was a man of inordinate ambition who did not hesitate to sacrifice thousands of lives to his vanity is probably ineradicable; and to the old charges Professor Tarlé now adds the rebuke that Napoleon did not foresee clearly enough the world that opened in 1917, and on the whole spoke contemptuously of rioting mobs of proletarians. Objective history will probably cling to the view that Napoleon, more clearly than any of the other leaders of his time, caught the vision of the world that the nineteenth century was to know and forced it upon Europe by shattering the fossilized fabric of the old regime by the sheer force of his military genius and by his constructive statesmanship. Among the generals he was the only one who could always win, and among the statesmen he was the only one who did make a reform when he had the chance. The dynastic aspect of Napoleon's career, which is also the comic aspect, especially when the story of his family is added, probably reflects more closely his view of Europe than his view of himself. That it was a sound view the after-history of his family shows amply enough, to say nothing of the exhibition that monarchical sentiments in presumably civilized peoples are making of themselves in our own day.

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON

Creative Sensibility

SELECTED POEMS, WITH AN ESSAY ON HER OWN POETRY. By Edith Sitwell. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

THERE are certain elements in Miss Sitwell's work, as she herself recognizes, that make it foreign to all but a limited circle of readers. This is the more to be regretted because, like Wordsworth and Traherne before her, she enjoys a "creative sensibility" which makes the world new. One of the barriers to intelligibility is the very sharpness of her sense impressions and the extraordinary rapidity with which they follow each other. The second is the rural and at the same time aristocratic landscape which was the setting of her childhood and which continues to furnish her with material for poetry. Her sensory equipment leads her to employ synaesthetic effects with the freedom of a Mallarmé or a Rimbaud, and since, again like the symbolists, she holds the world of appearance to be but a screen for a deeper spiritual reality, she adds a metaphysical difficulty to the obscurities of her method.

Some of these problems are touched upon in the essay which prefaces the present volume. It is dedicated to John Sparrow, whose little book, "Sense and Poetry," deals intelligently if too briefly with the difficulties and rewards offered by Miss Sitwell's work. He said of her there that she had done not a little to "extend the range of recognizable associations (and thus of metaphor) . . . and so to open the eyes of her generation to aspects of things and similarities between them to which their predecessors were blind." He also argued against the extreme privacy of some of her allusions. That privacy is not noticeably lessened by her latest attempt to give the sympathetic reader the keys to the city of her mind. Indeed, her essay merely repeats, sometimes in identical words, what she has said elsewhere about her processes. Furthermore, like her previous expositions, this is so largely devoted to the effects of tone-color in her verse as to slight other less obvious and equally important aspects of it.

PUBLIC

Miss Sitwell, as her critical no less than her creative writings bear witness, is exquisitely aware of the refinements of verbal texture. Certain syllables, certain relations between vowels and consonants, express particular sensations for her so exactly that she is assured they must have the same significance for every sensitive reader. Typical in everything but its restraint is her statement that "the ethereal quality of the plant world, the slow growth of the plant, the color and scent of the rose are conveyed by the different wave-lengths of the vowels" in one passage. Granted that this technical device is part of every poet's equipment, yet Miss Sitwell's extravagant claims for its effectiveness have an unfortunate influence on her work. Not seldom she sacrifices the melodic line to the tone-color of her verse. She tends to ignore the fact that too close attention to these subtleties may injure the larger pattern of grouped lines. Nor does she appear to realize that even those sensitive to such matters may differ as to the interpretation of certain abstract sounds or rhythms, or that the purely aural associations of a word may not be the most powerful. Hence she refuses to admit that her failures in communication are largely due to discrepancies between individual reactions.

In spite of her preoccupation with technique, as evidenced by her many experiments, in spite also of her nostalgia for the felicities of her sheltered childhood, Miss Sitwell is not able to live wholly in retreat. Gold Coast Customs, for example, is expressive of the poet's horror at a world in which "man is part ravenous beast of prey, part worm, part ape, or is but the worm turned vertebrate"; it is her indictment of a civilization in which the vulgarity of the nouveaux riches is only more disgusting than the debasement of the exploited poor. Her attempt here to "give the concentrated essence of the present age" is not greatly helped by analogies drawn between contemporary brutalities and those described by Hegel in that chapter of his "Philosophy of History" which deals with Africa. The poem is further flawed by a dancing rhythm, presumably supposed to emphasize the grotesque character of urban life today but actually defeating its purpose. It is the vividness of the ghastly imagery that stamps the poem ineradicably upon the mind and almost, though not quite, redeems its serious faults.

There is abundant evidence that Miss Sitwell suffers with what she calls "the wounded and suffering soul" of the contemporary world. Even her evocations of parks and gardens as remote and fair as the Fortunate Islands are crossed by a painful consciousness of boorish countries beyond. Her poetry is most successful, however, where she remembers the scents and colors, the sounds and stirrings of a golden past. To read these enchanting passages is to be reminded of the famous meditation of Traherne's on his own intimations of immortality: "The corn was orient and immortal wheat which never should be reaped nor was ever sown. I thought it had stood from everlasting to everlasting." One feels that, like Traherne, with much ado she "was corrupted and made to learn the dirty devices of this world." Her poetry is a testament to the struggle she has endured in seeking to unlearn those dirty devices and to recapture that orient light. She has come out scarred from the struggle, and her triumph has not been complete. One remains grateful for those poems or parts of poems, sometimes for a single line, that briefly remind us of "the celestial, great, and stable treasures" to which, like the shoemaker's son of Hereford, this descendant of Angevin kings was born. BABETTE DEUTSCH

Today's Neurotics

THE NEUROTIC PERSONALITY OF OUR TIME. By Dr. Karen Horney. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

THE most challenging social-science problem of our time lies in the antithesis between Freudian psychoanalysis and Marxian sociology. I believe the social science of the future will be largely a synthesis of these, a sociologized psychoanalysis, or, if your bias lies the other way, call it a psychologized Marxism. Most attempts of Marxists to deal critically with the problems of psychoanalysis are not merely superficial; they are quite frankly silly: "Capitalism breeds neurosis," and, vice versa, "Communists all had a bad time in the Oedipus situation." Such rubbish completely evades the basic issue and after a time becomes wearisome.

To come, therefore, upon a book entitled "The Neurotic Personality of Our Time," by so distinguished a psychoanalyst as Karen Horney, raised my highest hopes. Lines in the introduction left me warmly excited. For instance, "I believe that a strict adherence to all of Freud's theoretical interpretations entails the danger of tending to find in neuroses what Freud's theories lead one to expect to find. It is the danger of stagnation. I believe that deference for Freud's gigantic achievements should show itself in building on the foundations that he has laid, and that in this way we can help to fulfill the possibilities which psychoanalysis has for the future, as a theory as well as a therapy." Yet I must confess that by the time I laid the book aside I had cooled down considerably.

There are two excellent, skilfully developed ideas in the opening chapters which are the basic postulates for the argument of the book as a whole: (1) Neurosis may be defined only in terms of culture, so that the social side of the problem of socio-psycho-biology must be more stressed than it has been by the chief adherents of Freud in the past; (2) although it is necessary to know of the infantile experiences of the neurotic to understand the neurosis, the present life situation of the individual is perhaps of equal importance. But true and important as both of these postulates are, Dr. Horney's service at the present time has been rather in emphasizing them than in making an original contribution. The chief service of these chapters will lie in disabusing the layman's mind about certain misplaced emphases in the psychoanalysis of the past.

The rest of the book, with the exception of the last chapter, presents Dr. Horney's description of the neurotic personality as it follows from her basic postulates. Here there is much material which will interest the profession and entertain, amuse, or perhaps in some cases worry the layman. There are new interpretations of the problem of masochism; new implications of the neurotic need for affection are pointed out; a new theory of neurotic guilt feelings is developed. Dr. Horney writes well in a rambling anecdotal style. The layman who reads the book will end with a fair picture of what neuroticism consists of, but he will probably have difficulty in reducing his impressions to precise formulations. There is, it seems to me, an unnecessary looseness in the presentation.

This looseness comes chiefly from Dr. Horney's attempt to present a generalized picture in "plain language" and to treat the neurotic as a character type without differentiating the various neuroses. Such an attempt, however, is scientifically a mistaken endeavor. If we grant that Dr. Horney has taken a step beyond the more orthodox analysts in her emphasis on cultural factors, we must also point out that she has taken two steps backward in building her theory in such a generalized fashion. The chief contribution of psychoanalysis to modern medicine has been the systematic theory of the neuroses. This theory, although subject to criticism on methodological grounds, is systematic in that it shows the detailed interrelationships between symptoms and characters. I believe nothing is to be gained by neglecting the precise details for larger generalities. For this reason it is impossible to recommend the book as an introduction to psychoanalytical theory.

Since so much of Dr. Horney's work is concerned with hostility, it is interesting to note the ill-concealed hostility toward Freud and other analysts through this section of the work. Much is said quite generally about Freud's "gigantic contributions," "monumental discoveries," and the like, but these are often criticized rather severely without having been given accurate presentation. To take only one example, Dr. Horney denies the universality of the Oedipus situation by pointing out that Freud's patients were neurotics with neurotic parents. Nothing is said of the behavior studies of children, the psychoanalysis of normals, the studies of sex perversion, the many works in the field of belles-lettres which support Freud's contentions about the Oedipus situation. Dr. Horney also presents a very one-sided picture of Freud's ideas about anxiety, and of his definition of sexuality.

The last chapter returns to the problem of culture and neurosis. It can only be described as thin. One might gain from it the impression that modern psychoanalysis has really very few implications for sociology. Actually, besides Freud, many others like Alexander, Kardiner, and Williams have dealt with the problem. There is no discussion of their work. The competitive nature of our culture, woman's position in it, the need for conspicuous consumption are posted as factors creating the neurotic personality of our time. Not one word about the economic system, nothing about politics, nothing about general problems of social organization. Dr. Horney apologizes for not being a sociologist. But when we think of the fools that step in, here is truly a case of an angel fearing to tread. The time is ripe for a real coming to grips with these problems. Meanwhile Dr. Horney is to be congratulated if through this book she succeeds in stimulating the interest of psychoanalysts in cultural problems and the interest of sociologists in psychoanalysis.

J. F. BROWN

The Common Health

POVERTY AND PUBLIC HEALTH. By G. C. M. M'Gonigle and J. Kirby. Victor Gollancz, Ltd., London. Six shillings.

THIS book, published abroad but not yet scheduled for publication here, contains much factual information of timely interest in America. It presents a comprehensive survey of the state of the public health in England on the basis of available statistics. It also records the results of slum clearance works in England, and it is these findings that have a direct bearing upon pending legislation designed to alleviate slum conditions here.

With a keen appreciation for scientific accuracy (woefully lacking among our own public health workers), the authors have collected their data and presented them simply. A brief summary of two of their most striking investigations into the relationship between poverty and health—which is at present a subject of lively discussion in England—will best illustrate the scope and significance of this volume. In Stockton-on-Tees, where Dr. M'Gonigle is Medical Officer of Health, a slum area was demolished some years ago, and its inhabitants transported to a new housing development. One reason for the change was the abnormally high death rate in the slum, which exceeded the death rate in the rest of the town by 86 per cent. The new dwellings were all that could be desired in model housing; yet a survey of these families, made at the end of five years, showed that their death rate was even higher than before, exceeding the general rate for the town by 178 per cent. In the light of these figures, it would seem that slum clearance had been detrimental.

In their capacity as public health officers, the authors sought the reason for this unexpected increase, and found it. The new apartments rented at a slightly higher figure than the old, and necessitated an additional expenditure for transportation of wage earners. The wages of the people living there, however, remained just where they had been before removal to the model village. This extra living cost had to be deducted entirely from the food bill. Worse yet, to make up in bulk for the cut in the daily ration, housewives had shifted their purchases to carbohydrates, encroaching on an already minimal protein allowance. The solid fact brought out by this study is that people living in slum housing earn so little and live so close to the margin of starvation that it is impossible to raise their rents or other living expenses in any way without seriously affecting their nutrition.

Another study, made at Newcastle-on-Tyne, dealt with the health status of two groups of children: one composed of children from professional families, the other of children from families maintained by the dole. The criterion used here was the hemoglobin index, a figure of 75 per cent being taken as normal. In the professional group, 84 per cent had an index of 75 per cent or better, while in the group supported by the dole, 71 per cent of the children were below par. A similar study of the children of American families on federal relief would be of great interest.

The foreword to this volume was written by Sir Frederick Gowland Hopkins, past president of the Royal Society and an authority on nutrition. He directs England's attention to these important data, and calls upon the government to take action. Scientific men of prominence in England do not hesitate to express themselves publicly on national problems on which they are qualified to speak. In the United States it is considered somewhat undignified to be found in the market place. The public health departments in our universities, at least, could make real contributions to preventive medicine if they would conduct similar surveys and publish the unvarnished data in brief form.

HUGH H. DARBY

The Poet as Prophet

MILTON AND WORDSWORTH, POETS AND PROPHETS. A STUDY OF THEIR REACTIONS TO POLITICAL EVENTS. By Sir Herbert J. C. Grierson. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

"SURELY," says Sir Herbert during one of the arguments he conducts here with the critical school of T. S. Eliot, "there may be more than one kind of good poetry." Leaving aside the question whether Mr. Eliot, if not his school, is less aware of this than Sir Herbert, there is wisdom in the remark. And there is method; for Sir Herbert's effort throughout the present volume is to distinguish among three kinds of poetry. One is Pope's kind, one is Donne's, and one is Milton's and Wordsworth's—or rather it is if they can be found to satisfy a certain definition. The first is a poetry of statement, the second is a poetry of ratiocination, and the third is the poetry of prophecy. Sir Herbert's central inquiry is into the prophetic quality of Milton and Wordsworth; do they have it at all, and if so in what degree?

The standard of comparison is always the Hebrew prophets, who according to Sir Herbert were neither polishing commonplaces nor exercising their intellects for the fun of so doing, but were possessed in some unique and quite personal way with deep convictions—concerning God as an agent of justice and mercy rather than as a glutton for sacrifice, and concerning the whole history of their race as signifying an ethical truth of unspeakable importance—which filled them with a burden literally unendurable until it was delivered in words. The burden counts for more than the words, if such a distinction can be made; the message more than the art. Milton matches Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Hosea at all points save this essential one. His conviction is passionate and deep, his desire is authentic, and his view of human history is ethical. But the God of "Paradise Lost" is a general and a divine rather than an immeasurable force; Milton's justification of his ways to man is "legal" rather than metaphysical or mystical; and ultimately it is the art of the poem that we remember with the greatest clearness. All this is possibly less true of "Samson Agonistes," yet even there a hardness at the surface prevents us from passing at once, as we do with the older prophets, into the heart of both man and matter.

The political background of Milton's major poetry was of course the Civil War. Wordsworth's background was the French Revolution, and "The Prelude" is his attempt to build a substitute for the doctrine which he had shared with other young men in 1790 but which ten years later had become to him both monstrous and meaningless. Sir Herbert finds Wordsworth genuinely prophetic in those portions of his masterpiece which for everybody are the most successful—the magical passages in which he remembers his youth. Sir Herbert does not say, though I believe he thinks, that the rest of the poem, in which Wordsworth so pompously rationalizes his relief at having escaped into the Lake country, is worthless as prophecy because we are no longer able to know what it means. But his analysis of Wordsworth as a poet dedicated to love and hence to truth has freshness no less than validity. He surely cannot mean that Wordsworth is a major prophet, yet he knows how to recognize the fine strain which is there.

Sir Herbert only hints at the possibility of a prophetic poetry today. There is such a possibility now as always; and as always there is much to prevent its realization—the spirit and habit of criticism, for instance, and the unlikelihood that any intelligent poet will be able to maintain a point of view through the long period necessary for the composition of a great work. Sir Herbert's own remark that Milton's heaven is totalitarian provides a clue to what might happen in our poet's mind even before he knew he was ready to give up. We are addicted to comparisons, and we know too much about the past. Yet it is just here that Sir Herbert is most suggestive. The prophet, he says, is one "who sees that what the world has approved hitherto is not good but evil," and who perceives that the error still goes uncorrected. So Milton wrote "Paradise Lost" as an arraignment of man from Adam to 1658. And so in our time a man might compose a poem in sorrow or wrath at the spectacle of human cruelty once, now, and forever. A man might. Whether any man will is another question.

MARK VAN DOREN

Can the Supreme Court be "REFORMED"?

Must judicial dominance of American life be overthrown—once and for all? Is the President's proposal—or any other yet made—really enough to ensure that the will of the people will govern? Must real court reform go further—to the root of the usurpation of power by the Court? Is the Supreme Court a "bulwark against Fascism"?

With such questions as these Isidor Feinstein, Associate Editor of the New York Post, deals in a little book which clears the air of the confusion of controversy. Read, below, what critics are saying of this book.

Here is the answer!

THE COURT DISPOSES

By ISIDOR FEINSTEIN

- "Packed with pungent, effective, and even brilliant political argumentation. . . . Places the court in proper perspective as concerns its much-publicized role of defender of individual liberties. . . . His conclusion is that reform must be sought in different ways, in fact, in all ways possible."—Dean Charles E. Clark of the Yale Law School, in THE NATION
- "The legend of judicial impartiality and omniscience dies hard, but Mr. Feinstein's detailed account of the Supreme Court and minimum wage legislation is an effective lethal instrument."—Thomas Reed Powell, in THE SATURDAY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
- "Clear, spirited, brief . . . 'a layman's book for laymen.' . . . The most sensible and most lucid tract upon the whole problem that we have had."—Matthew Josephson, in the NEW MASSES
- "A simple, clear and forceful statement of the liberal position. . . . As for the cry most often heard from the conservatives, that any change in the court's personnel or powers will endanger the civil liberties of the people, Mr. Feinstein declares that the court's record in this respect is none too good, anyway, and points to a number of startling violations of constitutional guarantees."—HERSCHEL BRICKELL, N. Y. Post
- "A brilliant indictment of the Supreme Court for its usurpation of power. Painstaking in research and irrefutably sound in logic, its brilliance is enhanced by the glittering simplicity of its prose."—COURIER-POST, Camden, N. J.

☞ PIN $1 TO THIS AD AND MAIL COUPON

COVICI-FRIEDE, 432 Fourth Ave., N. Y. C.

Please send me a copy of THE COURT DISPOSES, for which I enclose $1.

Name ....

Address ....

Professor Hartshorne's God

BEYOND HUMANISM. ESSAYS IN THE NEW PHILOSOPHY OF NATURE. By Charles Hartshorne. Willet, Clark and Company. $2.50.

IT is not easy to say whether Professor Hartshorne is a philosopher or a prophet. But one can say with assurance that these roles hardly do justice to his ambition. For he claims that in this book he not only offers us the only synthesis of the "new" philosophy and the "new" theology compatible with contemporary science, but the only system of beliefs capable of giving us a completely integrated personality. He gives us, besides, solutions of the central problems of Western philosophy, and a refutation of such humanist thinkers as Freud, Marx, Dewey, Santayana, Russell, Mead, Alexander, Carnap and the positivists, Croce, Heidegger, Hartmann, and G. E. Moore.

Could the claims which the author makes for his book be substantiated, its publication would be an event in the history of culture as portentous as the appearance of the "Timaeus," "The City of God," or the "Summa Theoligiae." But it is to be doubted whether "Beyond Humanism" will occupy a place among these works, for the new synthesis turns out to be very little more than Whitehead, torn from his impenetrable terminology and simplified to meet ordinary concrete religious demands.

Professor Hartshorne attacks all philosophies which on naturalistic grounds emphasize man's self-sufficiency and deny that human values will endure after man's extinction. Our author maintains that belief in man is inadequate because mankind is too vast and formless to attract man's effective loyalty. He also maintains that the belief that values will be finally destroyed goes against man's spontaneous ethical convictions and their deepest needs. As an alternative he offers us belief in the God of the "new" science and the "new" theology. This God apparently suffers neither from the vastness nor from the formlessness of mankind, though it is the Universe. But this new God is not the mechanically determined Nature of Spinoza. It is the Universe conceived as an organism and hence endowed with personality. It is the guarantor of our values and hence the only object fully worthy of man's reverence and piety. Thus it is only through the new Hartshornian faith that we gain full integration.

To appreciate fully Professor Hartshorne's performance it is necessary to grasp the formal structure of his argument. In order to refute humanism he first proves the possibility of his thesis. And his thesis is that the Universe and the electrons may be said to feel and think. This, I guess, is where the "new" science comes in. If the Universe feels and thinks, God may have imagination and memory. Therefore He has imagination and memory. All this is reinforced by the claim that only upon this thesis can certain facts be adequately explained. And these facts boil down to the assertion—hardly a fact of course—that our spontaneous ethical convictions and deep human needs demand this conception of God-Nature if we are to achieve adequate personal integration. What integration is we are not told. Nor is the effort made to show that spontaneous ethical convictions and deep human needs are not the result of accidental cultural conditioning.

That a thinker as quick to detect the weakness of his adversaries should himself indulge in such a manner of argumentation will not surprise any one who remembers how easy it is for men to mistake the inner glow of religious faith for the possession of the truth. Those who do not share the inner glow with our author will not be surprised at the muddled vagueness and the utter lack of anything approaching empirical evidence on which this grand new synthesis rests; radical confusion and absence of evidence have always been traits of metaphysical substitutes for religion. Nor will they be surprised at the clever use of the old tricks of apologetics—the claim to the sole sanction of science, the sharp distinction, when evidence is untoward, between science and philosophy, the facile demonstration of the ignorance of those one is opposed to, and the scornful arrogance which grows from a monopoly of the truth. But all the intellectual ingenuity and all the skillful use of eristics are not enough to cover up the emotional immaturity which lies behind the need to find cosmic support for human efforts.

ELISEO VIVAS

In Search of America

THE ROAD: IN SEARCH OF AMERICA. By Nathan Asch. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.75.

MR. ASCH bought the longest bus ticket ever sold and left Washington on a commiseration tour of the underprivileged in America. He met the share-croppers in Arkansas, was run out of town in Marked Tree, was caught in a dust storm in Oklahoma, witnessed an organizers' meeting of beet workers in Colorado, and lived in a lumber camp in California. No matter where Mr. Asch went or what he saw, he was dreadfully upset. On his way back, in Chicago (which he found rather dull), he had a mystic experience. He came upon a budding prostitute in a doorway, seized her hands, kissed them, and said, "Forgive me, sister." Mr. Asch has a great capacity for suffering and seems eager to take upon himself the guilt of an entire social system. That may be praiseworthy in itself, but it creates a kind of réportage which is distraught, inaccurate, and often offensive: facts are distorted, obfuscated, and lost in the author's sobs and sighs, and a widespread social condition is reduced to the terms of his personal hysteria. The reader becomes more and more aware of the author's emotional state and more and more suspicious of what may really be responsible for it. Mr. Asch's reactions are so subjectivized and melodramatic that the circumstances which prompt them take on the quality of implausibility and invention. He has exploited suffering human beings in a way they have never been exploited before. Death, destitution, and unemployment are something to write about, not to revel in.

CHRISTOPHER LAZARE

HUNTINGTON LAKESIDE
ELMER ROSENBERG AND MOLLIE LISS · PROPS.

FOR YOUR IDEAL VACATION
LAKE HUNTINGTON, N.Y.
"THE HEART OF THE CATSKILLS"
TEL. HUNTINGTON 3
HOTEL & CAMP — SOCIAL & ATHLETIC ACTIVITIES
SPECIAL 4TH OF JULY WEEK END RATES.

TWIN PINES
A Camp for Adults

Individual screened sun porches, semi-private adjoining baths in de luxe rooms of new main house; comfortable bungalows. Tennis, handball, basketball, baseball, sand beach bathing, boating, fishing, etc.
For further details, address
TWIN PINES ON TROUT LAKE
S. SAIDEL, LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

RECORDS

BRUNSWICK'S new series of repressings from Polydor offers important singers and pieces of music on domestic records for the first time. One extraordinary item is the Sleep-Walking Scene from Verdi's "Macbeth," sung by Gertrude Rünger. The music realizes the mere sense of the scene, as distinguished from Shakespeare's poetic values; and one is amazed by the dramatic force and poignancy that Verdi, writing in 1847, gives to the conventional instrumental and vocal style of his period (consider merely the opening accompaniment figure with its stabbing note of the English horn). Rünger, who made a poor showing at the Metropolitan the past season, is superb on this record ($1.50).

Superb also on other 12-inch single records (each $1.50) are the singing of Franz Völker and the playing of the Berlin State Opera Orchestra under Melichar in the tremendous opening scene of Act 2 of "Fidelio"; the singing of Adele Kern in Strauss's coloratura aria to end all coloratura arias (and singers), "Grossmächtigste Prinzessin" from "Ariadne auf Naxos"; the alto voice of Emmi Leisner in Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and Brahms's "Wie bist du, meine Königin." Another lovely voice is that of the soprano Tiana Lemnitz, heard in "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" and so forth from "Der Freischütz," and, on another record, in the Trio from "Der Rosenkavalier," Viorica Ursuleac and Erna Berger, who are heard more satisfactorily on the reverse side in the closing duet of the opera. One of the finest of German lyric tenors a few years ago, Julius Patzak, reaches us with his voice a little hardened, but displays excellent style in two arias from Mozart's "Entführung aus dem Serail." And one of the best German tenors, Fritz Wolff, is heard in a "Lohengrin" recording that takes him from the farewell to the swan to the end of the first act in 4½ minutes; on the reverse side is an abbreviated version of the closing scene of the opera; on another record an abbreviated version of the bridal chamber scene. The Elsa, Berta Malkin, is excellent.

One is told that Bruckner is at his best in his religious music; but his best, represented in the two motets, "Os Justi" and "Virga Jesse," is, for my taste, not good enough (10-inch, $1). In an album of six records ($6) Schlusnus's fine baritone is employed with more musical sensitiveness than I can recall from other occasions in Schubert's exquisite "Geheimes" and his "An Schwager Kronos," Strauss's "Morgen" and "Geduld," and less interesting songs of Strauss ("Der Nachtgang" and "Winterliebe"), Schumann ("Provençalisches Lied," "Talismane," "Der Soldat"), and Graener.

Perhaps Musicraft is right about the greatness of Buxtehude as manifested in the cantata "Singet dem Herrn" (one record, $1.50), well sung and played by Ethel Luening, soprano, J. Reilich, violin, S. Hunkins, 'cello, and Ernst Victor Wolff, harpsichord. I am better able to perceive the greatness of Mozart in the Piano Sonata in F (Köchel 332) (three records, $5), played by Mr. Wolff with great sensitiveness, but in a style that softens and sentimentalizes the music. Recording is excellent; surfaces, with steel needles, are noisy.

Wolff makes another appearance, this time on Gamut records, on which he plays Bach's Partita No. 6 on the harpsichord (one 12-inch, two 10-inch records, $4). Performance, recording and surfaces are excellent; but I cannot get as enthusiastic as Gamut about the music.

B. H. HAGGIN

FIVE WEEKS
in
SOVIET RUSSIA
A comprehensive tour under leadership of
WILL GEER
of New Theatre League, including attendance at the MOSCOW THEATRE FESTIVAL.
Sailing July 28. Tour including round-trip Third Class on the QUEEN MARY $559
Other trips under authoritative leadership $399 up
THE OPEN ROAD
12th Floor
8 West 40th Street New York
Cooperating with Intourist

WORKERS SCHOOL
Summer Term Registration
COURSES IN:
Economics
Historical Materialism
Marxism-Leninism
Literature
American History
Current Events
Psychology
Public Speaking
Trade Union Problems
For Descriptive Catalogue D write to the School Office, 35 E. 12th St., N. Y. C.

WALTER DURANTY

WALTER DURANTY

EXPLOSION IN RUSSIA! in STORY
The distinguished correspondent writes his first long fiction, an unforgettable 15,000-word tale in STORY—For JULY—25c
ALSO
A superbly humorous 25,000-word novella
"THE FLYING YORKSHIREMAN"
by ERIC KNIGHT and six unusual short stories
Now at all newsstands

Letters to the Editors

School Children See the Massacre

Dear Sirs: Your readers might be interested in these two compositions written by eighth-grade pupils of a school in the strike area. The first is by a girl, the second by a boy, but I have withheld their names. I am sending the compositions without corrections.

A CHICAGO TEACHER

Chicago, June 12

THE STRIKE

It was May 30 when a bunch of girls and I were going to the picnic in the forest preserve when suddenly we saw people marching. Two American flags came first then men and women with signs on which one I read was "Come Out, We Promise You Fair Play." This was meant for men who were still working inside of the plant. We thought this was just going to be a march so we marched along with them.

The marchers cut through a field and their we met policemen armed with guns and machine guns. We were frightened but we stood, not thinking their was going to be any gun play. Suddenly we saw bricks, bats, stones, etc., flying in the air. We heard shots. Everybody began to run. Some one hollered: "Don't run, it's only blanks they're shooting," but when we looked around and saw men lying on the field blood all over them we were sure they were bullets. I was running blindly through tear gas that the police threw and I fell in a ditch full of stickers. Another girl fell in the mud.

Finally we got on the sidewalk and the guns stopped shooting. We saw cars with red cross signs on them go as fast as they could to get the dead and wounded. Six men died and a great number were wounded in which my brother was one. This is one day I will never forget in my life.

THE STRIKE

My opinion about the strike is that there would be no trouble if the nonstrikers came out of the mill. The strikers believe in peaceful picketing. After the big mass meeting one of the men in the crowd voted peaceful picketing in front of the Republic Steel Corp. This occurred on Sunday about three o'clock. The men were in formation and two men carried the flag. They started to march down the prairie and Nick [a boy of 12, brother of the author of the first composition] was in the front lines with the men from Inland Steel Corp. They were met by the policemen. They showed passes to the policemen and told them they have the right for peaceful picketing. Nick was still in front and was watching the strikers. All at once the bricks start flying in the air the strikers in back start throwing. The policemen drew their guns after Capt. Mooney had been struck on the head. The policemen had started shot the machine gun and Nick and I started to run. Then Nick got struck in the ankle but tried to get up. Then the tear gas were in the air. Nick started to crawl and I started to run. A lady was shot through the neck by machine gun bullets. I went to the headquarters and told Gus, head manager of the C. I. O., and we both went in a machine and found Nick lying in the grass with a baby lying next to him shot through the arm. Gus and I took both them to the South Chicago Hospital.

The Spanish Anarchists and the Government

Dear Sirs: Among the people in this country who read the labor press from Spain, your editorial, Uprising in Catalonia (May 15), aroused considerable comment, containing as it did what must be for The Nation a record number of misstatements of fact about the struggle within the Loyalist ranks. You say your source of information is Louis Fischer, who was not there during the events he described and interpreted. His account was seemingly derived from the Spanish Communist press. The rest of the Spanish press, from Republican to Anarchist, presented the picture very differently and frequently denied with heat many of the things Fischer stated as if they were unquestioned fact.

The line-up is: Republicans plus Right Socialists plus official Communists against Anarcho-Syndicalists, P. O. U. M., and Left Socialists (Caballero group). The issue is nothing less than the Spanish revolution itself. Bertram Wolfe's letter clarified with facts the falsities in the original editorial. Fischer replied with irrelevant material: (1) the slander that the Anarchists and P. O. U. M. sabotage the war, and (2) that they want to collectivize small property. This is silly and untrue. There is no organization or party on the Left which advocates the confiscation of small property; both the C. N. T.-F. A. I. and the P. O. U. M. have repeatedly made their position in this respect clear. If The Nation is unwilling to publish any but Mr. Fischer's version and interpretation of the profoundly important struggle which links the Barcelona events (May 4-9), the political crisis and fall of Caballero, and the terrifying repressions now going on, let its readers reconstruct the gist of the story from the following documents, taking notice of their significant dates:

"As for Catalonia the purging of Trotskyist and Anarcho-Syndicalist elements has begun; this work will be conducted with the same energy with which it has been conducted in the U. S. S. R." (Pravda, Dec. 17, 1936)

"It is only recently that the legitimate governments of Valencia and Barcelona have come to suspect that the apex of the inverted pyramid on which Anarchist power rests may be small enough to be dealt with in its own terms—those of force. . . . This suspicion is being tested out cautiously, here and there, as the government seizes auspicious opportunities to increase its own authority. A reliable police force is being built up, quietly but surely. . . . The Anarchists have already noticed and complained about the increased strength of this force. . . . They realize that it will be used against them. . . . The government, however, has to walk warily and secure itself in public opinion. Too hasty action against the Anarchists might cause a revulsion of opinion in their favor, particularly in the industrial towns. The Anarchists are taking their stand now as the watchdogs of the revolution, guarding the people's gains against the predatory bourgeois who is represented as trying to sneak in through the back door. . . ." (James Minific, New York Herald Tribune, April 28.)

"The Police Corps will be a powerful arm against the enemy's attempts at sabotage, provocation, and espionage in the Republican rearguard. With this corps the Government of the Generality will be able to crush all attempts against anti-fascist order, and to enforce efficiently all the decrees of the Generality—for example, that decree which states that the property of the peasants and of the middle classes shall be respected and protected against attack." (Official Bulletin of the P. S. U. C. [Third International] previous to Barcelona events.)

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

"The proprietors of small industry, traders, and artisans of all kinds, including the peasants, shall be respected, as well as the property and industrial interests of all foreigners." (Ibid.) Italics in both quotations are mine.

"If the Caballero government were to apply the measures of suppression to which the Spanish section of the Communist International is trying to incite it, then it would come close to a government of Gil Robles or Lerroux; it would destroy the unity of the working class and expose us to the danger of losing the war and shipwrecking the revolution. . . . A government composed in its majority of people drawn from the labor movement cannot make use of the methods that are reserved for reactionary and fascist-like governments." (Adelante, organ of Largo Caballero, May 11.)

Finally, news has been received of the arrests, murders, and disappearances of prominent writers and leaders of the C. N. T. and P. O. U. M. One name among them, that of J. M. Escuder, is well known to journalists in this country. They are all (those who are still alive) being held while "Moscow trials" accusing them of espionage, aid to fascism, etc., are prepared against them, in the manner now become classic—and this does not omit torture.

ANITA BRENNER

New York, June 7

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER cables his first article since his return to Spain as The Nation's correspondent.

MAX ASCOLI, who was forced to leave Italy because of his opposition to the Fascist regime, is now a professor of political science at the University in Exile. He is the author of "Intelligence in Politics."

HAROLD J. LASKI, professor of political science at the London School of Economics, is a leading member of the left wing of the British Labor Party.

FREDERICK R. BARKLEY is on the Washington staff of the Baltimore Evening Sun.

ROSE M. STEIN, who was arrested and jailed while covering the Youngstown strike for The Nation, is a journalist who has followed closely labor struggles in the steel industry.

WILLIAM GROPPER, whose drawings of the contemporary scene are widely known, is now on a tour of the South and West from which he will report back to The Nation in words and pictures during the next three months.

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON is associate professor of romance languages at Columbia University.

J. F. BROWN is a physician and the author of "Psychology and the Social Order."

HUGH H. DARBY is an investigator in the Department of Biological Chemistry at the College of Physicians and Surgeons.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

SUMMER RENTALS

Furnished 11 room house, edge of small village. Electricity, bath, fireplace, hardwood floors, plenty of good water. Large shaded lawn, porches, garage. View of sunset and mountains from porch, cool breezes due to elevation, 1600 ft. Good roads. Season $200. A. L. Lawsing, Randolph Center, Vt.

Unique houses, concrete pool, acres of lawns, shade, fruit, tennis, hour commuting. P. J. Kohler, Congers, N. Y. Tel. 261-R.

Connecticut cabin furnished. $100 season. One room 18x20. Primitive, secluded. 65 miles from N. Y. Near lake. Write 15C, 440 West 24th St., N. Y. C.

Modern 5 room bungalow on beautifully landscaped property at Free Acres, N. J. Reasonable. Commutation. Call. Mr. or Miss Friptu, BOwling Green 9-0088.

FOR SALE

Woodstock, N. Y. Beautiful hillside lot, nearly 4 acres, magnificent views, large evergreens; quiet, refined section, about 7 miles from Woodstock center; double garage convertible 4-room cottage; gravity spring water, electricity; 330 ft. frontage, good road; ideal for writer, artist, summer or year round; $1500; very easy terms. Owner P. O. Box 47, Station F, New York.

Writer's 6-rm. Del. Valley stone house for sale. 6-acre N. J. farm ½ mi. Delaware River, 69 mi. from N. Y. Good roads, electricity, running water, furnace, brook, fruit trees, fine views. Priced for quick sale, $3000. See E. R. Hummer, real est. agt., 34 Kingwood Ave., Frenchtown, N. J. or phone John Coffey, N. Y. CHel. 3-3179.

WANTED

Room in country within few hours of New York with private family for woman writer in delicate health. Meals in room. Bathroom near. Quiet for writing. Telephone particulars to CHelsea 3-2786.

FURNISHED APARTMENT FOR RENT

Large, airy, cheerful 4 room and bath apartment. New gas stove, large Frigidaire, stationary tub, 3 comfortable beds. Top floor accessible to roof overlooking gardens. Good ventilation. Near 8th Ave. subway and bus. Greenwich Village. $45. Phone CHelsea 3-6239.

SUBLET

4-room apartment furnished or unfurnished, opposite Prospect Park. July to Labor Day. BUckminster 4-5149, 6-8 P. M.

SCHOOL

Oak Point Cottage—Mattituck, L. I. Summer nursery school-house for seven 3 to 4 year old children. Individual care by trained nursery school staff—Near safe, clean beach; healthful surroundings; carefully planned diet—Doctor and nursery school references on application. Reasonable rates. Catharine M. Conradi, Box 221, Mattituck, L. I. Phone: Mattituck 98.

ADULT EDUCATION

RALPH M. PEARSON'S
MAIL STUDY COURSES IN MODERN ART PRACTICE in creative painting, modeling and drawing. THEORY: Analysis of current modern works. Bulletin on request. Summer address—E. Gloucester, Mass.

LANGUAGES

Language Phone Sets
Bought, sold, rented, exchanged. Language Service, 507-5th Ave. MUr. 2-4221.

BOOK

The RENAISSANCE OF DEMOCRACY
G. S. GRACCHUS
The first successful attempt to prove the absurd fallacy of Fascism and Communism and to reestablish the eternal validity of democracy.
PEGASUS PUBLISHING CO. $2.00

DANCE—ENTERTAINMENT

SPANISH NIGHT. Swim Dance Entertainment. Art Bazaar on Roof Garden. 104 St. & 5th Ave. July 9th. Ausp. Heckscher Foundation—Adm. 75c. Tickets at North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy, 381-4th Ave.; 2017 Grand Concourse, and Heckscher Foundation.

FILMS

Attention NATION Reader!

Exclusive
FRITZ LANG'S
Original version of "M"
with Peter Lorre
also "TSAR TO LENIN"
RARE DRAMATIC SHOTS OF THE REVOLUTION
WORLD 49 ST. 153 West nr. 7th Ave. | Circle 7-5747

RESORTS

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
ADIRONDACKS

COLORFUL
CONGENIAL
COMFORTABLE
RATE $29.50 UP
Echo Lake Tavern
WARRENSBURG, N. Y.
City Tel. VAnderbilt 3-9875

The Fieldstone

on Round Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and recreation in the heart of the Ramapo Mountains, one hour from New York.

Swimming, boating, tennis, riding, golf and other sports

P. O. BOX 297
MONROE, N. Y.

TELEPHONE:
MONROE 2501

[illegible] descriptive folder will [illegible] at your request

---

For a Glorious Fourth

LAKE CANDLEWOOD ORCHARDS

Come [illegible] this quaint old pre-revolutionary farm in the foothills of the Berkshires. . . .
Lying directly on Lake Candlewood, it offers all land and water sports — from Tennis and Riding to Motor boats and Sailing. . . .
A Fisherman's Haven. Splendid accommodations. Jewish-American cooking.
60 miles from New York, [illegible] Danbury, Conn.

SONYA SNOWE Manager

R.F.D. 44, Brookfield
CONN.

---

for a glorious vacation

COPAKE

The Island Paradise

CRARYVILLE, N. Y.

—on Beautiful Lake Copake—in an unspoiled [illegible]tionland, 110 miles from New York City. Nationally selected [illegible] the "Ideal Camp." Modern Bungalows with private showers.

- 18-HOLE CHAMPIONSHIP GOLF COURSE ON GROUNDS
- 10 FAST-CLAY TENNIS COURTS
- [illegible] HANDBALL COURTS
- SADDLE HORSES—AQUATIC SPORTS
- UNSURPASSED FOOD AND ENTERTAINMENT

Gala July 4th week-end Low Rates
July-August Rates from $32.50

N. Y. Office: 116 Nassau St. BEekman [illegible]

Carefree! Friendly! Informal!

LAKE CHODIKEE LODGE

HIGHLAND, N. Y.

Hampshire Players in Dramatic and Musical Repertoire. Adult Social and Athletic Activities. Lecture Forum. Private Lake.

JULY FOURTH WEEK-END
Friday Supper to Tuesday Breakfast $18.50

RATES 27.50 UP

N. Y. C. 1202 Kings Highway, B'klyn, ES. 5-4330

LIMES-LEMONS FOR SALE

Seedless Limes delivered prepaid $8.00 bushel, $4.25 half bushel, $2.25, 1/5 bushel. Lemons, $6.75 bushel, $3.75 half bushel. Oranges $4.00 bushel. A. H. Burket, Sebring, Fla.

RESORTS

4 DAYS of sports, fun, entertainment! A wonderful week-end

4TH of JULY

13.50

COOKS FALLS LODGE

COOKS FALLS, NEW YORK
N. Y. Office—250 W. 57th St.
Phone COlumbus 5-3690
RESERVE NOW!

CAMP LIVINGSTON

[illegible] Lake Sunset, Livingston Manor, N. Y.

An adult camp with all modern conveniences. Four handball courts, six tennis courts, water sports, horses. Golf nearby. Superb meals. Music and social staff under personal direction of Sol Posnack.

July 4th Week-end—$16.50
Friday supper, July 2, to Tuesday breakfast, July 6

Rates for July and August—$27.50 [illegible] week.
Mgt. SOL POSNACK and BEN LIPSCHUTZ
N. Y. Phone: TRiangle 5-0845
Camp: Livingston Manor 38 FS

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women

ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

QUEEN WHITE MOUNTAIN LAKES

All Modern Camp Features
Sports . . . Dancing . . . Entertainment
Excellent Cuisine
New Low [illegible] $25.00-$27.50-$30.00
Write for Booklet
Mrs. Sadie Brickman, [illegible]
WOLFEBORO NEW HAMPSHIRE

ONE OF THE BETTER RESORTS

Pauls

SWAN LAKE, N.Y.

---

7 OAKS

EATONTOWN NEW JERSEY

Get away from [illegible] all with a vengeance. Secluded camp lost in the pines. Tennis and swimming. Charming comfortable house. Limited to 20. Fare 80c (Red Bank Station).
Weekly $14—Week-end $2.50 per day
HARRY KATZ (N. Y. Office)
354 West 18th St. BRyant 9-7617

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE
Pleasant Valley, N. Y., Dutchess Co.
An ideal place for rest. Beautiful surroundings. Wholesome food. Modern conveniences. Tennis, bathing, fishing, rowing. RATE $18 in June.
Louis Sakow Pleasant Valley 2741

RIVERSIDE INN on Lake Housatonic. Swimming, boating. 1¾ hours from New York. July 4 week-end $3.50 per day. $19 weekly. Station Derby. P. O. Seymour, Conn. Tel. Derby 598-12.

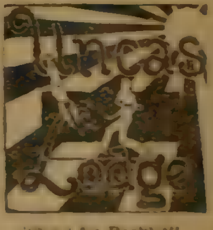
Garnerville, N. Y. Ramapo Mountains. Relax at cozy inn 30 miles from New York. Home cooking, fruit orchard, garden. Swimming, Tennis, Golf, within walking distance. $18 weekly. Write Clement Bernstein.

FEW GUESTS, Berkshire Foothills, 200 acres. Excellent meals: Restful, Quiet; Modern Conveniences; Fishing, Swimming; $20 Week, $3.50 Day. Mrs. Gardner, Ancramdale, Columbia County, N. Y.

RESORTS

UNCAS LODGE

UNCASVILLE, CONN.



"Send for Booklet"

A charming, unpretentious modern adult camp and 165-acre New England farm. An ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.

- Private Twin Lakes
- 3 Clay Tennis Courts
- Saddle Horses and Golf
- 4 Ping-Pong Tables
- Unexcelled Cuisine
- Dancing to a Fine Orchestra

JULY RATE $24.50 PER WEEK
$4.00 per day

Phone: PResident [illegible]

STAR LAKE CAMP

in the glorious Adirondacks between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleas[illegible] playground for adults. [illegible] feet elevation and right on the Lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Swimming, Canoeing, Handball, Baseball; Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Delicious wholesome meals that pep up the appetite. Rates $22.50 weekly.

Send for Booklet

New York Office:
116 Nassau St., Room 802a
BEekman 3-6345

THE BILTMORE FIFTH AVENUE ASBURY PARK, N. J.

Telephone Asbury Park 1456—Max Finn

A HOME-LIKE RESORT IN AN IDEAL SETTING—ON BEAUTIFUL SUNSET LAKE—Just a stone's throw from Boardwalk and Beach.

Nineteen years of successful operation attest to the excellence of [illegible] Biltmore's [illegible] [illegible] service—Moderate rates—Write or telephone for reservations.

VACATION AT

VALLEY DUDE RANCH

Where East goes Western. Ideal horseback riding. Swimming, tennis, handball, social activities. Comfortable cabins. Write for Booklet. GLENN STERN, VALLEY DUDE RANCH, Wallpack Center, N. J.

86 MILES FROM NEW YORK

IT'S DIFFERENT . . . Charming is the word for Artemis. If [illegible] [illegible] beauty, solitude, [illegible] sports; good food and fun—Come! $25 weekly. Couples special. Write: ARTEMIS, Brewster, N. Y., or phone: Brewster 555F5. Management: Rogers.

SPERLINGS LILAC LODGE
In Rockland County
The Most Beautiful Place for your vacation. Dietary laws observed. Tennis, Handball Courts.
Moderate prices for July 4th
West Nyack, N. Y. Tel. Nanuet 409

VINEYARD LODGE

Ulster Park, N. Y.
"Garden spot of Ulster County"

Where peace and tranquillity reign supreme. Modern hotel midst beautiful orchard, vineyards and woodland. All sports, solariums, swimming, social activities. Rates $16 up. J. Rosenthal, Kingston 3430.

Hillcrest Lodge among the Watchung Mts. 25 minutes by train, 50 by car. C. C. of New Jersey, commutation reasonable. Golf, tennis, swimming, handball.
Plainfield, N. J. Millington 364

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL
37 MINUTES TIMES SQUARE
MAKE THIS YOUR SUMMER HOME
Recreational Facilities. Solarium. Singles $8 [illegible]
SHeepshead 3-3000

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks. One mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, badminton, swimming and canoeing. Cabins. Guests met at Lake George. $20.00 and $21.00. Tel. 27-F-12. R. J. Venton,

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 10, 1937 NUMBER 2

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 29

EDITORIALS:

MAP OF TODAY:

THE UNITED STATES 31
EUROPE 33
THE NEW DEAL FIGHTS FOR ITS LIFE by Robert S. Allen 35
O LITTLE TOWN OF BETHLEHEM by Allen Grobin 37
JAPAN'S DILEMMA by Eliot Janeway 39
JACK RAPER, CLEVELAND'S BEST CITIZEN by Louis Adamic 42
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 46
BROUN'S PAGE 47

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

HISTORY IN SWING RHYTHM by Sidney Hook 48
GAUGUIN: A FAMILY PORTRAIT by Meyer Schapiro 50
FASCISM: ANALYSIS AND APOLOGY by Ludwig Lore 50
THE PROFESSORS' NOVELIST by Harry Levin 51
FILMS: HARPO & CO. by Mark Van Doren 53

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER
Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
Editorial Associates
HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

*

GOVERNMENT BY FILIBUSTER SEEMS TO BE the aim of Senator Wheeler's much-vaunted passion for democracy. The Administration is finally presenting Senator Logan's compromise court proposal for debate, but the Wheeler die-hards threaten to talk until hell freezes over rather than permit one seventy-five-year judge per year to be retired. The decision to filibuster means, of course, that the opposition can now count noses accurately enough to count a majority of the Senate in favor of the bill. It is therefore appealing from rule by ballot to rule by lung power—strange tactics for those whose every other word is "democracy." The Senate rules unfortunately permit them to stifle court reform by talk. But we are certain that mass opinion will not permit them, and that many a filibustering Senator will drag his feet wearily from the Senate chamber to his office only to find from letters and telegrams that he has constituency trouble back home. "You cannot filibuster a reasonable proposition," remarked an Administration leader.

*

SENATOR WAGNER IS PLAYING HAMLET TO Tammany as we go to press. To be or not to be a candidate for the New York City mayoralty—that is his question. There can be no doubt that Tammany, and perhaps Mr. Farley as well, is exerting intense pressure upon him to run. If he does it will be a shameful sacrifice to the Moloch of machine politics. For, while we have had our reservations about some of Mayor La Guardia's mercurial traits, he has come close to blasting Tammany out of existence by the dynamite of sheer work done, money saved, corruption minimized. He has broken the Tammany hold upon the voters by the most deadly kind of propaganda—the propaganda of the deed. But Senator Wagner, with his sponsorship of the labor measures which have made his name a household word among masses of people in New York, might easily prove victor running on a Tammany ticket. There is an irony in the plight of both the Republicans and Democrats in New York over La Guardia's campaign. But it would be tragic if Senator Wagner lent his name and aid to Tammany's purposes. For Tammany values his progressivism only in order to swap it for votes. It is appealing openly to Wagner to do his duty as an "organization man." His acceptance would gladden not only the Tammany machine but Jim Farley as well, as it would help heal the Tammany-New Deal rift. But for the people as a whole it would be a misfortune. Mr. Wagner's place in the Senate is unique, and no one else could fill it with his prestige and sense of balance. More important, the return of Tammany to power would set back New York politics a generation.

* * *

THE DEADLOCK OVER NON-INTERVENTION in Spain remains unbroken as we go to press. For the first time since the outbreak of the Spanish insurrection, nearly a year ago, the democratic countries seem to have taken a firm stand against the fascist powers. Their stand is the more impressive in that it is not motivated primarily by humanitarian considerations. Hitler's frank statement regarding Germany's need for Spanish iron-ore has provoked a sharp change in attitude among conservatives in both France and England. If we are to judge by Eden's speech at Warwickshire, England has finally discovered that it is to its interest to preserve the "territorial integrity of Spain," and that a victory for Franco, involving concessions to Italy and Germany, would threaten the life-line of the empire in the Mediterranean. It is reported to be successfully lining up Portugal in opposition to Germany's and Italy's economic aspirations in Spain. The democratic countries have the whip hand if they choose to use it. France could easily outdo Germany and Italy in arms shipments. But rather than utilize the weapon at hand, there is a strong possibility that England will seek a direct agreement with Franco repudiating German and Italian claims. A few weeks ago this would have been relatively easy, as Franco is known to desire such an arrangement. But with the prestige of both Hitler and Mussolini openly staked not only on a fascist victory but on obtaining important economic concessions, the possibility of an early solution appears remote.

* * *

THE AMUR RIVER CLASH, ENDED BY THE withdrawal of Soviet troops from the disputed islands, is explicable only as an attempt by Japan to test Soviet strength. It is significant that practically all the stories of the incident came from Tokyo, and in contrast with the excitement of the Japanese press the Soviet papers scarcely mentioned the incident. Legally, the islands, which are little more than sandbars, probably belong to Russia under an 1860 agreement with China. Certainly they do not belong to Japan, which has no territory nearer than Korea. Japan's claim, of course, has been made in behalf of Manchukuo; and Manchukuo's rights, if they be granted any validity at all, can only rest on China's treaty obligations. If China has contested the Soviet Union's claim, no mention has been made of the fact. But whatever legal or actual rights are involved it is doubtful whether Japan would dare risk an attack at this season. Each year, during late summer and fall, Manchurian patriotic organizations, bandits, and small bands of Communists make use of the cover afforded by the vast fields of kaoliang to launch attacks on Japanese outposts and lines of communication. Recent reports indicate that these illegal groups are more numerous and powerful than ever before. Nor are conditions in China as calm as they appear on the surface. The puppet government at Peiping has recently shown signs of restiveness, and a war between Japan and the Soviet Union might see China, officially or unofficially, on the side of the Soviets.

* * *

THE NAZI CAMPAIGN AGAINST FREEDOM, culture, and religion was advanced in the past week by a series of dramatic incidents. Speaking before the foreign scholars and scientists assembled for the two hundredth anniversary of Göttingen University, Bernhard Rust, German Minister of Education, denounced democratic freedom as a hiding place for "demons." He declared that in the end individual liberty could only lead to a "decay of national states" and "cruel dictatorship." On the following day there was an illuminating lecture on the relationship between science and war, the central theme of which was the desirability of preserving scientific secrets until the outbreak of war so as to wreak greater destruction on the enemy. As if to emphasize Rust's remarks on freedom the National Socialist government issued a decree placing the finances of the Protestant churches under its control and assuming direction of the forthcoming church elections. It followed this action by arresting Martin Niemöller, who has earned the reputation of being the most outspoken opponent in Germany of the religious absolutism of National Socialism. In the past the anti-religious campaign has tended to quiet down during the tourist season; the fact that it is being intensified just now may signify an even more vigorous opposition than is indicated in the censored press reports.

* * *

> . . . The C. I. O. and its powerful affiliate the United Automobile Workers of America . . . have traveled a merry and irresponsible course, browbeating employers and non-union employees, terrifying politicians, and inconveniencing whole counties to satisfy the whims of small minorities.

> . . . The advance of the C. I. O. has been accomplished with a minimum of conflict and industrial disorder. . . . Among the heads of the big steel companies here there is no concern about the "responsibility" of the union.

THESE SHARPLY CONTRASTED OPINIONS ARE not, as one might think, those of Mr. Girdler and Mr. Lewis. They are the words of one and the same man—F. Raymond Daniell. The first was culled from the first page of the New York Times of June 29 and the second from the fourth page of the Times of July 2. In their apparent inconsistency is revealed the real responsibility for the waves of violence and threats of violence that have rolled over Illinois, Michigan, and Ohio in the past few weeks. In the first quotation Mr. Daniell was speaking, possibly a little loosely, about conditions in Michigan; in the second about the section in and around Pittsburgh. The difference has in fact been sensational. In the article of July 2 Mr. Daniell explains it. The lack of disorder in the Pittsburgh region, he stated, "was due largely to the voluntary action of Myron S. Taylor of United States Steel in coming to terms with Mr. Lewis and to the action of Horace Edgar Lewis, chairman of the board of Jones and Laughlin, in signing up with S. W. O. C. after that organization had demonstrated in a consent election that it represented a clear majority of employees eligible for membership." Mr. Daniell might have stated with equal truth (but did not) that the violence and disorder in Illinois, Michigan, and Ohio have been due to the action of Messrs. Girdler, Purnell, and Sykes in refusing to deal with the C. I. O. under any circumstances. To their objection to a signed agreement Mr. Daniell's article of July 2 gives the perfect answer: "One industrialist said today that if the person he was dealing with were irresponsible he would rather have a written contract with him than an oral one."

*

THE UNDERGROUND PAPER OF THE GERMAN seamen tells an amazing story of an almost successful revolt on the German cruiser, the Königsberg. The cruiser, loaded with arms for Franco, was steaming toward Cadiz. An anti-Hitler committee among the seamen had done such excellent work in educating the crew as to the meaning of Hitler's aid to Franco that plans had actually been laid for taking over the command from the officers and delivering the cruiser to the Loyalist forces. In the Bay of Biscay, however, the plot was betrayed, and thirty of the men were executed. The incident, if true, shows that in the long run the Hitler regime will be only as strong as its capacity to suppress the truth.

ED PARKER IS TWENTY-ONE. HE HAS GROWN up in the labor movement as worker and union organizer. Recently he has been representing the Workers' Alliance. Early last spring when the Mississippi went on a rampage 800 WPA workers in Cairo, Illinois, most of them colored, worked night and day to keep Old Man River in his own tracks. Cairo was saved from the flood, though Cairo needs to be saved from things worse than floods. It is a stopping place for colored people migrating north, a town of transients and of those who prey on transients. Race prejudice is strong. There were no unions in Cairo until Ed Parker came to town and organized WPA workers into a local of the Workers' Alliance. They had a rather serious grievance—in that they had not received the pay promised them—and Ed Parker decided on a demonstration. The sequence was a march to relief headquarters and occupation of the place, which was deserted; a routing of the occupiers with casualties; and later the indictment of Ed Parker and several of his followers on half a dozen serious charges. Next Monday Ed Parker must appear in the Cairo court to answer to charges for which the penalties, added up, would amount to life imprisonment. Ed Parker feels sure the Cairo court will add up the penalties and send him to jail. But he is needed outside; and he can be kept outside with proper aid. The Workers' Defense League, which is handling the case, needs money; good coverage by nationally known newspapers would be useful. Help if you can.

Map of Today

The United States

EIGHTEEN months ago we wrote in these columns: "History will probably record that in 1935 the giant of American mass-production labor woke up, ripped off the tight but puny bindings of craft unionism, and started going places." Today that cautious journalistic "probably" looks foolish, yet it serves to recall the suddenness with which the giant rose and the speed with which, since then, he has been striding from factory to factory; in conjunction with the ancient word history, it provokes sober reflections at a time when the Committee for Industrial Organization is passing through its first major crisis. In 1935 the end of all striving was to get the giant on his feet. In 1937 the questions of where he is going, how far, and by what road have become burning questions for those who feel that an organized working class, conscious of its real strength and ready to use it, is the only concrete hope of saving civilization from the black death of fascism.

It is a commonplace that fascism rides into power on the back of a deluded middle class. In this country, as in most others, this group, though its economic power has been largely drawn off by the powerful suction of monopoly, is still dominated psychologically by a wishful illusion of ownership—which can be turned with dangerous ease into the delusion that its interests lie with the very owners who have stripped or will eventually strip it. Add to this the further phenomenon that this psychology also dominates large sections of the American working class and the problem becomes all the more complex and dangerous.

It is apparent to the naked eye that in the present skirmish the major stake between the C. I. O. and industry, from the long point of view, is middle-class opinion. That this is merely the opening skirmish is also clear, for the C. I. O. has just begun its task of organizing the unorganized. It is in the light of this fact too that we must consider—and estimate—the resistance to the C. I. O. that is rising from every quarter of ownership, and from the beneficiaries and the servants of ownership, in support of the truculent Girdler and his Grace of Bethlehem. When Senator Ellender of Louisiana rises to accuse the C. I. O. of "enslaving us"—as a New York Times headline so tragically puts it—he speaks as the mouthpiece of those who themselves hold the South enslaved and see their power menaced by T. W. O. C. and S. W. O. C.—and a million union buttons that bloom where only docility and surplus value grew before. Senator Ellender in fact described more frankly than usual the nightmare which obsesses ownership.

> The so-called C. I. O. and its organizers [he said] are bending every effort to incorporate under their banner every form of labor in this country. . . . Such a stupendous organization of workers could paralyze industry overnight. . . .

And Senator Ellender, lashing out against this threat to himself and his masters, appeals to the powerful middle-class ideals of democracy and "free government." In this he follows the cue of the executives and the servants of little steel, whose aim is to enlist the support of the middle-class mind that is the American mind.

The aim is shrewd; and little steel's methods are quite as shrewd. With instinctive cunning, born of the realization that the C. I. O. is a threat to their power, they invoke the "right to work"—on which they can put a quite different interpretation when the issue revolves about government relief; and the monolithic corporation talks loudly to the workers about your right to do as you please and my right to do as I please. On the side it hires agents provocateurs of violence, and talks about the "irresponsibility" of unions; it screams "labor dictatorship!" and guides the pens of editors into channels of "law and order" while it cuts off credit at strategic places.

And what of the C. I. O. in this as yet unequal contest? In a sense the C. I. O.'s worst present handicap is its past success. It won a relatively easy victory in automobiles. The automobile settlement was quickly followed by the capitulation of United States Steel which, coming without the tempering influence of a struggle to match the magnitude of the conquest, could not but produce overconfidence, if not among the leaders, at least among the rank and file. It certainly increased the flow of workers into the C. I. O. which put a strain upon the organizational capacities of the committee that has shown itself in such occurrences as spontaneous stoppages and the Saginaw Valley power strike. These events have been used to good advantage against the unions. The position of little steel in relation to the middle class was further improved by the fact that the fight has revolved not about hours and wages but about the intangible and essentially political issue of union recognition.

As it turned out, little steel has not fared so well in its actual exploitation of its advantage. The average American is well equipped to understand the psychology as well as the law of contracts—and can recognize an unsigned contract for the anomaly it is in a business civilization. In addition, ownership has patently overplayed its hand and, most fortunately, the Administration in its various capacities has helped to dramatize the fact in entirely legal and democratic terms. Tom Girdler, the Mayor of Johnstown, and the Chicago police have convicted themselves in public. Miss Perkins's testimonial that the leaders of the C. I. O. concerned in the steel drive have a long record of responsibility, Jim Farley's self-defending reply on the mails issue that Republic Steel is merely trying to provoke "civil disorder and strife," the NLRB's cogent and cool arguments in regard to contracts, and Senator La Follette's magnificent cross-examination of the Chicago policemen with the help of the non-partisan testimony of moving-picture cameras—all these factors seem, as we write, to have saved a situation, as far as public opinion is concerned, which a week ago looked very serious. We are speaking here of the long-range effects, not of the immediate strike, whose outcome is by no means clear as yet.

One thing, however, is very clear: the great continuing task of the C. I. O. and of its intellectual allies is to enlist the support of the middle class, in the interests of both. The middle class must be made to realize that what is to Senator Ellender a threat is to them the only promise, economic and moral.

Unfortunately, the C. I. O., thanks to the nature of its leadership and the complex of conditions, historic and contemporary, out of which it springs, has nothing resembling the social outlook or the ideological equipment which the task we have outlined requires. It does have, in the millions of workers now turning toward it, the material with which to fashion a powerful weapon against reaction. Merely to state the task ahead is to realize its magnitude. Yet somehow the C. I. O. must assume one responsibility which ownership does not wish it to carry. It must formulate social as well as merely trade-union aims. It must enlist the middle class as its firm ally. The new labor movement will inscribe the word democracy on its banners; it must build up within its ranks the strength and the informed intelligence to make and keep democracy a fact.

THE PROGRAM IN CONGRESS

If a new order is being forged in America it is clearly not being forged in Congress. In fact, nothing could illustrate better the enormous gap between the social potentialities of the labor movement and the paralysis of old-line American politics than the contrast that is being offered by the C. I. O. and Congress. A miasmic fog seems to have settled down upon Capitol Hill. The present Congress has done nothing with greater intensity and strain than any previous Congress in our memory.

Look at its record. The court bill is tied up in so many knots that it is doubtful whether the sharpest sword the President can wield will cut them successfully. Even with the plan for setting the retiring age at seventy-five instead of seventy, and adding only one judge a year, there is talk of filibustering the bill through the summer. Second, the plan for reorganizing the government departments and bureaus faces a stiff fight. The opposition to it is valid in so far as it is directed against the provision for bringing all the independent commissions under departmental roofs. But most of it comes from the vested office-holding interests, whose hand has now been strengthened by the eager enemies of the court plan. Third, the Black-Connery wages-and-hours bill has an extremely hazy future. The real drive in Congress is not to move forward to this sort of bill, which represents a real advance, but backward from the Wagner Act. To distract attention from wages and hours and harass the Administration, the bi-party conservative bloc is pushing Senator Vandenberg's proposal for rewriting the Wagner Act. Fourth, prospects are dark even for the farm bills. Crop insurance and soil conservation funds are either too meager to be very effective or are jammed; the farm-tenancy program now proposed is, in Secretary Wallace's words, "less than half a drop in the bucket"; and it is doubtful that much will be salvaged from Mr. Wallace's ever-normal granary proposal, even through desperate Administration efforts. Fifth, the program for setting up a group of eight regional T. V. A.'s has not yet made much progress against the bitter opposition of the utilities. Sixth, the forces that have been hoping for something like an adequate housing measure are now pretty close to despair. And so through the whole list—the adoption of a tragically inadequate relief bill, the failure to do anything with the Nye program for munitions control, the synthetic storm that is being brewed over the plan to stop up the loopholes in the income-tax laws.

One wonders, from this record of inaction and sabotage, whether Congress may not be planning to secede from the Union. Much has been written about the maneuvering of Congressional groups, the petty hates and rivalries of the leaders, and the tactics of the President. But the fact is that the present turmoil in Congress is not to be seen as merely a revolt against Mr. Roosevelt. It is, as Robert S. Allen states elsewhere in this issue, a desperate attempt to scrap the New Deal. It is, looking toward 1940, an attempt to head off a movement which would result in a powerful and effective fusion of the left-wing Democrats and the newly organized labor forces. It is, ultimately, a confession of the complete failure of Congress and the party system to register the deeper currents of today.

PARTY ALIGNMENT

It is idle for Democrats to deny that a split is opening in the Democratic Party; but it is equally foolish for Republicans to rejoice at it. The split is there, and it only confuses matters to call it a sectional one. The Southern states, being backward economically, tend to produce more reactionaries per square mile than some of the other states. But remember that Senator Black of Alabama, Senator Pepper of Florida, and Congressman Maverick of Texas are fighting on the side of the President, while Senator Burke of Nebraska, Senator McCarran of Nevada, and Senator Copeland of New York are fighting against him.

The real split is one of economic program and progressive temper. However vague the New Deal is, it marks a sharp advance toward the control of business enterprise. It would be naive to imagine that such an advance could take place without a bitter clash verging on civil war. Civil war has broken out sporadically in the strike areas; but it is also going on, more silently, on the political front. The court proposal has been useful as a sort of yardstick for measuring the breadth and sincerity of progressivism among the Democrats in Congress. But an even better yardstick will be available when the inevitable attempts are made to scrap or whittle away the Wagner Act. The real split, in short, is not between Congress and the President. It is between reactionaries and progressives. It is, most significantly, between the bi-party reactionary group in Congress and the majority of the people outside.

That is why the Republicans should not be too hasty in their rejoicing. As Mr. Allen points out, it would be a courageous Democratic rebel who would carry his rebellion to the polls in 1940. But even more crucial is the fact that the forces that are tending to split the Democrats are also paralyzing the Republicans. A party in power, especially if it comes in by a landslide, tends always to divide into groups; while a party in opposition is united by a common hatred and a common greed for office. But the Republican opposition is as much at sea on basic issues of strategy and policy as it was during the campaign. There are two Republican views. One urges that the President has moved so far to the left that there is room somewhere in the center for the Republican program. The other, scorning any centrist "liberalism," sees the future as lying with outright conservatism. The first would run a man of the stamp of Charles P. Taft; the second a man like Senator Vandenberg, or someone even more reactionary. Thus the Republicans find themselves confronting the same dilemma that bewildered them in the last campaign.

It is not hard to map the choice they will be forced to make. The issues of today are bitter issues, and public opinion proceeds from hysteria to hysteria. Mr. Roosevelt, who has an instinct for the economic drift beyond that of most presidents, seems willing to have his party cleanse itself of its reactionaries. The Republicans, slower in their historical perceptions, will eventually be forced to rid themselves of their liberals. The campaign of 1940 will see an even sharper cleavage than that of 1936. National politics today, with its roots in the labor struggle, is reaching out toward 1940.

Europe

A FEW weeks ago the specter of war which had hung over Europe for the past two years seemed at last to have been dissipated. The non-intervention patrol had been thrown around Spain; Italy had agreed to a withdrawal of foreign "volunteers," and it appeared possible that the Spanish revolt would crumble for lack of support. The German-Italian offensive in Central Europe had struck a snag in Austria. France had taken steps to reassert its interest in Danubian affairs. In the Far East a still calm had settled over China and Japan after nearly six years of almost constant turmoil. With the outstanding issues settled between Japan and the Soviet Union, incidents along the Soviet-Manchurian border had become a rarity. It was generally believed that the new Japanese government would hold the militarists more closely in check than any which had held office since 1931.

The shelling of Almeria came as a rude shock to the complacency of the democratic countries, but the ease with which the incident was settled was generally taken as evidence that every one was desirous of avoiding war. Germany and Italy were drawn back into the non-intervention patrol. Once more there was talk of withdrawing foreign "volunteers." Then almost without warning, the smoke screen with which the fascist powers had masked their intentions was swept away. Under the pretense of an alleged attack on the cruiser Leipzig, Germany and Italy again withdrew from the non-intervention patrol, announcing bluntly that they intended to see Franco through to the bitter end. Spurred by the fall of Bilbao, they refused to permit France and England to take up the duties of the non-intervention patrol which they had repudiated, thus assuring the demise of that unhappy experiment. At this point Japan suddenly announced excitedly that the Soviet Union had "invaded" a sandbar in the Amur River which, though under dispute, was claimed as Manchurian territory. Although scores of pitched battles had been fought along this frontier during the past few years without serious consequences, this incident was momentarily magnified into a grave controversy.

Obviously it is no accident that Germany, Italy, and then Japan simultaneously cast aside their sheeps' clothing. They have decided that the present is an unusually propitious moment to take the offensive. Greece, Yugoslavia, and, to a lesser extent, Rumania, are under fascist influence. Poland is linked to Rumania in an anti-Communist pact. China is relatively quiescent. The Spanish Loyalists are once more on the defensive, seriously weakened by the fall of Bilbao. France is struggling with financial difficulties which may have political repercussions. Britain considers itself still inadequately armed. And most significant of all, the Soviet Union is enmeshed in a political crisis which, in the eyes of most of the press and many of the statesmen of Western Europe, has temporarily eclipsed it as a major military power.

RUSSIA AND FRANCE

The executions of last fall and winter were profoundly disturbing in themselves and because of the evidence they provided of crucial and irreconcilable cleavage within the revolutionary movement. But they could not be taken as proof of economic or military weakness. In both respects the Soviet Union appeared stronger than ever before. The recent execution of eight Red Army leaders, on the other hand, followed by arrests in all sections of the country, indicates that disaffection is more general than had previously been known. The army has ordinarily been above factional political strife. The charges on which the generals were tried and executed suggest either the growth of a military clique with political aspirations, a conflict over domestic policy so intense that it is reflected in the armed forces, or an actual plot to aid the Nazis in their threatened aggression against Soviet territory. The fascist powers appear to be basing much of their policy on the supposition that Russia has been fundamentally weakened. This view is supported by Harold Denny's series of articles in the New York Times describing the effect of the purge on the morale and efficiency of functionaries and workers alike and reporting a slackening in industrial progress. On the other hand, the German newspaper correspondents in Moscow are reported to believe that the Red Army is basically strong, while G. E. R. Gedye quotes two high Czecho-Slovakian officials as expressing relief that the previously known connections between certain high Soviet commanders and the German general staff have at last been severed.

In the case of France, Hitler seems definitely to have counted on serious political and economic instability in connection with the fall of the Blum government. In this he was clearly mistaken. While Chautemps does not have as dependable left support as was accorded Blum, he is far more acceptable to the conservative interests whose backing would be essential in case of war. And it is these groups that are most likely to be aroused by Hitler's open admission of his economic aspirations in Spain. The granting of emergency powers to Georges Bonnet, the new Finance Minister, and the new devaluation of the franc have forestalled the immediate danger of financial crisis and left France in what appears to be a stronger position than at any time in the past five years.

THE CHANCES OF WAR

In a situation as tense as the present one, the possibility of immediate war cannot be wholly ruled out. Although the Japanese army may have decided that this is not the moment to launch its long-planned drive against the Soviet Union, an attempt by Germany and Italy to impose a blockade on the Spanish republic might easily lead to hostilities. It is an open question whether this could occur without involving England and France in defense of their imperial interests. But the chances are still overwhelmingly against an early conflict. On unnumbered previous occasions the fascist countries have launched a major diplomatic offensive at a time when the democratic countries were preoccupied with other affairs. Yet they have shown uncanny agility in avoiding wars with other than third-rate nations. And for this there is an excellent reason. None of the fascist countries is strong enough to engage in a protracted war with a leading power. Germany, Italy, and Japan are all short of foodstuffs and basic raw materials. Nor have they sufficient gold or foreign exchange to purchase supplies from abroad on a wartime scale.

The one factor which might encourage Hitler or Mussolini to launch an attack would be the assurance that Great Britain would not enter the conflict. If the war started in the Far East, it is conceivable that Germany might confine its assistance, as in the Spanish insurrection, to underground aid. But it is one thing to localize a civil war in an undeveloped country like Spain, and another to prevent a major conflict in the Far East from involving the other powers with interests in that area. Any leanings that the new Chamberlain Cabinet may have toward collaboration with the Third Reich would probably vanish if it appeared that, through German and Italian aid, the Japanese were about to expand still further their Far Eastern interests. If further pressure were needed to line Britain definitely against the fascist powers, it would undoubtedly be brought to bear by France. Although France is not committed under the Franco-Soviet agreement to aid Russia in the event of attack by Japan, it could scarcely stand by and watch its most powerful European ally overrun by a combination of fascist forces. The renewed firmness exhibited by Britain in refusing to grant belligerent status to the Spanish rebels at the request of Germany and Italy suggests that it is inclined to abandon conciliatory tactics in dealing with fascist aggression. If this firmness could be depended upon in the negotiations of the coming weeks there would be no fear of immediate war.

The New Deal Fights for Its Life

BY ROBERT S. ALLEN

Washington, June 29

NUMEROUS articles and news stories have appeared in the press of late about a looming split in the Democratic Party. The basis of these reports has been the President's difficulties in putting his legislative program through Congress. To the political pundits and oracles (known variously in the press gallery as "thumbsuckers" and "navel gazers") this situation has afforded almost limitless opportunities for conjuring up all sorts of wild theories, ranging from a break-up of Democratic ranks to a new realignment of parties.

There is plenty of open and covert opposition to the President's policies on the part of certain Democratic Senators and Congressmen. But there is no split in the party nor talk of one. Not one of the dissidents has taken a walk or threatened to do so. They don't dare bolt. It would be political suicide for them. With a few exceptions—Burke of Nebraska, Copeland of New York, Adams of Colorado, King of Utah, McCarran of Nevada—the anti-Administrationites are Southerners who remember very vividly what befell the Hoovercrats for jumping the traces in 1928. It was significant that in the 1936 campaign not one Southern officeholder or candidate, including the ineffable Gene Talmadge, bolted the party reservation. The hostile Northerners and Westerners also are not sticking out their necks by going off the party reservation. Practically every one of them was very careful to be on hand at the Jefferson Island love feast. Mr. Roosevelt's policies may anguish their reactionary souls, but they are keeping a tight clutch on the Democratic label—and the President's coattails. It is their only hope of reelection next year.

If there was a split or early likelihood of one, the situation would be much more cheerful. The best thing that could happen to the Democratic Party and the President would be for the reactionary cabal to follow the example of Al Smith, Jim Reed, and the other 1936 bolters and take a walk. It would clear the atmosphere immeasurably and greatly strengthen Roosevelt's hand in dealing with Congress. He would then be able to disregard the pressure of the dissidents and treat them as the enemies they are. But bitterly as they hate him and his proposals, they are giving him no such opportunity. Their aim is not to smash the Democratic Party but to capture it.

Behind the sniping and sabotaging of the Southern die-hards and their Northern and Western allies is a two-fold objective: (1) to put a halt to further liberal economic and social legislation, (2) to wrest dominance of the party from Roosevelt and dictate the Presidential nominee in 1940. That is what all the shouting on the Potomac really is about. The Old Guard is after the scalp of the New Deal and not of the Democratic Party. It wants to undermine the Administration so as to prepare the ground for a "safe" standard-bearer in 1940; someone of the type of Missouri's demagogic Senator Bennett Clark or Paul (Social Precedence) McNutt. It is possible that two years from now if the conspirators are unable to get their way, some of them may take a walk. But at present that is farthest from their thoughts. They are after bigger—and safer—game. In this momentous undercover struggle the President has aligned against him most of the Democratic leaders of Congress. With a few exceptions these men are Southerners of long service who owe their powerful places wholly to the rule of seniority. Head man of the cabal, up to his recent departure, was Vice-President Jack Garner. The crafty Texan makes a great show publicly about his devotion and loyalty to the President—"my Boss." But behind the scenes he has wielded a murderous axe. It was Garner who conceived the idea of attaching an anti-sitdown rider to the Guffey coal bill in order to force Roosevelt's hand on the strike issue. The Southern clique, fearing the C. I. O. organization drive in the textile mills, tried to persuade the President to declare against the sitdown tactic. He refused, whereupon Garner, who is bitterly anti-labor, cooked up the scheme to compel Roosevelt to take a stand by inserting an anti-sitdown amendment in the Guffey bill that was certain to pass and go to the White House for signature. The attack was beaten off, but only after strenuous battling. It was Garner also who early in May began agitating for a hurry-up adjournment and the shelving of the President's entire legislative program, including the Supreme Court reorganization bill. His failure to get anywhere with this maneuver was the cause of his sudden decision that he needed a rest cure on his cool Uvalde veranda. As far as the White House is concerned, if he returns in January it will be too soon.

Except for patronage finagling, Garner did not meddle in Administration affairs during Roosevelt's first term. But during the past winter and spring he secretly had his hands in every issue. Although he did not stay for the Senate fight on the relief bill he did a lot of agitating for a slash in the appropriation. He also raged against the wage-hour regulation bill and buried the knife deep in the back of the President's government reorganization plan. Among his cronies he repeatedly urged the need to organize in order to prevent the nomination of a liberal in 1940. Personally Garner has no political power, but in his position as Vice-President he can, and it is now clearly apparent he will, fight against the President's liberal policies and their continuance.

Senate Floor Leader Joe Robinson picked up where Garner left off. The bulky, trigger-tempered Arkansan has never been sympathetic to the New Deal and on more than one occasion has quietly knifed the White House. An example of this was his action in the closing hours of the 1936 session, when despite a personal request from the President that Congress be kept in session until the Senate had concurred in the Guffey coal bill, previously approved by the House, Robinson a few minutes later rose on the Senate floor and moved adjournment. In the first year of the Administration there was considerable undercover talk about displacing Robinson as floor leader. He was widely unpopular because of his surly temper and high-handedness. He could have been ousted, but it would have entailed a fight, and Roosevelt, although he was warned that he would regret it, backed away from the distasteful job. This session, with his reactionary fellow Southerners aggressively on the offensive, he has played in with them hand in glove. Not even his itching ambition to go to the Supreme Court has kept him from attacking White House measures.

In the relief fight he rushed to the succor of the Old Guard cabal when they faced defeat in their attempt to riddle the bill with the Byrnes amendment requiring a 40 per cent contribution from cities and states. The present average ratio is less than 10 per cent. A 40 per cent restriction would have had the effect of holding down relief outlays to around $750,000,000. The reactionaries in control of the Appropriations Committee were able to load down the measure with the Byrnes rider. But in the open, on the floor of the Senate, it quickly became apparent that the scheme had no chance. It was at this point that Robinson galloped to the rescue. Without a word of warning to the President, and giving the impression he was offering an Administration compromise, he proposed a 25 per cent requirement. It took nearly a week of circuitous and delicate maneuvering to undo Joe's sabotage. He also strove strenuously to persuade the President to shelve his legislative program and wind up the session. When Roosevelt turned thumbs down on the idea, Robinson countered with a proposal that the program be limited to the court measure. Roosevelt, however, has persisted in insisting on his full program. Whether he can keep Robinson and the other sabotaging leaders on the job after the court issue has been disposed of remains to be seen. It will take more vigorous whip-cracking than Roosevelt has displayed so far.

At the moment Joe is busy giving indirect aid and comfort to the foes of the court bill by a consistently defeatist attitude. In his conferences with the President on the issue he has constantly underestimated Administration strength and urged the acceptance of a compromise much more unfavorable than the situation actually warranted. The six-judge plan is dead, but the President has a great deal more strength in the Senate on the court issue than Joe will admit. The vicious adverse report of the Judiciary Committee with its personal attacks on the President, written, incidentally, by Borah and an American Bar Association lobbyist, boomeranged against the opposition. In fact, even some of the signers of the document are now explaining privately that they had not read it and were misled as to its contents. Also, an intimation from Roosevelt that he is prepared to throw the court issue into next year's Congressional elections has had a salutary effect on some of the fence-sitters. Facing difficult contests, they have no desire to add to their troubles by having this dynamite-loaded question injected into the campaign. With loyal floor leadership it is probable that a four-judge bill can be passed. As it is, the President not only has to fight the opposition seeking to prevent enactment of any kind of legislation but to prevent being sold short on a compromise by his own leaders. Roosevelt's hopes in the fight rest on first-termers, such as Schwellenbach of Washington, Minton of Indiana, Schwartz of Wyoming, and a few veterans such as Barkley of Kentucky and Hugo Black of Alabama. Robinson, Harrison, Byrnes will sell him out at every turn.

White House intimates assert that despite the barrage of "authoritative" reports that Robinson is a sure-fire bet for the Van Devanter vacancy on the Supreme Court his selection is by no means certain. They say the President has never discussed the matter with Joe. In any event, they declare, his hopes of getting on the bench depend entirely on what happens to the court bill. If it is defeated the President, they predict, will not name him. Joe is too old (he is 65) and too conservative to be the President's first appointee to the Court. However, if several additional justices are authorized it is not unlikely that Robinson will be one of those named. If he is, the sole reason will be Roosevelt's fear not to appoint him. Robinson unquestionably would bitterly and vengefully resent his rejection, and his Southern pals would be no less irate. They are, in fact, his only backers. The liberals to a man are against him. But the reactionaries are beating the drums for him lustily and muttering dire threats of revenge if the President doesn't come across. Senator Josiah Bailey, yawping foe of everything savoring of liberalism, remarked to newsmen, "If the President don't appoint Robinson he will not only lose his Senate leader but he will lose the Senate." The last part of the statement is untrue, but the first is very likely.

Liberal confidants of the President say he now realizes fully what he is up against in the legislative situation and is determined to wage a finish fight for his program if it takes the rest of the year. As evidence of his stiffened backbone they cite his firm stand against strong pressure during the Jefferson Island conferences to agree to an August 15 adjournment. Roosevelt told Robinson and the other leaders that he wanted his full program enacted. He also made it clear that any measure shelved would be renewed next year and if necessary made a campaign issue. On their part they made no promises, but it is significant that, since the powwow, talk of an early adjournment has quieted down. Whether the question will be raised again depends on how militant a front Roosevelt presents in the court fight. If he stands pat and refuses to be bluffed or stampeded there is every likelihood he will have his way on the other measures. If he weakens and runs he is all washed up, not only for this session but for the rest of his term. The court battle is more than a struggle over that particular legislation. It is the determining test of the remainder of his Administration—which will be made or broken in this struggle.

O Little Town of Bethlehem

BY ALLEN GROBIN

I HAVE watched a "back-to-work movement" in the steel strike sector. I never saw anything more phony. When I returned from Johnstown, Pennsylvania, I was surprised to find how inaccurate a picture even well-informed New Yorkers had of what was going on in the steel-mill towns, despite the thousands of words printed about the strike. Most of the people I talked with appeared to think that (a) Tom Girdler was the so-and-so back of it all; but none the less that (b) the steel workers themselves, many of them, wanted to go back to work rather than continue the strike. There are two things wrong with this picture: (a) and (b).

On the other hand I should not have been surprised, for Edward Levinson of the New York Post was one of the few newspapermen I met in the strike zone who knew what the score was and who told it with clarity —and he got thrown out of the Johnstown City Hall for being so smart. There may have been one or two others who were doing a good job; but those I met were covering the story as though it were ordinary police-court routine or a baseball game.

They were telling who, what, where, and when—day by day, as things occurred or when somebody issued a statement. But they were not telling (or, at least, their papers were not printing) the why and how; and here, as every intelligent reporter on the job knew, lay the meat of the story.

New York, however, knew more about the situation than Johnstown did. The farther one got from the strike zone the more fairly was the story presented. In the strike zone the local newspapers made no pretense of fairness. Typical examples were the two Johnstown papers, the morning Democrat and the evening Tribune. They fairly frothed at the mouth editorially and in their news columns. Both pictured the strike as revolution and the strikers as aliens and Communists.

Since the strikers had been reduced to primitive word-of-mouth as a means of communication, their side of the story was smothered under a thick blanket of distortion in the local press. As a result, the local strike-bound communities themselves had but the vaguest idea of what was going on. This, as it developed, was an important element in the set-up for the spurious "back-to-work movement" and for the dynamitings which loosed against the strikers a fury already carefully built up. Neither of these events would have occurred in Johnstown had its 70,000 inhabitants been told the truth.

The anti-strike campaign has been waged along two general lines. One objective was to break the morale of the steel workers; the other to turn the general public against the strike. The attempt to demoralize the strikers took two forms: propaganda to the effect that the strike was lost, that men were going back to work, and that the strikers had better come back too while they were still acceptable to the management; terrorization of pickets and the intimidation of their families. Public opinion was "coordinated" also in two ways: through propaganda by means of press, pulpit, general talk, and gossip; and through economic pressure. The economic pressure was terrific.

On June 15, five days after the strike broke out, five leaders of the vigilantes met with the two strike leaders, David Watkins and John W. Stephenson, at the Lutheran Church on Vine Street. S. H. Heckman, head of the Penn-Traffic Store, Johnstown's only department store, who was one of the organizers of the vigilante Citizens' Committee, told Watkins and Stephenson that "the business men of the Greater Johnstown area will absolutely refuse to permit the employees of the Bethlehem Steel Company to organize and bargain collectively with their employer, as such procedure would be harmful to our business." I have in my possession a stenographic report of that conference.

Another item is the pencil-scrawled note to Mrs. Pedro Sanchez, wife of a striker, from Vince Faranda, who runs a general merchandise store where he sells everything from groceries to dry goods. I have it before me as I write. It says:

> Mrs. Sanchez: I guess you have heard about it. We are very sorry, because we have to stop all accounts. Because the wholesaler they have stopped all of our accounts and put us on cash basis.
>
> So since we have to pay cash for everything, we must get cash for everything too. So please don't feel offend (sic), because we can't help it. We want to stay in business.
>
> After this is all over, we will gladly open your accounts again. So please help us and keep on buying for cash here until we can open your accounts again. I feel very, very sorry. (signed) VINCE FARANDA.

Bethlehem Steel's executives and straw bosses, the town's bankers, merchants, city officials, newspapers, and clergymen have all been on the firing line against the strikers. The plan of campaign, apparently, was first to isolate the strikers from the rest of the community, and second to turn the community against the strikers. The isolation was accomplished by driving a wedge between the steel strikers on the one side and the white-collar workers and farmers on the other. The wedge was driven home with three distinct blows:

1. It was reported that the Cambria mills would close permanently if the strikers won. Since Johnstown's economic basis for existence rests on the Bethlehem Steel Company, this threw fear into the heart of every shopkeeper, small business man, and white-collar worker.

2. The day the steel workers went out on strike the Penn-Traffic Store laid off large numbers of its clerks, ranging in various departments from 25 to 50 per cent. After the modified martial law was clamped on, the remaining clerks were quivering in their shoes because of a rumor spread among them that if the strike were not settled they would be put on a half-week schedule.

3. It was publicly urged by the Johnstown Democrat and Tribune that all steel-mill workers go on relief immediately, which—it was stated—would raise relief costs in Cambria County 600 per cent. Nothing could be better calculated to arouse every home owner, business man, and farmer in Cambria County.

The wedge was driven home none too subtly. To tie these activities together, it is necessary to note a few facts:

1. There are only two major industries in the Johnstown area—steel and coal. Of the two, steel is dominant and pours more money into the city.

2. There is only one bank in Johnstown (as a result of the bank failures of 1932-1933)—the United States National Bank, which does all of Bethlehem's business.

3. The leading mercantile establishment and only department store is the Penn-Traffic Store.

4. The Bethlehem Steel Company contributes to the support of all Johnstown's churches, whose wealthiest parishioners are the steel executives and sub-executives.

The talk of what had happened to the clerks at the Penn-Traffic Store—and what was rumored to impend—spread like wildfire through the city. Twenty-four hours later I could not find a store clerk in Johnstown who was not prayerfully hoping the strike would be settled immediately. Thus Bethlehem accomplished the break between the steel strikers and the white-collar workers.

Five fingers pull the strings at Johnstown, and the effects of their manipulations reach directly or indirectly into the homes of every one of the 70,000 inhabitants of the Bethlehem "company town." The five key figures are C. R. Ellicott, general manager of the Cambria mills; George Suppes, president, and Francis Martin, cashier, of the United States National Bank; S. H. Heckman of the Penn-Traffic Store, and Daniel Shields, mayor of the city. Behind all five loom the same figures that stand behind Tom Girdler of Republic Steel and Frank Purnell of Youngstown Sheet and Tube—Eugene Grace, chairman of the board of Bethlehem, and William C. Potter, board chairman of the Guaranty Trust Company of New York, a Morgan bank.

A word about the five. Ellicott is known throughout the steel mill region as an intransigeant union hater; Suppes is entirely dependent for his big financial business on Bethlehem; Martin is president of the Johnstown Chamber of Commerce and is chairman of the vigilante Citizens' Committee; Heckman was Martin's lieutenant in organizing and leading the vigilantes; Mayor Shields is an ex-convict. Shields played his part in supplying the vigilantes. Of the 700 vigilantes, 600 came from the local civil-service lists for police and firemen jobs. When they were sworn in for strike duty, they were told that this job was a test of their fitness to hold city jobs. Suppes, whose bank holds hundreds of farm mortgages, at the same time announced he had "800 farmers prepared to do for Johnstown what the farmers did for Hershey."

The Reverend ——— is pastor of a Protestant church in Johnstown. On the Sunday after martial law was declared by Governor Earle, I was discussing the local situation with him on the street. A number of his parishioners surrounded us. The general tone of the conversation led me to understand that the Reverend Mr. —— was opposed to the strike. With nothing more immediate in mind, I inquired:

"Are you one of the Bishop McConnell school of social thought or are you on the other side of the fence?" He replied that he disagreed with much that Bishop McConnell has said and done.

The next morning, at the hotel, my telephone rang. It was the Reverend Mr. ——, and his voice was agitated. He wanted to come right up to see me. I told him to come ahead. He arrived, looking like a man undergoing a severe strain.

"My conscience is troubling me," he said.

"What about?" I asked.

"Well, you asked me a lot of questions yesterday . . . and, well . . . I wasn't quite truthful. As a matter of fact, I am an intense admirer of Bishop McConnell and agree with him fully." I drew him on, and let him talk. It turned out that the Reverend Mr. —— was in reality genuinely sympathetic with the strikers. Toward the end of his confession, he dug into his pocket, pulled out a sheet of paper, and thrust it at me.

"Here, read this," he said, "and tell me what you think of it."

It was the rough draft of a resolution which condemned the action of Governor Earle in declaring martial law, stated that the community was opposed to the strike, and that the steel workers themselves were opposed to it.

"What is this?" I asked.

"It's the rough draft of a resolution which I have been asked to draw up to present to the Ministerial Association," he answered.

"But you don't believe this!" I exclaimed.

He sighed heavily, and drew a handkerchief across his forehead. His silence was answer enough. I said: "You're in a tough spot, aren't you?" And his reply was a gust of despair: "You have no idea!"

"Well, what are you going to do about it?" I persisted.

"There's only one thing I can do. I'm going right down to the meeting and present this. Then I'm going on my vacation, and I'm not coming back until this is all over." I shall never forget his back as he went out.

But the strangest story of all revolves about the declaration of martial law by Governor Earle. Robert Lytle of the United Press, by some smart work, traced the telephone call to Governor Earle in which Sheriff Michael J. Boyle of Cambria County asked for martial law, on the ground that 40,000 coal miners were marching on Johnstown to support the steel strikers. That call was made on Friday, June 18.

Lytle traced the call to the executive offices of the Bethlehem Steel Company in Johnstown. Queried by Lytle, Sheriff Boyle admitted making the call from the Bethlehem offices and said General Manager Ellicott had helped him draft the appeal for martial law. Later I asked James Mark, leader of the strike in Johnstown and president of District 2 of the United Mine Workers of America, when he had given his miners the order to march on Johnstown.

"Saturday, June 19," he replied.

"Are you sure you did not order the march on Friday, June 18?" I asked.

"I am certain," he stated. "I had no such idea until I talked with Phil Murray on Saturday morning."

That seemed curious. The only man who could have ordered the miners to march was Mark. If Lewis or Murray had ordered it, they could have got their message out only through Mark. Yet Sheriff Boyle and General Manager Ellicott had known it on Friday, twenty-four hours before Mark knew it.

Governor Earle's supporters are still wondering whether Sheriff Boyle and Mr. Ellicott did not think the Governor would refuse their request for martial law. A vigilante told John J. Devine, special investigator of the Pennsylvania State Department of Justice: "Three days more and we woulda had this strike broken, if that damn Earle hadn't slapped on the martial law." Is it possible that Ellicott and Boyle were expecting violence? Did it seem that if Earle refused to grant martial law he could then be charged with responsibility for whatever happened later? Would that have ruined Earle's career?

The most reasonable explanation I have heard—and it comes from a source close to Earle—is that when the request for martial law came through, the Governor telephoned John Lewis and asked whether the miners' march had been ordered. Apparently Lewis and Murray gave substance to the shadow by ordering the march, making a reality of a wholly imaginary situation and thereby justifying the martial law and saving the strike.

The known plotting and ruthless measures resorted to in Johnstown by some of the "law-and-order" elements suggest that the same elements might not have hesitated to dynamite the water mains running into the Cambria mills in order to discredit the strike. Who did think of dynamite? In all the time I spent with the strikers at Johnstown I never heard a word suggesting sabotage. I did hear how easy it would be to stop the Cambria mill by blasting the water main. I heard it ten days before it happened. It was suggested to me by a policeman in Johnstown. The dynamiters were careful, I notice, to do no real damage, as the management has since admitted.

There's plenty that's phony in Johnstown!

Japan's Dilemma

BY ELIOT JANEWAY

II

JAPAN'S economic crisis has compelled the army to call a temporary halt in the campaign against China. It has not taught the army that the continued extension of armament manufactures is bound to intensify the present crisis. The army remains determined to accelerate its armament program. Of the current budget 47.5 per cent is to be absorbed by measures of direct war preparations, and a further 18.2 per cent will be spent on the steel, aviation, oil, and auxiliary armament industries. Exactly 0.2 per cent is allotted to "the renovation of education," and 1.6 per cent to health and relief measures.

Recent developments in the steel industry illustrate the reckless determination of the military to cling to their policy of conquest. The Japan Steel Manufacturing Company, a government agency, is spending $20,000,000 on the construction of new steel mills near Kobe. At the instance of the very aggressive Kwantung Army, the South Manchurian Railway has taken over the Showa Steel Company, and is planning to raise its pig-iron and steel output by 2,500,000 tons each in six years, at a cost of 160,000,000 yen. The government also proposes to introduce a licensing system in the iron-and-steel industry. All projects using steel, including those of the government, are to be postponed unless they are "vitally necessary to the national defense." All steel companies are to be compelled, furthermore, to maintain their annual productive capacity at a minimum of 100,000 metric tons a year; this will involve ruinous expenditures for the many small steel companies.

Similar projects are being undertaken in allied industries. Thus, 95,000,000 yen are to be spent on the development of synthetic oil production in Korea. To overcome Japan's notorious weakness in the air, the Mitsui interests have entered the military plane field, and the Mitsubishi group, which has been engaged in plane production for some time, is "doubling its capitalization in order to enlarge its aircraft manufacturing capacity."

In spite of these heroic measures, Japan's heavy industries are unable to produce in sufficient volume to satisfy the demands of the armed forces. The government's solution to this problem is again characteristic and can only intensify the economic crisis. Because of the steel shortage, Japanese steel interests have been compelled "to decline an offer from Brazil for the purchase of 10,000,000 yen worth of rails and locomotives." Such a sum could buy a great deal of cotton, iron ore, and manganese, supplies which Brazil has to sell and which Japan sorely lacks. Yet here is illustrated the vicious circle in which the Japanese military have involved the nation—steel exports to Brazil are forbidden because of the steel shortage at home. But one cause of the steel shortage is the lack of iron and manganese ores with which Brazil can pay for steel. As the steel shortage grows, Japanese shipyards face a serious delay on 141 vessels with an aggregate tonnage of 883,200. Meanwhile, because of a shipping shortage, freight rates to the Far East from North and South America are rising rapidly. High freight rates increase the cost of importing cotton from the Americas. And higher cotton costs raise textile costs, thus increasing the trade deficit, aggravating the budget crisis, provoking the government to extend import restrictions which add to the already desperate raw-material shortage, and thus completing a vicious industrial circle from which Japan can escape only by abandoning her expensive militarist ambitions.

Early in February the Japanese government announced that in order to obtain material for its armament program it had been forced to suspend the import duty on iron and steel for two years (at a cost to the Treasury of 11,000,000 yen which, a later announcement said, would be made up by new tax levies). Simultaneously the government announced that two orders for steel-making equipment, the largest in thirty years, had been placed with American firms. One, placed by Mitsui and Company, was awarded to the United Engineering and Foundry Company of Pittsburgh. The order calls for the erection of a 450,000-ton capacity hot-strip-steel mill—this is "the total annual output for all the mills now operating in Japan." The site of the mill is an island nine hundred miles southwest of Tokyo, where the commercial demand for steel is not very great.

The other order, placed by the Mitsubishi Company, was awarded to the Mesta Machine Company of New York and the East Pittsburgh division of the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company. (Westinghouse owns an interest in the Mitsubishi works in Japan.) This order provides for the construction of a cold-steel mill to cost $5,000,000 and to be built entirely in this country, except for certain electrical equipment to be provided in Japan "from Westinghouse designs."

A month later, in March, it was announced that the Struthers Iron and Steel Company of Youngstown would shortly begin shipment of 25,000 tons of its high-grade specialty pig iron to Japan. The company's capacity is only 15,000 tons a month, and its order book was then so full that three months had to elapse before the Japanese contract could be filled. However, some light may be thrown upon the willingness of the Struthers Company to force its American customers to wait while it shipped pig iron to Japan by the fact that its most prominent director is also a director of the United Engineering and Foundry Company, as well as of a New York bank on whose board are represented interests which have long been identified with Westinghouse.

During the entire year of 1936 the United States exported only 5,316 tons of pig iron. But in January, 1937, alone we exported 13,329 tons—250 per cent more than in the entire year of 1936—mostly to Japan. And between January and April, reports the Department of Commerce, "the United States sold Japan more pig iron than it sold to all the world in the six preceding years. So far this year Japan has placed orders in the United States for 600,000 tons of iron and steel."

Originally, Japanese pig-iron purchases here had been made at the rate of 65 yen a ton. On March 30, however, it was announced that 35,000 tons of pig iron had been sold to Japan by the Mystic Iron Company at the rate of 115-120 yen a ton, or nearly double the official price. This announcement naturally provoked considerable resentment on the part of companies which had sold to the Japanese before the price was raised. After the new price went into effect the Japanese contracted to buy 382,000 tons of pig iron at the new price; the price increase has already cost Japanese steel manufacturers, who buy their pig iron for steel making from the Ministry of Commerce and Industry, 20,000,000 yen.

Credit for this highly profitable readjustment of export pig-iron prices, then, must go to the Mystic Iron Company. Who controls it? The company is well named, for its affairs are not easy to probe. All that is known about it is that it is a subsidiary of Eastern Gas and Fuel Associates—a large utility. This utility, however, is itself controlled by the Koppers Company. The Koppers Company is, of course, one of the pillars of the Mellon financial structure. And one of the Mellon side-shows happens to be the same Westinghouse combine which owns a participating interest in the Mitsubishi engineering enterprises and which is busily engaged in equipping new Japanese factories; and another side-show of the Mellons' banking interests is United Engineering and Foundry, which, with the Struthers Company, has been doing as well with Japanese orders. (United Engineering has since received three additional Japanese orders.)

Japan's purchases of scrap steel and iron in this country have become legendary. Until a few months ago, our scrap exports to Japan were always good for a journalistic yarn, but they amounted to little more. Last spring, however, the situation became dangerous to those "independent" steel companies which are compelled to buy all or part of their pig iron or scrap for steel making on the open market. These companies were then unable to obtain supplies. Moreover, the export price of scrap was bid up (on European demand as well) far beyond the domestic price, aggravating the domestic shortage.

As the result of this drain on our scrap supplies such well-known "independent" steel companies as National Steel, Wheeling Steel, Lukens Steel (an important navy contractor), and Pittsburgh Steel organized a committee to demand an embargo on further scrap exports. But this protest does not bespeak any fixed objection of the independents to aiding Japanese militarism. They simply want to keep scrap—a raw material on which they make no profit—in this country, and to sell to Japan the competitive pig iron which they manufacture. This purpose is reflected in the presence of representatives of Pittsburgh Steel on the committee. For on the Pittsburgh Steel board are to be found the same interests which direct the affairs of Struthers Iron and Steel. And immediately after the scrap committee's declaration, Struthers contracted to sell another 22,500 tons of pig iron to Japan.

Japan is also placing copper orders of a remarkable character in this country. Early in April the Mitsui and Mitsubishi interests jointly arranged with the Granby Consolidated Mining, Smelting, and Power Company to buy every last ounce of copper concentrates produced by the company during the next three years. The price of this copper will vary with the world price. Shipments are expected to average 4,000 tons a month. But during 1936 Japan consumed only eleven-odd thousand tons of copper a month. Thus from one source, an American-owned copper mine in Canada, Japan has guaranteed herself a steady monthly supply of more than one-third of her copper needs. A secure copper supply under present market conditions is a luxury not all American consumers of the metal enjoy. For example, last December, when domestic copper supplies ran out, two leading American copper fabricators—General Cable Corporation and Revere Copper and Brass, Inc.—were compelled to refuse orders for nearly 20,000 tons of fabricated copper because they were unable to buy sufficient raw material.

It is true that the Granby company is discriminated against in the United States by our 4-cent-a-pound copper tariff, but the rest of the world is again eager to buy copper, and it hardly seems likely that its eagerness will diminish during the next three years. Accordingly, the willingness of the Granby directors to bind themselves to such a long-term contract would appear inexplicable on the face of things. Again a glance at the company's board of directors helps to solve the mystery. For Granby is no independent. Its board is dominated by interests close to the investment banking house of Hayden, Stone, which, with the Guggenheims and the Morgans, controls the great Kennecott copper mine. A leading part in Granby's affairs is also taken by the secretary of a subsidiary of the other important Morgan copper interest—Phelps Dodge. This mining group comes as close to dominating the world's metal markets as any one group can. The Granby deal typifies the attitude these interests take toward Japan. Their more important properties are concentrating on recovery in the prosperous countries. Only the marginal companies are being put to work on Japanese orders. But the sending or the denying of essential materials of war to Japan hinges upon decisions made in at least one very central office in Wall Street.

III

In effect, then, certain American interests are intervening to allow Japan a breathing-spell from her economic crisis. But meanwhile the American armament program gravitates toward the Pacific—obviously because of the "Japanese menace." The War Department proposes to develop a new air base at Tacoma. A base already exists at Riverside, California. The House has approved a naval air station for San Francisco. The Tacoma decision, predicts the New York Times, which is extremely well informed on military aviation plans, is a "certain indication that military leaders soon would propose another and even larger one in Alaska." The Pacific Coast aircraft companies have booked $80,000,000 of orders, exactly twice as much as the East Coast companies have received. Seventy per cent of the country's planes will be built in California this year. The Navy wants a $15,000,000 base at Oakland.

Nor is this all. "Official interest," reports the Chicago Journal of Commerce, has been stirred "in the practicability of a Pacific Coast iron-and-steel industry using electric furnaces and employing raw materials from Asia." Three reports have recently been made on Philippine ores. A large part of the 500,000 tons of good-grade iron ore there evidently has a high manganiferous and nickel content, in both of which vital ores this country is deficient. The Philippines also contain good commercial deposits of chromium. The cost of delivering Philippine iron ore on the Pacific Coast would be about $8.20 a ton—about double that of Lake Superior ore delivered at Lake Erie ports. But this is not prohibitive in time of shortage (we used large quantities of Philippine ore in the East during the war). The spring shortage, for example, made it profitable to sell Australian iron ore at Baltimore. It is emphasized that this "new economic situation ties in with proposed expert studies here regarding a Philippine economic set-up which might support independence earlier than . . . 1936."

Proposals to develop a Pacific Coast steel industry on the basis of the Philippines' "potential raw-material supplies have become of new significance in view of the rapid construction of immense hydro-electric plants in the Northwest states which may soon be looking for new tasks." This refers to the Bonneville, and to a lesser extent to the Grand Coulee, electrification projects which, when completed, will provide the virtually unindustrialized Northwest states with an installed capacity of 2,312,000 kilowatts and a potential output of 15 billion kilowatt-hours.

To complete the picture, the War Department, as the Wall Street Journal has put the matter, "has butt in" on the Bonneville project, radically increasing its cost. Here, then, is a program which is almost sinister in its blunt completeness. A steel industry is to be created where there were only water-falls before. The lack of coal is no deterrent; electric furnaces can substitute for it. Ores will be brought from the Philippines. Freight costs are no deterrent; in boom conditions, whether in time of war or peace, surplus supplies must be transported great distances. Already, says Business Week, it is hoped that "the basic electro-chemical, electro-metallurgical, and other heavy industries in which the cost of power bears a high ratio to manufacturing cost" will be attracted to the Bonneville area. Aircraft production is booming on the Coast. To the south, a rubber-manufacturing boom is making a second Akron of Los Angeles. In a word, by 1940 a new Pittsburgh—supplemented (as Pittsburgh is not) by bombing-plane factories—may well have risen on the Pacific Coast. It will be fed with power supplied by the War Department's brain-child—Bonneville Dam—and it will depend (as Pittsburgh does not) upon a colonial raw-material base which Japan covets.

But no doubt an arms base will be needed on the Pacific Coast by that time to protect us against the "Japanese menace" which our steel and copper is arming at an ever-increasing rate.

(The first instalment of this article appeared in the issue of June 26.)

Jack Raper, Cleveland's Best Citizen

BY LOUIS ADAMIC

FOR decades now, young newspapermen, especially those of more than average talent and general competence, have been giving up their jobs in cities and towns west of the Hudson and pouring into New York. Some of them found work on the big Manhattan dailies, and some are now editors, editorial and special writers, foreign and Washington correspondents, and sport, gossip, book, drama, and political columnists. A few developed into more or less successful free-lance writers of novels, magazine articles or stories, or nonfiction; some into well-paid staff writers on mass-circulation periodicals; some into "Communist" and red journalists—their redness splotched with yellow; and some into assorted intellectuals, a more accurate label for whom would be "ineffectuals." Thousands took—if not immediately, then in the course of time—to publicity, radio, advertising. Of other thousands there remains no trace.

There are reasons for this migration to New York, all tied up with the problems of the American press and the country as a whole. But its effects have been evil. It may be partly responsible for the deft writing of some of the news stories in the New York Herald Tribune; without doubt it is greatly to blame for the all-around shabbiness of many newspapers outside New York—to which fact, in turn, may be partly ascribed the shabby quality of life in many communities beyond Hoboken and their pathetic dependence on Manhattan for mental and spiritual stimulation. The process ruins much good talent. Most of what it does not ruin it makes ineffective.

Which brings me to John W. Raper, a columnist on the Cleveland Press. In spite of his outstanding ability Jack Raper was never tempted to go to New York—doesn't like the place—and never sought national fame or recognition. He has worked on the same paper for almost forty years, running the same column since August 23, 1900; yet today, at sixty-seven, he is incontestably Cleveland's most effective and successful citizen, and though he is scarcely known outside Ohio he is probably one of the most significant figures in the American newspaper world. He is the best functioning man of his age in Cleveland; and as a human being he is, in most important respects, probably better off than the overwhelming majority of people. He works six days a week from eight in the morning till eight or nine and even ten or eleven at night, doing for the most part exactly what he wants to be doing. And doing that, he has become an integral part of the minds, feelings, and instinctive reactions of a majority of the people of Cleveland. He is a source and the core of that town's often demonstrated political health.

His story is a pleasure to write.

Jack Raper is of old Virginia stock that came to Ohio, via Carolina and West Virginia, something over 130 years ago. He was born and raised in Chillicothe, in Vinton County, a town he describes as "pure hick." His father was a country newspaperman, and Jack became a reporter in his teens, working briefly on numerous papers in Ohio and also in Chicago, Buffalo, and Albany.

Back in the mid-nineties, between newspaper jobs, Raper—then about twenty-five—worked for Lew Dockstader, minstrel and monologist, whose buffoonery was punctuated by shrewd comments on local, national, and world events and personalities. Officially, Jack was Dockstader's press agent, but he suggested also many of his most popular songs and monologs, and was responsible for his sharpest, funniest "wisecracks."

Marrying, Jack Raper gave up this job—it required too much traveling—and became a reporter on the Cleveland Press, a Scripps paper. He was (still is) an excellent newsman. His interviews with stuffed shirts and bunk-shooters, like his reports of their speeches, were full of wasp-like stings. He wrote as he talked; his work with Dockstader had taught him to time and place his stings so they were most effective. He was naturally independent. The Scripps organization encouraged him to be so.

Having been connected with the theater while on Dockstader's staff, Jack added to his reportorial duties those of dramatic critic. Once his sole comment on a performance of "Resurrection," starring Eugenia Blair, was "Burn a rag." This closed the show in Cleveland, and then went, amid guffaws, throughout the theatrical world, where the phrase is to this day used as comment on stenchy performances. This sort of criticism caused the organized show business to boycott the Press, which lost over $100,000 a year for two years in theatrical advertising. But Jack Raper kept his job—thanks partly to the fact that old man Scripps was less interested in immediate profits than in developing honest, independent newspapers.

Jack is a small, wiry, extremely lean fellow, alert and agile, with a wasp waist even at sixty-seven. But waspishness is by no means his central characteristic. He has a fierce attachment to the principles and the practice of honesty, liberty, fair play, common sense, and human decency. One of his colleagues on the Press, Elrick Davis, calls him the Wasp of Virtue—as apt a short characterization as one could wish for. But there is in him no malice for malice's sake, not a suggestion of a holier-than-thou attitude nor the least touch of puritanism.

One day in the summer of 1900 Editor Rickey of the Press, an old-time Scripps man, suggested to Raper that he write down "some of these things you're saying around here—these comments on things—and let's put them in a column. Make it a daily trick if you can. Just as you talk. What you should call it? I don't know; call it most anything." Jack began the column and called it "Most Anything." He was thirty then. It still is "Most Anything"—one of the first columns in the country, now in its thirty-seventh year. All this time he has been writing it, six days a week, never missing a day except for his annual vacation periods or when he took some special assignment.

In 1907 Burr Gongwer, one of Cleveland's political bosses, made a public statement that was pure bull. Jack copied the juiciest part of it for his column: what could he say about it? He asked the staff artist to draw him a bull in silhouette, which he then printed indented in the quotation, without verbal comment. The bull was an immediate hit, and he has been using it ever since with steady effectiveness. During political campaigns he uses it daily; on some days the column is a veritable bull pen. And in the course of decades the bull has entered the service of numerous other columnists, scattered through the country, most of whom have written to Jack for his permission to use it—although the beast, of course, is not copyrighted.

"Most Anything" is not what the readers of the New Yorker would call "clever," "brilliant," or "subtle." It is simple, direct, shrewd, somewhat old-fashioned, its humor closer to Artemus Ward and Josh Billings than to Frank Sullivan, Walter Winchell, or Robert Benchley. It is made up mostly of two- to ten-line paragraphs, many of them purely local (Cleveland and Ohio); so that the average transient who happens to pick up the Press and casually glances at the column finds much of it meaningless or a little flat. A brief item such as—

> Assistant Safety Director John R. Flynn, says Director Ness, was ill advised when he appointed Frank J. Cadek, Jr., a rookie policeman. But not any more ill advised than the official who appointed John R. Flynn assistant safety director.

has scant significance for a stranger but may be vastly interesting to Clevelanders; while something like this—

> A Democratic candidate for Attorney General of Ohio is going around the state telling voters that Martin Davey has saved the taxpayers $30,000,000 a year. When? In the years he wasn't Governor?

gets chuckles which are not pure mirth all over town, as does this—

> Fifty persons turned out in the Twelfth Ward Thursday night to hear Councilman Herman Finkle. It beats all what a grip that man has on the people.

Or as does Jack's weekly whack at Newton D. Baker, the city's official Leading Citizen (and counsel for the Press!) and a voluble champion of public interest in the abstract while he represents the power companies before the United States Supreme Court against the TVA.

Jack's most important items concern politics, the police, the judiciary, the banking fraternity, the big-shots generally who thrive on sham, cover and corruption; many a prominent Clevelander turns first to "Most Anything" ready to laugh at the cuts Jack takes at somebody else, but a bit uneasy lest the little old so-and-so has said something true and devastating about him this time. The bull is feared most; for in the last three decades many a figure has departed from Cleveland's and Ohio's political, business, or religious life, his ears filled with the roar of Jack's animal and the accompanying laughter of tens of thousands of people. And if Jack is something of a wasp, he is also a little like an elephant. He never forgets. Two or three lines now and then are sufficient to keep the memory green. It goes without saying that frequent efforts were made in the early years by powerful groups and individuals to get Jack off the Press and out of Cleveland and Ohio.

"Most Anything," a mildly popular column from the start, gradually increased in popularity. Jack went in heavily for homespun wisdom; he invented an old rustic named "Josh Wise" and put his picture at the top of the column alongside such saws as these:

> Th' average man has t' steal his hours uv pleasure either from his work er his sleep.
>
> Th' man th't can afford t' pay his fare is th' one th't has th' least trouble gettin' a pass.
>
> You never hear a woman braggin' th't she's self-made.
>
> A man c'n make a lot o' fatal mistakes an' still live.
>
> "Competition is th' life of trade"—and th' death of men.
>
> Truth is stranger than fiction because we see so little uv it.
>
> Some men are so unlucky th't if they sat down on a haystack they would find a needle.
>
> Precedent is a ball and chain fastened to Justice.

Jack Raper is essentially a small-town fellow, a shrewd superior country jake, his feet close to the grass roots; which largely explains much of his popularity and lastingness. Every Monday for over thirty years now he has been running a feature in his column called "All the News from Hicksville." Using the place names of his boyhood, he faintly burlesques a rural correspondent's notes in a country newspaper. Yet burlesque is not quite the word. He takes shots at the follies, the pretensions, the fake urbanism of small towns. But the tone is kindly, tolerant, and Cleveland, like the rural areas around it, loves the Hicksville news.

With "Most Anything" increasingly successful, Jack came to be in demand as a speaker. In the last fifteen years he has averaged about two hundred addresses a year; he often speaks twice, three times a day. And before all sorts of audiences: women's clubs, labor unions, fraternal societies, teachers' conventions, and gatherings of high-school students—the latter his favorite audiences, from whom he won't take money. He is a born teacher, and young people enjoy him immensely. In the last twenty years or so he has talked to perhaps a hundred thousand of them in small and big groups. Now in their thirties or forties, citizens of Cleveland, they are devoted readers of "Most Anything."

As he walks in the downtown streets of Cleveland, it is "Hello Jack! How are you?" or "Good morning, Mr. Raper!" Sometimes it takes him a half hour to walk two or three blocks. Often someone touches his sleeve and says, "You don't know me, Mr. Raper, but when I was going to Lincoln High you came and spoke to the Discussion Club."

Jack is something of an actor in the Lew Dockstader tradition, and frequently before groups of high-school students he burlesques some inflated old judge, cheap politician, or business Babbitt speaking to them solemnly, emptily, platitudinously on "Youth, the Hope of the Future." The kids receive it with gales of laughter—and laugh again when the solemn, empty, platitudinous, inflated old judge, cheap politician, or business Babbitt actually comes to address them a month or two later. There is a theory in the Press office that the youngsters keep him young at sixty-seven; also, that through contact with them, he—a born and incorrigible idealist—momentarily gets over the disillusionment which became part of his make-up early in life.

In the course of the three and a half decades Jack has acquired a great following that is at once intensely personal and more than personal, and held together by mutual attachment to principles of which he is the high priest. He and his friends and constant readers, whose total may be a quarter of a million, and half of whom, perhaps, are so-called "foreigners" with such names as Ambrozich, Mlakar, Sczymanski, or Hatjas, are the bulwark of democracy and traditional Americanism in the northeastern corner of Ohio. They carry on the tradition of Jack's late friend Tom L. Johnson, and are generally responsible for the fact that Cleveland usually votes overwhelmingly progressive or liberal—even when the liberal or progressive candidate (as was the case with the elder La Follette in 1924) has no chance of winning. Theirs is largely the credit, too, that Cleveland's own government —in spite of (or I should say because of) Jack's constant columnar bellyaching—is as good as it is.

The government of Ohio just now is in poor hands, but that is not the fault of Cleveland, or of Jack and his friends. Governor Martin L. Davey, Democrat, was reelected last autumn in the Roosevelt landslide, but independent Cleveland, which went overwhelmingly for Roosevelt, gave a majority to the Republican candidate. That Cleveland went anti-Davey was due, to a great extent, to "Most Anything," in which Jack daily belabored Davey, and to a typical Raper radio speech, delivered shortly before Election Day, which contained a sting that caused Clevelanders to split their sides and votes:

> The people of Ohio first became acquainted with Mr. Davey as a tree doctor. A tree doctor is a doctor who knows all about trees, about planting, trimming, pruning, and [slight pause] grafting.

Jack is something of a perfectionist, and there is but one living politician in Cleveland—in fact, in the whole of Ohio—of whom he enthusiastically approves. This is old Robert Crosser, an extremely able independent-Democratic member of Congress, who for some twenty years has represented the Twenty-First Ohio District, a section of Cleveland inhabited largely by Polish, Slovak, and Lithuanian families. Bob Crosser hates political buncombe, has no campaign fund, no support from the Democratic machine, no machine of his own, no campaign manager, asks no one to vote for him; he makes no promises and no regular campaign speeches, but delivers, instead, an occasional brief talk in some Polish or Slovak hall on liberty, democracy, social justice, progress, and other such essentials of what he calls Americanism, and gives a party for his Hunky supporters in his house, where he—personally a dry but politically a wet—serves coffee and doughnuts! He is Jack's best friend in Cleveland, and Jack supports him in "Most Anything" and takes the stump for him every time he runs. Jack often opposes candidates that the Press supports.

The City Club of Cleveland is one of the most important and interesting organizations of its kind in America. It has a membership of some 1,600, and every Saturday after lunch it holds a forum, usually with some well-known speaker, whose talk, as well as the ensuing discussion, is broadcast locally. The club's avowed objective is the free exchange of opinions upon any question. But most of the members are conservative.

Soon after he joined, Jack became a sort of center for liberal and progressive members whose chief interest was in problems of government. One day, just after the war, a club member who was a florist sent flowers to the dining-room, among them a bunch of red roses for the table usually occupied by Jack's group. When the group was seated, someone jokingly exclaimed, "At last your true colors! This is the Soviet Table!" None of them knew then exactly what a Soviet was, but they knew they had been called a bad name, and that pleased them. Like a lot of boys, they stuck it on themselves, and, to this day the group, now numbering several hundred, is known as the Soviet Table. Around the main Soviet Table now are smaller ones, and in the center of the main table are their two insignia—the hammer and sickle and the black bull Jack has made famous. The Soviet Table is the heart of the City Club. It includes now many varieties of sociopolitical thinkers, an assortment of crackpots, and a few more or less good-humored conservatives and reactionaries, who have "sneaked in," so the theory goes, "to bore from within." The Soviet Table is instrumental in bringing to Cleveland every third or fourth Saturday some liberal, progressive, or radical speaker, who is broadcast all over Cleveland and for about two hundred miles around. It is the watchdog, the conscience of the city; and in 1924 became the brains and soul of a temporary political machine that carried Cleveland for La Follette.

There are people in Cleveland to whom Jack is a "red," a Bolshevik, but he himself feels that the black bull, which is of iron, is a truer emblem of the Soviet Table than the hammer and sickle.

Once a year or so the bull is moved from the Soviet Table to the speaker's table and Jack—graying and getting bald, but more vigorous than most men half his age—delivers a stingingly witty review of the political, social, and economic situation in Cleveland, with glimpses of the rest of Ohio and the United States. He spends weeks preparing himself for this, but his informal delivery, done with a dour face, full of fight, sarcastic cuts, and meaningful pauses, makes it seem an impromptu oration.

In 1935 his address contained a fierce onslaught, interspersed with double-edged phrases and "wisecracks," on the politico-economic bosses of the town, especially on two local financiers (lately dead), brothers and bachelors, who, while known for their exemplary personal lives, often employed questionable methods and were mainly to blame for Cleveland's acute bank crisis in 1933. When he came to them, he said:

> You may remember that Pete Witt [another member of the Soviet Table] once presented to the city a certain politician as an unkissed icicle. May I not present to you the two unkissed cherubs? There they sit in the [Terminal] Tower [Building], the wonderful tower reaching up into the clouds—the highest thing in Cleveland, except the pile of defaulted bonds they built; that wonderful tower in whose top there burns a powerful light, its bright rays going far across the boundaries of the city, far out into the country. There in the Tower top it burns, night after night, in memory of the unknown bondholder. And there they sit, the unkissed cherubs, symbols of the sublimity of virginity in masculinity. Pure in their private lives. But it can hardly be said that in their financial relations with the public they practiced continence.

He has built up a volunteer information service that makes him one of the most knowing men in town. Sitting at the big Soviet Table or in his cubby-hole office, he learns of everything that happens—of some things before they happen; and occasionally he prevents the worst of them from happening. Then, as likely as not, he tells no one anything about it for years afterwards, if ever. One day as he was recounting to me the details of the great Cleveland bank crisis of 1933, he hesitantly mentioned something he had done in connection with it. Sensing one of his secrets, I pumped him and learned that when the crisis hit the city he had feared that the State Banking Department would appoint as conservators certain local politicians who were hovering over the scene like vultures, ready to steal as much of the banks' resources as had not yet evaporated. In his fear, he had jumped on a train for Washington and had a talk with Secretary of the Treasury Woodin, who then applied pressure on the Ohio authorities to appoint as conservators two outside banking experts. It was mainly the financial ability of these experts and their disregard of local political and business pressure which enabled the depositors to recover from the wreckage a considerable percentage of their money. Raper told me that his wife and I and two or three other of his friends were the only persons who knew this, and made me promise to keep it to myself. Later, after I had threatened to break my promise if he would not release me from it, he gave me leave to mention the incident in this article.

When I told him I was going to write him up, he looked confused and was reluctant to cooperate. "I know the value of publicity," he said, his face engulfed in a grimace, "but—oh, hell! It's liable to complicate my life."

I can approach the conclusion of this sketch of Jack Raper no better than by telling of his connection with the starting of the American Newspaper Guild. The idea of the Guild originated partly with a young reporter on the Cleveland Press, Garland Ashcraft, who was chiefly instrumental also in organizing Chapter No. 1 in Cleveland. I could theorize that Ashcraft's daring idea was not unrelated to the atmosphere of freedom and vital independence that largely prevails in the Press office, which must be credited in part to Jack; but I shan't. The most interesting fact is that Jack discouraged the formation of the Guild.

The story goes that in the summer of 1933 a committee of Press reporters called on Jack in his cubby-hole, thinking it would be a pushover to get him to sign up as a charter member. But before the committee had half finished its song and dance Jack interrupted, "Nothing doing! Just skip me, boys."

"But, why?" asked the flabbergasted committee.

"I will have nothing to do with organizing newspapermen," he said. "I've lived with 'em all my life, and I know 'em. You fellows are barking up the wrong tree. Boys, they're just not worth wasting time on. Not worth a damn! Yellow as hell! Longshoremen have more brains than newspapermen. They won't stick together on anything but a bottle. Won't fight for anything. Once or twice in my time I've tried to organize them in towns where I've worked. I've got burned every time, and once I lost a job trying. Of course, now, if you boys can do something with a bunch of reporters, why, hop to it. I'm getting up in years now, and I'm sittin' pretty. If anything can be made out of this business, it's up to you younger fellows. If you need any money, come around. If you succeed, I'll join—but I predict you won't."

None the less, he joined, has been an active, interested member ever since, and thinks the Guild is a great outfit, with potential power to improve not only the newspaper people's working condition but the Fourth Estate as a whole.

Jack's cynicism is a surface characteristic, a defense mechanism of an active idealist who is being kicked in the face by all manner of evils, at least temporarily stronger than he is. The usual expression on his lean face, which is beginning to resemble an apple that has lasted till February, verges on disgust. He seems to have a perpetual pain in the neck. Way inside him, however, Jack is not a cynic but a hopeful, happy man—as hopeful and happy, perhaps, as any intelligent and informed person can be nowadays: for, as I have tried to suggest, he functions rather marvelously, and—beneath his modesty—he knows it. Jack is no genius; but simply by functioning long, energetically, and consistently in one place, he has had a big hand in making Cleveland culturally superior to most other large American cities.

Jack is a waspish sort of Doremus Jessup who, although he may believe—in his optimistic moments—that it can't happen here, does everything possible to keep it from happening. For decades now he has been promoting, and fighting for, genuine democracy, common sense, skepticism, mental and spiritual avidity, a progressive political mood and urge, and resistance to economic, social, and political evils and abuses which in all too many American towns, big and small, have gone too long unchallenged. He has become as much an institution in Cleveland as the Public Square or the Tom Johnson monument.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THAT it is—a genuine disaster. Stalin's continuation of his legal murders has not only struck a grave blow at the great Communist experiment which he is supposed to be serving, but it has altered the whole aspect and balance of the European scene, let us hope for the moment only. Well, his defenders will ask, has he not a right to punish traitors? Indubitably. He has the power to exterminate anyone he dislikes or suspects and apparently to induce each one, by force or otherwise, to confess his guilt. But it does not always pay to use the extreme penalty. These executions have been going on in Russia steadily, but they do not seem to have had a deterrent effect. Indeed, judging by public statements and the opinions published in the press, treason is more than ever rife. Plainly something is radically wrong. Either the men who rise to the top in Russian official and industrial life are a set of loathsome perjurers and betrayers of their own countrymen, or the system—as administered by Stalin—is so intolerable that men will stop at nothing to cripple or destroy it.

Take those eight generals who were executed. It is openly said that they had sold out to Germany and it was explained that they were all inherited from the Czar's regime. If the latter was the case why were they trusted and advanced to such high rank? Why were they not always suspected and caught up with before they were in possession of the most important military secrets? There have been military scandals in other countries, notably in France, but somehow it seems impossible to believe that eight French generals would deliberately betray their trust and perhaps jeopardize their country by taking money from Hitler. Eight Benedict Arnolds at once—that would surely be incredible in any other country but Russia. Even granting that they were guilty, it seems as if something less than death would have served, if only from the point of view of world opinion. But Stalin is plainly utterly reckless of that, with the result that his prestige and that of his country have received a really dangerous blow.

When I denounced the previous judicial murders in Moscow some months ago, I was charged with giving aid and comfort to the dictators because I said that Stalin was forfeiting the good will of the liberal forces all over the world who had earnestly wanted to see the Communist experiment fairly tried. What can these critics say now? They must admit that these executions, with the resultant destruction of confidence in the Russian army, have given the greatest aid and comfort to the dictators, notably Hitler. If the generals have been in his pay, of course he knew all along of the rottenness of the army of his chief opponent in Europe. But the fact that the most reliable London correspondents are telegraphing to their papers that England is now ready to make advances to Hitler because of this demonstration that the Russian army is not the strong organization to lean upon that it was thought to be must fill the Berlin dictator with cheer and hope. If he can only tie England up in some other treaties, like that made by the two countries respecting the size of their navies, he will have a free hand in Europe. It seems incredible that England should ally itself with this man, but there has always been an element of powerful, diehard Tories in the Conservative Party which has wished a German alliance. Neville Chamberlain is more likely to yield to them than was his predecessor, Baldwin.

With England in an alliance with Hitler, what would become of the passionate demand of so many of our American liberals that we be ready to go to war on behalf of the democracies? (They included the despotism of Stalin as a democracy.) I have been astounded to find many liberals who are so shocked and unbalanced by the horrors in Spain that they are eager to have the United States fight again to save the remnants of democracy from Hitler and Mussolini. Perhaps if Russia now fades out of the picture, at least to some extent, they may recall that it was the last war on behalf of democracy that made possible the rise of the dictators all over Europe. Even our intervention in another war would not save democracy, but only destroy it here in America. Certainly the laws we now have on the statute books insure to us a fascist dictatorship the minute war begins and the military machine takes charge of the country. But many of these liberals have been so fanatical in their feelings about Russia that I suppose that they will still insist that all is well in the Kremlin and that Stalin is justified in purging his government of endless traitors.

Here the difficulty is that the more officials Stalin puts to death, the more certainly will there be demoralization in the work of his governmental bureaus. Officials who are absolutely honest and loyal cannot but be dismayed and disheartened and are certain to wonder where the lightning will strike next. I may be all wrong, but it seems to me as if the shootings of high officials were bound to produce the very curtailment in production of which Russia is now complaining. We get almost daily reports in the form of quotations from the Moscow press to the effect that this factory or that has fallen behind its quota, that the railroads are still doing very badly, and that there is an increasing mass of unrepaired machinery all over Russia. Can the Russians be held up to their duty by firing squads? Men who are sincerely devoted to the task of building a great new world order ought not to have the threat of death kept before them every moment. Who can work well or cheerfully if it is?

BROUN'S PAGE

Those Charming People

WHENEVER the newspaper publishers of America arrogate to themselves the right to take an inch they immediately proceed to give some innocent party the most outlandish sort of ell. At the moment the front pages and the editorial pages of very many newspapers in America are devoted to the brave deeds of the publishers in preserving a "free press." This traditional and undeniably vital right was saved by a little group of owners and agents who met in secret conclave in Chicago and at the end of their session gave out a short canned statement as to just what they had done to preserve the integrity of the news.

I believe that the working newspapermen and women of America have an even greater interest in free press and news integrity than any owner, and it worries us to learn that the complete custodianship of this sacred right should have been intrusted solely to such a small and secretive group. And the number of Swiss guards is growing smaller all the time. Every day brings the news that one or two or three more papers have collapsed or combined with their rivals. Whether this curtailment of the avenues of information is due to economic pressure or editorial ineptitude I couldn't say. The truth lies somewhere between the two and constitutes a most unhappy medium. It may be that within the next five or ten years all American newspapers will be owned or controlled by four or five men. They will still be vociferous in their devotion to free press and the integrity of the news (although publishers seldom talk of this latter right), but in any case the question of what is true, and just where freedom lies, will rest with a definite oligarchy of the best minds or the biggest purses.

To a very considerable extent this condition already exists. The flourishing city of Cleveland has but one morning paper—the Plain Dealer. It is not a bad paper at all, although definitely on the conservative side, but if the Plain Dealer makes up its mind to use its editorial page or its news columns (such things have been known) to favor a particular cause the opponents of the proposition must wait until the afternoon to see what the Cleveland Press of the liberal Scripps-Howard chain has to say in rebuttal. And if the liberal Scripps-Howard chain does not rebut, then the inquiring Clevelander is left wholly to the mercies of Dan Hanna's Cleveland News.

Memphis, Tennessee, although smaller than Cleveland, is not precisely a river village and it has two newspapers, one in the morning and one in the afternoon. Both belong to Scripps-Howard. Possibly one ought to argue that Memphis is extremely lucky now that both its newspapers belong to a liberal chain, even though it happens to be the same one. I am not the person to argue the point, since as a Scripps-Howard employee I am naturally disposed to feel that my employers are wiser and more righteous than other newspaper owners. I can remember numerous good fights which they have made, but just for the sake of the argument and objectivity, I might admit the dim contingency that on some particular point at some future time they could be wrong. If this be treason, make the least of it. If by the widest stretch of the imagination anybody can imagine the Scripps-Howard chain being wrong, then it will have to be granted that when this legendary day comes, Memphis, Tennessee, will be out of luck. Only one version will be served to it.

After the recent convention of the publishers in Chicago a statement and a set of resolutions were issued which were prominently displayed in practically all the papers of the country. The statement announced that the Newspaper Guild was seeking to force the "closed shop" on American newspaper publishers. This is not accurate, and since the subject has been discussed at such length in so many conferences, it is difficult to believe that the publishers of America reported falsely through some inadvertence. The Guild is seeking the Guild shop, and there is a tangible difference. The linotypers' union (the I. T. U.) is a closed shop. A newspaper cannot hire anybody to work in its composing room unless he belongs to the union. I certainly am not quarreling with this arrangement. The I. T. U. trains men for the difficult craft which it represents. Indeed the union controls and assigns the jobs. Obviously the American Newspaper Guild does not and could not, if it so desired, have within its membership all men and women who potentially might be good reporters or copy readers. Accordingly the Guild is freely admitting that the publisher should have the right to hire whomsoever he pleases with the stipulation that at the end of a given period that person must become a member of the Guild. You may argue that the system is good or bad if you will, but it is not the "closed shop" as that phrase is familiarly applied.

In response to the publishers' statement I made a reply which was much shorter than their blast. It was approximately 200 words in length. A very large number of newspaper owners who had beaten their breasts as evidence of their devotion to a "free press" promptly threw the Guild statement into the waste basket and printed not a line of it. The Herald Tribune went to the fantastic lengths of printing an editorial in which it said that "Guild leadership" was working with President Roosevelt to muzzle the press. I think I have a right to claim a share in Guild leadership. I have seen Mr. Roosevelt just once in two years. We talked for two minutes. I said, "Mr. President, you are looking very well." One may not quote the President, but I hope I violate no tradition if I state that in his brief answer he made no suggestion of any kind that the American Newspaper Guild should proceed to muzzle the press. Far from having any such desire, I wish it were possible to unmuzzle the press so that it would construe "free press" to mean an obligation to report the other side of all controversies, even those in which the publishers themselves are parties.

BOOKS and the ARTS

HISTORY IN SWING RHYTHM

BY SIDNEY HOOK

CRITICAL philosophers may raise the question whether there is any such subject matter as philosophy of history. They can hardly deny, however, that there is a literature on the subject. When it is good literature, it contains some insights into the ways of man and gives dramatic emphasis to phases of social experience deemed morally significant. Usually the sharp urgency of a contemporary need or problem lends point to the historic construction. A common milieu or unspoken convention between author and reader makes it easy to discover what application is intended and what exhortation to the future is to be construed from the exhumation of the past.

Latter-day philosophies of history—with some notable exceptions—differ from those of Augustine, Vico, and Hegel not so much in fundamental assumptions as in declaration of allegiance to scientific method. I say "declaration of allegiance" to scientific method because almost invariably the detailed treatment proceeds independently of the canons of scientific method, when not in violation of them. In the end little is accomplished: style and insight have been sacrificed to a profitless erudition of doubtful reliability. The conclusions are not supported by valid principles of action and prediction but rest upon the backs of metaphysical white elephants. This is so even when the text is laden with the paraphernalia of statistical inquiry which more often than not serve as so much lattice work for weasel interpretations.

Professor Sorokin's massive work* is not easy to classify. It claims to be nothing if not scientific; but scientific in a sophisticated way. For it attempts to correct the uncritical prejudices of empiricism with a whole set of metaphysical assumptions, borrowed in part from Rickert and Dilthey, about meaning, mind, and the nature of the social sciences. It pits itself against many current doctrines and skilfully juxtaposes their relative strength and weakness to produce the impression that they cancel each other out. It bristles with charts, tables, and bibliographical references on almost every phase of culture. Despite his reliance upon second- and third-hand sources, the author has written a miniature encyclopedia.

And all to establish a very simple thesis. To understand the thesis it is necessary to grasp Sorokin's key distinction between types of culture or mentality. All cultures are either (a) ideational, (b) sensate, or (c) mixed. An ideational culture is one in which the basic realities are supernatural and immaterial. Values are conceived as absolute and eternal; art is predominantly religious and collectivist; its system of truth is based on faith and reason, and whatever science it has is vitalistic and qualitative. Its social organization is one of status and compulsion; its techniques of control, renunciation and dogmatic imposition of authority. Sensate culture has a pattern which is logically opposite. It is earthly and experiential. Its art is secular and individualistic. It finds truth in the deliverances of sensation. In science it is empirical, in ethics utilitarian, and in politics democratic. Its social organization is based on contract. Mixed cultures are all other types of mentality which combine and mediate between the elements of the other two. The most significant expression of a mixed culture is called idealistic, like the culture of Athens in the fifth century B.C. or the culture of medieval Europe in the thirteenth century. Here at the point of transition between an ideational and sensate culture a perfect balance is achieved between spirit and sense.

The conclusion of Sorokin's survey of the history of Graeco-Roman and Western civilization is that there is a recurrent fluctuation from one type of culture to another. "When one of the forms has completed its immanent course and has lived the span of time destined to it, it decays and is replaced, after the proper intermediary stages, by the other form . . . and so it will go until integrated culture or mankind disappears." Since each culture, according to Sorokin, is a logically unified whole, we are justified in expecting that pendular swings will be observed in the historical development of the constituent parts. He marshals evidence to prove that science, philosophy, law, political and economic organization "all change synchronously and in the same direction." With an anxious eye on the critics, these conclusions are hedged in with a number of half-hearted qualifications. There is never a return to the original position in its every detail, the rate of development varies, and the existence of vestigial traits and minor mutations is acknowledged. But the theme song repeated again and again in this million-word tract is: the law of the pendulum is the law of all social and cultural life.

Sorokin's construction is vulnerable at so many points that one is embarrassed to know where to begin. I indicate only the main lines of criticism. First of all, the basic conception of pendularity, as employed by Sorokin, is mystical and possesses no explanatory significance. All it tells us is that culture is now "hot" and now "cold," just as dresses are now short and now long. But why it is one thing now and not another, why it appears here and not there, now and not then—the crucial questions for purposes of scientific prediction and control—are left completely unanswered. Indeed, on Sorokin's own assumption that the process has "an immanent self-regulation and self-direction" such questions are meaningless. All he can assert is the tautology that it is the essential nature of culture (art, literature, etc.) to fluctuate from one pole to another. He introduces no principle of material determination, so that the only ground for his grandiose prophecy about the advent of a new period of ideational totalitarianism, even granting him his data, is a simple and risky induction from a few cases. So it has been twice or thrice, so it will be. In science, however, the observation of a genuine periodicity or fluctuation is never taken as a brute datum or ultimate fact. It does little more than mark the beginning of a problem, not, as in the present case, the close of an inquiry.

---

* Social and Cultural Dynamics. By Pitirim Sorokin. American Book Company. $6 per volume. $15 per set.

But are the fluctuations reported by Sorokin genuine? He engages in some fanciful interpretations to get all the data into his net. If one starts out with loose evaluating categories, makes selections from almost unlimited material, and refuses to be bound by a constant time interval for to-and-fro oscillations, any curve can be drawn to fit the facts. More important still, in his anxiety to stress the aspects of recurrence Sorokin reveals his chief weakness—an unhistorical approach to cultural phenomena. Take his strongest case. He traces the rise and decline of nudity in art as an index of the presence and intensity of the ideational and sensate modes of mentality. But he begs the question of the significance of nudity in different periods. He presents no evidence that the cluster of meanings associated with nudity are the same in the late Hellenistic, Renaissance, and contemporary cultures. Or he speaks of the recurrence of empiricism and overlooks completely the striking differences between the nature, origin, and cultural impact of the empiricisms represented by Epicurus, Ockham, and Dewey.

The very logic Professor Sorokin employs to investigate the nature of culture mentality is open to serious question. He distinguishes between a "logico-meaningful" and a "causal-functional" approach and sneers at those who restrict themselves to the latter for their lack of philosophic maturity and their inability to understand that by ordinary scientific methods we cannot grasp "the inward nature of phenomenal unity." What he does not see is that from the fact that a culture pattern, or a work of art, or a system of philosophy has a qualitative unity it does not at all follow that the determination which links their parts is strictly logical. Sorokin assumes that given the meaning of a culture, he can deduce what other elements are logically entailed and hides from himself by a verbal play about "essential natures" that he can only succeed in so far as he is dealing with definitions. The consequences of his belief that what holds for his definitions holds for concrete material is faulty description and sometimes downright absurdity. For example, it is alleged that ideational mentality or culture is marked by idealism, spiritualism, quietism, religiosity, mysticism, indeterminism, and qualitativism. It is easy to show that these characters do not logically imply each other; nor are they always historically involved with each other. The same thing is true for his array of sensate characters. Sorokin believes he can deduce characteristic musical differences from his conception of ideational and sensate cultures and hazards the guess that significant differences exist even in the interoceptive sense organs of those who fall within these types. It is truly amazing what complex intrinsic meanings Sorokin can read out of musical tones. One cannot but admire the keen ear which is able to recognize that Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" is "pantheistic rather than Christian, mystical rather than religious"—a judgment he quotes with approval to substantiate his claim that during the last four hundred years music has been sensate, whatever that may mean.

To be captious about special points where the author's learning is at fault would be unfair in a work of such immense proportions. On the whole the materials assembled, especially in the third volume, are useful in their own right. But except for those readers who still do not know that progress is a value term, it is a book altogether without wisdom. Spengler and Pareto, both unscientific in different ways, have nevertheless a sensitivity and insight which make their vast mythologies instructive. In Sorokin, however, even the homely truths of common experience taste flat in the quantitative sauce with which they are served. He makes up in intensity of feeling and disdain of other investigators, particularly those with sensate mentalities, what he lacks in incisiveness and vision. On almost every page this ardent protagonist of superobjectivity in the social sciences betrays a strong animus against empiricism, democracy, and temporalism. His very descriptions of the two basic cultural types are loaded with adjectives which express visceral reactions rather than scientific judgments. Only a bias so deep as to be beyond any intellectual discipline can account for the following. An extended survey is presented of the alternation between idealism and materialism, as technical philosophical doctrines, which indicates that despite the major radical shift from ideational to sensate mentality in Western-European culture, philosophy has remained predominantly idealistic. This is a vital difficulty for Sorokin's thesis even on its own uncritical terms. He disposes of it with the cool remark that "a certain predominance of idealism over materialism is necessary for the continued existence of human culture and society." Sorokin cannot here be referring to idealism and materialism as philosophies of life, for this would invalidate his whole thesis, since it would then follow that a sensate culture never existed.

Sorokin regards himself as a Neo-Thomist, but except for the general direction of his bias he is a weak representative of Neo-Thomism. He takes a grim satisfaction in his prophecy that the world is on the threshold of a new totalitarian culture. For all his idealism, he assigns little influence to human ideals in history and completely ignores the extent to which men, under certain conditions, can redetermine the direction of history. In his view historical action falls out of the realm of responsibility into that of fatality. Although he uses the language of science, and in certain critical asides also its method, the larger conclusions he sets out to establish are grounded in a metaphysical faith.

Cal. PUBLIC LIBRARY

BOOKS

Gauguin: A Family Portrait

MY FATHER, PAUL GAUGUIN. By Pola Gauguin. Alfred Knopf. $3.75.

THE most recent biography of Gauguin is deceptive in its title, for the author met his father but once, and then at the age of seven. His own experience as a painter, which permits him, he says, an insight into aspects of his father's life closed to laymen, hardly enters into the story. At least he adds little to the ten or more older biographies and omits much that is to be found in the writings of Gauguin himself. What is distinctive in this work, apart from the subdued and sober tone of narrative rare in biographies of modern artists, is the importance given to Gauguin's wife—the author's mother—the Danish woman abandoned by the artist in search of freedom and a cheap life. She is the inverted counterpart of the Scandinavian figures of Ibsen who are victims of their men's bourgeois success. Gauguin wrote her that all their sufferings were only the means to his public triumph as an artist, that one day he would return to his family and repay them with his wealth and glory. But if in some pages the story of Gauguin acquires a broader focus as the story of a family, this perspective is not maintained. With all his interest in family history, the author cannot escape the common practice of focusing so sharply on a single person that the field from which he emerges becomes blurred. The isolated man in turn appears incomplete and exists in a shapeless world which could hardly have provoked the responses of his well-defined being or engaged him in a productive career. In presenting his life, the biographer oscillates between the compulsion of surroundings and events and a fatality lodged in the hero's character, without effecting a view in which their connection becomes evident. He sees in his father's independence an inherited primitive nature (the famous fraction of Peruvian blood), but he speaks also, with a characteristic negative, of the "egoism that results from an absence of the conditions that might make one generous." In this independence and egoism Gauguin was not alone. The most violent affirmations and complaints of the artist, even when directed against bourgeois society, could be shared by the aggressive business men of his time: "I am strong because I have never allowed myself to be deflected by others, and all I do comes from within myself"; and he also cried out again and again in his letters: "What kills me is this damned struggle for money."

It is remarkable how little thought is given here to Gauguin's paintings as events in his life and as data of his changing mind, and to the latter as sources of his art. The illustrations in the book, especially rich in the little-known early works of Gauguin, are often better documents than the avowals of the artist himself. How could we grasp more plainly the change in Gauguin than by comparing the pictures he made while still with his family and the pictures of Brittany painted just after he had left them? In the first—to consider only the subjects—intimate, domestic scenes (even the nude woman is sewing), from the viewpoint of one who still belonged with the women, the children, and the middle-class surroundings in the paintings, though already in conflict with them; in the others, exotic, brutish peasants of a world which could hardly produce or enjoy such "primitive" pictures. And in painting "Bon Jour, Monsieur Gauguin" after a personal theme of the realist Courbet ("Bon Jour, Monsieur Courbet"), whom he valued as the prototype of the independent, sovereign artist, Gauguin shows himself as a lonely, shrouded figure returning in the twilight, greeted by an anonymous peasant woman at the gate, unlike the cultured patrons bowing before the great Courbet whom they have come out to meet in the open fields on his arrival in their town. The situation of homage in the latter—a unique and dramatic event—has become in Gauguin's painting an uneventful, recurrent moment of perfunctory sociability, suffused with the pathos of homelessness, twilight, and estrangement in a dream of grandiose recognitions.

MEYER SCHAPIRO

Fascism: Analysis and Apology

THE SPIRIT AND STRUCTURE OF GERMAN FASCISM. By Robert A. Brady. With foreword by Harold J. Laski. The Viking Press. $3.

THE FASCIST: HIS STATE AND HIS MIND. By E. B. Ashton. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

THESE two books, while covering essentially the same ground, differ widely in concept and in their treatment of the subject. Dr. Brady reviews German Fascism from all angles. He gives a description of its organizational structure in greater detail than it has ever been given in the English or any other language. He shows the inner connections between the various Nazi departments, lays bare their functioning, and exposes a structure most cunningly devised and put together for the aims in whose behalf the National Socialist Party was organized. His work goes infinitely further, however. It is the clearest analysis of the motive power of German Fascism and of the engineers who tend this political machine I have ever seen anywhere—a book both beautifully written and painstakingly organized, which no serious student of Fascism can afford to overlook.

On the other hand, I saw red when I read Dr. E. B. Ashton's "The Fascist: His State and His Mind." It is also a thoughtful piece of writing, lucid and easily understandable. He presents plenty of material to back up his theoretical position. But the approach is an entirely different one. His contention is that "if we, as non-Fascists, want to assert and justify effectively our stand, we shall first have to realize Fascism, not from our point of view, but from its own. That is to say, we have to find out what Fascism means to Fascists—not to any imaginary 'objective' observer. And to do that we must learn to discard our superiority, pocket our convictions for the time, and accept, if only for the sake of argument, Fascist pronouncements at their face value. . . ."

This tone of super-fairness and ultra-objectivity is found in every line of Dr. Ashton's book. At first I felt that this leaning over backward might be attributed to a desire to spare the finer feelings of these sensitive Fascists. "It is unfortunate that we have to admit," "much as it may disgust us, we must confess," "it is regrettable to say"—such sentences abound, always prefacing some justification of Nazi statements and theories. But I shortly realized that Dr. Ashton was ready to make a good many pro-Fascist statements on his own responsibility, statements entirely out of accord with the simple facts. A few choice morsels of this kind might be put on exhibition.

". . . According to the bulk of available non-Fascist information [note that consistent "non." No "anti" here. L. L.] there can be little doubt that in Germany as well as in Italy the coordination under the present regime is overwhelmingly voluntary and that the system is quite in keeping with the people's own ideas and expectations [page 39]. . . . In other words, that in the Fascist countries of today there is virtually no opposition irrespective of what their governments do to suppress it [page 41]. . . . Still the Fascist parties' bellicose potentialities cannot alter the fact that their basic functions are truly peaceful [page 49]. . . . Fascist red-baiting is not motivated by social antagonism but by the strictly political necessity of preventing the people from turning to something for which Fascism itself has set the emotional stage [page 102]. . . . Actually Fascism—this will sound like heresy but is really the key to the whole problem—does not restrict the freedom of the individual at all. What it not only restricts but exterminates is his individuality [page 119]. . . . Anti-Fascists would do well to realize that all signs point to a future in which, from the point of view of outraged humanity, German Nazis will provide much less material for atrocity stories than, for example, democratic Americans—the inventors of lynching and of the third degree [page 171]."

These and numerous other statements of the same kind stamp Dr. Ashton as directly sympathetic to some of the basic ideas in the Nazi handbook. It is dishonesty of the worst kind to pretend to oppose Fascism with these reservations. His insistence that he opposes Fascism from a democratic viewpoint is simply not to be taken seriously. He must have read enough to know that terrorism in Germany has not ended, nor is it on the wane. He knows that last year more than 3,300 years in prison terms and fourteen death sentences were meted out to the political enemies of the National Socialist regime. The opposition to Hitler and Mussolini is growing and not abating. How can he dispute the evident fact that there is no freedom in either Italy or Germany for individuals or for groups; that Fascist red-baiting comes from capitalist fear of working-class action? It is a downright untruth when he speaks of "Fascist unanimity in Italy." It would have been far more honorable to come out for Fascism directly with flags flying.

What is Fascism? It is interesting to compare the definitions given by our two authors. Dr. Brady defines it as "monopoly capitalism become conscious of its power, the conditions of its survival, and mobilized to crush all opposition. It is capitalism mobilized to crush trade unions, to wipe out radical and liberal criticism, to promote, with the sum total of its internal resources, economic advantage at home and abroad." To the contrary opines Dr. Ashton: "It was desirable (in Italy after the march on Rome) that economically everything should go on as before. An actively Socialist program was, therefore, out of the question. The two considerations were put together—and the new capitalist collectivism was born. Fascism is nothing else. From these two premises evolved, step by step, the whole Fascist ideology. . . ."

What about the rights of labor under Fascism? Dr. Ashton, an enthusiastic pessimist when he examines the future of democracy, becomes ardently optimistic over the prospects of the worker's future under the benevolent rule of Hitler and Mussolini: ". . . Summed up, this blueprint of a Fascist economic structure might read as follows: organization of the national economy into independent bodies along trade or industrial lines; within these bodies equal rights to employer and employee in determining wages and working conditions, with any sort of struggle strictly forbidden and the state installed in every organization as superior authority. . . . As in every other field the 'leadership principle' in economics represents not a superiority of the leader over his followers, but a division of functions between essentially equal parts with mutual obligations to be discharged in the interests of the collective body."

The economic leader is the plant owner, the proprietor of a big department store or other enterprise. Does Dr. Ashton seriously want us to believe that owners and workers in Germany and Italy have equal rights in the determination of wages, labor conditions? Has he read Dr. Salvemini's "Under the Axe of Fascism," to name only one source, with its compilation of evidence to the contrary? Dr. Brady does not mince words on this point. ". . . The leader has absolute authority in the conduct of all affairs in his enterprise, so far as these do not contravene law. In effect it is an employer-designated committee of specially trusted workmen whose duty it is to explain and interpret to the workers the will of the leader and to convey to the leader, for his consideration, complaints made by the followers. . . ." These are things as they really are in Germany and Italy today.

Thus our two authors clash on every point from cover to cover. But even the most definite pro-Fascist will have to admit that Dr. Brady quotes Nazi laws and the highest Nazi authorities for every assertion. He does not—like Dr. Ashton—philosophize and theorize on the basis of pure abstractions but bases his opinions on recorded facts. It is interesting, in conclusion, that both books agree that Fascism has a chance to win in America and that democracy will be lost if its friends do not fight for its preservation. "When we ask today if democracy can survive," writes Dr. Ashton, "we are afraid that this cost may prove too high for those of us who would have to pay it. We are tempted to infer that they consciously want to sacrifice democracy. The truth is probably only that they cannot see yet how a system that is based on the interest of the individual can at the same time require the individual to restrict himself in the pursuit of this interest. . . ."

Contrast this defeatist outlook with the militant conclusion of Dr. Brady:

"Against an opponent who believes singly and solely in force and guile, force must be massed. The hope of the people of the United States is to be found, not in giving free rein to monopoly-oriented and Fascist-inclined capitalism, but in turning back to its fields, factories, and workshops, to those who fought its wars of freedom against a tyrannical power and who built, with their brain and muscle, all the real wealth and all there is in America which deserves the name of culture."

LUDWIG LORE

The Professors' Novelist

ANATOLE FRANCE, 1844-1896. By Edwin Preston Dargan. Oxford University Press. $5.

WHEN Anatole France found out that his secretary was taking notes on his intimate conversation, he was not perturbed. The kind of disclosures that Jean-Jacques Brousson could make—he prophesied—would first be treated as indiscretion, but gradually they would come to be looked upon as erudition. With this volume of more than seven hundred pages, published by the American branch of the world's greatest university press, sponsored by two learned societies, embodying the results of ten years' research on the part of a professor in the University of Chicago, we seem to have reached that consummation.

TRAVEL

FIVE WEEKS
in
SOVIET RUSSIA
A comprehensive tour under leadership of
WILL GEER
of New Theatre League, including attendance at the MOSCOW THEATRE FESTIVAL.
Sailing July 28. Tour including round-trip Third Class on the QUEEN MARY $595
THE OPEN ROAD
12th Floor
8 West 40th Street New York
Cooperating with Intourist

RESORT

TWIN PINES
A Camp for Adults
Individual screened sun porches, semi-private adjoining baths in de luxe [illegible] of new main house; comfortable bungalows. Tennis, handball, basketball, baseball, sand beach bathing, boating, fishing, etc.
For further details, address
TWIN PINES ON TROUT LAKE
S. SAIDEL, LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

Fight Fascism
by Helping Its Enemies!

Join the International Relief Association for Political Prisoners of Nazism, the only non-partisan organization which systematically gives aid to the families of the fighters against Nazism inside Germany.

Yearly membership fee: $10, including subscription to the IRA BULLETIN and other publications of the IRA; or $5, including subscription to the IRA BULLETIN alone.

Hitler—through his intervention in Spain today—is World Public Enemy No. 1.

Help Fight Hitlerism at its Base!

INTERNATIONAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION,
20 Vesey Street, New York City

I pledge ($10) ($ 5) a year for anti-Nazi relief in Germany.

Name ....

Address ....

Anatole France wore his laurel with a difference. Now that thirteen years have heaped a literature upon his grave, his immortality is more precarious than ever. The note of eulogy has been continually jangled by polemic and scandal. Even before his death critics and younger writers were beginning to tire of bouquiniste scholarship and originality that always took the form of pastiche, of anticlerical hagiography and skepticism that prompted a panegyric on de Lesseps. Irony and pity, when due to a lack of critical principle and an emotional instability, are reducible to dilettantism and sentimentality. What once passed for paganism looks today like a discreet blend of pedantry and pornography. A. W. Schlegel expressed the change when he called Les voyages du jeune Anacharsis the adventures, not of a young Scythian, but of an old Parisian.

The fact that so many works on Anatole France already exist is precisely the warrant for Professor Dargan's study. He has a remarkably full collection of fiches on the subject, and he has put them all at the service of his readers. They comprise a book that contains no new revelations and adapts itself to no thesis, but furnishes a reliable digest of biographical knowledge and critical interpretation. We must regret that the plan was too comprehensive to comprehend the latter part of Anatole France's career. Breaking off where it does, the narrative places a somewhat grandiose stress upon the accession to the Académie. Yet its tendency to prefer personal motives to public issues covers the earlier period more satisfactorily than it could handle the Dreyfus Case, the South American tour, the war-time activities, or the apathy that greeted Anatole France's decease.

Composite photographs, though they may be slightly blurred, have the merit of being typical. Professor Dargan's sic et non faithfully mediates between the vicissitudes of opinion. When the most valuable portion of his documentation—an account of Anatole France's uncollected journalism—is added to the details of literary politics and the weight of criticism, he has presented us with the materials for a strictly measured estimate. It would help us further to understand so derivative a writer, if there were a more technical discussion of the stylistic and topical cross-currents which influenced his work—for example, the kind of orientation given to Thaïs by Mario Praz's recent study of the decadent movement. But that is merely to suggest that the present volume would be richer if it were based more on what Anatole France had read, and less on what has been written about him.

Anatole France is still a more accessible author than Zozimus the Panopolitan, and scarcely requires so scholastic an approach. Professor Dargan justifies his method by diffidence, but that seems a curious reason for producing such a big book. Even his most off-hand obiter dicta are likely to be unmarked quotations; the comparison of the relations between Madame Aubernon and Madame Caillavet to those between Madame du Deffand and Mlle. de Lespinasse is apparently borrowed from Ernest Seillière. It does not reinforce the authority for a simple biographical fact to cite American reviews of English translations of French works. And the assertion that Anatole France was in the habit of portraying elderly savants does not need to be put forward as a theory that originated in the minds of Gustave Larroumet and Maurice Barrès. We have only to recall Sylvestre Bonnard, Jérôme Coignard, and Lucien Bergeret, and to wonder what they would have said about humanistic studies in America.

HARRY LEVIN

FILMS

Harpo & Co.

OF the Marx Brothers it is Harpo this time that shines. Last year in "A Night at the Opera" it was Groucho, though of course Harpo's final swing on the scenery ropes was the seal of that picture's success. And Groucho is far from negligible now; as horse doctor, as medical examiner, as bookbuyer, and as the entertainer of a blonde whose affected "Thank Yow" he returns in such full measure, he is still to be felt somehow as the brains of "A Day at the Races" (Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer). Brains are always evident in anything these brothers do, no matter how silly it seems, and one always instinctively supposes that the creative burden has been borne by the deep-voiced humbug with the cigar and the mustache. In other words it is impossible to imagine "A Day at the Races" without Dr. Groucho in it and behind it. One would even miss Chico, who ordinarily is to either of his brothers as one is to ten. But it is Harpo that one will remember longest, because in this film he has managed as never before to braid a kind of beauty into his lunacy, and indeed to bestow upon the whole preposterous business a sheen of perfection. The film is as funny as any of its predecessors, and in addition it is more charming, more lovable. It places the Marx Brothers clearly among the few fine comedians of our day.

It is not at all easy to say what new thing Harpo contributes in the present case. The firm of Marx could get along very nicely without Harpo's harp and Chico's piano, just as it could dispense with amorous tenors and the other baggage it seems to think it must carry forever. The advance is perhaps in degree rather than in kind; Harpo is more of something. He is more the innocent, the natural. For no good dramatic or narrative reason, it must be confessed, a door is opened in the racing stable where the tenor's horse is kept and we learn that a village of Negroes exists outside—exists so that Harpo can play on it, and play an infinitely subtler tune than he has ever played on his golden Jumbo. He has in his hands a little pipe of some sort, which now he raises to his mouth and blows as he dances out among a few black children who themselves have been dancing in the stable grounds. They change their tune and their step to his; he moves on to other groups who do likewise; and in a few minutes he is leading them all, young and old, in wonderful figures across the film. His pipe is a slight thing and produces scratchy sounds, and nobody needs to be told that he himself is a loon in rags who prances somewhat clumsily among the accomplished dancers he has fascinated. But those facts are irrelevant; or rather they are relevant to the prime fact that the music of Harpo here is in his spirit, not in his hands or any tube of tin. He is the soul of innocence in masquerade, the genius of joy in a coat whose sleeves are too long for him and under a wig whose curls look ridiculously like excelsior. He is a child who comes at last upon the world of children he has always been looking for. He will not have it long. Soon he must be back in the plot, providing a foil for Groucho's ancient cynicism and trying his best to make people understand him.

MARK VAN DOREN

"This is a book which is unique of its kind, very badly needed and likely to excite more anger than anything yet published this year. . . . The story he tells has never been told elsewhere. . . ."
—RAYMOND POSTAGE in The New Statesman and Nation

WORLD REVOLUTION
1917-1936
The Rise and Fall of the Communist International by C. L. R. James
440 Pages $3.50
PIONEER PUBLISHERS
100 FIFTH AVE. NEW YORK

" . . . a book which will influence substantially the thought of our time. A great contribution to Socialist history."
—FENNER BROCKWAY in The New Leader, (London)

WAR IN SPAIN
A New 10c Booklet by Louis Fischer

As a result of his observations at the Spanish front, Louis Fischer has written a 56-page booklet, none of which has ever appeared in print before. Over 15,000 copies were sold in advance of publication! In this booklet which is published by The Nation, Mr. Fischer authoritatively analyzes the social and economic background of the war, discusses the progress of the fighting to date, predicts the outcome, and explains the international significance of the struggle. Every progressive should read it!

We will gladly ship copies directly to your friends without extra charge, thus saving you the time and expense of mailing. Send a list!

THE NATION,
20 Vesey Street,
New York City.

I enclose $.......... for Louis Fischer's booklet, "War in Spain," at 10c a copy. ☐ Ship to me OR ☐ Ship one copy to me and the remainder to the names attached.

Name ____________

Address ____________

____

____

Letters to the Editors

Two Denials

Dear Sirs: Mr. Lore in his imaginative record of my activities (The Nation, June 5) airily refers to "friendly assistance" given to me by "organized Nazi literature centers in nineteen American cities." I have no knowledge of such centers. I receive no assistance from them. I admire Hitler's achievement in crushing the peace treaty of Versailles. I do not, and never have, accepted the philosophy of National Socialism. I prefer horse-and-buggy democracy to fascism or communism.

Mr. Lore insinuates that I am spreading Nazi propaganda under various pseudonyms. That is an unqualified falsehood. I have written under various names, including "George F. Corners" and "Donald Furthman Wicketts," but never on any subject connected with National Socialism.

Mr. Lore's allegation that all the articles which have appeared under the name of "Dr. Claudius Murchison" and "William R. Sticher," coupled with the suggestion that they are masks behind which Nazi propaganda lurks, is patently absurd. I am not familiar with Dr. Murchison's literary activities. And who is "Mr. William R. Sticher"? If I have written all the articles appearing under the names of these two gentlemen in the last two years, they must have secured their copy by telepathy from my unconscious!

GEORGE SYLVESTER VIERECK

June 26, 1937

Dear Sirs: Ludwig Lore in a recent article mentioned my name, stating that I am one of the highest Nazi officials in America. To keep the record straight, permit me to say that I am an American citizen, have never belonged to any Nazi organization, have never had any contact with German government officials, and have not been in Germany since 1930. I am very much interested in German-American history and am carrying on extensive research in that direction. My findings I publish wherever there is interest, and I lecture before bodies interested in German-American history, no matter how they are labeled.

If the Cleveland historical meeting was inspired by Dr. Goebbels it most certainly is news to me, and judging by the presence of many American government representatives, including a Congressman from Washington, Dr. Goebbels must have many friends in America whom Mr. Lore did not mention in his article. The lecture I delivered in Cleveland was about Ephrata Cloister and dealt exclusively with this German cooperative experiment of the eighteenth century in the wilds of Pennsylvania. At no time did I hear any derogatory remarks about Jews during the entire meeting.

I am a firm believer in American ways of doing things and in all that our Constitution stands for, no matter what Mr. Lore says, and I have no mental reservations either.

KARL T. MARX

New York, June 25

Spartakus in Danzig

Dear Sirs: Stalin says Trotsky is Hitler's agent. Some liberals not only "do not know"; they say they "cannot know." Hitler seems to be clearer. In a series of articles beginning December 9, 1936, and continuing into January, 1937, the Danzig Vorposten, official Nazi organ, announced the arrest of 60 members of an underground organization, Spartakusbund, named after the league founded in 1918 by Liebknecht, Luxemburg, Jogiches, Ruehle, and others. The organization published Marxist works and imported anti-Nazi émigré publications. Materials seized condemned the Nazi attitude toward Bolshevism; favorably contrasted the U.S.S.R. with Germany; called for a waterfront strike against Nazi arms shipments to Franco; "agitated furiously against Nazi leaders and governments." According to Vorposten, American and English money was found in one Spartakus leader's room; these presumably came from abroad and were to be used "for sapping operations in Danzig."

And who were these Spartakus people? Vorposten gives the answer in the words of the Nazi police and prosecutor: The league "was created by followers of Trotsky to assemble all opposition supporters, especially followers of the dissolved Marxist parties." "The spiritual leader and organizer was the Jew, Dr. Franz Jakubowski," who became a Trotskyite in 1935, having previously been a Stalinist. The leaflets called for a new Communist Party, a Fourth International, and demanded "Hands Off Trotsky!"

Vorposten charges that Spartakus corresponded with Trotsky, "probably via the Polish mail." Worse: "a leading personality of the underground organization even visited Trotsky in Norway in the summer of this year, and brought back directives for the underground sapping work." The man is named: "the Marxist, Siegfried Kissien." It is a fact that Kissien, now an émigré from Danzig, visited Trotsky in July, 1936. He registered at a Hoenefoss hotel in accordance with police rules. The Norwegian Nazi press denounced his visit. Like all flesh-and-blood visitors, Kissien could not get to Trotsky without wide public knowledge of the fact.

In short, the Spartakus people sought "to make their organization a reservoir for all enemies of the state." Ten defendants, including Jakubowski — all really Trotskyites guilty of fighting Hitlerism—were thrown into Schiessstange Prison, tried by a Nazi court, and given thirteen years in a Nazi prison. Vorposten complained because Spartakus had "compared the Moscow show trial with the Reichstag fire trial." Pravda's comment on the Danzig trial should be rich—if any.

HERBERT SOLOW

New York, June 1

Radio and the Steel Strike

Dear Sirs: Last Friday evening, June 18, I sat down in front of my radio to get the latest developments in the steel strike. From 6:45 to 11:30 I heard seven nation-wide and local broadcasts devoted exclusively or partly to a discussion of the strike. Not one of the speakers had a good word to say for the C. I. O. and John L. Lewis or a word of criticism of the steel barons. That was no less true of the high-priced and presumably "impartial" news commentators than it was of the self-styled "rabble rouser," the Reverend Gerald L. K. Smith. My Friday's experience was fairly typical of other evenings at the radio.

Without attempting to pass judgment on the merits of the claims and counterclaims of the two contending parties, I question whether such one-sided propaganda is fair to the thousands of C. I. O. members, to the millions of still unorganized workers who, sooner or later, will have to take a definite stand on C. I. O. affiliation, and finally to the broad masses of American citizens whose aggregate opinion must ultimately play a part in the settlement of the controversy.

HARRY J. BREVIS

Buffalo, N. Y., June 20

Time in England

Dear Sirs: As a free-lance journalist who has for several years made very good use of Time in preparing various articles, mainly for provincial readers, I would like to thank Dwight Macdonald for the brilliant and exhaustive analysis he has made of the control and policy of Mr. Luce's papers. Would it be possible to put out these articles in pamphlet form? I believe 200 to 300 copies might be sold over here alone. A good proportion of Time's sales here are to journalists, and it thus has more influence than its circulation figures suggest. I shall continue to buy Time but Mr. Macdonald has effectively confirmed what has become more and more apparent—viz: that objectivity is just a word.

GLYN ROBERTS

London, England, June 12

Correction

Dear Sirs: In his article on the Elk City Community Hospital, in The Nation of May 29, James Rorty said that the laboratory fee was $2. This was an error. Laboratory work is free to all our members who pay their dues. Also the charge for X-ray pictures is not $3 for each but $3 for the first and $2 for each additional picture.

M. SHADID, M.D.

Elk City, Okla., June 11

CONTRIBUTORS

ROBERT S. ALLEN is coauthor with Drew Pearson of the syndicated newspaper column Washington Merry-Go-Round.

ALLEN GROBIN, who has just returned to New York from a week in Johnstown, was formerly chief of labor-relations information in the Resettlement Administration.

ELIOT JANEWAY writes the monthly "Trade Currents" on the Far East in Asia.

LOUIS ADAMIC is the author of "Dynamite," a study of class violence in America, "The Native's Return," and other books.

SIDNEY HOOK is chairman of the Department of Philosophy at Washington Square College of New York University. He is the author of "Toward an Understanding of Karl Marx" and "From Hegel to Marx."

MEYER SCHAPIRO is a member of the faculty of fine arts and archaeology at Columbia University.

LUDWIG LORE contributes frequently to The Nation. His most recent article, What Are American Nazis Doing? appeared in the issue of June 5.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address [illegible] well [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] required for change of address.

STATEMENT OF THE OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT, CIRCULATION, ETC., REQUIRED BY THE ACTS OF CONGRESS OF AUGUST 24, 1912, AND MARCH 3, 1933.

Of The Nation, published weekly, at New York, N. Y., for July 2, 1937.

STATE OF NEW YORK } ss.:
COUNTY OF NEW YORK }

Before me, [illegible] Notary Public in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Hugo Van Arx, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the business manager of The Nation, and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, [illegible] true statement of the ownership, management (and if a daily paper, the circulation), etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, as amended by the Act of March 3, 1933, embodied in Section 537, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business managers are: Publisher, The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.; Editors, Freda Kirchwey, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.; Max Lerner, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.; Business Manager, Hugo Van Arx, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

2. That the owner is: (If owned by [illegible] corporation, its name and address must be stated and also immediately thereunder the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding one per cent or more of total amount of stock. If not owned by [illegible] corporation, the names and addresses of the individual owners must be given. If owned by a firm, company, or other unincorporated concern, its name and address, as well as those of each individual member, must be given.) The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.; Freda Kirchwey, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: (If there are none, so state.) None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in [illegible] capacity other than that of [illegible] bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than [illegible] [illegible] stated by him.

5. That the average number of copies of each issue of this publication sold or distributed, through the mails or otherwise, to paid subscribers during the twelve months preceding the date shown above is. (This information is required from daily publications only.)

HUGO VAN ARX,
Business Manager.

Sworn to and subscribed before [illegible] this 2nd day of July, 1937.

TERESITA GRANT.

(My commission expires March 30, 1939.)
(Seal)

WANTED

Young Man, 29, wishes to join one planning extensive economical trip abroad end of August. Box No. 937, c/o The Nation.

SUMMER RENTALS

FIRE ISLAND—SHARE MODERN SPACIOUS SECLUDED HOUSE. Ocean bathing. GR. 5-8736, 45 West 8th St., afternoons.

DANCE—ENTERTAINMENT

SPANISH NIGHT. Swim Dance Entertainment. Art Bazaar on Roof Garden. 104 St. & 5th Ave. July 9th. Ausp. Heckscher Foundation—Adm. 75c. Tickets at North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy, 381-4th Ave.; 2017 Grand Concourse, and Heckscher Foundation.

LIMES-LEMONS FOR SALE

Seedless Limes delivered prepaid $8.00 bushel, $4.25 half bushel, $2.25, 1/5 bushel. Lemons, $6.75 bushel, $3.75 half bushel. Oranges $4.00 bushel. A. H. Burket, Sebring, Fla.

FILMS

Attention NATION Reader!

Exclusive
FRITZ LANG'S
Original version of
"M"
with Peter Lorre
also "TSAR TO LENIN"
RARE DRAMATIC SHOTS OF THE REVOLUTION
WORLD 49 ST. 153 West nr. 7th Ave. | Circle 7-5747

LITERARY SERVICES

Special Articles, Reviews, Theses, Speeches, prepared to specifications. Convenient Service. Authors Research Bureau, 516 Fifth Ave., New York.

LANGUAGES

SUMMER SPECIAL. Language Records and 15 private lessons. French, Spanish, Russian, etc. $25.00. LANGUAGE SERVICE, 507 Fifth Ave., MUrray Hill 2-4221.

BOOK

HAVELOCK ELLIS
PSYCHOLOGY OF SEX
"The best one-volume treatment of Sex in the English language."—Carl Van Doren
$3.00 Postpaid
At Booksellers, or from
EMERSON BOOKS, Inc., Dept. 93-A
251 West 19th Street, New York

DO YOU WANT—

A house in England—an apartment—a room—an office—a ranch—a secretary—a piano—a lecturer—a tutor—a telescope—a grandfather's clock—a bicycle.—

All of these have appeared in our Classified columns.

Call the Advertising Department, COrtlandt 7-3330 by Friday, so your advertisement may be in the next week's issue.

RESORTS

The Fieldstone
on Round Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and recreation in the heart of the Ramapo Mountains, one hour from New York.

Swimming, boating, tennis, riding, golf and other sports

P. O. BOX 297
MONROE, N. Y.

TELEPHONE:
MONROE 2501

A descriptive folder will be [redacted] at your request

BARLOW FARM
Candlewood Lake, Sherman, Conn.
Modern conveniences, tennis, etc.
$20 PER WEEK
For information N. Y. MAin 4-8276, evenings

SCHOOL CAMP

LAKEWOOD
MODERN SCHOOL CAMP
CARMEL, NEW YORK

A [redacted] for boys and girls from four to fourteen [redacted] of age, where the keynote of happiness is in creative activity with a social environment developing [redacted]sibility and comradeship.

For reservations and further information write:
JAS. H. DICK

HOTELS

MANGER
" One Price "
FINER HOTELS
EXCELLENT CUISINE
RATES
Rooms From $3 Double From $4.50

All rooms have bath and shower. Hamilton, Hay-Adams, Manger have circulating ice water.

WASHINGTON

Hotel HAMILTON
ALL BEDROOMS AIR-CONDITIONED
[redacted] K N.W. Phone Dist. [redacted]

HAY-ADAMS House
ALL BEDROOMS AIR-CONDITIONED
16th [redacted] H St. N.W. Phone Met. [redacted]

Hotel ANNAPOLIS
H St. Bet. 11th [redacted] 12th N.W.
Rooms from $2.00: Double $3.50
With Kitchenette If Desired
FREE PARKING AT WASHINGTON HOTELS

BOSTON

Hotel MANGER
The Wonder Hotel of New England
In North Station. Phone CAP. 2600
Radio in Every Room

NEW YORK

Hotel WINDSOR
58th St [redacted] 6th Ave COL. 5-2100

OFFICE FOR RENT

A BARGAIN IN OFFICE SPACE

Two private offices with reception room, unfurnished, to sublet to desirable tenant. 620 square feet, airy, light and quiet. Suitable for lawyer or other professional firm or business. Convenient to all subways. Terms and rental price very reasonable. Apply Room 404, 20 Vesey St., Garrison Bldg., New York City. Tel. COrt. 7-3330.

RESORTS

FUN FOR ALL!
All sports facilities . . . Private lake! Swimming pool! Social and theatrical program directed by JOHN FORD, N. Y. stage director of "STEEL." Reasonable rates.

COOKS FALLS LODGE
COOKS FALLS, NEW YORK
N. Y. Office—250 W. 57th St.
Phone COlumbus 5-3690
RESERVE NOW!

The "Vacation Buy of the Year"
COPAKE
The Island Paradise
CRARYVILLE, N. Y.

—on Beautiful Lake Copake—in an unspoiled vacationland, 110 miles from New York City. Nationally selected [redacted] the "Ideal Camp." The only Resort with all lake front.

- MODERN BUNGALOWS WITH PRIVATE SHOWERS
- 18-HOLE CHAMPIONSHIP GOLF COURSE ON GROUNDS
- 10 FAST-CLAY TENNIS COURTS
- 6 HANDBALL COURTS
- SADDLE HORSES—AQUATIC SPORTS
- UNSURPASSED FOOD AND ENTERTAINMENT

July-August Rates from $32.50
N. Y. Off.: 116 Nassau St. BEekman 3-5590

CAMP MILFORD
The Camp with that Wonderful Spirit!
KENT CONN.
IN BERKSHIRE HILLS, ON BEAUTIFUL LAKE
Interesting social activities. Well Planned Athletic program. Wholesome food. Gay informality in a setting of rustic simplicity.
Write for Booklet
11 West 42nd St.
Penn. 6-7842
JULY RATE $29.50 Daily $5

Carefree! Friendly! Informal!
LAKE CHODIKEE LODGE
• • • • • HIGHLAND, N. Y.

Hampshire Players in Dramatic and Musical Repertoire. Adult Social and Athletic Activities. Lecture Forum. Private Lake.

RATES
27.50 UP

N. Y. C. 1202 Kings Highway, B'klyn, ES. 5-4330

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE
Pleasant Valley, N. Y., Dutchess Co.
An ideal place for rest. Beautiful surroundings. Wholesome food. Modern conveniences. Tennis, bathing, fishing, rowing. RATE $18 in June.
Louis Serkow Pleasant Valley 2741

Silver Birches, Canton, Maine. For discriminating women who want a quiet place that offers boating and bathing in a secluded and beautiful lake. Cabins with sanitary plumbing. Excellent table. Rates $15 to $20. Booklet.

RESORTS

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
Camp for Adults in the
ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG N. Y.

COLORFUL
CONGENIAL
COMFORTABLE
RATE $29.50 UP
Echo Lake Tavern
WARRENSBURG, N. Y.
City Tel. VAnderbilt 3-9875

UNCAS LODGE
UNCASVILLE, CONN.

Uncas Lodge

"Send for Booklet"

A charming, unpretentious modern adult camp and 165-acre New England farm. An ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.

- Private Twin Lakes
- [illegible] Clay Tennis Courts
- Saddle Horses and Golf
- 4 Ping-Pong Tables
- Unexcelled Cuisine
- Dancing to a Fine Orchestra

JULY RATE $24.50 PER WEEK
$4.00 per day

Phone: PResident [redacted]

STAR LAKE CAMP

In the glorious Adirondacks between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground for adults. 1800 feet elevation and right on the Lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Swimming, Canoeing, Handball, Baseball; Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Delicious wholesome meals that pep up the appetite. Rates $22.50 weekly.

Send for Booklet

New York Office:
116 Nassau St., Room 802a
BEekman 3-6345

VINEYARD LODGE
Ulster Park, N. Y.
"Garden spot of Ulster County"

Where peace and tranquillity reign supreme. Modern hotel midst beautiful orchard, vineyards and woodland. All sports, solariums, swimming, social activities. Rates $16 up. J. Rosenthal, Kingston 3430.

Hillcrest Lodge among the Watchung Mts. 25 minutes by train, 50 by car. C. C. of New Jersey, commutation reasonable. Golf, tennis, swimming, handball.
Plainfield, N. J. Millington 364

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL
37 MINUTES TIMES SQUARE
MAKE THIS YOUR SUMMER HOME
Recreational Facilities. Solarium Singles $6 [redacted]
SHeepshead 3-3000

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks, One mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, badminton, swimming and canoeing. Cabins. Guests met at Lake George. $20.00 and $21.00. Tel. 27-F-12. R. J. Venton.

IT'S DIFFERENT . . . Charming is the word for ARTEMIS. If you love beauty, solitude, or sports; good food and fun—Come! $25 weekly. Couples special. Write: ARTEMIS, Brewster, N. Y., or phone: Brewster 555F5. Management: Rogers.

BERT FRIEDBERG welcomes you to a comfortable farm situated on 150 acres of beautiful country. Always pleasant companionship. Good Food. Tennis, Swimming, Riding.
HIL-BERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y.
Tel. Bert Friedberg Mahopac 2083

RIVERSIDE INN on Lake Housatonic. Swimming, boating. 1¾ hours from New York. $3 per day. $18 weekly. Station Derby. P. O. Seymour, Conn. Tel. Derby 598-12.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 17, 1937 NUMBER 3

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 57
EDITORIALS:
VIOLENCE, LAW, AND LABOR 59
PALESTINE IS DIVIDED 61
LOYALIST SPAIN TAKES THE OFFENSIVE by Louis Fischer 62
WASHINGTON SWEATSHOP by Robert S. Allen 63
RUNNING THE INTERNATIONAL BLOCKADE by Albert Weisbord 64
SAVE THE ARTS PROJECTS by Elizabeth McCausland 67
GADSDEN IS TOUGH by Maxwell S. Stewart 69
AFTER CHAUTEMPS, WHAT? by M. E. Ravage 71
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 74
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
ONE FOR DIOGENES by Oswald Garrison Villard 75
GOLDWYN FOR PRESIDENT by George S. Kaufman 75
CORWIN VS. FIVE JUSTICES MORE OR LESS by Walton H. Hamilton 76
RUBBER STAMPS by Eda Lou Walton 76
SOCIAL CLEAVAGES IN THE SOUTH by Helen Merrell Lynd 77
RUMBLES ON THE RADIO by Edgar M. Jones 78
OUR NATIONAL DISGRACE by Maxwell S. Stewart 78
SUMMER FICTION 79
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 81

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER
Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
Editorial Associates
HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

✶

"I HAVE NEVER SOUGHT TO PREVENT OUR MEN from joining an association," said Henry Ford in an interview dated April 29. "No one who believes in American freedom would do that." On May 26, at the Rouge plant gates, a squad of Ford service men (pardon us, loyal employees) "spontaneously" set upon a group of union organizers, beat them with blackjacks and "knuckles," kicked them when they were down, and ground loyal heels into their abdomens, in order to protect Ford's workers from being tempted by leaflets to "join an association." That fast-moving episode, which sent several men to the hospital before they could even say "Join the union," is now being reeled out slowly at the National Labor Relations Board sessions in Detroit. Like the Paramount film of the Chicago slaughter which has recently been a headline attraction before the La Follette Committee in Washington, it presents a case study in violence, blow by blow, and demonstrates that most of the blows so far have landed on labor's head—or below the belt. The fourteen defenders of Ford's Freedom have at least been indicted for "assault with intent to do great bodily harm less than the crime of murder" (but not much less). The Chicago police who with guns accomplished the crime of murder have not yet, so far as we know, been called to account legally. Will the Chicago Tribune, that vigilante of American journalism, please check up on this lapse of justice? Meanwhile we suggest that the N. L. R. B. or the La Follette Committee select as an early production in camera Terror in Ohio, with the National Guard and a big native cast. The S. W. O. C., for instance, claims to have photographs showing bayonet wounds inflicted by National Guardsmen on three boys who made fun of them. American freedom is, at the moment, looking down.

✶

IT IS OPEN SEASON IN NEW YORK CITY FOR Democratic mayoralty candidates, now that Senator Wagner has wisely chosen to stick to his Senatorial knitting. Chaos reigns in Tammany councils. Boss Dooling wants Senator Copeland, and the Senator is more than willing, but everyone else seems to agree with President Roosevelt that the Senator is only good for a laugh. Some want Judge Mahoney, but he would give Boss Dooling apoplexy. Sam Levy wants to run, but it is unlikely that a peanut politician could defeat La Guardia, even on a Tammany ticket. The truth is that the road is now open for another La Guardia victory. Whether he gets the Republican nomination or not, he is sure to corral a considerable share of the Republican vote. He will win the Labor Party nomination in September, and there is even talk, fantastic though it may seem, of his entering the Democratic primaries as well. When the election comes, he will have on his side most of the Jews, Italians, and Negroes, the labor and reform elements, and the ordinary man interested in retaining a dramatic fighter who is also an efficient mayor. If that isn't enough to win, New York had better be handed back to the Indians.

* * *

MADRID'S GREAT OFFENSIVE, DISCUSSED BY Louis Fischer on a later page of this issue, is proceeding swiftly as we go to press. After six days of fighting, government troops have captured six towns and nearly a hundred square miles of territory. This signal success has been made possible, according to Herbert L. Matthews of the New York Times, by the complete reorganization of the army, air force, and war industries, which has been pushed through by the Negrin government. For the first time in the war that is a year old this week the government troops are well equipped, thoroughly trained, and are directed by a unified command. Matthews speaks of the Loyalists' strategy as being "intricate" and "brilliantly conceived" for cutting the rebels' last artery of communications on the Madrid front. While it is too early to say whether this particular advance will go so far as to break the encirclement of Madrid, the fact that a successful offensive could be launched within a fortnight after the fall of Bilbao suggests that the government is far stronger than is generally recognized. Given a complete breakdown of non-intervention, which would enable the democratic countries to supply munitions in accordance with international law, there is reason to hope that the government may suppress the rebellion before another year has passed.

* * *

AFTER YEARS OF TENSION, OPEN FIGHTING has again broken out between China and Japan, apparently without deliberate provocation. The situation around Peiping has been increasingly tense in recent weeks. For the first time since the signing of the Tangku truce, in 1933, the Nanking government has been claiming and exercising a degree of power in North China. Irritated by their gradual loss of influence, the Japanese are reported to have brought pressure on the local authorities to break with Nanking. In the past Japan has frequently employed bold and illegal troop maneuvers in Chinese territory as a method of intimidating China. This time the Japanese were engaged in night maneuvers in the open country south of Peiping when they encountered Chinese troops who refused to be intimidated. In the struggle which followed the Chinese soldiers showed, as they had in Shanghai, that man for man, given reasonably modern equipment, they were fully the equals of the Japanese. The effect of the battle on the Chinese people was electric. All the pent-up hatred of the past six years seems to have exploded, and large groups of patriotic Chinese are demanding an immediate declaration of war against Japan. The days in which the Nanking government looked to Tokyo for its instructions have come to an end. Whether the present conflict will precipitate the long-expected war depends primarily on the extent to which the new Japanese government under Prince Konoe can restrain the bellicose activities of the military leaders. Japan's recent skirmishes along the Soviet-Manchurian frontier would seem to emphasize the folly of a protracted war with China at the present moment. But the Japanese warlords, like their kind elsewhere, have a habit of starting a great deal more than they can finish.

* * *

ALTHOUGH THE NEW IRISH CONSTITUTION, establishing Ireland as a wholly independent state, was adopted by a small majority in the recent elections, De Valera encountered an unexpected setback when his party failed to obtain an absolute majority in the Dail. The defeat is of little immediate significance, since De Valera can count on the support of labor and certain independents in matters of general policy. But it presages further difficulties for the Fianna Fail in the future. Mr. de Valera has been an extraordinarily good strategist in carrying out his campaign for gradual independence from Britain, and he has succeeded where the extremists of the Irish Republican Army certainly would have failed. His success, however, has been obtained at a tremendous cost. Years of economic warfare with Britain have greatly weakened Irish agriculture, and led to indefensible wastes in an effort to attain the will-o'-the-wisp of self-sufficiency. For a time his battle with the Crown was extremely popular. The majority supported him even at the expense of their economic well-being. But now that the struggle is all but completed, it is apparent that the Irish people desire nothing more than to return to normality. In order to offset this very human aspiration Mr. de Valera may have to invent a new devil to replace the British Empire.

* * *

THE SEARCH FOR AMELIA EARHART AND Fred Noonan is ending as we go to press. Now that the chance of rescue is all but gone it remains only to hope that the two aviators died many days before the search was over. Their death ends two lives that stood for gallantry and spirit. Miss Earhart in particular had become more symbol than woman; and this was rather ironical because she thoroughly forswore the conventional attributes of heroism. She was direct, unpretentious, hardworking. In spite of the publicity that flooded her activities and the commercialism which marked out her trail through the skies, she managed to convince a skeptical world that she enjoyed her profession more than the fame it brought her. She will be missed not because bravery is rare or sudden death a novelty, but because a symbol of high-hearted, reckless adventure is a continuing need of the human psyche—now, perhaps, even more than in other less commercial times.

BUT ALL THE GENUINE EMOTION THAT surrounds the loss of the two fliers has not suppressed a measure of criticism and cold appraisal. Apparently it is established that Amelia Earhart had scrapped the 500-kilocycle transmitting wave length universally used by ships at sea. Neither she nor her navigator knew how to send or receive messages in code and it was for this reason that she decided against an equipment involving an awkward trailing antenna which demanded added attention during landings and take-offs. As a result it was impossible for her to communicate with the Coast Guard cutter Itasca or for that vessel to use its radio direction-finder to take a bearing. Her decision appears, incredibly enough, to have been unknown to the commander of the Itasca, who frequently requested her to transmit messages on 500 kilocycles. Such an error of judgment seems inexcusable. Another focus of post-mortem attacks is long-distance flying when undertaken for no scientific purpose. To her credit Amelia Earhart never claimed any objective other than her own pleasure. But it still remains a question whether the government should permit useless and perilous flights that may, if disaster overtakes them, involve the expenditure of vast work and expense. Apologists insist that the rescue flight provided the Navy and the Coast Guard with an opportunity to use in an actual emergency equipment which would otherwise be tried only in set maneuvers. But no one pretends that the $250,000 a day spent on the search would have been needed for routine practice or testing. The tragic death of two fine fliers should force the government to reconsider its present free-and-easy policy toward flights of this kind.

* * *

THE C. I. O. HAS ADDED ANOTHER LINK IN the chain of labor strength that it is forging across the country. A seven-man maritime organizing committee, headed by John Brophy and including Harry Bridges, Joseph Curran, and Mervyn Rathborne, has been formed, and is starting its organization work in earnest. On the Atlantic Coast, where the former rank-and-file insurgents are now in power, the move to affiliate with the C. I. O. has received the approval of the Maritime Council. A National Unity Convention is scheduled for September in Chicago, at which time it is expected that the main work of consolidating 300,000 workers in a National Industrial Maritime Federation will have been accomplished. There are two stumbling blocks the new committee must confront immediately. One is Joe Ryan, still czar of the New York longshoremen. But it is clear that the C. I. O. will proceed with its work regardless of Ryan, who for some time has been making overtures to John L. Lewis, and that if Ryan goes along with the new movement it will have to be on C. I. O. terms rather than his own. The second stumbling block is the bitter struggle for power between Bridges and Harry Lundberg, head of the Sailors' Union on the Pacific Coast. Harry Bridges has now been appointed C. I. O. head of the West Coast. It is a post that Bridges has earned by his brilliant organizing, his tactical skill, and his popularity with workers outside as well as in the maritime trades.

THE INVESTIGATION OF THE AMERICAN Telephone and Telegraph Company by the Federal Communications Commission is now ended. It was hampered throughout by the skill with which the A. T. and T. handled its public relations. We shall comment later on the investigation as a whole. Meanwhile one bit of history unearthed by the investigation should be mentioned, especially as it has received no attention in the newspapers. Our largest public utility, the Bell Telephone System, advanced $20,000,000 in 1916 to the British government, under the goading of J. P. Morgan and Company. This demand loan was made in December, 1916, by the A. T. and T., the parent company, despite the opinion expressed a year earlier by the company's general counsel that its charter did not give it the right to lend money; despite the fact that in August, 1916, Comptroller du Bois had stated to President Vail that there would be no surplus to invest at the end of the year; and despite Vail's refusal in November to invest $5,000,000 in Morgan three- and five-year notes at the request of Messrs. Lamont and Davison. The bankers seem, however, to have had some mysterious power over the management, and in December the A. T. and T. sold $20,000,000 worth of bonds, and lent that sum on demand to the British government, through J. P. Morgan and Company. The argument used was that the loan was needed to preserve favorable industrial conditions in Europe—a curious argument, considering the fact that the A. T. and T. had nothing to export. The loan was repaid in February, 1917. But by that time the country was already far down the slippery incline that led into the trenches of the war to make the world safe for the dollar.

Violence, Law, and Labor

IN the labor struggle now being waged our sympathies are frankly with John L. Lewis and the C. I. O. We have the great good fortune to be living in the midst of a great renascence of American energies, and the center of that renascence is the new labor movement.

But that does not keep us from turning a critical eye on labor tactics when they merit it. The question is whether there is anything to alarm the progressive mind in the methods the C. I. O. is using to achieve its ends. The fact that the reactionary press is so violent about labor violence does not move us. If editorial javelins and columnists' venom could kill Mr. Lewis, he would have been dead long ago. But when Secretary Frances Perkins, in an official statement, condemns the sitdowns; when Mr. Roosevelt calls down a plague upon the house of labor as well as the house of capital; when even the New York Post declares for a drastic program of labor control, it is time to scrutinize charges and remedies.

The main charges are four: that the C. I. O. has been unable to control such "wildcat" moves as the shutting off of power in Saginaw, Michigan, the labor holiday at Lansing, and the guerilla warfare waged by some of the automobile locals in breaking the terms of the strike settlement; that it has resorted to violence and violation of property rights in its sitdown strikes and its picketing tactics; that it achieves a tyranny of the minority by throwing an industry into disorder through the action of a small group; and, finally, that its affairs are in the hands of a dictatorship which makes no accounting to the public. You have to thread your way warily through these charges, which vary in their truth-content all the way from substantial accuracy to the sheerest poppycock. The C. I. O. in its mushroom growth has not been able to move along the entire strike front with equal control of its constituent units. There have been cases of wildcat strikes, some spontaneous, some engineered by agents provocateurs of the employers. There have been instances of violence, although they have been fewer than we are asked to believe; and the sitdown itself, as we have pointed out, is not legal, although its legality is being forged in the crucible of social usage. The instances of tyranny by a strike minority have been few; far truer has it been that large majorities, long repressed by employer intimidation, have eagerly awaited the entrance of the C. I. O. into their field, knowing that its organizers meant business. As for the charges of dictatorship, they are compounded of hysteria and lies.

A good angle from which to view most of these charges is one that commands a view of the pay rolls of today and the ballot-boxes of tomorrow. The C. I. O. is the greatest threat that the holders of economic and political power have had to confront in our time. It increases their wage bills and challenges their autocracy in industry. And it enrolls in a cohesive labor movement millions of men whose votes will go far toward electing the next President and the next Congress. Put yourself in the place of these men who rule America's economic destinies. Would not this combined threat move you to take whatever measures you could, however desperate, to smash the organization that embodied this threat? Hence the drive to turn middle-class opinion against the C. I. O., a drive in which many liberals are unwittingly joining.

Another angle from which to consider these charges is one that commands a view of the Chicago Memorial Day massacre and the brutal beating of the automobile labor leaders by Ford thugs. We have just seen the Paramount news reel of the Chicago massacre. And we have been reading with an irrepressible nausea the details uncovered by the Labor Board hearings on the Ford beatings. We do not believe that violence justifies retaliatory violence. We do believe that violence begets violence, and that the violence of labor is puny and trivial compared with the mammoth violence used by Girdler and Purnell and Grace and Ford. It is significant to compare what has happened since the automobile settlement and what has happened since the settlement with Big Steel. Wildcat strikes and guerilla warfare have broken out in the automobile area. There have been none in the Big Steel area, following the agreement between Myron Taylor and John L. Lewis. The reasons are not difficult to get at. The steel settlement came at the end of an arduous and systematic organizing campaign, kept well in hand by Philip Murray and his committee; and it was a voluntary settlement, without the fierce strike struggle that took place in automobiles. The moral is a dual one. If employers sow the wind, they must be prepared to reap the whirlwind; and if the wind consists of labor espionage, repression, and bitter strike-breaking tactics, the whirlwind will be a lack of labor discipline, sporadic contract-breaking, and violence. Where the C. I. O. has had a chance to do the painstaking, detailed work of labor organization and has not been swept into a strike by the pent-up and spontaneous sentiment of the workers, it has combined responsibility with strength.

All of which leads us to the conclusion that the approach to the question of labor responsibility and labor violence goes far deeper than any program of legislative control. There are two ways of insuring order. One is to create it by fiat from above. This method implies the use of troops, court injunctions, legislative outlawry of certain kinds of strikes and ultimately of all strikes and of trade unions themselves. It is the method which, innocently as it may start, finds its logical culmination in the corporate state of Mussolini and the totalitarian state of Hitler. Its method is to create a framework, ever tighter and more restrictive, within which labor is permitted to carry on. Its ultimate result is to identify "order" with the national will and the use of national force to suppress trade-union activities.

There is another plan—let us call it the "American plan," for it deserves that designation far more than the reactionary movements which have adopted it in the past. It recognizes that labor discipline is not a thing that can be legislated without the loss of civil liberties. Labor order is rather the organic outgrowth of a healthy state of industrial relations, and can be achieved only after such a state has been established. It would seek to restrict the role of the government in the industrial struggle to that of preserving civil liberties, setting minimum standards in industry, and providing the machinery which will facilitate a real meeting of minds.

The agitation for legislative control of labor today calls for incorporation of trade unions and publicity of accounts; revision of the Wagner Act to allow the employer the right to invoke a vote whenever he likes; the outlawing of sympathetic strikes, jurisdictional strikes, sitdown strikes, and all strikes not directly involving wages and working conditions; and, often, compulsory arbitration. To our mind, while the individual items vary in importance, the program as a whole is dangerous.

The provisions for incorporating trade unions and for publicity of accounts can serve no useful purpose, and they are subject to abuse. To compel unions to incorporate would be to coerce them into doing something which profit-making business establishments are not required to do. For a business man can operate, if he wishes, as an individual or in a partnership. Moreover, the Coronado cases showed that trade unions may be sued under the law even when they are not incorporated.

On the revision of the Wagner Act the case is more complicated. The general objection to giving employers the power to invoke the Wagner Act election machinery is a clear one. For employers will inevitably use it to scotch an organizing campaign at the outset. But we see no reason why the employer should not have the right to invoke the election machinery when an independent union asks for a contract. By asking for a contract, the union is declaring its readiness for a test of strength. We agree, moreover, with the New York Post that no strike should be allowed where the union is under contract, unless a violation of the contract by the employers is charged. The history of the garment unions is proof that a militant unionism can operate with strict observance of all contract obligations. But we do not by any means agree with the proposed ban on the sitdown strike, the sympathetic strike, or the so-called jurisdictional strike. The sitdown strike must be allowed to work out its own legal fate in the rapidly shifting complex of rules about property in the industrial situation. To freeze that fate now by prohibitive legislation would be both unfortunate legally and disastrous economically. The sympathetic strike, moreover, is an integral part of industrial unionism. The strength of that unionism lies in the united front of labor which it establishes all along the line of an industry. To ban sympathetic strikes would be to hamper industrial unionism at the outset. And to ban jurisdictional strikes would have much the same effect, since every C. I. O. strike in an industry where there is even a vestige of an A. F. of L. craft union would be construed as a jurisdictional strike.

There can be no doubt that American labor today must maintain discipline. But the discipline must for the most part come from within; it cannot be imposed from without. The final reliance for the maintenance of labor discipline and order must lie in trade-union democracy. We must remember that the energies which have produced a militant labor movement representing the greatest stride this country has made toward economic democracy are turned not only outward but inward as well. The rank-and-file enthusiasm that produces wildcat strikes is also the best insurance against racketeering, dictatorship, and irresponsible leadership within the trade union. But such discipline is not an over-night product. It is part of a civilizing process that must take time but is worth waiting for. America has not yet produced a good substitute for democracy, whether in government or industry.

Palestine Is Divided

As was expected, the Palestine Royal Commission's plan for partitioning the Holy Land into three segments has pleased no one. Zionist organizations have denounced it as a flagrant violation of the Balfour Declaration. Arab nationalists are equally incensed at a program which hands over to the Jews the choicest portions of the land in which their ancestors have lived for centuries. From an economic point of view, it is manifestly absurd to divide a tiny country of not more than 10,000 square miles into three distinct political and economic units.

Yet no one, least of all the Zionists and Arab extremists, would maintain that the mandate as it is now administered is even tolerable. The peace of the Holy Land was shattered by sanguinary rioting in 1925, 1929, 1933, and 1936, the disturbances of last year being much more severe than in any of the previous years. Conciliation and plans for inter-factional cooperation have been tried and failed. As Jewish immigration increased, the conflict between an emotional, irreconcilable Zionism and an equally uncompromising Pan-Arab movement has grown steadily more intense. Both have reasonable and legitimate claims to the whole of Palestine, and both are correct in saying that anything less involves a breach of faith on the part of Great Britain and serious political and economic disabilities to their peoples. The Arabs as well as the Jews have strong historic claims; but the Jewish claim is far more urgent in view of the anti-Semitic policies of the German and Polish governments. Although the proposed partition violates both of these claims, it provides a feasible plan of national self-government for a great majority of the present inhabitants of Palestine, and will permit somewhat greater Jewish immigration during the present critical years than would otherwise have been considered practicable by the British.

Once the principle of partition is accepted, the details of the commission's plan stand out as a reasonable compromise. While territory assigned to the Jews represents a considerably greater value per inhabitant than the land assigned to the Arabs, the discrepancy will be partially made up by extensive irrigation projects in the Arab portion. Similarly, it seems reasonable that the holy cities of Jerusalem, Bethlehem, and Nazareth should not be put in the hands of either group, and that the British have the right to expect access to the sea if they are to assume the responsibility of administering these cities. But the same protection for the religious shrines might have been secured if the British administration had been limited solely to the cities, and free access to the sea guaranteed in the treaties which are to be drawn up with the new states.

The chief danger in the commission's recommendations lies in the immediate future. Feelings are being aroused to a high pitch, both among the Zionists and the followers of the Mufti of Jerusalem. Despite the elaborate precautions which the British have taken, serious disturbances may be expected at any time until the final decision is reached. After the new states have been established, the opportunities for friction will be fewer, although it is quite possible that the bitterness which is now distributed throughout Palestine may center in Jerusalem.

The first Jewish state in two thousand years will struggle under tremendous handicaps. Everywhere enemies will be seeking to capitalize on the slightest misstep. Despite Mussolini's explicit assurances to the contrary, we may be certain that he will do all that he can to weaken the new Jewish state, if only to embarrass Britain. Arab hostility will continue to be an unsettling influence. And whatever policies are adopted will be twisted and misrepresented by the Nazis in their diabolic efforts to justify their anti-Semitic program. The difficulties will be magnified if the Socialists gain control of the new state, as is highly probable. No matter how moderate or wise such a government's policies might be, they would be held up as a terrible example of Jewish radicalism. And Jewish capitalists from whom aid would still be needed might find it increasingly difficult to reconcile their belief in a Jewish national home with their bitter opposition to socialism.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

It may be argued that the Zionist groups in Palestine are not yet ready to assume this almost terrifying responsibility. In some ways it would be much easier to go on under the present arrangement, sparring for time in the hope that conditions would improve. But the last ten years have seen an increase rather than a decrease in the problems which the new Jewish state must face. To prolong the status quo would mean only to insure the continuance of bloodshed and bitterness in Palestine.

Thus despite the obvious dangers which are inherent in the division of Palestine, the plan seems to make the best of a nearly impossible situation. A minority of extreme Zionist organizations may be expected to attempt to persuade the United States, because of its treaty obligation with respect to the Palestine mandate, to oppose the change. But if the League Mandate Committee approves the plan, we see no reason why the United States should stand in the way of an experiment which at worst will merely prolong a hopeless conflict, but which may contribute to the peace and well being of Jews and Arabs alike.

Loyalist Spain Takes the Offensive

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Madrid, July 11

"IF we win military victories, our internal politics will cease to be a problem for us," a prominent member of the Negrin Cabinet said to me ten days ago. The military, internal, and international situations all dovetail and improve or deteriorate together. Every Spanish Loyalist believes that the present government was put into office primarily to win the war. This is what the people expect of it and, above all, they expect signs that steps are being taken in that direction. "Offensive" has therefore become a magic word, for its use would indicate the beginning of a new phase which can end with victory. The first offensive need not be crushing; it need not bring the Loyalists into Badajoz or Sevilla. Its greatest significance would be psychological. It would break the ice. General Miaja, whose understanding of public sentiment is at least as good as his grasp of military strategy, knew he was touching the Spaniards' most responsive chord when he stated in his proclamation yesterday, "The offensive so eagerly desired by all has commenced."

The first few offensives will probably be partial and indecisive unless the enemy reveals a surprising weakness. They will be rehearsals for an army whose reflexes are those of trench warriors rather than those of rapidly advancing phalanxes. They will modify the map, and that is important, but in a larger sense their chief value lies in their modifications of the habits and fighting qualities of the troops. The moment the Negrin Cabinet was formed it energetically undertook to make the usually slow and painful transition from resisting to attacking. I believe that all observers were startled by the excellent and quick results. From what I have seen on various fronts, it is obvious that the Loyalist army is not only better equipped than it was several months ago, but it has mastered the manifold aspects of the use and care of its equipment. The authorities make no secret of this fact. Yesterday Loyalist aviators dropped leaflets over Madrid commencing, "The people's aviation is already here, reinforced and mighty, determined to deliver the last blow which definitely will free Madrid from the Fascists' claws." Such sanguine hopes would provoke resentment if recent performances did not justify the claim, at least in part. Without aviation no offensive is possible in this war, and from what we have seen in and around Madrid during these last few days this has become apparent to the government, and its air force has acquired a new striking power.

Military moves may solve political problems, but there are problems between the government and its opponents. Its critics have been hushed. Nevertheless, difficulties persist in Catalonia, which is so pivotal for war industry. In that province separatism joins with anarcho-syndicalism to become a thorn in the Cabinet's side. The separatists are not always loyal. Indeed, Franco has many friends among them. Separatism was a product of bourgeois economy in feudal Spain. But to the Anarchists separatism represents a desire to evade the central government's authority. This complicated situation is one which, it seems, will require the permanent attention of one or more Cabinet ministers with prestige, power, and tact.

My own view is that the relations between the elements within the government are far more interesting than the friction between it and those outside. The line of demarcation in Loyalist politics is becoming clearer. One camp consists of the Communist Party and groups or individuals who are ready to cooperate with it; the other camp is unfriendly to the Communist Party, although sometimes claiming to be more communist than the Communists themselves. The Communist Party has abandoned its earlier tactics of self-effacement. Irked by Caballero's attacks while it maintained a helpful, defensive attitude, it too has taken the offensive, and the result is that its best friends are worried. Its policies, they maintain, are wise, sober, and best for the new Spanish nation now emerging, yet its new-found ambition to dominate has unhealthy possibilities.

Washington Sweatshop

BY ROBERT S. ALLEN

Mrs. Norton, Chairman

Washington, July 12

THE Administration's wage-hour bill emerged from committee as emaciated as if it had spent the past month in a reducing cabinet. Once ample enough to cover some 12,000,000 workers, it now blankets a scant 3,000,000. Broad enough at one time to outlaw such practices as use of strike breakers and labor spies, it is nothing now but a wage, hour, and child-labor bill, and an inadequate one at that. It permits a proposed Labor Standards Board to go as far down the scale as it likes in fixing minimum wages but forbids it to go above 40 cents an hour. The sky is the limit in establishing a work week but this must never be less than 40 hours. Most railroad workers are exempted and so are seamen and agricultural hands of all kinds. Even the child-labor restrictions are loaded down with reservations. They do not apply to farm children or to those working for their parents or to those in whose cases the Children's Bureau may rule that work does not interfere with their schooling or harm their health. That leaves, as beneficiaries of the bill, those employees of manufacturing plants, mines, and public utilities whose products move in interstate commerce, plus railroad maintenance-of-way men—those, that is, who now earn less than $16 a week. Reduced to this gaunt ghost of its former self, the measure has little charm for most of its early admirers.

At the moment its chance of passage seems as slender as its new proportions. There are three reasons for this:

First, and most important, is the indifference of organized labor. Two years ago when the NRA was garroted by the Supreme Court, labor was extremely anxious for a wage-and-hour law. Today, absorbed in a fierce family vendetta, it has little time or thought for anything else. The C. I. O., making a desperate bid for power, has its forces scattered over a hundred fronts. It would like to have a wage-hour law but it is much more concerned with what Congress says and does about the sit-down strike and the massacre of workers in Chicago. Its leaders have had little time to think about new legislation. John L. Lewis did appear at the joint committee hearings, but he appeared with a statement an aid had written and thrust into his hand which inveighed against one of the chief provisions of the bill—Section V, permitting adjustment of wages upward above the 40-cent minimum. To correct that faux pas Sidney Hillman rushed to the committee with a fervid plea for the higher wage provision, but the damage had been done. The bill, as it was reported, had none of the provisions which Hillman hoped would be used to improve a large number of textile wages instead of just a few. Neither did it contain the ban against Southern differentials which Lewis wanted.

The A. F. of L., while apparently friendly to the bill, secretly has been sabotaging it. It has dark suspicions of the whole thing because it thinks the legislation was instigated by the C. I. O. This isn't true, but so vindictive are the Federation moguls that anything bearing C. I. O. approval automatically incurs their hatred. William Green, yessing and no-ing with characteristic pomposity, bestowed his pontifical blessing on the measure at the committee hearings, but the zeal with which the A. F. of L. usually lobbies its bills through Congress has been missing. In fact behind the scenes the Federation's official Congressional lobbyist has been sniping at the bill.

Members of the Senate Labor Committee were not slow to recognize this apathy or to take advantage of it by stripping the bill down to a shadow. To please the President, the committee members agreed to a wage-hour bill, but they saw no point in courting employer wrath if there was to be no corresponding gain in labor favor.

The second handicap under which the legislation labors is the threat of protracted debate on the Supreme Court issue. One of the principal objectives of Supreme Court reform is to insure permanence of a wage-hour law, but that fact will not prevent Congress from shelving the bill and stampeding for home if it gets a chance. The longer the Senate fight over the court measure lasts, the more the wage-hour bill's chance of passage dwindles. On the other hand if the court bill should be defeated, directly or by being sent back to committee, action on the wage-hour bill would be futile, for its fate depends on a change of the collective judicial heart.

Finally the death of William P. Connery, chairman of the House Labor Committee, was a body blow to the wage-hour bill. If Connery had lived the measure might already have been passed by the House. He knew the subject backward and forward, was wholeheartedly for the legislation, and would have lost no time in getting it onto the floor. His death brought to the committee chairmanship, through the rule of seniority, Mrs.

Mary T. Norton, henchman of the egregious, refulgent, and anti-labor boss Frank Hague of Jersey City. What Mrs. Norton doesn't know about the wage-hour bill would fill volumes. Administration leaders tried to dissuade her from taking the chairmanship but she insisted on her seniority rights. Their forebodings about her were well founded. Committee members are reporting that she has been secretly urging them to shelve the bill for "further study."

With Mrs. Norton's succession, the Administration had to reshuffle its whole plan of strategy. Instead of taking the lead in the House Committee it had to switch to the Senate Labor Committee. Unless the House Committee swings into line promptly and gets the bill onto the floor there is not likely to be any wage-hour legislation this year.

The Supreme Court fight makes up in zest what the wage-hour engagement lacks. So far the Administration definitely has the upper hand. It started the floor combat with a bang and has maintained an aggressive, hard-hitting offensive ever since, striking out this way and that with an ardor that has been missing in New Deal attacks this session. Floor Leader Joe Robinson, whether stung by the criticism on his desertion of Roosevelt in the relief fight, or for some other reason, has been on top of the ball and hitting hard. He has had excellent support from Senators Hatch, Logan, Guffey, Schwellenbach, Minton, and others. All have been merciless in exposing the hypocrisy of the opposition's arguments.

One of the principal weaknesses of the opposition is its oversupply of leaders. It has more prima donnas than the Metropolitan Opera Company. Several, such as "Kemal Pasha" Vandenberg and Bennett Clark, cherish presidential ambitions. Burke of Nebraska is an incorrigible grandstander and Burt Wheeler has so far abandoned his one-time liberalism as to consort openly with Alice Longworth, Frank Kent, and other reactionary storm troopers. None of the group is personally liked in the Senate and their malice is so great that other Senators are wary of them. Moreover, the opposition is badly split on the question of strategy. Old-timers like Borah and McNary are opposed to a filibuster. They contend it exposes the weakness of their position and, more serious, is certain to alienate public support. They want to center their efforts on a move to send the court bill back to committee. The maneuver admittedly is a last-ditch plan. It is their hope that the worthy Democrats who don't quite dare vote against Roosevelt and yet are against the bill will take this way out of their dilemma.

In the other camp is a group of amateur die-hards who see in a filibuster a chance for notoriety. Senator Joe O'Mahoney is representative of still another group. He is opposed to the court plan but he is also opposed to a filibuster or a move to recommit. As a member of the Judiciary Committee he had to take a stand and he wants his colleagues to have to take their medicine, too.

The Administration's plan is to let debate run until the end of the month, meanwhile making things as tough as possible for the opposition by recessing from day to day, so that no Senator may speak more than twice, and enforcing all other rules usually honored in the breach. At the end of three weeks or so it will start pressing for a vote. It has a majority of the Senate and is sure to win on the Logan compromise if it can wear out the opposition and force a vote. Filibusters in the past have been successful only at the end of a session, when adjournment was fixed by law or when trunks had been packed and there was no holding the boys. Neither condition prevails now. There is no limit to the session, and if the Administration will be tough enough it can smash a filibuster. It has the votes, and the opposition knows it. There is every indication at present that in the end they'll be counted.

Running the International Blockade

BY ALBERT WEISBORD

THE international control over Spain was established with the ostensible purpose of isolating the Spanish war through cutting off volunteers and rigidly checking the shipment of all supplies. How unevenly this control works to the ultimate detriment of the Spanish republic has already been reported by numerous witnesses. Jay Allen, for example, writing for Esquire Features, stated in a dispatch published on May 11:

> Over eastward, near republican Spain, it's tough. This correspondent's car was stopped and searched six times after he entered the twenty-kilometer control zone. One morning he drove to Dancharia on the rebel border and was not stopped until he was within twenty feet of a Carlist sentinel.

For anyone who tries to get into the left-controlled side of Spain there are almost insuperable difficulties to overcome. Even Norman Thomas found this out when he tried to enter legally. As for penetrating illegally, the chances are many to one that it cannot be done. Thousands of soldiers stand guard at the border. They watch the sea. They patrol the mountain passes, even the ones used by expert smugglers. They search every village, every tavern. Each week, at the border near Andorra or Perpignan, many arrests are reported, sometimes running as high as one hundred and fifty or two hundred. But no such arrests take place on the western border of Spain, where only reactionary sympathizers cross. Although the opinion is current that the French People's Front government favors the cause of democratic Spain, there is ample evidence, supported by my own experience, that if such favoritism exists it is certainly kept well under cover when it is a question of permitting left adherents to enter the Iberian peninsula.

Naturally anti-fascist forces in France conspire to defeat the effort of the French government and the international control. In many cities of France committees have been set up to aid republican Spain. Some are controlled by the parties represented in the People's Front, others by Anarcho-Syndicalists and other working-class factions opposed to the People's Front. Whatever struggles may exist between these sets of forces in Spain, I have found that the French committees cooperate to a certain point. At the important towns near the southern border of France the committees are links in an underground railway relaying left adherents into Spain.

Although the illegal methods of getting into Spain are many and ingenious, it is virtually impossible at the present time for any mass of volunteers to pass over the French border. The Mediterranean might appear an obvious route, but fascist vessels are warned in advance and make this trip exceedingly difficult, as was demonstrated by the torpedoing of the City of Barcelona, in which over one hundred persons lost their lives, including fifty Americans.

At one time the anti-fascist committees tried the daring scheme of sending a large mass of volunteers straight through the French guard, with the idea that, since the French soldiers are instructed not to shoot, only a few could be stopped. Such tactics, however, can be used successfully only once or twice. Now all the approaches are so well guarded for many miles in advance of the border, and the trains are so closely watched, that it would be impossible for several hundred men to be mobilized and concentrated in any part of southern France near the frontier without the authorities being fully aware of the situation.

Despite all these obstacles, however, if the individual Loyalist sympathizer wants to put up with a bit of hardship and is ready to take the risk of being arrested, there is always a chance of slipping through. It is still possible to find a friendly fisherman who will row you across some dark night from one point in France to another point in Spain. There still exist devoted friends of the cause who know difficult mountain passes not too familiar to the soldiery. Then there are dark railroad tunnels through which one can grope one's way despite the guards—a harrowing experience warranted to give one nightmares afterward.

Some have used the dare-devil method of racing the guard to the border. The road is a winding one that twists and turns just before the car that carries you to the border has to stop. You jump off your car at the point immediately before the last turn in the road where you would be seen by the guards. You run as fast as you can the several hundred yards of rough country hillside till you reach a point where the road has wound around and crossed the Spanish line. There, if you have beaten the French guards who by this time have seen you running up the hill, you may possibly be able to persuade the Spanish soldiers, often headed by officers who by no means love the proletarian leftist and would secretly like to cooperate with France in barring all reds, to let you stay in Spain and go on your way.

If you don't like to run you might try to walk across the frontier via the little village of "X" that stands astride the border, one part being in France, the other in Spain. This method calls for considerable histrionic ability. You arrive in the village one fine morning armed with papers showing you to be a respectable business man, preferably French, working for a firm shipping supplies into Spain. A shipment is supposed to be awaiting your attention there, and when hours pass and your stuff fails to show up you fume and fret in the cafes that line the road. You take good care to denounce the "damned Anarchists" to all and sundry, so as to ingratiate yourself with the "impartial" international control and the business men of the village. By the time late afternoon arrives, when the highway is extraordinarily busy with the loading and unloading of goods for the customs inspection, you casually ask to be permitted to telephone to some place in Spain from the Spanish side. You are so dressed that no one would possibly suspect that you want to leave France for good. Once having crossed the heavily guarded road to enter the cafe on the Spanish side, it is not necessary for you to return. France can see you no more. You can then go out by the back way, through devious side paths, until you reach the Spanish soldiers at the other side of the border.

The legal difficulties created by the People's Front government of France find a sinister counterpart in the activities of the French Admiralty operating under this same government. French consuls and naval officers working together have made it extraordinarily easy for fascists fleeing the Spanish government to get out of the eastern side of the country in order to pass through France and reenter on the western side controlled by France. Nor do the French Admiralty or consulates care whether they violate French law, Spanish law, or the rules of the International Control Commission to accomplish their end of aiding Spanish fascism. They extend their most cordial welcome to such reactionaries, give them favored treatment, and furnish them with consular escorts so that those in flight can pass through France, even though they may have no passports. These things I saw with my own eyes.

In the beginning of June I decided to get out of Barcelona into France as an evacuated refugee, that is, to get the permission of the French consul to take the French boat, Imetherie II, which each week sails from Marseilles to Barcelona to take out refugees who wish to leave Spain. The ship is under the watchful eyes of two representatives of the control commission who hoist their white pointed flag with two balls for all to see. I was interested to watch how the international control actually worked and what took place under the guise of evacuation.

Those who took the boat were, in the main, people who were afraid to leave Catalonia by train, who were friendly to the republic and therefore feared, whether justifiably or not, that they would be taken off and arrested. Under the protection of various foreign consulates in Barcelona thousands of rightist elements have been evacuated who knew that once outside the protection of these foreign flags in Barcelona their lot would not be an easy one. Most of the refugees on the trip I made were former nuns, pale, timid creatures, bewildered and plainly incapable of adjusting themselves to the stern realities of the life they had found outside their cloisters. Mingled with the nuns were a few families of the business class that had lost their all in the revolution and wanted to get out. Then there were others.

That these prospective passengers were suspect to the Spanish authorities was made very plain, once we had entered the pier and come before the customs men. Most of the voyagers, playing safe, were traveling light. But I, not having been warned, had a big suitcase and plenty of literature, including a map of Spain, pictures of the victims of the recent bombardment in Barcelona, and similar material. In my pockets, too, were military notes I had taken at the Aragon front, notes of interviews with some of the commanders at the Aragon headquarters. It was a jittery moment for me when the customs officials, searching my baggage, came upon this stuff plus a tourist's map which had been put out by a German company and, linking all this with my German name, decided to put me down for a German spy. Had they found the military notes I doubt whether I could now be writing this article. As it was, I had to spend some harrowing minutes before I got by the last inspection, with my military notes still safe, having convinced the Spanish republican officials I was not an enemy of the Spanish left but its friend.

I was one of the first passengers to board the Imetherie II, but I found ahead of me a faultlessly dressed passenger who, I am certain, had not passed through the customs. This individual was already ensconced in the best cabin in the ship. I should point out that the only accommodations for some 350 refugees who were to overcrowd the ship for the night trip were miserable bunks of straw in a filthy, unventilated freight hold. Knowing what sort of bunk had been given to me, I became all the more interested in this favored passenger.

Walking around the ship, I knocked into the delegates of the International Control Commission, an Englishman and a Dutchman. The British representative, I soon discovered, was a member of the British Naval Reserve. He evidently conceived his job on the commission as a fine opportunity to do some spying for the British Admiralty. His chief concern was the identity of every vessel, especially every ship of war, to be found in Mediterranean and Barcelona waters. The Dutch member, however, took his duties conscientiously. A newcomer, he was worried about the fact that the captain of the ship was not making him very welcome. Things looked rather suspicious, he confided to me.

It was the Dutch member of the commission who informed me of the manner in which the interesting passenger had come aboard. Before the Imetherie II had reached Barcelona harbor, a French destroyer had stopped the boat and placed this passenger on board. Thus his presence was unknown to the Spanish authorities. While the stolid Dutchman was puzzling over the question, I made up my mind to do a bit of sleuthing of my own.

I was soon in conversation with the stranger. He told me that he was a "special aid" of the British consul at Alicante. But when I questioned the British member of the control I learned there was no British consul at Alicante and that such small consulates never had "special aids." What was more suspicious was the fact that this "British aid" could speak no English and, although a Spaniard, had no passport of any kind. Later he unburdened the real facts. He was the son of a very wealthy aristocratic family now fleeing republican Spain. With the help of the French consul he had been able to get on board a French warship and then had been transferred to the refugee ship, since it would create a scandal for the French Navy to disembark private passengers. The French consul would take care of him and see that he got off all right at Marseilles. Once in France, he would go to the west coast, and from Bayonne would enter fascist Spain to help Franco.

I made it my business to check all these facts. Sure enough, as the boat docked at Marseilles and the immigration authorities came on board, one of the French consuls who had traveled on the boat with us took this stranger in first of all and made a special plea for him. He was then given a special pass for debarkation, and as I got off the boat at the same time he did, he asked me to help him find the prefecture of police. I accompanied him to the prefecture and saw that it took only a short time to fix him up with the papers necessary to stay and travel in France, to enter England if he so desired (London is the center of Spanish monarchical intrigue), or to go to the Franco side of Spain.

But he was not the only one the officials aided. As the Imetherie II steamed out of the harbor of Barcelona, it was stopped, and again a French warship drew alongside. This time six more passengers were deposited. All of them were well within the draft age; all of them, like the first one, were Spanish and were thus violating Spanish laws in fleeing the country. All of them were extremely reactionary in their views, as I found in conversations with them, and, with the help of the French Admiralty, most of whose officers are members of the fascist Action Française, were on their way to join the rebel side.

There was such a glaring contrast between this situation and the one that had confronted me when I had tried to enter leftist Spain that I determined to take up the matter with the representatives of the control commission on board the boat. But the British member declared his job was only to prevent the entrance of volunteers into Spain, not to report the escape of fascists from the leftists. If the French Admiralty violated the laws of France and of Spain that was not his business. If these favored refugees wanted to get into Spain on the other side, that was for the control in western France to worry about. The Dutchman wanted to help but felt he could not if the British member would not cooperate. And so the matter rested.

Save the Arts Projects

BY ELIZABETH McCAUSLAND

THE Renaissance lasted three centuries, the Age of Pericles and the Augustan Age each a half century; for the "cultural birth of a nation" our government allows less than two years. With drastic cuts in the Federal Arts Projects effective July 15, the arts in America are on their way back where they came from, to the status which made necessary the WPA and white-collar projects.

Yet already the Four Arts Projects have been justified. Since its first performance, February 1, 1936, the Federal Theater has played to more than 25,000,000, 87 per cent free and 13 per cent paid admissions. From October, 1935, to May 1, 1937, almost 60,000,000 persons have listened to 81,000 performances of WPA music units, many of them in orphanages, hospitals, community centers, parks, playgrounds, and churches. Besides murals, easel paintings, sculptures, and prints allocated to public buildings, the Federal Art Project has reached the public through its art teaching and through thirty federal art galleries and art centers established in Tennessee, Alabama, the Carolinas, Oklahoma, Florida, Utah, Wyoming, and New Mexico, all in communities where there were none before. More than a million people visited these centers and galleries in one year. The Federal Writers Project, handicapped by lack of publishing outlets, has not yet contacted its widest audience. It is expected, however, that the state guides will have at least 2,000,000 circulation.

In "Government Aid During the Depression to Professional, Technical and Other Service Workers," Jacob Baker, assistant to WPA Administrator Harry Hopkins, wrote: "It is only a wide popular participation in artistic activities of any kind that keeps the arts genuinely alive." By this test, the Federal Arts Projects have justified themselves. Nevertheless there has been incessant pressure to reduce expenditures for the arts. Critics argue that to employ 40,000 persons for fourteen months cost the government $46,000,000; and is art worth it? So the cuts continue, because of the Administration's failure to press for adequate appropriations.

In the Federal Theater, employing at the peak more than 13,000, 31 per cent of the personnel has been dismissed throughout the country, and Delaware, Rhode Island, Nebraska, and Texas no longer have a theater. This slash is characteristic of what has happened in the drought lands of American culture. Yet it was the hope of the Federal Theater Administration to build a theater belonging to the people. Indeed, it did so; witness the attendance of 14,000 children at one federal circus matinee—free. Or take Valley, Nebraska—population 1,000—where 800 men, women, and children tried to attend the Federal Theater performance; some had ridden 25 and 30 miles to get there. They wrote begging that the company be permitted to settle down there. But the Nebraska unit was wiped out. As regards community drama work, in New York City alone there are over 1,000 non-professional groups, attended each week by between 25,000 and 34,000 adults and children, which have given over 1,500 plays. All over the United States, in communities so remote and unprivileged that even "the road" had passed them by, this work has gone on.

On the creative side, New York offers outstanding successes, the "Living Newspaper," "Macbeth," "Dr. Faustus," "Murder in the Cathedral," and others, while the simultaneous opening in 18 cities of 21 productions of Sinclair Lewis's anti-fascist "It Can't Happen Here" was a major event in the American theater. In four months it played to 275,000 persons, grossing $80,000 at an average of 30 cents. "Macbeth," the Negro theater's Shakespeare improvisation, gave 144 performances to a total audience of 120,000, touring 4,000 miles, to close at the Texas centennial.

With metropolitan successes have gone important services to the stage, the revival of "the road" through 150 resident companies in 27 states, the revival of repertory, and the revival—notably in Los Angeles—of stage hits of ten, fifteen, and twenty years ago, such as "Potash and Perlmutter," "The Fool," "Madame X," "The Goose Hangs High," and "Ladies of the Jury," a great aid to students of the evolving American drama. The "Living Newspaper," a montage of cinema, stage, and political rally, is a definite contribution in form.

Of great value, though little advertised, has been the work of the bureaus of research and publication in New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Birmingham, Seattle, and Oklahoma City, cataloguing, card-indexing, and analyzing every play ever performed or published in the United States. The magazine Federal Theatre, published in New York, has filled a real need of the American people, treating of the theater in human terms. This publication has been discontinued.

So the Federal Theater, which brought the living stage to millions of Americans who had never seen a flesh-and-blood actor before—only one high-school pupil out of thirty even in New York City has—faces the future seriously crippled. This, despite the fact that it has won the support of playwrights like George Bernard Shaw and Eugene O'Neill, who offered their plays at extraordinarily low royalties because they believe in a federal theater.

"The salvation of the arts," the Federal Art Project has been called by Lewis Mumford. No less enthusiastic is Ambrose Vollard. The exhibition, "New Horizons in American Art," at the Museum of Modern Art in September, 1936, offered a visual record of the project's first year and won wide critical approval. There were then over 5,000 on the FAP'S pay rolls. Now almost 600 have been dismissed in New York City alone. Public demand for federal art may be seen in allocations made in New York in 18 months: 134 murals, with 800 separate panels; 4,000 prints; 2,950 easel paintings; 204 sculptures, including busts, panels, plaques, figures, fountains; 200,000 posters for libraries, hospitals, etc.; and the creative photography record, "Changing New York," for the Museum of the City of New York.

The Federal Art Project is notable for art teaching of children centered in New York City, though isolated examples like the work being done in Breathitt County, Kentucky, and in Hawthorne, New York, show what could be done elsewhere. In New York 30,000 children attend painting and modeling classes.

The use of art in mental hygiene is only beginning. At Bellevue Hospital in New York City art teaching is used for diagnosis, while at Hawthorne-Cedar Knolls it is used both diagnostically and therapeutically. Both theater and music have also been useful, the Federal Theater giving performances at Bellevue and the Federal Music Project working at the hospital and also at the House of Detention. Such experiments, though unfortunately confined to New York City, point the direction for other communities.

The Index of American Design, set up to record applied arts in our American tradition, ferrets out, collates, and makes accessible source materials in the field of design. The Shaker portfolio, the Pennsylvania German data, and the colored plates already produced in New Mexico of local textiles, hand-carved chests, and folk lore are invaluable. How the projects can be integrated is shown by the Community Playhouse in Albuquerque, New Mexico, where the building was erected by WPA engineers, the drapes woven by WPA women in Colonial Mexican designs, the furniture made by WPA craftsmen after Colonial period furniture, Mexican tinwork used for indirect lighting by WPA artisans, and murals of New Mexican scenes painted by WPA artists.

Music for music's sake has been the aim of the Federal Music Project. Founded because of the interpretative musician's plight, its emphasis has been on performance and on teaching, although through the Composers Forum Laboratory new music by contemporary Americans like Roy Harris, Aaron Copland, Howard Hanson, Roger Sessions, and Virgil Thomson has been given a hearing, while 4,000 other compositions by 1,400 American composers have been presented. Chiefly the FMP has given music back to the people, as the Federal Theater has given back the living stage. Thus it is not uncommon to hear Brahms wafted by a string quartette from the backyard garden of a settlement house.

An important activity of the project has been recording the folk music of America. Early Mexican, Texas plains and border, Acadian and Creole songs in Louisiana, bayou songs of the Mississippi delta, Kentucky hills folk songs, white and Negro spirituals from the Carolinas, settlers' songs and songs of Indian origin from Oklahoma, early Spanish songs from California, liturgical music from California missions, songs sung by the Penitentes of New Mexico, are a few of the types. Here, too, is aid for those seeking the American tradition.

Music teaching has been carried on by the group method rather than individually. Weekly throughout the United States 1,300 teachers have met with 200,000 students, aged 6 to 75. In Mississippi the classes number 70,000, in Oklahoma 300,000. Before the Federal Music Project's creation two-thirds of the 4,000,000 children in 143,000 rural schools were without music instruction. In New York City weekly attendance is 60,000; and in nine months prior to April 1, 1937, the total was almost 8,000,000. Participation of the Music Project in National Music Week is another instance of usefulness. Of the 13,300 musicians then on the rolls 11,000 took part in New York, Philadelphia, New Orleans, Detroit, California, Mississippi, Minnesota, and Oklahoma. Now this project has had lopped off a fourth of its man-power.

Least favorably situated has been the Federal Writers Project, smallest in numbers employed (about 4,000), and seriously handicapped by lack of outlets for its work. Even so, it has in print or in press 32 of the state guides, which are its most ambitious undertaking, a job of writing expected to win at least 2,000,000 readers in the 48 states. The impact of literature is not as easy to evaluate statistically as theater, concert, or gallery attendance. Nevertheless in a window display at project headquarters on East Forty-Second Street, New York City, almost two score titles are shown, including the best seller "Who's Who in the Zoo" and four small magazines published by project workers on their own time and with their own funds. The state guides are a collective adventure in that rediscovery of America which has been going on now for a decade. There are to be separate volumes for each state, Puerto Rico, and the principal cities—in all a total of 20,000,000 words, later to be condensed into six regional guides, the volumes to sell for about $2.00. Washington, D. C., and Idaho guides, already published, have won much favorable comment.

Collateral are the survey of federal archives and the historical records survey, which have salvaged valuable public documents. Folk heroes have also been unearthed, such as the New York fireman Mose Humphrey, a worthy companion of Paul Bunyan and John Henry. And a history of the Negro in America has been begun.

Such are the Federal Arts Projects in outline. "One of the gains of the federal work program," wrote Mr. Baker, "has been in its progressive revelation to the American public of the economic significance of cultural activities, which, instead of being luxuries that can be dispensed with, are enrichments of our lives, and material as well as spiritual enrichments." The Roosevelt Administration is dispensing with these enrichments, pleading recovery and economy. Yet in a conference in Washington June 25 with a delegation from New York, Aubrey Williams, assistant WPA administrator, admitted that the only solution of the cultural workers' problem is to establish a permanent arts project, since private industry and private patronage will never absorb these workers. To this end, the unions of the four arts projects are urging a permanent Bureau of Fine Arts, functioning independently under the President. By recognizing the arts' identity of interest and by consolidating administrative duties, pay-roll economies can be accomplished. On the other hand, the economic rights of the worker will be safeguarded, and artist control guaranteed. After the present crisis has been mastered, the next step must be to push this bill.

Gadsden Is Tough

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

Gadsden, Alabama, July 5

THE strike wave which has engulfed a large portion of the industrial areas of the United States in the past few months has not touched Gadsden. Well-to-do members of the community will tell you that this is because Gadsden workers are satisfied and will not tolerate outside agitators telling them how to run their affairs. More realistic observers will suggest that Gadsden has developed a technique which makes it unhealthy for its workers to show signs of dissatisfaction with wages or working conditions. For Gadsden may lay claim to being the toughest labor city in the United States.

Other cities have had riots, occasional shootings, and sporadic vigilante activity. But the reign of terror which has been maintained in the employers' interest in this small Southern town has not been spontaneous or sporadic. It has been well organized, coolly carried out, and incomparably efficient—so effective, according to local newspapermen, that it cannot possibly be overcome. On three separate occasions during the past thirteen months, labor organizers have been mercilessly beaten on the streets in the very heart of the city, twice in broad daylight. Other beatings, less public in character, have been an almost weekly occurrence. In addition the C. I. O. was charged with complicity in the bombing of a theater in nearby Attalla some weeks ago, and even more recently three C. I. O. members who were arrested with dynamite in their car were accused of plotting to blow up the automobile owned by the head of Goodyear's company union.

On the invitation of the local labor unions, a committee of prominent ministers, writers, and teachers, primarily from the South but including a few from the North, has been in Gadsden for three days investigating the alleged reign of terror. The committee has made every effort to conduct a fair and impartial survey of the situation. Officers of the company, city officials, and other observers have been asked to present their testimony along with that of the workers.

But the well-to-do portion of Gadsden has not exactly welcomed an investigation of its formula for maintaining labor peace. The members of the committee were shadowed whenever they went out. On the opening day of the hearings the City Commission issued a blistering statement which declared that the commission did not believe that the committee was "interested in the welfare of the community," and which ended very dramatically by asking why the group was devoting its attention to "this law-abiding community" and overlooking the opportunity of investigating conditions in many cities of the North and East. One of the members of the city commission assured the chairman of the committee that there was no trouble whatsoever in Gadsden, but added a moment later that he could not be responsible for the safety of the committee if it chose to carry out its investigation. The commission refused to grant permission for a public meeting of the committee in the municipal auditorium, and dug up an ordinance forbidding the distribution of handbills without a license to prevent the announcement of an open-air meeting. Yet the town is littered with bills announcing a speech which the mayor delivered yesterday lauding "peace, prosperity, and happiness." One of the larger hotels turned away several members of the committee because it had no riot insurance. Even the bricklayers' union, in whose hall the first day's hearings were conducted, found it advisable to withdraw its hospitality on succeeding days!

A few years ago Gadsden was little different from any other Southern town of thirty to forty thousand population. While never fully organized, it had more than a score of unions which were reasonably active. A general strike was staged in 1922 without undue violence. But there have been no strikes since 1934. About two years ago the three principal manufacturing concerns in the city—the Goodyear Rubber Company, the Gulf States Steel Company (recently acquired by the Republic Steel Corporation), and the Dwight Manufacturing Company (a textile factory)—began to take active steps to prevent the unionization guaranteed by New Deal legislation. Company unions were organized and a number of notorious thugs were imported as company guards.

The new anti-union offensive was formally launched on June 4, 1936, when Sherman H. Dalrymple, international president of the United Rubber Workers, attempted to address a meeting of Goodyear employees in the courthouse. Newly organized "squad men" from the Goodyear plant broke up the meeting and beat up Dalrymple while he was in the personal custody of the sheriff.

That worthy gentleman made no effort to protect his charge beyond saying, "Never mind, boys, we will take care of him."

Angered by the attack on their president, the rubber workers' union sent Gadsden eight of its toughest and most effective organizers. Headquarters were opened near one of the main corners of the city, a stone's throw from the police station. At one o'clock in the afternoon of June 25, about four days after their arrival, these headquarters were attacked by a mob of 250 Goodyear employees. They were completely wrecked, and the eight men who happened to be inside, including four of the "tough" organizers, were cruelly beaten. Although the police had been notified of the impending attack more than a half hour before it actually occurred, they failed to arrive until the job had been completed. Thereupon they arrested the eight victims and forcibly escorted them out of the city. No criminal action was ever instituted against any of the attacking squadron, although many were identified. A civil suit brought by one of the union men encountered cold hostility in the courts and was lost despite the fact that one of the defendants admitted being a member of the mob. When called before the La Follette committee, Mr. Michaels, superintendent of the Goodyear plant, admitted that 150 men had left the factory about noon on June 25 and had not returned until 3 o'clock. But he declared that he had instructed the foreman to stop them, and, failing this, that he had given strict orders that they should be docked for the time spent in extra-mural activities. However, pay-roll sheets showed that the men who had been identified as members of the mob drew a full day's pay.

If we are to credit the testimony of more than a score of Gadsden workers who appeared before the investigating committee, the attack on the rubber organizers was only the beginning of organized terrorism. Men were beaten up on almost any pretext, and frequently for no very obvious reason. One worker was attacked on May 31 and injured so severely that he was forced to remain in bed a week, merely because he refused to join the Gulf State-Republic company union. Another worker, employed at the Goodyear plant for seven and one-half years, was beaten so badly on June 7 of this year that he lost nine teeth, apparently because he refused to sign a statement declaring that working conditions are entirely satisfactory. There have been other cases even more serious, but in most such instances the testimony has been heard in private, since the victims fear that their lives would be put in jeopardy if any inkling of their testimony reached the public. Several witnesses have insisted that they were followed to the union hall when they came to appear before the committee.

In most parts of the country the Supreme Court decision upholding the Wagner Act has served to check company gangsterism. But not so in Gadsden. Practically all of the witnesses have agreed that validation of the Wagner Act was the signal for redoubled vigilance against unionism, particularly against the hated C. I. O. It happens that Gadsden is one of the few towns in the country where the local labor council makes no distinction between the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. But the employers insist that they are opposed only to the C. I. O., and that they have no quarrel with the A. F. of L. The distinction, however, has apparently not been made clear to the "guard men," because the great majority of the workers who have been beaten up have been A. F. of L. members.

The latest outrage occurred just two weeks ago tonight, on June 21. That morning a report had gone around the city that five C. I. O. organizers had arrived to unionize the plant of the Republic Steel Company. Rumor had it that these men were staying in the Reich Hotel, the city's most impressive hostel. About five o'clock in the afternoon a crowd of tough-looking characters began to congregate around all the exits to the hotel. Local newspapermen were tipped off to hang around and see the fun. A few minutes after five, two strangers came downstairs and walked up the main street. The "squad men" followed, cursing because three of the men had presumably gotten away.

When the two strangers were finally revived in a nearby drug store, they were identified as Dowell E. Patterson, representative of the International Typographical Union from Charleston, South Carolina, and the secretary of the Gadsden local of the same union. It was merely an unfortunate case of mistaken identity; no C. I. O. organizers had actually arrived.

Of course, physical violence is not resorted to with every rank-and-file union member. All of the conventional weapons used against unions elsewhere are also employed here. Scores of union members have been discharged on one pretext or another, usually a false one. Threats have been more frequent, and probably more effective, than actual violence. There is evidence that an extensive espionage system is maintained through the various company unions. The newspapers cooperate by emphasizing the fact that all Gadsden workers are satisfied with their conditions. For many of the mountaineers who have crowded into Gadsden in recent years to work in the new factories the average wage of 30 cents an hour, or $12 a week, may indeed seem like an adequate sum. But the fact remains that $12 a week really goes little further, if any, in Gadsden than in similar small towns of the North. And the wage is markedly lower than is paid by the same companies for corresponding work in Akron or Youngstown, where unions at least have a fighting chance.

At the moment the forces opposing Gadsden labor appear overwhelmingly strong, so much so that many sympathetic observers insist that any attempt by outsiders, whether by the government or unofficial groups like the present investigating committee, can only lead to a more crushing suppression of labor activity, possibly involving the sacrifice of hundreds of lives. If Gadsden could in some manner be isolated from the rest of the United States, as the local officials would desire, this might indeed be true. But it is impossible to believe that the forces which are at work elsewhere in the country will not eventually affect the deep South. The workers are determined to prevent a second secession from the Union.

After Chautemps, What?

BY M. E. RAVAGE

Paris, June 27

AFTER a year and fortnight in office the Blum government—the first ministry of the Popular Front and the first in the history of France to be headed by a Socialist—was forced to retire by an adverse vote in the Senate over finance. The voters cannot yet believe their eyes and ears. Not only the Socialist voters, who take it hardest, but all those who less than two years ago took the solemn oath to stand together, who subsequently went to the polls to keep the faith, and after the magnificent victory were assured that the government of their choice would stay where the will of the people had put it until the last fragment of the Popular Front program was converted into law.

They understand it all the less in that, on the surface, nothing has changed. They, the people, still stand solidly behind the majority they returned to the Chamber of Deputies (the only body they were consulted about, the only one they are ever consulted about), and that majority has held together beyond Léon Blum to the last. The Senate? But that is a chamber of "old beards" elected by limited and indirect suffrage. For over a year it has obediently eaten out of the hand of the lower house, unresistingly passing all the legislation submitted to it, until everyone was sure that it never again would dare upset a ministry willed by the voters.

Not only that. Outside parliament the Popular Front functions as loyally as ever. In numerous by-elections of recent date the four constituent parties have worked together with the same solidarity as in April and May of last year. On the very day the thunderbolt fell several municipalities and Paris districts elected Popular Front councils, and in the suburb of St. Denis the would-be fascist chief Jacques Doriot, despite his "Liberty Front" and the support of the Louis Marin group, was eliminated from his own stronghold by a smashing defeat in the very first poll.

How then could the Senate dare? The voters had for a year been told, and had believed, that "something had been changed in France" since May, 1936.

What is most puzzling is that Blum—the most courageous premier France has had in decades—submits. Constitutionally and by tradition he should have stayed where he was. President Lebrun (Ah, but he is an ex-Senator, a former president of the Senate even.) should have called on him, or at least on a Socialist, to form the new government. But Blum not only does not resist. He pleads with the National Council of his party, summoned by telegraph, not to insist on the point and to permit their deputies to enter the Chautemps government. He explains why: the country cannot now be exposed to the tumult of a general election, and since the Radicals have loyally shared the responsibilities of office with the Socialists, these cannot fairly refuse them a like cooperation. What he leaves to the imagination is that without support on their left the Radicals would have no choice but to turn to the center and the right. And that would mean the end of the Popular Front.

The National Council by a huge majority follows its leader's advice. In the back of its head, and in the back of the voters' heads too, the hope lingers that after Chautemps Blum will come back. One need not be a black pessimist to feel that, short of new elections (or revolution), it is a very faint hope.

Camille Chautemps has twice been Premier of France. The first time he lasted one day, the second a few months. Not because of his record but because of his personality and his political line he is essentially the transition leader. He sweeps away the left and clears the decks for the national union. His enthusiasm for the Popular Front is most lukewarm. In his very first public statement he called his ministry a government of "rassemblement républicain" (instead of rassemblement populaire). What with Sarraut and Queuille and Bonnet in his team, he could scarcely do otherwise. He promises to leave untouched the reforms of his predecessor but is somewhat vague about the unexecuted part of the program.

The Senate will doubtless vote him (or rather Bonnet) the plenary powers it has refused Blum and Auriol. But the stock exchange is not reassured, and the gold of the Bank of France continues to cross the Channel or go to Switzerland. At this writing it seems likely that drastic measures will have to be taken against the speculators (an embargo on gold?). If this occurs Chautemps will improve the treasury situation, reconquer confidence, and thus leave a better heritage for his successors. Who these will be depends upon whether the workers come out of their lethargy and react. And that in turn will depend on what line the Communists adopt. Thus far Thorez, like Blum, has counseled calm.

With Chautemps at the helm it's the "Stavisky gang" that comes back. But one would hardly guess it from reading the right press, or from conversing with conservative neighbors. In 1934 Chautemps was the ringleader of a band of thieves that rifled the public treasury, the chief of the mafia, the assassin of the "honest judge" Prince. But much water has passed under the bridge in the interval. Today M. Camille Chautemps, Premier of France, has saved the republic from Socialist chaos and incompetence; he has snatched the state from the grasp of Marxist revolutionaries to restore it to the parties of order.

The Communists, too, have grown in these three years —not merely in numbers but in wisdom and self-discipline. In January, 1934, they lumped radicals and conservatives together and consigned them to "the same garbage can," and on the Place de la Concorde their followers echoed the Croix de Feu's shouts of "Down with the thieves!" In 1937 they see in Chautemps merely the head of the second Popular Front ministry and vote him their confidence—with a good deal more fervor, one feels, than they felt for Blum.

Even the new finance minister is welcomed to the left fold by Messrs. Thorez and Cachin. Yet M. Bonnet has never made any secret of his unfriendly sentiments toward the Popular Front. He is a Radical of the same temper as Caillaux and the Senate majority. He too was tarred by Humanité three years ago with the Stavisky brush. In the devaluation debate last September he openly sided with the right against the government. But then the Communists themselves were not enthusiastically for that measure, and though supporting the government deemed it necessary to explain that they voted not for devaluation but for the integrity of the Popular Front.

To those who have followed the progress of the Third International in the U. S. S. R., in Spain, and in France these evolutions of the French Communists are not wholly unintelligible. Some other incidents, per contra, remain mysterious. How explain, for instance, Duclos's offer on behalf of his party to assume his share of responsibility in a government drawn more nearly in the image of the Popular Front (i.e., with a few portfolios distributed to Communists)? A year ago Blum pleaded with Thorez and his friends to do that very thing, without avail. Had they accepted, Blum's task would not have been so heart-breakingly difficult, and French history these thirteen months might have followed a very different course. Why after refusing it when the Popular Front was flushed with victory, did the Communists demand it when the Popular Front Cabinet was in its agony? And why after having refused participation to a Socialist premier who begged for it, did they offer it to a Radical one who would certainly reject it?

It remains to be said that, Caillaux having forced Blum out, Humanité now maintains that Blum should have resisted the assault of the reactionary Senate and refused to go; and that the seventy-two Communists have not made the slightest difficulty about voting plenary financial powers to Chautemps and Bonnet.

We are already beginning to hear disquisitions about Socialist wastefulness and incompetence—the first seeds of a legend that the Treasury deficit and the whole financial mess in which France now finds itself is a heritage of Blum and his confrères. Now it is perhaps true—Socialists themselves do not deny it—that the finance minister was the weakest member of the late Cabinet. He made a serious mistake in not resorting to devaluation earlier, and in not extracting all the possible profit from it when it was made. (But do we know all the obstruction he encountered in the country, in parliament and within the Cabinet itself?) He made a fatal one when, a little intoxicated with the triumph of his five billion National Defense Loan, he followed it almost immediately with another three billion bond issue at the same figure and the same interest rate. But to admit these errors, grave as they may be, is not the same thing as saying that V. Auriol, or the Socialists, or the Popular Front have plunged the country into the present financial crisis.

The French Treasury deficit is a very old story, as old at least as the World War. Governments of every stripe and color have had to tussle with it. But whereas Poincaré and Tardieu, Doumergue and Laval, enjoying the confidence of bankers and bigwigs, lost very little sleep over the problem, it has broken the back of every left government that has tried its hand at a solution—of Herriot in 1926, of Daladier in 1934, and now of Blum. Even a moderate like Flandin found it too much for him, and unless I am much mistaken Chautemps is not likely to fare any better than his Radical and center predecessors.

Senator Caillaux was brutally truthful when he told Blum that as he, Blum, did not have the confidence of the "investing public"—meaning the financial and industrial oligarchy—the plenary powers for which he asked to meet the situation could not be granted him by the staid and responsible upper house. But it was only part of the truth. Another fraction of it is that the crisis was deliberately hatched by the bankers and speculators—by artificially depressing the rente, by the massive emigration of capital, and finally by the elimination from the Banque de Paris et des Pays-Bas of its director, M. Finaly—the last man disposed to come to the aid of the government. In short, Léon Blum, whose term of office began in the midst of a strike of labor, ended in the midst of a strike of capital.

And the remainder of the truth is this: The French Treasury deficit has long ceased to be a purely financial problem and has become instead a political weapon whereby the privileged classes impose their will upon the voting masses, irrespective of what the latter may do at the polls. In this respect the money difficulties of the state are in a class with "the hereditary foe beyond the Rhine" and the antiquated Senate itself—a restraining influence upon those who in the lower chamber might be tempted to go in for radical social or economic reform.

The "French House of Lords" is a very curious institution. Nominally the majority at the Luxembourg, though it calls itself the democratic left, belongs to the Radical-Socialist Party. Owing to its indirect mode of election and its long tenure, the Senate has remained "radical," even though at the last general election the Socialists came out on top in the lower house. But radicalism in France is an elastic label. When one bears in mind that men like Caillaux and Malvy are influential Radical Senators one begins to understand Blum's difficulties there. The Constitution of 1875 deliberately erected the upper house as a kind of American Supreme Court—a brake upon the vagaries and extravagances of manhood suffrage. This function it has faithfully fulfilled. It is the radical Senate that has kept the French woman in subjection to the Napoleonic Code, though the radical chamber has again and again passed bills in favor of woman suffrage. It is the Senate which until last year resolutely set its face against all progressive social legislation.

Nominally, too, the Senate represents the agricultural countryside, the majority of its members being the mayors (and political bosses) of the provincial towns and villages. In reality, however, their constituencies are upper bourgeoisie, the feudal lords of industry and finance—in a word, the famous 200 families which despite all revolutions and under all regimes have remained the effective masters of France. There is the ironmaster group, the bank and insurance clique, the railroad delegation, not to mention the coterie of the titled landed artistocracy, and the rest of them. The working-class parties, despite their remarkable gains in the last thirty years, have to this day a bare ten seats in this stronghold of conservatism. It is no wonder that the Socialist platform contains a plank looking to the ultimate abolition of the Senate. The Radicals themselves have long advocated a like reform.

But the Popular Front Chamber majority and M. Blum have only themselves to thank if the Senate's feudal constituency is today in a position to make and unmake cabinets. It lay in the hands of the Blum government to break the grip of the twin incubus upon the Republic, or else to be broken by it. The friends and the press of the Popular Front have for more than a year warned them of these alternatives. The Popular Front program made it a simple duty for them to act and thus redeem their campaign pledges. The nationalization of the trusts—railroads, banks, and natural monopolies—was part of the platform upon which the present majority in the Chamber was elected. They could have made the Senate swallow this reform as surely as they made them swallow the forty-hour week and all the other progressive legislation which overnight raised France from being socially one of the most backward nations in Europe to being the most advanced. But to have triumphed under this head, the government should have acted swiftly—while the Senate and its constituency were paralyzed with terror by the strike wave and the rumors of revolution. It was under the threat of what the Popular Front—fresh and vigorous, and moving under the momentum of its own enthusiasm—might do that privilege and its representatives in the Senate submitted to the sweeping legislation of last year. It was in a mood to submit to a great deal more.

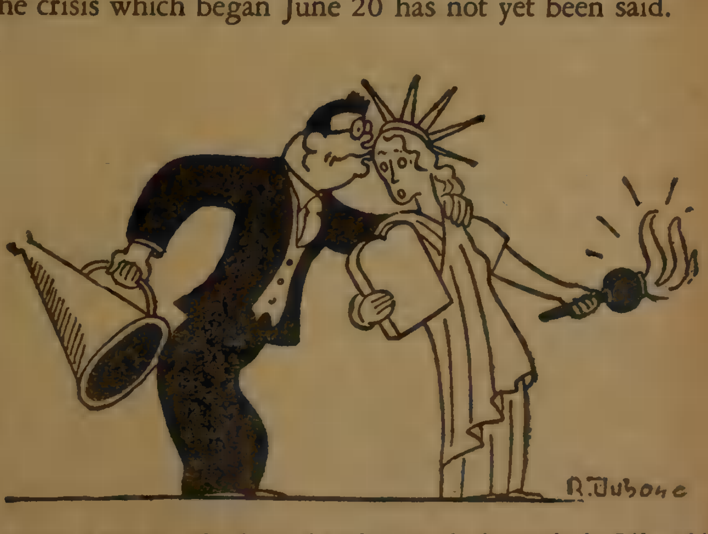
But the Socialists in the government, no doubt restrained by their Radical partners, let the historic moment pass. Instead of going on with their mandate to the end, they sought to placate the enemy, to win his confidence, to show him that they were not the extremists they were painted. To this end they dangled before his nose the reassuring legislation and financial "pause," and while the security of France and the peace of Europe were in the crucible they lulled themselves into imaginary safety by subscribing to the monstrously unreal and one-sided "non-intervention" in Spain. Thenceforward the offensive passed to the foe, and today we see the first fruits of that incredible folly. What are we likely to see tomorrow?

Since the Senate never made a secret of its dislike for the Socialist-led government, the General Confederation of Labor and many of the political and non-political member groups of the Popular Front made ready for possible conflict. Again and again we have heard in the left press, at meetings, on posters, and in the very Chamber that if anyone ever dared to touch the government freely elected by the people, he must be prepared to reckon with the people, with mass resistance, perhaps with a general strike or with revolution.

Today the crisis has come and gone and, in round figures, nothing has happened. There have been protests, a few posters lambasting the Senate, and a very vigorous resolution from the Seine branch of the Socialist Party. The Communists have not budged; not a single strike has broken out that was not scheduled before June 20. And, apart from a minor and very orderly demonstration near the Bastille, the masses have not moved.

Why? The answer seems to be that the change of government was not due to financial difficulties purely—that in the background lurked some new and undefined international danger. Léon Blum himself cryptically alluded to such a possibility on the morning after his resignation and again yesterday. Elsewhere the air is full of rumors and alarums.

I freely confess that I do not know what it is all about. I am aware—but so is everyone else—that Europe is nearer to war than it has been in twenty-three years. But there is nothing either new or undefined about that, and being near war in Europe does not by any means mean that war is imminent. Europe is chronically near to war; nevertheless there are pauses of peace and semi-peace at intervals. I know that "non-intervention" in Spain, unless the powers which have an interest in the status quo assert themselves vigorously and swiftly, is fatally leading to war, and so is the economic crisis in Germany and the incipient civil war that is rumbling in Russia. Certainly this is not the time to add oil to the flames by creating disorder in France. But the disorder is already here; the first stone was thrown in the Senate a week ago. Are the democratic forces forever to capitulate because the privileged classes have, in their terror before the advancing new order, set up a gendarme beyond the Rhine to bar the road to revolution? In that case I understand why the reactionaries of France have favored Mussolini in Ethiopia and Hitler in Spain against the patent interests of their own country. And I am beginning to understand what the French workers mean by "external danger blackmail." But I doubt whether the French people are going to let it fool them. I have a suspicion that the last word in the crisis which began June 20 has not yet been said.



Jacques Doriot—the kiss of Judas on "le front de la Liberté."

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Liquidation—American Style

NOTHING indicates more clearly the heat to which the passions of the day have given rise than the prevailing bitterness in some circles against all who dare to differ with John Lewis, the C. I. O., or F. D. Roosevelt in his attacks upon the Supreme Court. I have already pointed out that it is "off with his head" if anybody dares to disagree. If execution is not advocated, then the offender's past, back to his grandfather and great-grandfather, is raked with a fine-tooth comb to prove that at heart the rascal always was a Tory. In any case judgment is immediately passed on him and he is the target of unlimited abuse. He is rigidly liquidated from the ranks of the desirables. His motives are proved as black as those of any Trotskyist, and if we were living in Russia he would be shot at daybreak—loudly announcing his guilt. There is a fury about it all not in accordance with American tradition, but much more in the spirit of a Sicilian vendetta. If the appetite grows with the eating, so the successes of the New Deal and the C. I. O. seem to have aroused a fighting spirit which will not only brook no opposition but seeks to liquidate by aspersion anyone who ventures to dissent.

I am moved to these remarks by various amusing letters of hearty abuse The Nation and I have received in connection with my letter on labor, A Letter F. D. R. Ought to Write, in The Nation for June 26. That article has been widely reprinted in such dailies as the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, the Cleveland Press, the Chattanooga News, and the Des Moines Register and Leader, and has called forth an unusual number of congratulatory and defamatory letters. That is usually a sign that a particular article had some "punch" in it. But I confess I have not been prepared for the revelations of my hideous past which have come to me, especially from a gentleman in San Francisco. He has discovered that, inconceivable as it may seem, in bygone days while helping to edit the New York Evening Post, I daily commuted to my task "sitting in the same seat with John D. Rockefeller, Sr.," as a result of which apparently I committed the Evening Post to the support of Grover Cleveland's bond issues and his 1894 Pullman action. It's a pity to spoil this explanation of my treachery to labor in 1937, but as it happens I cannot recall ever having talked with Rockefeller, and when the 1894 events took place I, a boy just out of college, was somewhere in Europe.

However good this particular alibi may be, it will not save me from other blows. Here is a man from Washington who says I am "just another Walter Lippmann." That certainly liquidates me. Worse than that, from Denton, Texas, comes the word that there is no longer any difference between my writings and those "of such fellow-columnists as Frank Kent and David Lawrence. Mr. Villard's article might well have been an editorial in the Saturday Evening Post." Baltimore, Maryland, has been heard from, too: "I am referring to Oswald Garrison Villard, the last vestiges of whose liberalism are rapidly petering out in a pathetic and discouraging mess of legalistic and muddle-headed sentimentality." So I suppose that those who have written on the other side, including a P. W. A. worker just kicked out of a job, and the editors who have commended the article, are all in the pay of big business. What has particularly infuriated the protestants is that I have insisted that labor must not resort to violence because to do so would alienate innumerable friends. To this the answer is: "It would be advisable for Mr. Villard to take a job in a steel mill and learn at first hand what it feels like to duck a bullet."

Well, the opinion people hold of me is not of importance in such a crisis as we are in. But I am wondering whether the torrents of abuse will now be poured forth upon Governor Earle and Frances Perkins to liquidate them for their recent utterances. Speaking at the mass meeting at Johnstown on the Fourth of July, Governor Earle said to his labor audience: "But if you want to have the public sentiment on your side, you must end all violence." A little later he said: ". . . And I say to you, the second thing to do is for the labor unions also to offer a reward [for the dynamiters] to show the general public that they won't stand for violence of any kind. . . . Don't let violence and the breaking of contracts lose your public sympathy." Frances Perkins not only declares her belief that sit-down strikes are not "lawful, desirable, or appropriate," but adds: "In fact the officers of the department and the secretary have urged union leaders and members not to use the [sit-down] method and to bend every effort to take the men out of a plant where used." She then went on to declare: "I am opposed to the use of force and violence in labor disputes by the employers, as well as the wage-earners. . . ." Plainly these two very distinguished friends of labor have been reached by the "interests."

Well, I may be an apostate too, but I believe that the truest friends of labor are those who give it this advice—never to resort to force. I stick to that belief in the face of the very alarming reports published in the New York Times and other New York newspapers of the growth of the vigilante movement among employers, their determination to disobey the Wagner Labor Act and the decision of the Supreme Court upholding it. Labor is not the law-enforcing arm of the government; that power belongs to the duly constituted authorities, however weak or partisan.

BOOKS and the ARTS

One for Diogenes

INTEGRITY, THE LIFE OF GEORGE W. NORRIS. By Richard L. Neuberger and Stephen B. Kahn. The Vanguard Press. $3.

MESSRS. Neuberger and Kahn, although newcomers in the field of biography, have done a solid and satisfactory job. Their life of Norris is not as dramatic as it might be; nor is it distinguished by far-reaching interpretations of the national currents against which Mr. Norris has swum during all of his political life. But their facts are well marshaled and carefully compiled and they have shown good taste and skill in refusing to worship their hero or to become mere eulogists. Those temptations were surely hard to avoid, because the character of their subject does compel admiration, and because of the absolute, almost unique, fidelity of Senator Norris to his oath and to his conscience. He ought to be today the best-known and best-beloved man in Congress; hence this excellent volume is in every way justified. Had the Senator been a flamboyant, strutting person, he would be much better known than he is. His trouble is that he is not a great orator, only something vastly better, and that he does not go cavorting around the country to speak at every county fair. Instead he has just stuck to his job and earned the unbounded respect and regard of every political observer. Men marvel every time they look at him that here is one man in Washington who would absolutely satisfy Diogenes; who has remained unaffected by political considerations.

The admirable restraint of the two authors is never better shown than in their handling of what remains to my mind the greatest episode in Norris's career. His opposition to American entry into the World War was positively heroic and as an example of lofty and self-sacrificing patriotism is unsurpassed by any other act of personal devotion in our entire legislative history—of course I rank with him the other five Senators who voted against the war. My only regret in connection with the authors' description of his conduct during the period immediately before the World War is that they did not print in full the Senator's story of his going back to his constituents in Nebraska in March, 1917, to account for his acts, which story he wrote in detail to the author of this review on December 21, 1927. There could be no more dramatic episode than this man's journeying to Lincoln and taking a theater there to meet his friends and critics face to face. He was told he would be mobbed, perhaps lynched. Few friends met him; he was befriended only by a reporter whose name he did not learn for ten years. He walked out alone upon the platform. "I have come home to tell you the truth," he said simply. When he finished the crowd cheered and cheered, stamped on the floor, and whistled, which demonstration repaid him "for all the turmoil, the agony, and the suffering I have endured."

The authors have none the less done ample justice to this extraordinary event and to the magnificent speech Senator Norris made in his final, farsighted opposition to the greatest blunder this country has ever made. Other men have risked political extermination; as the authors have recorded, to few has it been given to live to see themselves completely vindicated. Mr. Norris's five associates in the Senate who voted with him on April 2, 1917, are dead; but when the twentieth anniversary of our entry into the war came there was not a single man as honored or as often interviewed in Washington as George Norris, whom almost the entire press of the country execrated in 1917 and accused of treason.

As this life sets forth, in the last twenty years, far from being embittered or rendered cynical, Mr. Norris has accomplished more for the plain men and women of this country than any other legislator in Washington. Indeed, this record is the story of the progressive movement in the United States during that period. But in 1923 Norris was so dispirited that he refused to run and was kept in office only by a trick. None the less he has built four great monuments to himself: his record in 1917; his saving of Boulder Dam to the American people and thus making possible the TVA; the Lame Duck amendment to the Constitution, with its change in the day of the inauguration of the President, and finally, his establishment in Nebraska of a unicameral legislature. All of these achievements are set forth clearly and correctly in proper perspective and also many additional fights and accomplishments. Here is the story in full of the dastardly effort to defeat him by running another George W. Norris, an obscure young grocer, in the primaries against him with the obvious connivance of President Hoover.

Despite all these attacks and base stratagems, Senator Norris has steadily risen, until in the last election he found himself praised to the highest degree possible by the President of the United States, who called him "one of the major prophets of America" and hoped that the people of Nebraska would keep him in public life as long as he lived. He is 76 years old now and undoubtedly serving his last term in the Senate, but personifying always the finest traditions and ideals in our American life. His credo is a short one, but if every man in political life would only live up to it as he has we should find that most of our political difficulties would disappear. Here it is: "I am not conscious of having a single selfish ambition. Neither money nor office holds any enchanting allurements. . . . I have received all the honor I can ever expect. I should like to repay the people by an unprejudiced and unbiased service in their behalf. I have no other ambition." While other men may have been similarly unselfishly devoted, to no other that I know of can also be credited such an extraordinary record of constructive achievement in his country's service. OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Goldwyn for President

THE GREAT GOLDWYN. By Alva Johnston. Random House. $1.50.

READING "The Great Goldwyn," you feel rather sorry that its hero is content to stay in the picture business. Here is that great rarity, a man who always gets his way—nor rain nor sleet nor Louis B. Mayer seems ever to have stayed him. Rival picture makers have wilted before his eloquent charm, or else fled for their lives; the most international of international writers have been no match for him.

So it would be fun to see him operate in some other field—politics, for example. Put him at a disarmament conference and all those present would certainly disarm if Sam Goldwyn wanted them to—or he would be at them again in the morning, hammering away until he conquered. And his victory would be the triumph of virtue—for Sam Goldwyn's way is the right way, as witness his present preeminence in the motion-picture field. Plainly, his are talents that should be put to work on behalf of his country. Goldwyn for President, and Charlie Chaplin, if need be, for Secretary of State. Certainly, before he got through with his appointments, we would have at least a handsome-looking Cabinet.

Alva Johnston's thin volume makes no pretense of being a full biography—it skims the surface amusingly, with many a bow to the Goldwyn anecdote, apocryphal and otherwise. In essence it is a not unfamiliar success story, no less remarkable because of its familiarity. From a Polish immigrant of thirteen Sam Goldwyn has risen to a high spot in our fourth or fifth industry (or maybe it's the third by this time). Somewhere along the line he picked up a sound sense of motion-picture values, and out of his early struggles he developed the power to fight for them. The result is written daily on a thousand screens.

Mr. Johnston makes you understand his hero thoroughly, and does it with the entertainment of the reader always as the first consideration. Maybe it isn't important, but it is gay and interesting and what is known as "easy reading." In fact, the publishers really ought to give away a hammock with each copy. GEORGE S. KAUFMAN

Corwin vs. Five Justices More or Less

THE COMMERCE POWER VS. STATES RIGHTS. By Edward S. Corwin. Princeton University Press. $2.50

THIS is a suit before the Court of Informed Opinion. The plaintiff is one Edward S. Corwin, a distinguished student of constitutional doctrine. The defendants are some five justices—more on some counts, less on others—of the United States Supreme Court. The cause of action is an uninformed application of the Constitution to cases affecting the New Deal. The USSC has declared invalid a Railroad Retirement Act, a National Industrial Recovery Act, an act for bringing order into the affairs of bituminous coal, and sundry other measures. Corwin demurs that the federal power over commerce has been arbitrarily narrowed, and that the results were reached through error. The cause is here for review.

In support of his suit Corwin submits an imposing indictment of recent judicial utterance. His brief is an argument uncompromising in its logical severity. It sets down some six theses from the records of the USSC for the notorious "October term of 1935"—all converting commerce into a legal category little touched by reality—and traces the doctrinal history of each from the days of Marshall into the Great Depression. To this task Corwin has brought intellectual resources of a high order—insight, industry, clarity, integrity, and courage; and the results of his inquiry are devastating. On each count the justices—one, five, six, or even nine—are shown to have strayed far from the path of orthodoxy. As national action has become more insistent, the words on parchment—upon which federal authority must be rested—have been pent within narrower confines. As he alleges, so Corwin proves. Recent constraining decisions are out of step with earlier statements of constitutional doctrines. Of that there can be no doubt whatever.

The error of the justices is proved, but the question of their intent remains. Corwin indicts but does not explain. The brief is all doctrine—its beginnings, its articulate statement, its departure from the norm of orthodoxy. But doctrine does not of itself go astray; nor is it a dialectical confusion which impels judges along the path of error to wrong conclusions. The novelty in doctrine is usually due to some urge from without—the zest for verbal adventure, the lure of new ideas, a public necessity recognized, a new interest to be served—which make yesterday's phrases live with a later meaning. In doctrinal terms we learn from Corwin exactly where the justices went astray, but nothing of the temptations which drew them from the beaten path. For the domain of commerce to be narrowed just when the federal government was asserting its responsibility for the rightful conduct of industry, we find to be appalling. But if the proneness of the justices for novelty had resulted in enlarging the concept of commerce to allow the national government to serve larger national needs, we should hardly call it error. In the USSC the real conflict has been between public control and leaving business alone. It has appeared as a clash between the commerce power and states rights only because judicial positions must be fortified by sanctions drawn from the sacred document. In the law reports preferences—and even philosophies—appear far more impersonal when wearing the liveries of doctrinal conflict.

The plaintiff Corwin asks for a mandamus compelling the justices to go "back to the Constitution." At the moment the question is moot. Since his suit was begun, the five justices who persist in saying "states rights" when they mean "laissez faire" have become four; the USSC has rediscovered—possibly from the Corwin brief—a number of lost interpretations; and the domain of federal authority has been enlarged. If in the future a judicial backsliding renders such an imperative necessary, we cannot issue a back-to-the-Constitution order. That document is an expression of the spirit of 1787. The language of the Fathers, the paths for their minds, their problems of policy belong to an age which is gone. The member of USSC most scrupulous about his oath to uphold the Constitution could not possibly recapture their contemporary meaning. But the Constitution is a charter for the state which has its enduring values.

Therefore the Court of Informed Opinion will hold its decision in abeyance. It will make judicial activities the subject of its constant observation. And it will, upon the petition of the said Corwin, order a rehearing of this cause—if, when, and as the USSC does not go "forward with the Constitution."

WALTON H. HAMILTON

Rubber Stamps

TWELVE POETS OF THE PACIFIC. Edited by Yvor Winters. New Directions. $2.50.

POEMS: 1929-1936. Dudley Fitts. New Directions. $2.

NOT ALONE LOST. Robert McAlmon. New Directions. $2.

ONE finds little in these three books of poetry to justify the name of the press publishing them. None of these poets actually takes a "new direction." Yvor Winters's group of poets are writing in the manner of the middle eighteenth century; Dudley Fitts is a cross between Cummings and Eliot; and Robert McAlmon, if a poet at all, is an imagist.

Yvor Winters edits "Twelve Poets of the Pacific"—Janet Lewis, Don Stanford, Howard Baker, J. V. Cunningham, Clayton Stafford, Richard Finnegan, James Atkinson, Ann

Stanford, Henry Ramsey, Achilles Holt, Barbara Gibbs, and himself. It is obvious (without Winters's preface) that these poets have worked together toward a common end and that Winters himself is the leader of the group. He defines their aims thus: "In the matter of conception, [it is] clarity, as opposed to contemporary obscurantistic tendencies, or, to put it otherwise, the expression of feeling in terms of the motive; in matter of style, [it is] purity, and freedom from manners, as distinct from the contemporary tendency to substitute mannerism for true originality." "This temperance we deify," as one of these poets says. But the clarity here in reality proceeds from nothing more than a formal substitution of mere rhetoric for subject matter. The feeling behind these poems is generally stultified; not one of these poets, with the exception of Janet Lewis, Winters's wife, eludes the dictates of a group. She, in her feminine and delicate lyrics, achieves authenticity.

As for the remainder of these poems, they seem largely rubber-stamped. Each poet looks for an agreeable subject, either in nature or classical mythology, and each is careful first to picture whatever he is talking about and then to generalize from his picture in a few, usually too obvious, statements about life as Life. The trouble is, I think, that under the leadership of the older members of this group (Winters, Stafford, and Baker) the younger poets have been taught to revere form out of all proportion to subject matter. They all write neat quatrains or rhetorical odes. Disliking "obscure" poetry, these poets evidently dislike also the attendant labors of thinking and feeling engaged in by most artists today. In rebellion chiefly against such poets as Eliot, Crane, Cummings, and others, the group often puts one in mind of the early romantic poets who, although still laden with the lumber of classical references and "poetical language," made much of their pretensions to rural simplicity. Stanford University, where the group meets, is indeed a rural community; but California has known dramatic events of late, and fascism sometimes seems closer there than in most states. Nevertheless one is unable to discover in these poems a word about the condition of the world today.

Dudley Fitts is not temperate or simple. His unusual rhythms, his ironic wit, his complex imagery, tending in general toward the vague and the merely suggested, are his own. Nevertheless, he is distinctly of the Wasteland school of poetry. Disillusioned and bored, his philosophy is half Eliot's despair, half Cummings's mockery. Fitts is a romantic, though he would probably deny it, and this world, uncongenial as it is to individualism, apparently does not please him. Technically he is very interesting, but he has essentially nothing very new to say and no entirely fresh or outstanding command of the poetic medium. He has written some quite musical lyrics and he is, indeed, a poet in love with words, not generally concerned with ideas. He takes, almost always—and with a good deal of complacency—the intellectual's skeptical pose.

Robert McAlmon is, in one sense of the word, not a poet at all. The verse in "Not Alone Lost" is really broken lines of prose—notes, as it were, on unusual images, clever ideas, and exotic scenes. McAlmon is more the short-story writer than the poet by temperament. If he were as interesting technically as either Fitts or any one of a number of Winters's poets, he might produce good proletarian verse, as his rousing, though faulty, poems about the Spanish Loyalists would seem to indicate. Unfortunately his lines are awkward, unmusical, and stubbornly rhymed against all reason.

EDA LOU WALTON

Social Cleavages in the South

CASTE AND CLASS IN A SOUTHERN TOWN. By John Dollard. Yale University Press. $3.50.

IN his "Criteria for the Life History" John Dollard set forth his belief in the life history of the individual as, in its own right, a valid method of social research; and through a searching comparative analysis of diverse uses of the life history, ranging from Freudian to anthropological and literary, he arrived at certain criteria of adequacy. For many of us this critical bringing together of methods of study hitherto used largely in isolation had the effect of making them spring suddenly into rich, new relationships, so that subsequent thinking involving them had to be of a much higher order. "Southerntown" represents the elaboration of one of these criteria: "the careful and continuous delineation of the social situation." Desiring to study the emotional development of Negroes, Dr. Dollard perforce turned to the study of the culture in which these personalities are rooted. His findings offer fresh material to the student of race relations; to the person interested in wider aspects of personality in relation to culture they give an excellent demonstration of the adaptation of psychoanalytic methods to community study.

Implicit in Dr. Dollard's approach is the assumption that there is no such thing as human nature independent of the social structure in which it is found. He stresses the fact that each individual is a specimen of a particular group, that men in the same situations tend to develop the same feelings. In so doing he goes beyond Freud's identification of Western European culture patterns with human nature, but does not recognize adequately the variations among individuals occupying the same social roles.

The basis for the emotional life of this Negro-white community Dr. Dollard finds in its caste and class structure. He uses caste as a social grouping which allows no vertical mobility in contrast to class, in which, theoretically at least, such mobility is possible. Caste, based upon physical differences, he regards as more important in determining individual personality and community structure, than class, which is the result of a variety of differentials, including economic factors. And yet the actual evidence at a number of points calls into question this primary importance of caste. Dr. Dollard points out, for example, that poor whites show "less than the predicated amount of resentment" toward Negroes, and that the greatest rapport is found between middle-class whites and middle-class Negroes. At times when he is nominally discussing caste distinctions he recognizes that the differences are actually those between lower-class Negroes and middle-class whites. Furthermore, many of the distinctions in economic advantage, prestige, sexual freedom, and so on, which Dr. Dollard attributes to caste would appear almost as strongly as class distinctions in, let us say, certain steel towns in the North.

The importance of this question lies in its bearing on where one is to look for determinants of social structure and of social change. Some lack of clarity in Dr. Dollard's class analysis may lie in the fact that his economic interpretations are not as completely interwoven with his thinking as are his psychological interpretations. One questions the adequacy of his historical analysis of laissez faire; one notices that the idea of increased production as a prerequisite of economic welfare is attributed to a psychoanalyst. In all the discussion of class the Marxian theory of class is not mentioned. It is not that economic data are lacking—an entire chapter is devoted to the economic gains of the white middle class—but rather that their significance is underplayed, and that they lack the support of such underlying theoretical analysis as is implicit in the psychological data.

What this approach does accomplish is to provide an indispensable corrective to an over-simplified economic explanation of the position of the Negro, and to show up the falsity and shallowness of purely biological or "racial" explanations—though here it is strange that there is no reference to Klineberg's work. There is admirable treatment of the way in which the habits and attitudes which we call the "personality of the Negro" have been built up through long years of learning "accommodation"; of the role played by epithets and symbols in the emotional structure of a group; of the significance of the patriarchal family pattern in building up the paternalistic attitude of the whites toward the Negro. The study of fear—of the Negro toward the white and the white toward the Negro—with resulting hatred and aggression, often misplaced, runs through the book and offers fresh illumination. This book, like Horney's "The Neurotic Personality of Our Time" and Dr. Dollard's own earlier work, is significant for what it points toward. It suggests new factors that must be taken into account in any study of personality and culture.

HELEN MERRELL LYND

Rumbles on Radio

NOT TO BE BROADCAST: THE TRUTH ABOUT RADIO. By Ruth Brindze. Vanguard Press. $2.50.

WITHOUT a doubt radio broadcasting deserves this book. It is a thoroughgoing ABC on how the American broadcasting system operates. In thirteen short chapters Miss Brindze analyzes the advertising playground of radio, touches on the ownership of the "air," patent medicine plugs, free speech censorship, news dissemination, and appends a full chapter of solutions. The theme of the 320 pages is the radio industry's biased treatment of political and economic thought. It may come as a surprise to Americans that their radio is after all just as full of propaganda as the broadcasts emanating from Moscow, Berlin, and Rome. The book explains that, because of the myth of impartiality in this country and the government's domination of the industry, the propaganda is inserted with relative subtlety. In short, the economic preachings are candy-coated with music and "friendly chats" during intermissions.

Like every other book, the volume has its high and low points. The high points are the fast-paced quotations from reports, speeches, and letters, while the low points may be found in the very occasional degeneration into pure "soap box." There is no question but that Miss Brindze has undertaken a diligent research into this modern-day problem. She marshals her facts and figures into a very convincing indictment of radio as it now operates. However, it is the opinion of many government, radio, and newspaper experts that she has been able only to skim the surface. The understandable assumption, perhaps, is that a more detailed treatment might detract from the pace of the volume as a whole, so that it would be another dull bit of reading. Radio, moreover, is a fast changing business: the reality of today is the dim past by tomorrow, and consequently the author could not be expected to present a coverage of the radio situation that would be entirely up to date.

The importance of this book is, then, relative; to reach its highest effectiveness it would have to be read by the listening millions who also patronize the drugstore lending library. While good-natured public tolerance acknowledges that many of the radio claims are as fraudulent as those of a side-show barker, few have realized that today's radio operates with tax-free licenses issued under a ten-year-old law which clearly did not foresee the rapid strides or the potentialities of this modern means of communication. It may be said, in passing, that Miss Brindze renders unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's. While not hesitating to criticize severely the chains and independents for improper practices, she does give them praise when that praise is due. Her closing paragraph correctly concludes the work with this note: "About this, and other of radio's problems, we need more free discussion. We need greater realization that radio is not a toy, not a special gift to the advertising profession, but an instrument that can enslave or free. We need a sufficiently aroused public opinion so that radio broadcasting in the United States will in truth be made to serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity."

EDGAR M. JONES

Our National Disgrace

CHILD WORKERS IN AMERICA. By Katharine Du Pre Lumpkin and Dorothy Douglas. Robert M. McBride and Company. $3.50.

UNPLEASANT facts rarely have widespread currency. The average person is prepared to admit that child labor is a blight on our national life, but he believes that the evil is rapidly being eradicated. Katharine Lumpkin and Dorothy Douglas, after years of exhaustive study, find that child workers in America must still be counted in the millions. Complete figures are not available because the census does not recognize child labor when the workers are under ten years of age or when they are enrolled in school on April 1—before the season for agricultural work. Yet even the census figures show at least 250,000 children between ten and thirteen years of age regularly at work and more than 400,000 between fourteen and fifteen. Another million and a half are over sixteen but under eighteen.

The conditions of child labor in industry are less disgraceful than in other fields. Most of the children employed in the larger industries are more than fourteen years of age. Their working conditions are subject to more or less strict regulation. Little or no control exists, however, over conditions in sweatshop factories, street trades, domestic service, industrial home work, and agriculture. In 1931, for example, 17 per cent of New York's newsboys were less than twelve years old, and some were as young as six. In several cities as many as 20 per cent of the newsboys were under ten. Thousands of these children work until midnight or later, especially on Saturday nights, and their pay, after the usual deductions and fines, is pitifully small.

For children as for adult workers, the worst conditions are found in agriculture. At least 100,000 children from ten to fifteen years of age are listed as working in commercial agriculture—as berry pickers, beet-sugar workers, cotton pickers, or in vegetable gardens. The majority of these youngsters work not as individuals but as parts of families which hire out to contractors for a wage barely enough to keep them alive. On truck farms in New Jersey, for example, the father's earnings averaged only one-third that of the entire family, or 15 to 18 cents an hour. Children work the same hours as adults, twelve hours being normal in many sections. Housing and sanitary facilities for these migratory farm workers are less satisfactory than for any other group in America.

The authors are not optimistic about the elimination of child labor in the United States. They point out that many of the movements for the "regulation" of the evil have only resulted in diverting attention from it. While favoring immediate passage of the amendment, they believe the evil will persist until a strong labor movement is developed.

The Administration's new program for eliminating child labor on goods moving in interstate commerce, brought forth after the completion of the book, will not even touch the sectors of our economy where child labor is most prevalent. Nor can we expect state legislatures in the more backward states to grapple with the problem. There is still need, as indicated by the votes of the New York and Massachusetts legislatures on the child-labor amendment, for a long-range educational program. Drs. Lumpkin and Douglas have made an invaluable contribution to that end in this first scientific study of our national disgrace. MAXWELL S. STEWART

Summer Fiction

THE MAKING OF A HERO. By Nicholas Ostrovski. Translated from the Russian by Alec Brown. E. P. Dutton. $2.50.

OSTROVSKI, a veteran of the Civil War and a product of the militant generation of October, was a hero. His novel, however, is not heroic. That a man afflicted with blindness and paralysis in his middle twenties could have found within himself the resources to turn to writing and make it a means of recapturing his waning life seems a manifestation of high resolve. All the more unfortunate it is that Ostrovski's imagination was so completely at the mercy of a simplified and dogmatic outlook that it was unable to cope with the dramatic events and transformations he had lived through. To act heroically is at times only a matter of courage and simple faith; to create the heroic in art, however, requires a range of qualities much more varied and profound. Above all it requires an independence of consciousness, which is clearly at odds with the urge to conform so typical of Soviet writers today.

Largely autobiographical, Ostrovski's narrative describes the development of Paul Korchagin from an illiterate worker's kid to a Bolshevik fighter and leader. The behavior of a White Guard in political struggle is given the same tonality and subjected to the same moral standards as that of a woman in love. Korchagin experiences the Revolution, the Civil War, the ordeals of reconstruction, and a cycle of personal suffering without so much as once facing himself and others except in terms of official beliefs that in their very nature are too abstract to explain individual conduct and psychology. Interesting in places for its documentation of the early Soviets, the book is otherwise banal and occasionally quite silly, as in the episodes of Korchagin's love affairs. Marxists, being fond of discerning contradictions in the social process, ought to apply their analytic prowess to investigating the discrepancy between the prodigious dimensions and meanings of the October Revolution and the feeble records of it recently produced on its home grounds by writers seemingly most devoted to its progress. PHILIP RAHV

AMERICAN DREAM. By Michael Foster. William Morrow. $3.

NOW it is a Seattle newspaperman who attempts to transfix the American dream. His hero, also a newspaperman, has, at the outset of the book, quit his sordid metropolitan job to buy a country print-shop and weekly newspaper

This is the book which thoughtful, aware minds consider ESSENTIAL to an understanding of a force which threatens the world today.

THE SPIRIT AND STRUCTURE OF

GERMAN FASCISM

by Robert A. Brady

"Economic realism. . . . Cuts through to the supreme question: Who gets what?"—Charles A. Beard. "Careful and detailed analysis of German Fascism—the most complete, to my knowledge, that exists in the English language."—Harold J. Laski.

The Viking Press $3.00

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

MOONLIGHT CRUISE

FRIDAY, JULY 23RD

FRIDAY JULY 23

★ A NIGHT OF SPANISH STARS ★

featuring

★ DICK CARROLL
and his International Swing Brigade
★ REX INGRAM'S
Deep River Boys
★ VIOLETTA and ROSITA
Stars of Abe Lyman's Band and Roxy Theatre
★ GYPSY TANA
Flamenco singer and guitarist
★ NO PASARAN SINGERS
★ CARLOTA MONTEZ
Spanish Dancer

Dancing under the Stars Brilliant Entertainment an unforgettable evening of laughter, gaiety and good fellowship joint auspices

FRIENDS OF THE ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRIGADE and NEW MASSES

Tickets $1.00 in advance $1.50 at the boat

Every ticket sold helps send smokes to our boys fighting [illegible] the front

S.S. CITY OF NEW YORK leaves Pier 11, East River, foot of Wall Street, at [illegible] P. M.

Tickets now on sale at New Masses, 31 East 27th St.; Workers Bookshop, 50 East 13th St.; and Friends of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade. 125 West 45th St.

INDISPENSABLE for intelligent newspaper readers . . .

This important book introduces the reader to the intricacies and romance of reporting and publishing world news, describing the specific problems encountered by foreign correspondents in the news centers of the world. After a reading of it, world news and the forces which influence it take on new meaning and significance. $4.00

By Robert W. Desmond THE PRESS AND WORLD AFFAIRS

Introduction by Harold J. Laski

D. APPLETON-CENTURY COMPANY, 35 W. 32nd ST., N. Y.

JOHN L. LEWIS EXPOSED

by

ERIC HASS

Is John L. Lewis on the side of the working class—or on the opposite side? Is he a real working class leader, or is he a Capitalist Labor Lieutenant? Is he a champion of real Industrial Democracy, or do his efforts lead to industrial autocracy? Do the real masters of industry (Wall Street) denounce him, or do they shower praise on him,

Mr. Hass answers all these questions in his scholarly and factual exposure of John L. Lewis.

72 PAGES—10 CENTS PER COPY

Send for our catalogue of works on Marxism and the labor movement, including recent publications on "War," "The Supreme Court," "Industrial Unionism," etc.

NEW YORK LABOR NEWS CO.
45 Rose Street, New York City

CELEBRATION DINNER OF WELCOME TO Dr. EDWARD BARSKY

(Just returned from Madrid and Cordoba fronts)

WEDNESDAY — JULY 21 — 8 P. M.

HOTEL ROOSEVELT Carefully Air-Cooled Madison and 45th St.

Also other prominent speakers

Adm. $2.75 Ausp.: Medical Bureau to Aid Spanish Democracy, 381 Fourth Avenue, N. Y. Phone: MU 4-5301.

Adm. to balcony for speeches, $1.

TWIN PINES
A Camp for Adults

Individual screened sun porches, semi-private adjoining baths in de luxe rooms of new main house; comfortable bungalows. Tennis, handball, basketball, baseball, sand beach bathing, boating, fishing, etc.

For further details, address
TWIN PINES ON TROUT LAKE
S. SAIDEL, LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON

After an absence of three years, Paul Y. Anderson returns to The Nation with an article on violence along the labor front. He has closely followed the revelations of the La Follette committee on this subject and has reached a few conclusions of his own that every progressive will want to learn about. Don't miss his article!

Coming Soon in The Nation

on the shores of the Pacific. While his wife packs his household goods and cooks his meals, the hero retires to the attic for a few days, where, among the letters and papers of his ancestors, he gives himself a spiritual housecleaning. Pictures of his forebears are evoked. There was his grandfather, a hell-for-leather, damn-your-eyes Irishman, sea captain, and merchant, who, after an interlude of Boston respectability, ended his days as the polygamous rajah of a Malay coast settlement. There was his father, a fighting country lawyer, who defended Mexicans in Dakota and pacifists in wartime, and eventually died penniless in San Francisco. In the lives of these people Mr. Foster sees the American dream dramatized. It would appear from the plot to be a kind of permanent, lively intransigeance, but Mr. Foster, after a good deal of troubled reflection, prefers to define it as "the old, old human faith that somehow, somewhere, a time might come when man would stand on the ruins of an old world and an old self, with the starlight on his shouders. That a time might come when men would live and deal among themselves with justice. And tenderness. And truth." These are fine sentiments, but hardly precise. Mr. Foster's program for the materialization of the dream is equally starry-eyed and ectoplasmic. He puts his faith in "the quiet, decent people. . . . The silent ten per cent. Whose names are not often on page one, because they are so busy, and who pay very little attention to the loud antics of the shouters and grabbers." It is probably natural that a newspaperman should experience revulsion against the men-in-the-news, but to exalt that revulsion into a philosophy of life is absurd. MARY MCCARTHY

THE FRIENDLY TREE. By Cecil Day Lewis. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

WHAT distinguishes Mr. Lewis's romance from those of Ruby M. Ayres might be described as Mr. Lewis's writing hypothesis: from the outset he regards his characters as the absolutes of refined sensibility and exquisite reaction. The premise, implied rather than developed in the course of the narrative, is that Stephen, Anna, Evelyn, and Richard all possess a mystic, internal poetry, exalting the cheap, romantic events of their lives and bringing subtlety to what the reader finds trivial, grace to what is infelicitous, and mystery to what is commonplace or melodramatic. He proceeds from this premise through the device of a stream of consciousness sprinkled with inexact and incongruous metaphors: a hill is described as though it were an emotion, and an emotion as though it were a garden rake. Inanimate objects lose their identity in a welter of vague and strained descriptive associations, while psychological analysis and dramatic motivation are reduced to blunt clichés. The terms in which Mr. Lewis finally establishes his characters are banal, vulgar, and sentimental. They make love to each other like people who have seen too many movies; they become profound and intellectualize about life and death like the schoolboys sitting behind you in the bus. They wander from situation to situation, desperately happy or desperately near the breaking-point, but always and forever entangled in emotional confetti. Finally, on the last page of the epilogue, they are resolved in a way the reader would least expect. It is all reduced to a struggle between civilizations: the old, degenerate civilization of the Cranes and the new, good civilization of Stephen and Anna and their love. Such a distinction, occurring where it does, with no plausible relationship to what has gone before, is meaningless.

CHRISTOPHER LAZARE

RECORDS

THE performance of Mozart's lovely Clarinet Quintet by the Roth String Quartet and Simeon Bellison (Columbia: four records, $6) is stodgy; and instead of finely modulated phrases Mr. Bellison produces sequences of big, round, shrill pumpkins. Claudia Muzio's voice is a delight to the ear in songs—by Delibes, Donaudy, Bizet, Pergolesi, etcetera—that ask nothing in feeling and style beyond what she could give (Columbia: five records, $6.50).

Beside Muzio's voice Gina Cigna's sounds like very little in "Casta Diva" from "Norma" and "Suicidio" from "La Gioconda" ($1.50). On another Columbia single ($1.50) is beautiful singing by Kipnis in Schubert's "Haidenröslein," "Ungeduld," and "Erlkönig"; on another ($1) the fine voice of Kullman in Carissimi's "Vittoria," and, marred by a vibrato, in the Italian aria from Act 1 of "Der Rosenkavalier." Szigeti wastes superb playing on a Weber sonata, Ravel's "Habanera," and an arrangement of Scriabin's piano study in thirds with which he gives a demonstration of a dog walking on its hind legs ($1.50). Beecham's performance of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture with the London Philharmonic is less hair-raising in pace than some American performances, but beautifully phrased and colored and excellently recorded ($1.50). A two-record set ($3), finally, offers a fine performance by Yella Pessl of Bach's Partita No. 2.

Even non-metallic needles, I find, do not always enable one to escape fuzzy reproduction with new Columbia records; the records vary in this respect. I have tried Kakti needles, and like them better than B.C.N. because of their greater hardness; but they too cause a little richness and impact to be lost in reproduction of orchestral tone; and here I would like to add a postscript to my remarks on needles last November. Steel needles reproduce high frequencies—e.g., 5,000 to 6,500 cycles—with greater intensity than non-metallic needles; but if your phonograph does not reproduce beyond, say, 4,000, the advantage of steel disappears; and that is true also if the phonograph goes up high but the record is an old one that stops at 4,000. Steel will then merely intensify the noises of high frequency. If, in such an old record, the music is weak and there is a great deal of noise, only a non-metallic needle will permit you to step up the volume enough without increasing the noise too much. Even where both phonograph and record go up to 6,500 you may find it worth while to take the slight loss in orchestral reproduction with non-metallic needles for the sake of the lessened noise and increased volume. And if the record is one like the new Victor "Don Juan" or Brahms's Third, in which the high frequencies are overemphasized to the point where they are unpleasantly sharp with a steel needle, you will use a non-metallic needle to avoid or reduce this distortion. The thing to do is to try both the steel and non-metallic needles and compare the results—and not once for all, but with each record; for not only is there a difference between the record of today and the record of five years ago, but there are, unfortunately, appreciable differences between the record of today and the record of last week. The first difference represents the improvement in the process; the second represents the lack of precision and standardization in the use of the improved process. We have higher fidelity today; but how much higher is different in every record.

B. H. HAGGIN

AIR COOLED

JULY 19

FIRST ANNIVERSARY of the Anti-Fascist Struggle in Spain

AIR COOLED

Honor the Heroes of Spain!
Voice solidarity with the Spanish people!
Protest Italian & German invasion of Spain!

SPEAKERS

AMBASSADOR FERNANDO DE LOS RIOS
In his first public address since his return from Spain

DR. EDWARD BARSKY
Chief of Medical Bureau hospitals in Spain.
His first American appearance

REP. JERRY J. O'CONNELL
Sponsor of the Embargo Resolution No. 390 against Italy and Germany

NORMAN THOMAS EARL BROWDER

VITO MARCANTONIO

Chorus of Two Hundred Voices
Mass Chant
Spanish Folk Dances
150-Piece Symphony Orchestra
Max Gobelman, Conductor

MONDAY — JULY 19 — 8 P. M.
MADISON SQUARE GARDEN
Fiftieth Street and Eighth Avenue
ADMISSION:
25c, 50c, $1.00, $2.00

TICKETS AVAILABLE AT

North American Committee, [illegible] Fourth Avenue
Workers Bookshop, 50 East 13th Street
Call Bookshop, 21 East 17th Street
Tyson Ticket Agency, 1531 Broadway
Gray's Ticket Agency, 1428 Broadway

Joint Auspices North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy and Sociedades Hispanas Confederadas de Ayuda a Espana

If you do not live in New York, send a contribution in memory of those who have died in the struggle, so that their children may be given a chance to live in a happier Spain.

USE THIS COUPON TODAY!

UNITED SPANISH COMMITTEE,
Room 212, 381 4th Ave., New York.

I am sorry I cannot be with you on the historic occasion of July 19. For the children of those who have died, please accept my contribution. (N)

Name ....

Address ....

Letters to the Editors

Pacifists Face the Dilemma

Dear Sirs: The civil war in Spain has brought to revolutionary pacifists a conflict of loyalties closely resembling that which faced their predecessors twenty years ago. Shall we who condemned war in round terms when it stood for capitalism, aggressive imperialism, and exploitation of the workers extend our approval and support when it is waged by our own side in defense of legitimate government and against the counter-revolution? The dilemma is a real one, but, like every other dilemma, wears two horns: support of war in full realization of its twentieth-century consequences or non-support of war with deliberate renunciation of the hope of a military victory.

To us there can be no question as to the abstract justice of the case. The Loyalists of Madrid are the legitimate government of the workers, defending homes and rights against fascism. Pacifist radicals are heart and soul on their side against the illegal revolt of capitalist militarism. The issue is very concrete, however. In this situation, which horn of the dilemma seems to involve a lesser degree of calamity for Spain and for the world?

Support of the first, in the hope of eventual victory, is ethically justifiable if war ever is justifiable. But pacifists repudiate war, not merely because it is unethical but because it is futile. Is there some new magic in the rightness of the Spanish cause to make this particular conflict an exception as regards futility? The people of Spain are fighting heroically to defend not only their constitutional government but their homes, their wives, and their children. In any concrete sense of the word, however, twentieth-century machines have destroyed all possibility of successful defense by force of arms. Such inventions as the long-range gun and bombing plane have put permanently behind us the time when strong lines of soldiers could say with assurance, "They Shall Not Pass!" We all know that the European military commands have no hope of defending the civil population against air and gas raids, but count only on reprisals, while they drill non-combatants in the use of gas masks and shelters which experts pronounce ineffectual. The best that can be hoped for in Spain is that after cities have been destroyed and thousands of non-combatants slaughtered, the Spanish people may perhaps win the war as Belgium and its allies eventually won the World War. Such victory is an abstraction, however; defense is both concrete and different.

A cool view of history leads to several definite conclusions. First, revolution, in the Marxian sense of complete transfer of power, is accomplished by economic forces rather than by war. Violence often accompanies the change but usually hinders and often blocks the revolution itself. The permanent achievements of the French Revolution were almost entirely secured by the regularly elected National Assembly; the ultimate surrender to the bourgeois Directory was the direct result of fatal divisions among the revolutionists which found expression in the spectacular violence of the Reign of Terror. The Soviet Republic, economically so successful, is politically so held back by the elements of violence within it that twenty years after the beginning of the revolution it has executed, rightly or wrongly, a large number of its former leaders.

Second, no revolution can prove anything but abortive until the people as a whole are ready to assume power. The outbreak of the Spanish rebellion was a sign of the inadequacy of the popular organization, and the defeat of Franco, if it takes place, will be followed by one counter-revolution after another until the Spanish workers can obtain a breathing spell from war sufficient to build up a united political party. Our romantic sympathy with the Spanish people should not blind us to the extreme closeness of the vote which brought the popular front into power, the absence of a common working philosophy among its groups, and the failure of the enlightened industrial proletariat to reckon with peasant and military reaction.

The pacifist rejects the first horn of the dilemma, accordingly, because he is convinced of the concrete impossibility of defending a country or a revolution through military measures. Instead he grasps firmly the second horn—deliberate non-support of military victory.

But have we a "right" to refuse support to our struggling comrades in Spain without offering some substitute for armed resistance already proved effectual? It is not our "right," we declare, but our obligation to use what small influence we may have to prevent world catastrophe. Moreover, substitutes for armed conflict clearly exist—agitation, education, organization on the political and industrial fields, the peaceful general strike, and the scarcely tapped resources of non-cooperation. They cannot be tried out by the war-resistant minority, however, or even elaborated in completeness while the revolutionary working class continues to waste itself on real or imaginary barricades. To demand from the pacifist minority a tried-out substitute for war is quite as absurd as to demand from the Socialist minority a tried-out substitute for capitalism.

The present counter-revolution could never have arisen if the Spanish Republic had been pacifist in theory and in practice. Such a republic would have liberated the Moors, disarmed the old-regime generals, allayed the fears of church and peasants, and renounced violence against clerical reactionaries on the one hand and working-class dissidents on the other. To be sure, pacifism was as impossible to the working-class psychology of 1931 in Spain as to that of the United States in 1917. We are confronted with a situation. What do war resisters propose for Spain? Frankly, the proposal which we unhesitatingly bring forward for Spain is that an armistice be arranged as soon as possible and peace negotiations entered upon, through the offices of non-fascist governments.

The greatest good now obtainable would appear to be the avoidance of conclusive military victory on either side. A victory on the part of Franco would be obviously disastrous; even a victory of the Loyalists could not fail to be followed by such drastic retaliations upon clerical and political reactionaries as to prepare the way for new rebellions, and a regime of rigid suppression, punctuated by "Moscow trials," would be the most probable sequel to armed victory on the part of the republic.

Particularly in view of the danger of world war is a negotiated peace to be desired. To be sure, the European Powers will in any such negotiations brazenly utilize both Loyalists and rebels as counters for their own advantage. The sooner

RESORTS

FUN FOR ALL!
All sports facilities . . . Private lake! Swimming pool! Social and theatrical program directed by JOHN FORD, N. Y. stage director of "STEEL." Reasonable rates.

COOKS FALLS LODGE

COOKS FALLS, NEW YORK
N. Y. Office—250 W. 57th St.
Phone COlumbus 5-3690

RESERVE NOW!

The "Vacation Buy of the Year"

COPAKE

The Island Paradise

CRARYVILLE, N. Y.

—on Beautiful Lake Copake—in an unspoiled vacationland, 110 miles from New York City. Nationally selected as the "Ideal Camp." The only Resort with all lake front.

- MODERN BUNGALOWS WITH PRIVATE SHOWERS
- 18-HOLE CHAMPIONSHIP GOLF COURSE ON GROUNDS
- 12 FAST-CLAY TENNIS COURTS
- ■ HANDBALL COURTS
- SADDLE HORSES—AQUATIC SPORTS
- UNSURPASSED FOOD AND ENTERTAINMENT

July-August Rates from $32.50

N. Y. Off.: 116 Nassau St. BEekman 3-5590

Carefree! Friendly! Informal!

LAKE CHODIKEE LODGE

• • • ■ ■ HIGHLAND, N. Y.

Hampshire Players in Dramatic and Musical Repertoire. Adult Social and Athletic Activities. Lecture Forum. Open Air University now in Session under leadership of Irving Davidson, Popular Lecturer and Humorist. Private Lake.

Rates $27.50 up

N. Y. C. 1202 Kings Highway. B'klyn. ES. 5-4330

ONE OF THE BETTER RESORTS

Pauls

SWAN LAKE, N.Y.

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE

Pleasant Valley, N. Y., Dutchess Co.

An ideal place for rest. Beautiful surroundings. Wholesome food Modern conveniences. Tennis, bathing, fishing, rowing.

Louis Sakow Pleasant Valley 2741

BARLOW FARM

Sherman, Conn.

Modern conveniences, swimming, tennis, etc.

$20 PER WEEK

For information N. Y. MAin 4-8276, evenings

LIMES-LEMONS FOR SALE

Seedless Limes delivered prepaid $8.00 bushel, $4.25 half bushel, $2.25, 1/5 bushel. Lemons, $6.75 bushel, $3.75 half bushel. Oranges $4.00 bushel. A. H. Burket, Sebring, Fla.

WANTED

Passengers share expense auto trip to Los Angeles. Leaving about July 22. Mr. Spears, AL. 4-4173, between 9-5.

RESORTS

The Fieldstone

on Round Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and recreation in the heart of the Ramapo Mountains, one hour from New York.

Swimming, boating, tennis, riding, golf and other sports

P. O. BOX 297
MONROE, N. Y.

TELEPHONE:
MONROE 2501

A descriptive folder will be sent at your request

By Reservation Only

CAMP MILFORD

The Camp with that Wonderful Spirit!

KENT CONN.

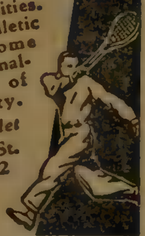
IN BERKSHIRE HILLS, ON BEAUTIFUL LAKE

Interesting social activities. Well Planned Athletic program. Wholesome food. Gay informality in a setting of rustic simplicity.

Write for Booklet

11 West 42nd St.
PEnn. 6-7842

JULY RATE $29.50
Daily $5



NOW! New Features at

NAPANOCH COUNTRY CLUB

[illegible] to your vacation

- ★ New NAUTICAL OUTDOOR DINING ROOM
  Overlooking the Lake
- ★ New MOONLIGHT PAVILION
  Dancing Under the Stars
- ★ IMPROVED SOCIAL AND ATHLETIC FACILITIES.
- ★ SPORTY GOLF COURSE ON GROUNDS.
- ★ TENNIS, HANDBALL, SADDLE HORSES, BICYCLING, SWIMMING.
- ★ CONTINENTAL CUISINE
  Under direction Chef Jules Machot

July rates from $32.50

Send for Illustrated Circular

NAPANOCH COUNTRY CLUB

NAPANOCH, N. Y. • Ellenville 700
N.Y.C. Office 315 [illegible] MU 4-3806

BERKSHIRE PINES

In the Lovely Berkshire Hills

A combination parents have been seeking. Hotel facilities and a fully equipped day camp for children under intelligent guidance of 12 trained counsellors with progressive outlook.

All land and water sports—Golf nearby

WEST COPAKE, N. Y. TEL., COPAKE 46

Silver Birches, Canton, Maine. For discriminating women who want a quiet place that offers boating and bathing in a secluded and beautiful lake. Cabins with sanitary plumbing. Excellent table. Rates $15 to $20. Booklet.

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks, One mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, badminton, swimming and canoeing. Cabins. Guests met at Lake George. $20.00 and $21.00. Tel. 27-F-12. R. J. Venton.

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL

37 MINUTES TIMES SQUARE
MAKE THIS YOUR SUMMER HOME
Recreational Facilities. Solarium Singles [illegible] up
SHeepshead 3-3000

RESORTS

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG N.Y.

COLORFUL
CONGENIAL
COMFORTABLE

RATE $29.50 UP

Echo Lake Tavern

WARRENSBURG, N. Y.
City Tel. VAnderbilt 3-9875

Uncas Lodge

Plays — Activities
Directed by
JESS KIMMER
N.Y.U. Dramatic Soc.

TENNIS

directed by Murray Pincus is a major sport at

UNCAS LODGE

- 3 Fast Clay Tennis Courts
- Private Twin Lakes
- Boating — Fishing
- Handball — Ping Pong
- Saddle Horses and Golf
- Orchestra for Dancing

informal atmosphere

JULY RATES: $24.50 weekly; $4.00 daily

MANAGEMENT: DIANA and ABE BERMAN

Phone: Norwich 1858—Ring 5
New York: PResident 3-8649

Sponsored by [illegible] adjoining the BERKSHIRE COUNTRY CLUB

Woman—Stand back!

WEEKLY RATES
July, August

$25

Modern, Adult Camp for men. Do as you darn please. Golf, tennis, swimming, handball. Evenings you're guests at the Berkshire Country Club. Entertainment, dancing. Swell eats. Reservations, 11 W. 42 St., PE. 6-1940. Any Saturday Through Sunday Aft. $5

BERKSHIRE

Camp for Men ... WINGDALE N.Y.

STAR LAKE CAMP

In the glorious Adirondacks between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground for adults. 1800 feet elevation and right on the Lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Swimming, Canoeing, Handball, Baseball; Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Delicious wholesome meals that pep up the appetite. Rates $22.50 weekly.

Send for Booklet

New York Office:
116 Nassau St., Room 802a
BEekman 3-6345

IT'S DIFFERENT . . . Charming is the word for ARTEMIS. If you love beauty, solitude, or sports; good food and fun—Come! $25 weekly. Couples special. Write: ARTEMIS, Brewster, N. Y., or phone: Brewster 555F5. Management: Rogers.

BERT FRIEDBERG welcomes you to a comfortable farm situated on 150 acres of beautiful country. Always pleasant companionship. Good Food. Tennis, Swimming. Riding.

HIL-BERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y.

Tel. Bert Friedberg Mahopac 2088

RIVERSIDE INN on Lake Housatonic. Swimming, boating. 1¾ hours from New York. $3 per day. $18 weekly. Station Derby. P. O. Seymour, Conn. Tel. Derby 598-12.

Hillcrest Lodge among the Watchung Mts. 25 minutes by train, 50 by car. C. C. of New Jersey, commutation reasonable. Golf, tennis, swimming, handball.

Plainfield, N. J. Millington 364

the negotiations can be set in motion, however, the further from disintegration will be the Spanish working class which must establish the post-war commonwealth, the less weighty will be the influence of foreign interests that have been drawn in, and the more closely will the peace terms be related to the just claims of the Loyalist government.

At more than one point in the World War pacifists urged a compromise peace, but the Allies refused to consider it, sometimes fearing a German victory, sometimes eager to dictate peace "Unter den Linden." The result was the Versailles settlement, which came to full flower in Nazism.

JESSIE WALLACE HUGHAN

New York, June 30

The Ghost of Göttingen

Dear Sirs: The German people found themselves suddenly in an atmosphere of freedom. The forces of liberty and democracy had triumphed over the prevailing oppression and tyranny. The conforming mind was replaced by the free mind as intellectual activity once again flowered. . . .

But then, with the suddenness of a thunderclap and all of its terror, reaction struck back. The liberal constitution was summarily abrogated. The universities and their leaders were the first to suffer. Professors and scholars were expelled; in disgrace many went into exile. The structure of tyranny was being re-erected and intolerance was once again its cornerstone. . . .

This was the Germany of 1837—this is the Germany of 1937. It was the University of Göttingen that suffered so disastrously one hundred years ago. For protesting against the revocation by King Ernst Augustus of Hanover of the liberal constitution, which he had sworn to accept (Führer Adolf was a little cleverer: he acted in the name of the constitution), seven of its most illustrious professors—Die Göttinger Sieben, among whom were the brothers Grimm and the famous historians Dahlmann and Gervinus—were expelled. Germany's most talented teachers, her most able scholars, her outstanding literary figures were forced into exile. The interdiction of "Young Germany" meant the suppression of young Heinrich Heine's works.

One hundred years later exile is again the refuge of Germany's great. Thomas Mann, the Heine of modern Germany, we hear confess his love for the "true Germany"—in the words of Heine: "the real Germany, the great, mysterious, anonymous Germany of the German people, the sleeping sovereign with whose scepter and crown the apes are playing."

And it is a mourning ghost of Göttingen that sees our universities fraternize with the avowed and shameless enemies of both.

ELVIN J. LASKY

New York, July 1

Dorothy Thompson

Dear Sirs: You are to be commended for your recent note on Dorothy Thompson's "outrage flight." It is high time someone called Miss Thompson on her bitter anti-labor bias. While she has a perfect right to be as anti-labor as she likes she has no right to be anti-labor under a cloak of extreme liberalism. She is increasingly likely to preface every attack on workers with the plea that this hurts her worse than it will them; but that, in the name of true liberalism, she must go on. It might interest her to see some of the letters that pour into the papers in admiring response to her call to arms. I quote from the public-mind column of the Kansas City Star, June 16: "Every day we have less of democracy and more of the dictatorship of the proletariat. Dorothy Thompson suggests a vigilance committee. I would amplify that suggestion and propose the immediate formation of a citizens' national committee of public safety." It can't happen here, Miss Thompson? Watch those curves.

SARA SAPER

Mayville, Mo., June 17

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

ROBERT S. ALLEN is coauthor with Drew Pearson of the syndicated newspaper column Washington Merry-Go-Round.

ALBERT WEISBORD just returned from Loyalist Spain, where he took an active part both at the front and behind the lines.

ELIZABETH McCAUSLAND was for many years on the staff of the Springfield Republican and has written extensively on art subjects.

M. E. RAVAGE, The Nation's regular correspondent in France, is the author of many articles and several books on Europe.

GEORGE S. KAUFMAN, well-known playwright and twice winner of the Pulitzer award, has also been a Hollywood scenarist.

WALTON H. HAMILTON, economic adviser to the Social Security Board and Professor of Constitutional Law at the Yale Law School, has recently published "The Power to Govern: The Constitution Then and Now."

HELEN MERRELL LYND is coauthor with Robert S. Lynd of "Middletown in Transition."

EDGAR M. JONES covers Washington for the Billboard.

FILMS

Attention NATION Reader!

Exclusive
FRITZ LANG'S
Original version of
"M"
with Peter Lorre
also "TSAR TO LENIN"
RARE DRAMATIC SHOTS OF THE REVOLUTION
WORLD 49 ST. 153 West nr. 7th Ave. | Circle 7-5747

ADULT EDUCATION

RALPH M. PEARSON'S

MAIL STUDY COURSES IN MODERN ART PRACTICE in creative painting, modeling and drawing. THEORY: Analysis of current modern works. Bulletin on request. Summer address—E. Gloucester, Mass.

RECORDS

100,000 European Recordings

Announcing an extraordinary sale of 100,000 Parlophone, Odeon, Decca discs. These marvelous records comprise the cream of the world's finest music. A selection to gratify every taste. Sale prices: 50c & 75c per record. Values $1.50 & $2.00. Mail orders. Catalog.

GRAMOPHONE SHOP, Inc., 18 E. 48th St., New York

WRITER'S SERVICE

State Your Literary Problem. Instruction, criticism, revision, consultation, marketing. Unquestionably superior service, reasonable charges. ROBERT L. NEWMAN, 251 West 71 St., N. Y. C.

BOOKS

HAVELOCK ELLIS
PSYCHOLOGY OF SEX
"The best one-volume treatment of Sex in the English language."—Carl Van Doren
$3.00 Postpaid
At Booksellers, or from
EMERSON BOOKS, Inc., Dept. 108-A
251 West 19th Street, New York

25c—Unabridged French Novels. French text—300 titles—Best authors. Ideal for vacations. 25c vol. postage 5c—lists 3c. Librairie CHAGNON, 26 West 46 St.

LANGUAGES

Language Phone Sets

Bought, sold, rented, exchanged. Language Service, 507-5th Ave. MUr. 2-4221.

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 24, 1937 NUMBER 4

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 85
EDITORIALS:
DEATH AND POLITICS 88
WAR IN THE EAST? 89
LOANS FOR FARM TENANTS 89
NAZI EXHIBITIONISM 90
WILL EUROPE GO TO WAR? by Ludwig Lore 91
ROBERT VANSITTART: EUROPE'S ARBITER by Robert Dell 93
OUT WEST by William Gropper 96
MAINE IS NOT IN THE UNION by Aaron Levenstein 97
FREEDOM OF THE PRESS AGAIN by Ruth Brindze 98
BEHIND CHINA'S CONFLICT by Maxwell S. Stewart 100
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 101
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
HOW GERMANY PERSECUTES WRITERS by Lion Feuchtwanger 103
PITIMINI'S ADVOCATE by Anita Brenner 104
HISTORY AND CASE HISTORY by Christopher Lazare 106
EVERLASTING YEA AND EVERLASTING NO by Edwin Mims, Jr. 106
IN BOTHWELL'S DEFENSE by Clara Gruening Stillman 108
A RURAL STRAIN by Stanley Young 109

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER
Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
Editorial Associates
HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

*

GOVERNOR LEHMAN'S LETTER TO SENATOR Wagner opposing the court plan will probably leave the Senator's vote unchanged. But there can be no doubt that it will strengthen the opposition and stiffen the lines on both sides. We believe that not only court reform but the entire Administration program, and the President's leadership, is now at stake. Governor Lehman could not have thought so, or he would not have timed his letter as he did. Despite his friendship with the President and their comradeship in a common progressive cause, he may have deemed it his duty to express his views and preserve his integrity. But we should respect his integrity the more if the letter were not timed to affect the vote over the Senate leadership, which may decide the fate of the court bill and the President's whole program. The voice was that of the governor: is it possible that the hand was that of his friends in the banking fraternity?

*

GREAT BRITAIN'S PROPOSAL FOR GRANTING belligerent rights to Franco on condition that "progress" is made toward the withdrawal of foreign "volunteers" fits neatly with the devastating appraisal of British foreign policy presented elsewhere in this issue by Robert Dell. From the beginning of the Spanish conflict, British Conservatives have been caught in an apparently insoluble dilemma. By inclination and temperament they have favored a rebel victory. At the same time it has been evident that a victory for Franco might give Germany and Italy a permanent foothold in Spain, which would be a direct threat to Britain's imperial and economic interests. The present proposal seemed to offer a solution to this perplexing dilemma. Removal of foreign "volunteers" would reduce the probability of Germany or Italian domination of Spain, while the granting of belligerent rights to the rebels might make it possible for the rebels to win, through the imposition of a blockade, without the assistance of the fascist powers. Fortunately, events in Spain and resistance from France and the Soviet Union may prevent this diabolical scheme from becoming a reality. Incidents such as the recent seizure by the rebels of a British ship should dim British enthusiasm for a rebel victory, while the new strength exhibited by the government armies at Madrid may persuade the Foreign Office belatedly that it has bet on the wrong horse. In the great battle which marked the first anniversary of the rebellion the Loyalists have shown their ability to stand firm against the greatest of rebel concentrations. Victory for the government now seems only a matter of time, if France and Russia can show equal firmness on the international front.

PUBLIC

* * *

ADD MIDDLE-CLASS FEARS TO EMPLOYER SELF-interest to strong-arm brutality and what do you get? For the moment you get a movement like that launched last week by the National Citizens' Committee at Johnstown, Pennsylvania. The statement issued by that assemblage was a call to "loyal American citizens" to take the law into their own hands. It wasn't put that way. The authorities were accused of permitting the violation of constitutional rights and the "citizens" were given the duty of "restoring and protecting" those rights. But this, translated into simple American, is lynch law. Ordinary violence on either side in a labor struggle is of little consequence beside action such as this. For the resolutions issued by the Johnstown meeting and published in full-page advertisements throughout the country were revolutionary in all their implications. And America is not yet ready for fascist revolution. In fact the meeting will undoubtedly create its own opposition. Senator Wagner has announced that the National Labor Relations Board should investigate the men, money, and motives behind the new movement; Ray Daniell, writing in the New York Times, has revealed the fine American hand of John Price Jones, publicity firm, in the organization of the committee; and still other observers have hinted that Grace finances stand back of Jones finesse. More will be learned about this little revolution before it is liquidated.

* * *

WHILE THE FARM TENANTS HAVE BEEN LET down shabbily by the new compromise legislation, which we discuss elsewhere, independent farmers remain the darlings of Congress. Back in 1933 the Farm Credit Administration was set up to take the farmers out of the doldrums. With it went emergency legislation fixing the interest rate on farm mortgages well below the market rate. Now President Roosevelt has vetoed a new bill to extend the emergency for two years and provide for loans on farm mortgages at 3½ per cent the first year and 4 per cent the second. Mr. Roosevelt's veto, written probably on the recommendation of Governor Myers of the Farm Credit Administration, is a sensible document, just as his past three bonus vetoes were. But it stood no more chance in the House than did the bonus vetoes. The President pleaded that farm income had doubled, that farm prices were up, and that the bill would cost the Treasury $50,000,000 and play havoc with budget balancing. His pleas were met not so much with argument as with indifference. "Many of you have lived on a farm, as I have," said Chairman Jones of the Agriculture Committee to the House. That was argument enough for three-quarters of the members. Farmer-Laborites, liberal Democrats, and other progressives voted to override the veto, along with conservatives of both parties who welcomed the chance to hit at the President. It is not the first time that a farm measure has made strange bedfellows.

THE REPORT OF THE NATIONAL RESOURCES Committee on Technological Trends and Social Policy stands as a monumental illustration of the possibilities of planning in a country as advanced technically as the United States. A dramatic picture is drawn of possible developments in the field of science and the effects of those developments on society. The committee points out that many of the experiments which are now being carried on with air-conditioning, prefabricated houses, tray agriculture, artificial cotton, and the photo-electric cell will have results of great potential value to humanity; but that each new labor-saving invention will throw thousands of skilled workers on the scrap heap along with the discarded process. While the committee is correct in asserting that much social dislocation could be avoided by coordinated, long-range planning, it must not be assumed that planning consists merely of preparing elaborate reports which are filed away in the government archives. The mechanism for true social and economic planning has not yet been created in this country and cannot be as long as business interests balk even the mildest invasion of the government into the economic field.

* * *

NEITHER HUMANITARIAN CONSIDERATIONS nor economic horse sense has been able to stop the wholesale cuts in work relief for needy persons. "William P. Farnsworth, administrative officer of the Federal Theater Project," we read in the New York Times, "was instructed by WPA executives in Washington not to defer the dismissal of 1,708 workers from his project for any reason" (our italics). The brutality of this order is matched by the cold chauvinism with which Congress added to the relief-appropriation bill a rider barring from employment on work relief not only non-citizens illegally in the United States, but aliens who have not declared their intention to become citizens. A companion clause provides that preference must be given to war veterans. All aliens are accordingly being dropped from work-relief rolls, whether they have any means of subsistence or not. The protests of organizations of the unemployed may be expected to increase; they should be seconded with telegrams and letters by those who feel that to cut down relief in this arbitrary fashion is to accelerate the next crisis and by those who merely feel that letting people go hungry is a cruel and dangerous way of saving money.

* * *

THERE ARE TWENTY-ONE NAZI CAMPS IN America now. The twenty-first, Camp Nordland, was opened last Sunday at Andover, New Jersey, amid military pomp and grotesque speech-making. Everything was there that could be transported from the mother-heaven in Germany—the swastika, the goose-step, the Nazi salute, and Fritz Kuhn as Führer. The Nazi-American storm troops (the Ordnungsdienst, they are called: OD for short, instead of SA) marched in military formation, in natty new uniforms with Sam Browne belts. The speeches were terrific. "We are living in a day of exaggerated tolerance where we have let aliens, absolute aliens, come in and partake of the things we have built up," shouted Dr. Salvatore Caridi, one of the duci of the Italian-American fascists. And he and other speakers proceeded to attack that "absolute alien" John L. Lewis and his whole "alien" organization. The attack on the C. I. O. by the American Nazis is significant. Following the lead of Goebbels, who assailed Lewis in the Angriff on July 5, the Nazis are dedicating a good part of the energies of their American organization to the attempt to smash the C. I. O. At a meeting at the Hotel Biltmore several weeks ago, at which Kuhn was reelected Führer, the German-American Volksbund took an anti-strike oath. Add to that the revelations of the tie-up between the Nazis and the vigilante organizations in the Michigan automobile area, and you have the emerging pattern of American fascism. The German-Americans are welcome to camps and speech-making. But when they resort to vigilantism they are outside the pale of the law. And Congress should consider legislation which would outlaw all uniformed bodies that engage in military drill.

*

"FOR THE HIGHEST FUEHRERS ONLY" WAS THE way Alfred Rosenberg marked his "strictly confidential" encyclical letter as the head of the Nazi neo-pagan movement. This encyclical, sent to the New York Times by a special correspondent in Munich, is the most valuable account we have thus far seen of the aims and methods of the anti-Catholic measures taken by the Nazis. It strips these measures of all their elaborate pretense, and shows that the Nazis regard the Catholic persecutions as necessary steps in the displacement of Christianity by neo-paganism. It speaks of the "skilful exploitation of a few smuggling cases and the masterful staging of the moral turpitude trial" as having had "a most devastating effect on priestly authority." It proclaims triumphantly that the church is fighting "with her back to the wall," that "there is no Catholic press to speak of," and that the Catholic schools are so rigidly regulated as to have become indistinguishable from the Hitler schools. And all this has been accomplished, Dr. Rosenberg boasts, under the pretense of adherence to Christianity. There were some neo-pagan leaders who preferred an open break, notably Hauer, Dinter, and Reventlow, but they were silenced by the state. It was found easier to absorb Christianity slowly into the new movement than to reject it outright. Hence, although Rosenberg, who calls himself "the despiser of the Papacy," has been put in charge of Germany's spiritual life, the Nazi leaders still pretend formally to be Christians. Their Christ, however, is "the modern Christ—a tall, lean, strong, light-haired Nordic fighter."

*

A BEAUTIFUL FRIENDSHIP HAS BEEN ENDED. Jefferson Caffery has gone from Cuba to seek his diplomatic fortune in Brazil, and Colonel Fulgencio Batista must comfort himself with the services of Butler Wright, the new American Ambassador in Havana. There are signs that Batista is already suffering from a sense of insecurity. He has been talking about a three-year plan for Cuba, where the economic situation is at present a bit worse than usual. The plan remains vague talk—Batista is even reported to have said that it is not yet typed—and close students of his rule are frankly skeptical of the plan's future. They see in it rather a sign of uneasiness and, along with the talk of amnesty, a demagogic attempt to draw attention away from the corruption and terror in Cuba which have reached a pitch unequaled since Machado's heyday. These same observers point out that if Mr. Wright should exercise his American privilege to praise democracy and civil liberty out loud in Cuba he could become a hero overnight and his words, like the shouts of Joshua, might bring walls tumbling down, in this case the walls of Batista's dictatorship. Meanwhile the American press and public, so easily aroused over the excesses of a Hitler in Spain three thousand miles away, might well turn their attention to the sorrows of Cuba, where terror reigns and a second-string farce of "non-intervention" is being played out with the Cafferys and the Welleses and the Wall Street bankers in the leading roles.

*

THE MOST HOPEFUL ASPECT OF THE WORLD Conference on Church, Community, and State, which opened last week in Oxford, England, has been the recognition of the need for militant intervention in political and economic life if the church is to survive. As might be expected, the conference has lined up unanimously against the idea of a national church as proposed in Germany. It has sought to build up a positive ideal of human brotherhood to set against the divisive and war-making tendencies of nationalism. Beyond this the Protestant church is apparently not willing to go, even to assure its own survival. In the fragmentary reports which have been thus far received there is no indication that the conference as a whole is prepared to apply the teachings of the church to the basic injustices of our times, or to make a frontal attack on the world forces which have throttled free religion in the Reich. A church which is silent in the face of falsehood, intimidation, and terrorism such as are being used in that country and many others to prevent men from bettering their standards of living will almost certainly put up no resistance to the ultimate terrorization which will put the church itself out of existence.

*

ONE OF THE NOTABLE PUBLICATIONS OF THE year has just been issued by the American Civil Liberties Union. "Let Freedom Ring" tells the story of the nation-wide fight for civil rights in this past year of economic and political tension. The document cannot be summarized; it must be read. Its impact comes from the mass of fact that fills its pages: the detailed record of repression, of violence, of censorship, and, on the other side, of growing militant resistance to injustice. The story is by no means disheartening; rather it offers a challenge that should be irresistible to all Americans who still care about their country's future.

Death and Politics

NO sooner was Senator Robinson's death known than it became the occasion for political maneuvering in Washington. We don't want to moralize over the fact, but we believe that both sides showed an undue avidity in turning death to the service of their aims. The nation is learning that the vaster the social issues involved in a struggle, the more ruthless are the weapons with which it is fought. It is no pink tea that is being staged currently in the capital. Nor is it even the usual kind of midsummer madness that comes with the jungle heat and the end-of-session fraying of nerves. It is a desperate struggle over a progressive legislative program—a struggle in which the liberal Democrats and their radical Republican and Farmer-Labor allies are arrayed against the tightest united front of reactionaries that the nation has witnessed in many years. It is in the nature of history that while the long-time trends are shaped by the great social movements, immediate alignments are at the mercy of just such tricks of fate as the death of the man who, next to the President, was the key figure in the current legislative and party crisis.

It was thus inevitable that Senator Robinson's death should have sharp political consequences. Not only was he probably slated as Justice Van Devanter's successor; as Senate majority leader he also bore the brunt of carrying through not only the court compromise bill but the rest of the essential Administration program as well. He was a sturdy party wheel-horse, endowed with a stubborn strength and intelligence. Yet paradoxically his death, putting it in cold terms, rescues Mr. Roosevelt from a quandary. If the President had named Robinson for the court, his first appointment would have been a man whose conservatism was as intrinsic as that of Van Devanter himself. Such a choice would have had to be balanced by that of a real progressive, thus causing Mr. Roosevelt's first two court appointments to cancel out. Moreover, Senator Robinson's death gave Senator Barkley a good chance to succeed to the party leadership in the Senate. And Senator Barkley could at least be counted upon actively to support the measures which must follow.

Thus, however much the President personally mourns the loss of a close and devoted friend, the inherent consequences of Senator Robinson's death should be, in political terms, favorable to the President's larger program. It was to offset these consequences that the reactionary bloc quickly swung into action. They moved quietly, among the more lukewarm supporters of the bill, to get a vote that would send it back to the committee and thus shelve it not only for this term but undoubtedly for good. They sent a deputation of these supporters to the President, suggesting that he could retreat now with good face. Most important, they sought through a newspaper campaign to give the impression that the President was already on the run. Reporters were told that Senate sentiment had, with Robinson's death, finally swung completely against the court bill; and names of Senators were even mentioned as having switched—a charge which in every case proved false. Throughout this campaign the attempt was to link the court program with the taboo of death. Dr. Copeland unctuously warned his colleagues in his most professional tones that their health demanded the adjournment of Congress. Senator Wheeler announced in a pompous statement that to pass the court bill would, after the warning of Senator Robinson's death, be tantamount to flouting the will of God. General Johnson, in one of the most violent of his splenetic columns, implied that Senator Robinson's death must be laid at the President's door, since Mr. Roosevelt had driven his Senate leader beyond his strength in "the black hole of Calcutta" and made him a martyr to a cause in which he did not believe.

The President's letter to Senator Barkley spiked this whole movement effectively. It administered a sharp rebuke to the opposition for its tactics. And above all, it made it abundantly clear that Mr. Roosevelt had no intention of retreating either on the court bill or on the rest of his program.

The time has come to shift the perspective in which liberals have been viewing the proposal for court reform. It is not merely a first step toward the overthrow of judicial supremacy in America. It is the key to the whole Administration program of Mr. Roosevelt's second term. We do not refer merely to the logical connection between court reform and the necessary social legislation. More important at this juncture is the psychological connection. The opposition, thoroughly frightened both by the projected New Deal program and by the growing strength of labor, is out to break both for good. Their path, as they see it, lies through breaking Mr. Roosevelt's prestige and his leadership of his party. They have picked the court proposal as their best bet.

But once they have forced Mr. Roosevelt to retreat on the court bill, they will harry the Administration forces until they have surrendered all along the line. We quote from a wire sent to various prominent industrialists by Frank E. Gannett in his capacity as chairman of the National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government:

> If court battle is lost next move will be to jam through pending bills setting up one-man rule over industry, agriculture, and labor. Our fight will build opposition to these other dictatorial measures.

That lets the cat out of the bag. The eye of these newspaper owners and big industrialists, and the eye of their senatorial champions, is on the real object. And the real object is not to rescue the "independence of the judiciary," but to kill the movement for control of industry and the increased strength of labor. And Mr. Roosevelt knows as well as anyone that the court opposition is only a set-up for a larger battle. He is not the headstrong and dictatorial figure he is reported to be by the yes-men of the press. He is a thorough realist, aware that if he should give up court reform he would be giving up not only court reform but the rest of his program as well. He would have to fight every inch of the way for the Black-Connery labor-standards bill, for Senator Norris's power and regional-planning bill, for the ever-normal granary measure and the farm-tenancy measure. And he would have to carry on this fight with forces whose morale was shattered, against a triumphant and continually more demanding enemy.

War in the East?

TEN days have passed since the first clash between Chinese and Japanese troops on the outskirts of Peiping. The fact that war has not actually broken out may be taken as an indication that neither country instigated the clash in order to precipitate hostilities. The danger of war remains, however. Japan has made it plain that it will not allow any interference with its program of political and economic exploitation in North China. It is willing to allow Nanking only fictional sovereignty over the region. Nanking's rejection of the Japanese ultimatum, on the other hand, indicates that Chinese nationalism has risen to such a pitch that it will tolerate no further Japanese aggression. Although neither government wishes war at present, it is evident that both are prepared to fight rather than give way on a question involving both "face" and fundamental interests.

General Sung's capitulation momentarily eased the local situation in North China, but it did not in the least affect Nanking's attitude. Sung virtually had no alternative. His small army was isolated from the main Chinese armies in Southern Hopei by the Japanese positions along the Peiping-Tientsin and Peiping-Hankow railroads, he himself was practically held a prisoner by the Japanese forces at Tientsin. The chances are that Chinese troops could not hold Peiping under any circumstances, but this does not mean that Japan can seize and keep it as it did Manchuria, Jehol, and parts of Chahar. Peiping, much more than Nanking, symbolizes Chinese unity. It has been the capital of the country for the greater part of seven centuries. And while it is of no large value economically or strategically, its sentimental importance is such that any attempt to occupy it would force Nanking into war.

In attempting to forecast the limit of Chinese patience, considerable significance must be attached to the agreement recently reached between Nanking and the Chinese Communists. It is not likely that anything could have persuaded the Communists to suspend their ten-year war against Nanking except a definite promise of resistance to Japan. The sincerity of Nanking is attested by the fact that the Communist troops, who are only a few hundred miles southwest of Peiping, have recently been supplied with food, trucks, equipment, and money for the ostensible purpose of strengthening them for a war with Japan. The widening of representation in the coming Kuomintang Congress to include left-wing elements and Communists means that Nanking no longer intends to resist anti-Japanese feeling among the masses.

The Nanking-Communist alliance greatly increases China's defensive possibilities. Although the Communists have only about 80,000 experienced troops, they are unusually skilled in guerilla warfare such as may effectively be employed against Japan. The alliance, however, materially increases the danger that a Sino-Japanese conflict might develop into a world war. If Japan fights, we may assume that it will treat the struggle as part of a holy crusade against communism. The Soviet Union might easily, because of its geographical proximity, find itself led into the conflict even against its will. Germany's alignment would be a foregone conclusion.

In such a war—or even in a war limited to China and Japan—the American neutrality act would almost certainly prove a boomerang: We would find ourselves in the unenviable position of actively aiding the aggressors, or of committing an unneutral act by shifting our policy after the war started. As the law now stands, the President would be compelled to declare an embargo on war materials as soon as a state of war existed in the East. This means that China, which has no war industry, would be denied arms, although Japan would have no difficulty getting raw materials to supply its efficient munition plants. More serious, however, is the prospect that the President would have to insist, as was the undoubted intent of Congress, that all supplies for the belligerent countries be put on a cash-and-carry basis. This would virtually amount to an economic alliance with Japan against China. For Japan would command the seas, and it alone has the ships with which to collect the raw materials and secondary war materials which we can supply in abundance. And it so happens that Japan is one of the few countries in the world to which credit is not restricted by the Johnson Act. The Neutrality Act, as we pointed out when it was signed, indicated little understanding on the part of Congress of its probable consequences. Evidently the Administration is now seriously worried by the consequences that loom in the Far East. Repeal of the act is hardly likely, but nothing short of that will save this country from embarrassment and prevent breaches of neutrality which might ultimately precipitate us into a general conflict.

Loans for Farm Tenants

THE sound and fury over the court reform, relief, and other major bills has obscured for the time being the quiet but bitter altercation going on in Washington concerning the tenancy problem. Fundamentally, it is another evidence of Southern Democratic revolt against the New Deal. After the almost masterly report of the President's Committee on Farm Tenancy, two different bills were brought forward in the House and Senate. The Senate bill provided for direct land purchase, whereas the House bill granted loans to tenants, without retaining title to the land for the government. Both, in effect, defeated every substantial measure recommended by the President's committee, yet both were passed.

The compromise measure, already passed by the House and still under consideration in the Senate, follows closely the original House bill. It attempts to build small landowners out of tenants, and for this purpose provides for loans, increasing in two years to $50,000,000 annually.

PUBLIC L Y

These would be repayable in forty years at 3 per cent. All land so purchased is to be transferred in fee simple absolute, with the government holding first lien. The tenant may indulge in any form of speculation that he chooses, such as accepting a loan from a private bank at several times the government's rate of interest for a slightly larger principal. In such a case, the administrative agency may declare the loan to be due in full but, of course, the damage will have already been done. The President's committee had recommended strongly that the government should lease the land to the tenant for a long period (forty years was suggested), at the end of which time it was to be completely owned by the tenant.

The method of selecting those tenants who are to be beneficiaries will probably be the same as was provided in the original bill. In the first place, preference will be given to persons who "are able to make the initial down payment, or who are owners of livestock and farm implements necessary successfully to carry on farm operations." This is a little like giving relief preference to those who have enough cash on hand to repay the government for some of the money expended on them. The entire act is to be administered by county committees, consisting of three farmers in each county, who are to be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture. They alone authorize the purchase of land and decide upon the "character, ability, and experience" of the applicant. There is no provision whatsoever for any participation on the part of the tenants themselves. In short, a smooth political bureaucracy will be established, probably made up of prominent Democratic landowners in each county, who will be able to disqualify anyone so ill-advised as to be militant in demanding tenant rights.

The most serious failure of the act, however, lies in the faulty philosophy behind it. For example, it classifies sharecroppers and those who rent for money together, although they are widely separated economic categories. The South itself has been undergoing a tremendous agrarian revolution in the last few years. The increasing use of agricultural machinery, the increase in production of cotton per acre in the older cotton-growing states, amounting to 25 per cent in the years 1934-1936 over the preceding ten years, the growth of a large class of agricultural day laborers, these indicate that the small individual holder will in the future find himself increasingly unable to compete with the great machine enterprises now rubbing shoulders with the sharecropper and all that he signifies. The only possible method of organization through which the tenant can hope to compete without bowing to a perhaps more brutal taskmaster is some form of producers' cooperative. No such set-up, however, may be created under the proposed act.

While America's world cotton markets go to pot, with foreign production increasing, with a crushing surplus of cotton impending this year or next, the mere creation of another administration and the appropriation of a few million dollars is not a solution, but a sop. American cotton culture and the body of submerged tenants who go with it demand fundamental change, not alleviation.

Nazi Exhibitionism

"THE Reich now calls into being an astounding blossoming of German art. . . . Works that are not generally intelligible will no longer reach the German nation. . . . Artistic cheats will be suppressed." With these words Adolf Hitler last week opened the House of German Art in Munich, with its exhibition of 850 objets d'art, all Nazi. The world could rest assured, he said, that lunacy in art had come to an end.

But the world refuses to be astonished. Herr Hitler has been announcing these death-blows to lunacy at the opening of every new exposition. This one, we suspect, is nothing new but is part of a general program which has provided a series of such shows all over Germany, each with its special objective and its own slogan. The recent Berlin exposition, for example, symbolized by the words "Give Me Four Years' Time," glorified rearmament and reemployment. In Düsseldorf the "Creative People" Exposition now displays the synthetic goods to be produced under the second Four-Year Plan, while Frankfort has been celebrating "Larger Families and Healthier Babies."

These expositions are a device of the dictatorship that has been little discussed outside of Germany. The exposition or fair has been converted from its ordinary use as a means of stimulating business into a large-scale political weapon. By all the arts of display, Herr Goebbels attempts to sell Nazi Germany to its population. He has devised three types of exposition: those in which the history of the Nazi movement is dramatized and drilled into the citizens; those in which they are urged to do their part by producing more babies, avoiding waste, or depositing money with the government; and finally those in which the leaders glorify their Kultur.

The job is well done, yet obvious dangers lurk in this graphic exposure of the new Germany. In the Berlin Ratshaus an exhibition was recently held celebrating the "Ten Years' Struggle for Berlin" of the Nazi Party. The chief attraction was a collection of knives, razors, slugs, pistols, and hand grenades—confiscated, it was said, from a Communist stronghold. The label read, "They fought with arms. We fought with ideas." But the walls were covered with pictures of Storm Troopers in the midst of riots, wounded "martyrs" on the streets and in hospital beds. The real story was not hard to read.

Even more revealing were the examples of Nazi Kultur presented recently at Dresden. There a whole armory was devoted to a demonstration of the superior virtues of the Germanic as compared with the Latin script—the preference of Martin Luther and the Emperor Otto for the Germanic being heavily stressed. This point settled, the crowning literary achievements of Aryan genius were exhibited in a display labeled "The People Live in Books." Here on plush-covered tables appeared rare editions of "Mein Kampf," the works of Rosenberg, Goebbels, and Göring, and a few Teutonic fairy tales. Such is the nature of Germany's rebirth under the aegis of Herr Hitler. Can even a Nazi miss the point?

Will Europe Go to War?

BY LUDWIG LORE

IF we were to take a poll of public opinion on the chances for war in the near future the vote would probably be overwhelmingly negative. There have been so many "war dangers" and "war crises" in the last three years that the public has developed a sort of immunity against them. The general feeling is that Germany would be the aggressor in any war that is likely to come, and that Germany is not ready for war. But history has a way of laughing at human predictions. It has a logic of its own which scoffs at the limitations of our puny understanding.

Those who discount the possibility of war proceed from the assumption that Hitler and his associates are preparing like true systematic Germans, with every intention of striking out when and not until they are ready to meet the enemy on something like equal terms. History knows of such instances. Bismarck's war against Austria (1866) was the result of just such cold-blooded calculation. The first Balkan War, in 1912, was another instance of a carefully prepared conspiracy against the peace of Europe. But 1914 was another story. It is true that Germany cast the die that brought on the war, but not because she was ready for it or wanted it at that moment. Careful research into the records of the German Foreign Office of that period has brought to light the paradoxical fact that German diplomacy, while sincerely trying to maintain the peace, was, with inexorable fatality, driving Europe into war.

All that is history. Yet we refuse to learn from the past and persist in the fallacious conception that no war will come until the nations of Europe are ready for it. That Hitler is preparing for war cannot be doubted. That his policy is a war policy is incontestable. Indeed, National Socialism became a power in the Reich chiefly for the reason that it guaranteed a political and diplomatic offensive against the restrictions imposed on Germany by the post-war treaties. But Hitler and those behind and above him are not fools rushing blindly to certain destruction. They know Germany's military, economic, and financial weaknesses and recognize them for the handicaps they are. But such handicaps can be overcome.

At present the Nazi government rests almost wholly on bluff and a talent for extortion. To these qualities it owes its popularity at home, a popularity which depends almost wholly, however, on its ability to continue in that dangerous course. A serious diplomatic defeat might destroy the confidence of the masses in the Hitler regime and even alienate the support of the large capitalist interests on whose continued approval its preparations for war so largely depend. German industry cannot live forever on hopes. The glory of a Germany remilitarized is a poor substitute for markets and foreign exchange. It is possible, therefore, that a crisis such as might arise out of the liquidation of the Spanish Civil War might drive the Hitler government head over heels into another world catastrophe. In other words, one cannot judge the chances of war on the basis of logic and reason. Nevertheless, it is profitable to investigate those conditions which, other things remaining equal, would encourage or deter the German government from inviting war.

THE PROBLEM OF FOOD

Could Germany feed its population in case of war? The terrible sufferings of the German people during the blockade of 1914-1918 taught the Nazi government the importance of being prepared. The fantastic self-sufficiency policy, which has been so roundly condemned by economists as blocking the course of German economic recovery, is of course not a recovery measure at all but an important part of Nazi Germany's war-preparedness program. Thus far, however, German self-sufficiency has been more spectacular than real.

German economists point out that the standard of living of the German people could be reduced by one-fifth without lasting harm to the physical condition of the population. In theory that may be true. Laboratory experiments may show that such a reduction is possible. Put into practice in the homes of millions of German workers, it would soon result in a retrogression in public health. There is no doubt that it would be put into practice, since war-time production in the Reich would fall decidedly below the best efforts of scientific management in peace time. War is destructive even in those sectors where bullets and shrapnel do not fall. War draws to the front a large percentage of those who work in the fields; technical replacements stop; factories manufacture explosives instead of fertilizers. We have no detailed figures regarding German farm production during the World War. We do know that the supply of pork fell from 25,300,000 head in December, 1914, to 16,600,000 in August, 1918; that the number of milk cows was reduced by 2,000,000 (20 per cent) during the four war years, and that the average yield per cow dropped so sharply that the total output of milk declined from 24,000,000 liters in 1913 to 11,300,000 liters in 1918.

Figures for grain production for the World War period were never published, but a study of war-time food distribution is enlightening. In the summer of 1918 the basic daily ration per person in Berlin was 280 grams of "bread," baked of a mixture of grain and turnips, and 500 grams of potatoes; the monthly ration of butter was 70 grams. During the war years 900,000 more persons, non-combatants, died in Germany than in the same period before the war from causes growing out of malnutrition.

Food conditions in the Reich today are not so bad as they were then, but they are bad enough. During the last eighteen months Germany has gone through a whole series of acute shortages, and the end is not in sight. There are no food cards—as yet—but various food categories, particularly fats, are apportioned by means of a system under which each customer gets a ration card from his dealer. There is an allowance of half a pound of fat per person per week, with butter fats at a premium. In a recent address Walter Darré, Reich Supervisor of Agriculture, declared that Germans eat a disproportionate amount of fat and demanded that the present daily average of 90 grams per person be reduced to 65 grams.

The acute meat shortage of the past winter was somewhat alleviated by a bumper crop of pigs, but prices are still inordinately high. Regulations for meat products do not affect the prices of "luxury cuts," which are hoisted by desperate retailers to fantastic heights to offset the practical elimination of profits on the cheaper parts. Because of the difficulty of getting feed, over a million more hogs were slaughtered in the final quarter of 1936 than in the corresponding quarter of 1935, but most of this increased supply was withdrawn by the government for storage. Bacon is almost unobtainable.

Last winter the Nazi government issued a series of regulations on the collection of foodstuffs produced in the Reich. A Reichsnährstand (Reich Food Estate) was appointed with power to organize production, fix prices, supervise the work of the peasants, and compel them to deliver certain quantities in fixed periods at fixed prices. Concurrently there has grown up a flourishing bootleg trade in farm products, such as cream, eggs, and butter. Whipping cream, for instance, is obtainable only in homeopathic doses in the better hotels and restaurants. Eggs, due to the lack of feed, are so scarce that the housewife rarely gets more than one or two at a time from her grocer's carefully hidden supply. Coffee is a luxury. Beet sugar is plentiful but sells at 30 per cent above the world price. New experiments for procuring sugar from wood have been successful but as yet the process is too costly to be practical. In general, the manufacture of synthetic foods and textiles is still too expensive to result in genuine self-sufficiency.

While there is no acute shortage of bread grains, the whole problem of grain production has become extraordinarily vexing. During the first two years the Hitler regime had the good fortune to harvest bumper crops, so that it was able to feed up to 75 per cent of the population out of its own resources. The drought of 1934 brought the first setback. Whereas the Reich produced 5,200,000 tons of wheat in 1932 and 5,800,000 in 1933, it raised only 4,000,000 in 1936, thus falling a million tons short of requirements. The situation in feed grain was even worse. Germany has had to import between 55 and 65 million dollars' worth of grain, and will probably use another 20 million dollars' worth before the next harvest. The shortage was covered in part under clearing agreements with Canada, Argentina, and the Danubian countries, but a considerable amount had to be bought outright. For the necessary exchange German citizens were forced to sell their foreign securities, cutting down a permanent source of foreign exchange from interest, dividends, and amortization payments.

Prospects for the coming harvest are anything but favorable due to heavy rains which delayed sowing. The farmer, who was one of the chief beneficiaries of the Hitler regime in its early stages, is becoming restive. He points out that the government's refusal to buy feed for German cattle in 1934 and 1935 led farmers to slaughter their livestock, causing the present shortage of milk and fats. He resents the order requiring a permit for every pig slaughtered for private use, and forcing delivery of all others to government agencies at a fixed price. Bootlegging of farm products has become so general that the Gestapo is enforcing compulsory delivery of milk and other farm products. Withholding produce has been made high treason punishable with prison and, if the courts so decide, with decapitation.

A contributory factor is the reduction of Germany's agricultural area for military purposes. In 1935 alone about 1,169,500 acres were withdrawn from agricultural utilization "for the new upbuilding of Germany"; in 1936, 200,000 acres. Meanwhile the demand for labor power in the arms and ammunition industries has produced an acute shortage of farm workers in East Prussia, the grain area of the country.

What does all this mean for the German people? Children are collecting bones, tin-foil, paper, etc., under the direction of the school authorities. Their mothers stand in line for hours to get a coveted piece of meat or a pound of fat or butter. The housewife no longer chooses what she wants to buy. She must be satisfied, in respect to quantity as well as quality, with what the storekeeper has to offer. The condition of Germany today is incomparably worse than before the World War. The Germany of 1914, in fact, had such vast reserves of every description that no one even thought of making special provisions for a coming war. The line-up of Germany's presumptive foes in a coming war makes it certain, moreover, that she would be cut off from foreign markets by a much more effective blockade than encompassed her defeat in 1914-1918. Germany's financial condition then was excellent; today it could hardly be worse.

The Hitler government would not repeat the mistakes of Imperial Germany. It would be less wasteful; its resources would be more carefully conserved and more adequately organized. Everything would be rationed from the first day of war. But starvation, too, would begin at once, and Germany's war lords would have to deal from the very start with a dangerous psychological element—the masses of the people.

IRON AND OIL

As the World War progressed it became increasingly plain that the side best supplied with the materials of mechanical warfare would be the ultimate victor. By the end of the war "motorization" had become the aim and end of all military wisdom. The outstanding drawback of motorized warfare is its enormous consumption of explosives, metals, and fuel oils of every description.

Germany's chemical industries can produce almost inexhaustible supplies of the first, provided factories can be kept intact. The Reich has also accumulated tremendous stores of copper, aluminum, manganese, zinc, lead, etc. How long they would last in case of war is another question. Undoubtedly Germany would continue to depend on the world market for its iron ore. In 1936, after every available source of supply was put in operation, Germany's iron mines produced 6,652,000 tons (1,340,000 tons in 1932) and 18,469,000 tons were imported. Translating these figures into pig iron makes the ratio even more unfavorable, since the yield of German ore is relatively much lower than that of imported ore.

At present Germany gets most of her iron from Sweden and France. Should her dreams come true, and Spanish intervention give the Nazi government a monopoly of Spanish iron production, it would relieve her economy of a tremendous burden—in times of peace. But what chance would there be of getting Spanish ore into Germany after the outbreak of war? Sweden would be the only certain source. Seventy-five per cent of Sweden's iron output now goes to Germany, but her agreements with Berlin expire at the end of the year, and Great Britain, whose financial position is strong, is planning to move into the Swedish iron market. Moreover, in war time the opposition of Norway's Socialist government could become a serious obstacle to Swedish-German trade. Transportation through the North Sea would certainly be blocked by England and perhaps by the Soviet.

The Third Reich has made a stupendous effort to free itself from dependence on the international market for fuel oils. Output was increased from 174,300 tons in 1930 to 437,400 tons in 1935. But in 1918 the Allies on the French front alone used 500,000 tons a month. Only the United States and the Soviet Union have a surplus supply of fuel, which would not be available to Germany in case of war. And the chances of getting oil from other oil-producing states would be just as unfavorable.

The question of oil for war is one of many which draw a sharp line of demarcation between Germany's military experts and the military dilettantism of Hitler and his associates. In the Deutsche Wehr, generally looked upon as the official organ of the military authorities in the Reich, H. Steinberg, a prominent mining engineer, has estimated that a great power would use at least 12,650,000 tons of oil in one year of war, 5,500,000 tons for the land army and 1,700,000 for the aerial force, 2,000,000 for the navy, and 3,450,000 for domestic purposes. This estimate is too low rather than too high, since it roughly approximates World War figures. Much more will be required in a new and modern war.

How are such quantities of the precious fluid to be procured? To buy in advance is out of the question. An English expert estimated not long ago that Great Britain would have to invest £30,000,000 for oil and for storage facilities for half a year's supply. In 1935 Germany produced 1,380,000 tons of Ersatz motor oil, or about 12 per cent of the amount she would need. The problem is not only technical. The production of an adequate supply of Ersatz oil would necessitate an increased production of hard coal of 800,000,000 tons, or 60 per cent more than the present total. Furthermore, assuming that the requisite number of mines were available, an army of 300,000 additional workers would be required to mine the coal and manufacture the oil. In war this would mean withholding twelve army divisions from duty at the front.

Other European powers are equally dependent on the world market but, having unimpeded access to the sea, they will always be able to supplement their deficiencies. For Germany the chances are practically nil.

This is the first of two articles on the chances of war in Europe. The second will appear next week.

Robert Vansittart, Europe's Arbiter

BY ROBERT DELL

Geneva, July 6

IF I were asked who were the two ablest diplomatists in Europe, I should reply without hesitation Titulescu, who was until recently Rumanian Foreign Minister, and Sir Robert Vansittart, permanent head of the British Foreign Office—his official title is permanent Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Vansittart has much more scope than Titulescu has ever had for the exercise of his abilities, and is undoubtedly at this moment the chief arbiter of the fate of Europe. Except when the foreign minister is a man with great force of character and a policy of his own, whether good or bad, such as Salisbury or Curzon in England, Delcassé or Poincaré in France, foreign policy in both countries is in fact conducted by permanent officials. Ever since Vansittart became permanent head of the British Foreign Office he has made British foreign policy, whether the marionette of the moment was called Simon, Hoare, or Eden. Now and then, no doubt, one marionette or another has tried a little dance of his own, but the strings have remained in the hands of Sir Robert Vansittart, and the deviation has not lasted long. At the present moment Anthony Eden appears not quite to see eye to eye with Sir Robert Vansittart, but in fact Vansittart is using Eden with remarkable dexterity. Eden is allowed to say things that he himself perhaps believes, or at least half believes, so as to deceive people about the real nature and aims of British policy.

In France, too, foreign policy is made by permanent officials, by M. Léger, permanent head of the Quai d'Orsay, and M. Massigli. The latter does not conceal in private his desire for the victory of Franco and his belief in the necessity of an understanding with Mussolini at all costs—in short, he adheres to the policy of Laval. Léger believes in blindly following the policy of England, and acts on his belief, so in fact the policy that he makes is also the policy of Sir Robert Vansittart, who is for all practical purposes foreign minister of France as well as of England.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Cal.

France is as necessary to England as England is to France, for France is a buffer state between England and Germany, and Germany will never attack England without first attacking France. When Baldwin said: "Our frontier is on the Rhine," he enunciated a truism. Whether or not there is an alliance or an entente cordiale between England and France, the British government, whatever its complexion, will always go to the aid of France if that country is attacked by Germany, because England will never tolerate the Germans at Calais, or, for that matter, at Antwerp or Amsterdam. England went to war in 1914, not to save France or Belgium but to prevent the Germans from holding Calais or Antwerp, and incidentally to destroy the German fleet. England will always go to war with Germany for the same reasons in the same circumstances. This being so, the French government of the People's Front, in sacrificing everything else to secure British support in the event of a German attack on France, has been paying for what it could get for nothing. Could any policy be more inept? And what a price the French government has paid! The Franco-Belgian alliance is gone, the Franco-Polish alliance no longer exists in anything but name, the Franco-Soviet pact has been emptied of all its value, the Little Entente and the Balkan Entente are dislocated. France has been separated from all her eastern friends and isolated in Western Europe.

These conditions are the consequences of the policy of Sir Robert Vansittart, in which France has acquiesced, and he is far too intelligent not to have foreseen them. This does not mean that he is hostile to France or desires to do harm to France. On the contrary, it is probable, indeed almost certain, that he regrets what he believes to be the necessity of leaving Hitler a free hand in Central and Eastern Europe. The traditional aim of British policy has been to hold the balance in such a way as to prevent any other power from becoming dominant on the Continent and, when there has appeared to be a danger of that happening, to intervene on behalf of the weaker side. This traditional policy of the balance of power has now been abandoned. It is true that there has always been in British diplomacy a school in favor of an alliance with the strongest power on the Continent, but that school has nearly always been in the minority and has rarely succeeded in applying its policy. The only important departure from the policy of the balance of power, which involves freedom for England from any definite and permanent commitment on the Continent, was made by Salisbury and Joseph Chamberlain more than forty years ago, when they offered an alliance to Germany.

It is perhaps too soon to say that an alliance with Germany has once again become a definite aim of British policy, but it cannot be doubted that it is the policy of Sir Robert Vansittart and of Neville Chamberlain, the new British Prime Minister, whose dream is to revive his father's policy and to succeed where his father failed. Pro-German feeling is strong in the House of Lords, in the City of London, and in the English ruling classes generally, and, strangely enough, the friends of Hitler include some politicians on the left, such as Lord Allen of Hurtwood, Lord Ponsonby, Lord Noel-Buxton, and George Lansbury, whose motives, however, are not the same as those of the Tory pro-Nazis. They are for peace at any price and fondly believe that peace will be secured by making concessions to Hitler.

An alliance or even a close understanding with Nazi Germany would not, however, go through without strong opposition. In the British Cabinet itself there is a minority opposed to, or at least uneasy about, present British policy. It includes Eden, who is probably sincerely favorable to the system of the League of Nations and what is called collective security. Unfortunately his past conduct suggests that he has neither the character nor the courage to make a stand. In the City of London there is an influential group, which is said to be growing in numbers, strongly opposed to any financial or other concessions to Germany. It is represented by an ably edited periodical called the Banker. This group is in strong opposition to the Bank of England and its governor, Montagu Norman, who is intensely pro-Nazi and works in close cooperation with Dr. Schacht. In politics there are Conservatives like Winston Churchill and the Duchess of Atholl and independents like Eleanor Rathbone opposed to the foreign policy of the government and in favor of a system of collective security for Europe with the participation of England; but one can never be sure how long Winston Churchill will remain of the same mind.

The danger is that, since few people in England seem to realize what British policy really is, the country may some day be presented with a fait accompli and rushed into accepting it. There is no effective political opposition. The Labor and Liberal parties have no leadership and seem incapable of any energetic action. The Labor Party is actually losing ground in by-elections because it has no alternative policy to offer the electors, thousands of whom do not trouble to vote at all.

The new British policy is based on the following argument. England must never go to war unless the interests of the British Empire are involved—that is to say, the only war permissible is the kind of war forbidden by the Kellogg Pact. British interests would not be involved in the event of a war between Germany and any country east of the Rhine. It follows that Article 16 of the Covenant of the League of Nations must be got rid of and that England must join in no pact of mutual assistance. The League of Nations must be "reformed" in such a way as to make it a mere debating society. If, however, Germany attacked France or Belgium or Holland, British interests would be involved, and England would have to go to war with Germany. This being so, France must be compelled to abandon all its commitments east of the Rhine. For if Germany attacked Czecho-Slovakia, for instance, and France went to the aid of Czecho-Slovakia, England would almost certainly be involved in the war between France and Germany, and that must never happen in such circumstances.

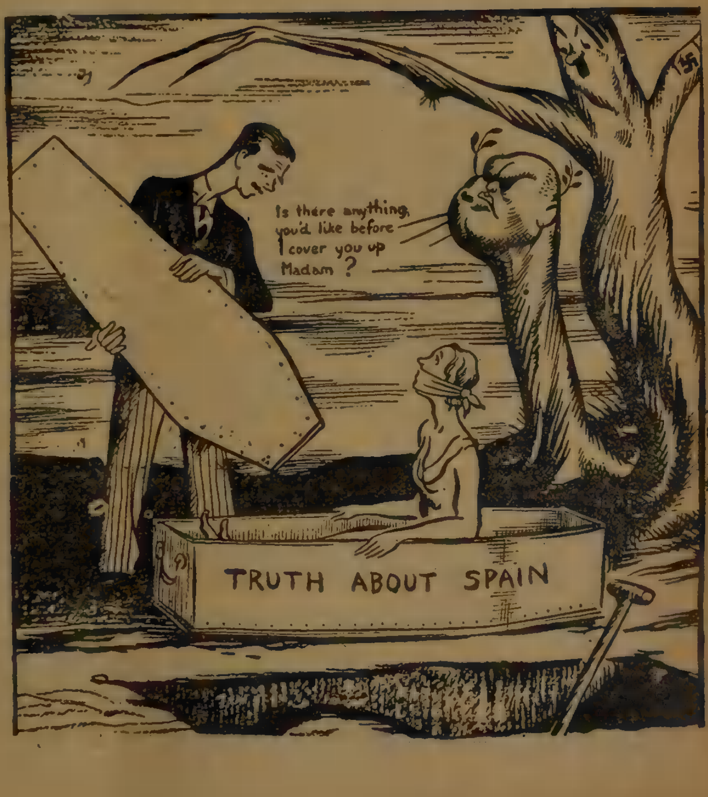
It will be seen that the policy is quite logical. Whether it is not a shortsighted policy is another question. When Hitler had become the master of the greater part of the European Continent, he might follow the example of Napoleon and turn his attention to England. Hitler himself has said in "Mein Kampf" that for the moment Germany must not try to be a world power, because an alliance with England is necessary, but he has also said that ultimately "Germany will be a world power or nothing at all." The aim of Vansittart's policy is to force Germany to be and remain a European Continental power and not to become a world power. The calculation is that by the time Hitler has made himself master of the Continent east of the Rhine, England will be so strongly armed that it will be hopeless for Germany to attack it, and England will be in a position to make an alliance with Germany on its own terms. This is the real reason for England's rearmament. France would then be forced to come into the Anglo-German combination and would sink to the position of a second-class power under Anglo-German control. In my opinion this policy, which is not unlike a division of the world into British and German spheres of influence, is a serious menace to the United States of America.

Even if I had no solid grounds for my conviction that this description of Vansittart's policy is accurate, I should say that it is the only hypothesis that will explain British policy during the last four years. It explains British acquiescence in German rearmament and the refusal of the British government in 1933 to join in any steps to stop it. It explains the Anglo-German naval agreement, which gave Germany the command of the North Sea but not a navy large enough to embark on a world policy and enter into competition with England. It explains why the British government persuaded the French government to capitulate to Hitler in March, 1936, when he sent the Germany army into the demilitarized zone. There is ground for suspicion that the British government knew of Hitler's intention in advance and did not inform the French government. The military occupation of the demilitarized zone furthered the British policy of cutting France off from Central and Eastern Europe because the fortification by Germany of the frontier has made it much more difficult for France to go to the aid of Czecho-Slovakia or any other country east of the Rhine.

My description of Vansittart's policy explains the action of the British government in the Abyssinian affair. The British government agreed to sanctions only to win an electoral victory, with the firm intention of making them ineffective so as to have an excuse for never applying them again and of dropping them as soon as the electoral victory was won. This policy was initiated by Vansittart, and the general lines of his plan, which was made public about three weeks after the English general election, were communicated by Baldwin to Count de Chambrun, then French Ambassador to Rome, at Aix-les-Bains in September, 1935, during the Assembly of the League of Nations at which Sir Samuel Hoare made his famous speech. Vansittart's policy, as I have described it, explains British hostility to the Franco-Soviet pact and British action in regard to Spain. It explains why the British Foreign Office encouraged Poland to come to terms with Germany in 1933, encouraged Belgium to break the alliance with France and to return to "neutrality," encouraged the Henlein party in Czecho-Slovakia, encouraged Yugoslavia through the British Minister to Belgrade to come to terms with Italy and Germany, and in short did everything in its power to break up the Little Entente and the Balkan Entente. At the Dardanelles conference at Montreux last year Titulescu told the British delegates to their faces that they were trying to break up the Balkan Entente, and he was right. It was evident to everybody at that conference that the British delegation was working for Germany.

I have left to the last what I am convinced has been one of the most important factors in Vansittart's policy, which is also the policy of the majority of the British government, namely, hostility to Soviet Russia and fear of communism. This above all has rallied so large a proportion of the English ruling classes to the idea of an understanding or alliance with Nazi Germany. In spite of all their declarations against the division of Europe into "ideological blocs," they know quite well that the fascist bloc has already been formed, and in their hearts they prefer fascism to communism—a term by which they denote any attempt of organized labor to seize power. They prefer Franco to the Spanish government, although they know that there is no chance in Spain of a Communist regime in the true sense of the term.

The question now is whether liberal and labor forces in England will awaken to the realities of the situation in time to prevent their country from joining the fascist bloc. The symptoms are not encouraging.

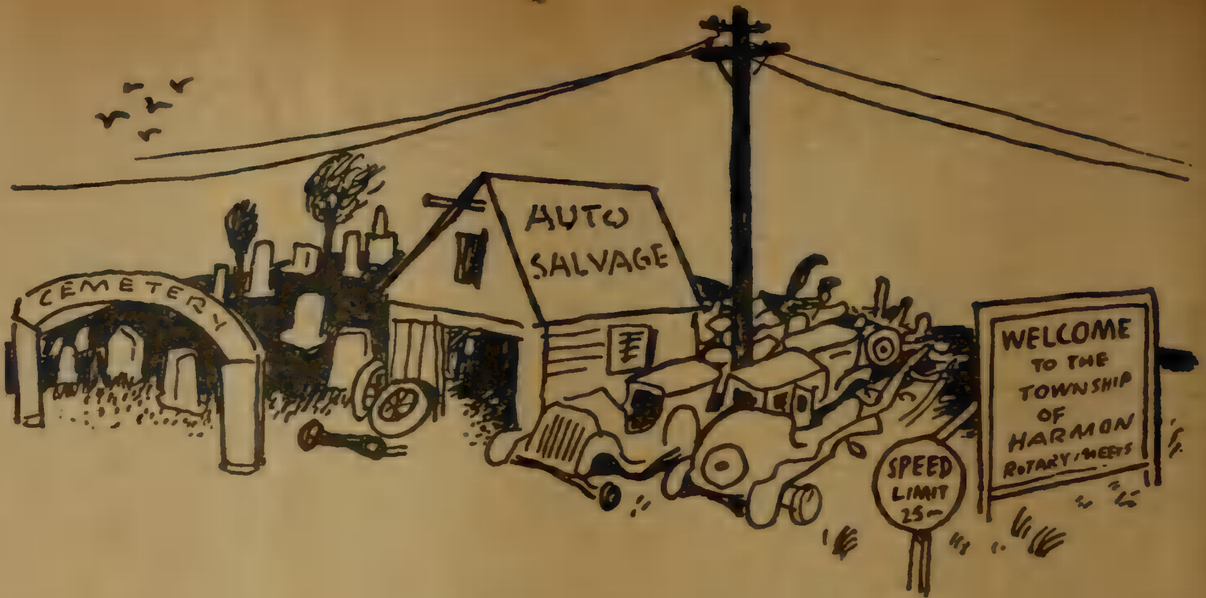


Is there anything you'd like before I cover you up Madam ?
TRUTH ABOUT SPAIN

Out West

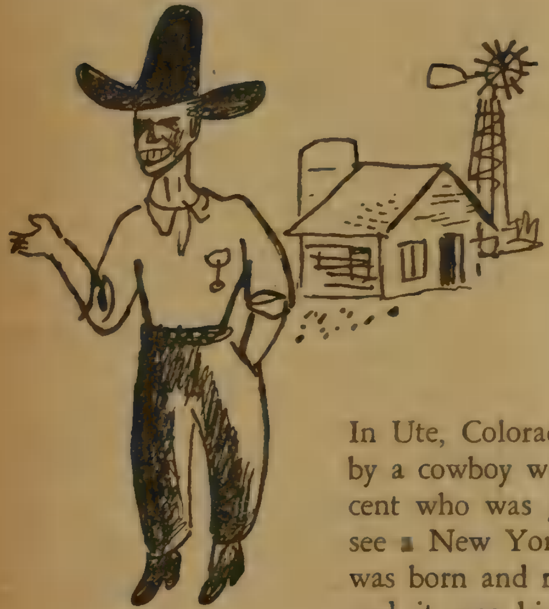
BY

WILLIAM GROPPER

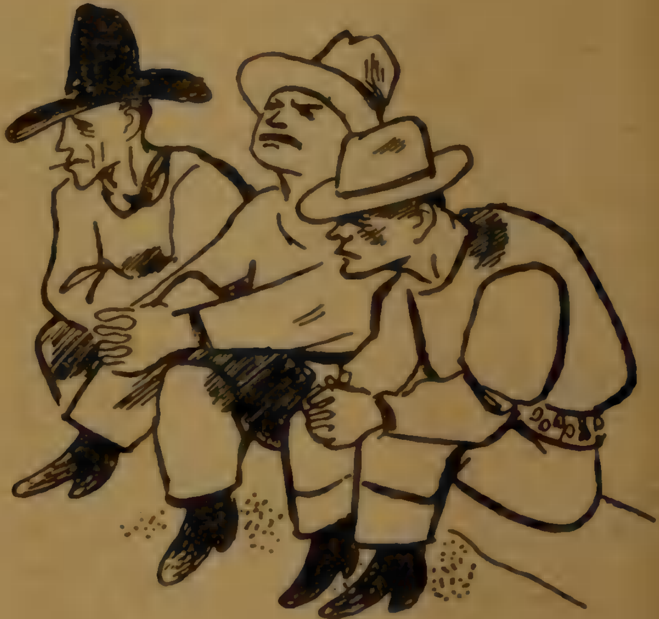


CEMETERY
AUTO SALVAGE
WELCOME TO THE TOWNSHIP OF HARMON ROTARY MEETS
SPEED LIMIT 25

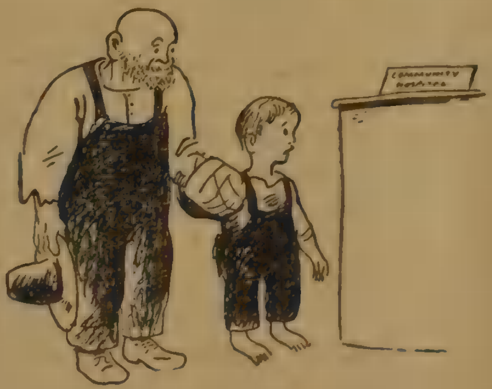
At the entrance of almost every town the tourist is greeted with a welcome sign, the name of the town, the population, when the Rotarians meet, and the speed limit. Right next to it is a junkyard and a cemetery; then you go along Main Street. All Main Streets look alike, with cars parked in front of general stores and the Post Office.



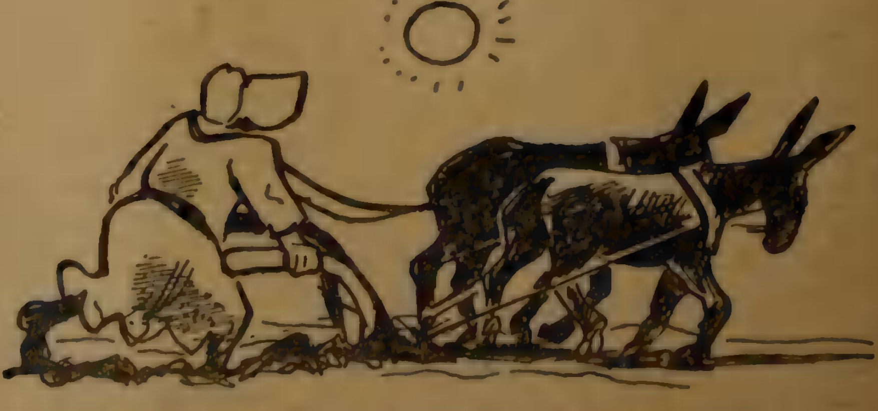
In Ute, Colorado, I was greeted by a cowboy with a southern accent who was gosh-dern glad to see a New York car, because he was born and raised in Brooklyn and it was his home town for thirty years. I asked him how long he had lived in Colorado, and he said three months.



In the State of Kansas men sit on the curb for hours and just look.



In Elk City, Oklahoma, while I was waiting to meet Dr. Shadid, of the Community Hospital, a youngster led in his granddad, who had hurt his hand playing with firecrackers. I also heard a farmer say that if Dr. Shadid ran for Congress he would get all the farmer votes in the vicinity.



Out on the farms, I've seen women do the plowing.

Maine Is Not in the Union

BY AARON LEVENSTEIN

IT'S really true: Maine is not a part of the United States. And what is worse, the people of Maine know it and don't care. Maine's secession from the Union was emphasized in the recent shoe strike conducted by the Committee for Industrial Organization in Lewiston and Auburn. Six strike leaders, together with their attorney, were jailed because they thought they had the protection of the Wagner Act.

Soon after their strike began, the local press informed them that they were strangers in a strange land. The Lewiston Sun opened a barrage calling on the manufacturers to have nothing to do with the C. I. O. "The manufacturers should not dare to accept and surrender to the 5-4 Wagner law decision," it thundered. "Our local manufacturers should insist that whatever the Wagner Act means, it does not apply to our Auburn and Lewiston manufacturers." And again: "The shoe manufacturers should refuse to have any conferences with any federal official or with any other outsider." In connection with the Wagner Act, Roosevelt was referred to as "your No. 1 lawbreaker of America . . . your queer-minded President."

These two small Maine towns, separated by the Androscoggin River, which cascades picturesquely between them, have a total population of 50,000. Some 6,500 of them are shoe workers, predominantly French-Canadian. Conditions were rotten-ripe for unionism, with wages averaging $14 a week at most and frequently falling as low as $7 and $8. I talked to two little boys who alternated between French and English in telling how they received 25 cents a week for working long hours after school sweeping up the floors in the Lounge Shoe plant. Organization was inevitable. Led by Powers Hapgood, New England secretary of the C. I. O., the United Shoe Workers of America called for conferences with the manufacturers last March but received no reply. The strike followed, with an overwhelming majority walking out. Action came fast and furious from the companies. In spite of the state's liberal labor-injunction statute, Judge Harry Manser of the Supreme Judicial Court refused to listen to witnesses called by the union, and in the midst of the hearing signed a decree declaring the strike "illegal" because it was directed toward a closed shop.

Meanwhile the chief of police in Auburn forbade picket lines within a radius of 500 feet of any factory. A local attorney, Benjamin J. Arena, who advised the strikers that the chief had no authority to make such a ruling, was thereupon indicted with many others on charges of conspiracy, a felony in Maine. After a two-weeks trial, Arena was acquitted by a jury, but nine of his codefendants were convicted and sentenced to five months' imprisonment and fines of $100 each. During the examination of talesmen, the effect of the newspaper propaganda on the public mind became evident. Three panels were exhausted as prospective jurors passed through the following questioning:

Question: Will the fact that some of the defendants come from outside the state of Maine affect your verdict? Answer: Yes.

Q.: Will the fact that the defendants are connected with the C. I. O. affect your verdict. A.: Yes.

Q.: Do you know what C. I. O. means? A.: No.

At the same time, the authorities proceeded with the enforcement of the injunction. They threatened to close down the food commissary of the strikers, but backed water when faced with determined refusal. Powers Hapgood and five other strike leaders, together with Sidney Grant, a Massachusetts labor lawyer, were charged with contempt of court and haled before Judge Manser. Attorney Grant's contemptuous conduct was an address delivered to a strike meeting. "He stated," testified a witness, the son of a shoe-company executive, called by the manufacturers, "that he was counsel for the organization and that in the event the advice which he gave the shoe workers—in the event that they were arrested—they had a perfect right to use the telephone, to plead not guilty, and if they were subjected to any third degree that they were to notify or let their counsel know immediately, that they might serve action for assault and battery against those who would be responsible for such action of the third degree upon them. He also stated that no judge or any court of law can proclaim a strike illegal. That is all I recall of what he said." Grant was jailed for advising his clients of their legal rights.

Governor Lewis Barrows contributed to the drive against the union by sending in the militia. While the newspapers were telling the manufacturers to disregard the Wagner Act as hostile to their interests, Barrows issued a proclamation in which he declared, echoing Judge Manser, "The present strike is illegal under the terms of the Wagner Act"—despite the explicit provision of the law that "nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike."

The conduct of the contempt proceedings before a jury, as required by the Maine statute, was a further illustration of judicial contempt for law. Judge Manser proceeded on the theory that the defendants were being tried for a civil contempt, subject to fine or assessment of damages, and so charged the jury: "If you reach a verdict of guilty, you are not branding a person as a criminal; in other words, this is not a criminal case." But on receiving the verdict of guilty, the learned court imposed jail sentences as in a criminal case.

Manser packed the defendants off immediately to the Androscoggin County Jail and refused to fix bail. He even kept Ernest Henry, 63-year-old union organizer, under guard in a hospital to which he had to be removed because of tuberculosis, and refused to release any of the men unless they apologized to the court and promised to leave the state. Of course, they all refused. It was only after Arthur Garfield Hays, acting in behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union and the Workers' Defense League, together with C. I. O. attorneys, obtained a writ of habeas corpus from another judge that the right of bail was allowed the union leaders and they were finally released.

The workers have since voted to return to the factories, in view of the decision of the National Labor Relations Board ordering elections under the Wagner Act. In five plants consent elections have already been held, all of which have been won by the C. I. O., and some manufacturers have signed agreements. It is still not known whether the shoe manufacturers in the others will accede to the order of the board or will listen to the Lewiston Sun, which says: "You manufacturers must not, after so fine a fight, surrender and submit to anything Dr. Myers (Regional Labor Director) or any of that new-fangled Administration is going to put over on you."

Freedom of the Press Again

BY RUTH BRINDZE

THE newspaper publishers of America have discovered a new threat to freedom of the press. It has nothing to do with the publishing business, with unionization, or with the Newspaper Guild. Radio is the cause of the present agitation. The publishers have discovered a "conspiracy" to prevent them from gaining control of the air.

Until recently the official attitude of the publishers emphasized the essential differences between the radio and the press. As late as the 1936 session of the American Newspaper Publishers Association, Edward H. Harris, chairman of the association's radio committee, had proclaimed with indignation and alarm:

> Journalism could not exist if it were subject to a government license. Radio broadcasting, facsimile printing, and television by their very nature must always be under government license. Attempts of radio to function in the field of journalism must fail, because a government license destroys the freedom on which any journalistic endeavor rests.

These sentences ring with conviction. Yet it now appears that radio stations licensed by the government can function freely in the field of journalism if the stations are operated by publishers. In fact, say the leaders of the fourth estate, the only way the free press can be saved is to permit and encourage the publishers to go into the radio business. Their reasoning runs along these lines: the press is a free, unlicensed agency; the radio is licensed; joint ownership makes it possible to operate one as a check and balance to the other.

Back in 1933, when the publishers decreed that news broadcasts must not be sponsored by advertisers and established the Press-Radio Bureau to supply news to radio stations ("See your newspaper for further details"), they also posed as champions of freedom of the press. Permitting an advertiser direct control over the news was a direct affront to a free press, they said, and with this point of view there can be little disagreement. However, the rules and regulations formulated by the publishers, their worry over "spot-news" broadcasting, and the leeway permitted the radio commentators to color the news indicated an obvious attempt to control a competitor which was threatening not only the publishers' advertising income but their circulation as well. If the public could get the news on the radio, it would not buy a newspaper; therefore news broadcasting must be controlled.

The Press-Radio Bureau is still in existence and the few stations actually owned by the National Broadcasting Company and the Columbia Broadcasting System still adhere to the provisions of the contract signed with the publishers at the famous "Biltmore Conference" to broadcast no spot news except that supplied by the bureau. But the affiliated stations of the networks are not bound by the agreement, and the number of news broadcasts sponsored by brewers, silk-stocking manufacturers, gasoline refiners, and others has steadily increased. The bureau scheme is an admitted failure. Since 1935 the Associated Press, the United Press, Mr. Hearst's two newsgathering organizations, the International News Service and the Universal Service, have been selling their news to radio stations, which in turn sell the news programs to advertising sponsors. Last year it was estimated that the news agencies collected $3,000,000 from the radio industry, while from the sale of news programs the stations derived an income in excess of $15,000,000.

Some of the publishers are still bitter about the defection of the press associations, but the more practical and realistic among them realized several years ago that the only way to compete with radio was to go into the broadcasting business themselves. In December, 1933, when the Press-Radio Bureau was established, only 98 stations were owned by publishers; in February, 1937, they controlled 200 stations, and had filed with the Federal Communications Commission 103 applications for new stations and eight other applications for the transfer of stations to newspaper control. Information on ownership required by the commission does not extend to the ultimate control, and there is no way of learning how many of the other 685 stations in operation in February of this year were dominated or owned by newspapers. According to a conservative estimate, the publishers now own or control more than one-fourth of all radio stations. They intend to increase their holdings. At the 1937 convention of the A. N. P. A. there was a meeting of all publishers who owned stations, had applications pending, or intended to apply for permission to operate a station to discuss ways and means of spiking the enemies in Washington. It was decided that no open lobbying was to be carried on; but pressure was to be exerted in other ways.

The campaign is, of course, to be based on the free-press issue, and the publishers have discovered an effective ogre to parade before the public—namely, a bill introduced during the present session by Representative Emanuel Celler of New York, providing for a $750,000 appropriation for the establishment of a government-owned broadcasting station. Such a station, Mr. Harris warned his fellow members of the A. N. P. A., "will be capable of broadcasting a governmental news service not only to all foreign countries but also to all parts of our own country."

Irvin Stewart of the Federal Communications Commission took a different view in his dissenting opinion on the granting of a license to the El Paso Times. The application had been opposed by Station KTSM of El Paso, on the ground that "public convenience, interest, or necessity" would not be served, since the city could not support two stations, and that to license the newspaper station would force the independent one out of business. The threat to free speech and a free press of such unified control of the instruments which mold public opinion was clearly enunciated by Commissioner Stewart in one of the last opinions rendered before his resignation on June 30.

> Broadcasting has given the listener the means of checking on the newspaper. More important, it has given him a means to supplement the information he gets from the paper, to get matter denied him in the process of editorial selection or because of the limited resources of the publisher. . . . Obviously the newspaper and the broadcast station cannot be checked against each other when both are under the same control. To some this solicitude for channels of information independent of each other may seem a counsel of confusion; to me is a principal hope of democracy.

There are now 113 cities in which all local broadcast stations are under newspaper control. To what extent this number will be increased during the next year remains to be seen. The publishers pooh-pooh the argument that any danger exists in the unification of control of radio and the press, but one of the incidents reported in the American Civil Liberties Union study of radio censorship indicates the possibilities. In July, 1934, State Senator Paul Stewart (no relation to the commissioner) was campaigning for election to the Oklahoma Corporation Commission, and for one of his stump speeches he bought time from WKY, a station owned by a subsidiary of the Oklahoma Publishing Company. When the speech was submitted to the station censors, in accordance with the usual requirements, they discovered that one paragraph was devoted to a criticism of the corporation owning both the station and the local newspapers. Senator Stewart was asked to delete the paragraph. When he refused he was informed that he would not be permitted to broadcast, and his money was refunded.

The powerful publishing chains now have a firm foothold in the radio industry. Hearst Radio, Inc., holds ten stations in its own name: WINS, New York; WCAE, Pittsburgh; WBAL, Baltimore; WISN, Milwaukee; KYA, San Francisco; KEHE, Los Angeles; WACO, Waco; KOMA, Oklahoma City; KNOW, Austin, and KTSA, San Antonio. Another Texas station, KFJZ, was bought in June of this year by Mrs. Elliott Roosevelt, whose husband is vice-president of Hearst's radio company. Hearst is said to be playing the angel to other stations, including WSAY of Rochester and WMEX of Boston. Recently he has been angling for WGST of Atlanta, for which Sam Pickard former radio commissioner and executive of the Columbia Broadcasting System, now holds the license. It is Hearst's reported ambition to own a radio station in every city in which he publishes a newspaper. He is also widening his sphere of influence by the sale of Hearst news to radio stations. There were, in 1936, 185 stations broadcasting Hearst news.

Scripps-Howard has not fared so well with the commission. Shortly before the 1936 election, Scripps-Howard's broadcasting subsidiary, Continental Radio, Inc., filed two applications which were denied on the ground that the company's financial condition did not warrant the granting of the licenses. Continental was then operating two stations, WNOX of Knoxville and WCPO of Cincinnati. A few months after the denial of its applications, Scripps-Howard bought the Memphis Commercial Appeal, and with it acquired stations WMC and WNBR, two of the three biggest stations in Memphis. These purchases were approved by the commission. There has recently been a reorganization of Continental Radio Company. Its name was changed to Scripps-Howard Radio, Inc. Jack Howard was elected president and M. H. Aylesworth, formerly president of the National Broadcasting Company and before that managing director of the national Electric Light Association, became a member of the board of directors. In addition to the four stations for which it holds licenses Scripps-Howard is affiliated with at least one other, KOB, of Albuquerque, licensed to the business manager of Scripps's Rocky Mountain division.

The Gannett newspaper chain owns seven stations, six in New York and one in Connecticut, and had four applications for new stations filed with the commission; in Pennsylvania the Steinman brothers have four stations and two more in Delaware; the Capper publications have two stations, and the McClatchy interests five.

There is no indication that immediate legislative action will be taken to prevent the acquisition of radio by the publishers. The Wearin bill, introduced early in the present Congressional session, which would prohibit joint ownership of newspapers and radio stations, is still in committee, and the radio inquiry suggested by Senator Wallace White, Jr., coauthor of the Radio Act of 1927, will apparently not even be started. But the publishers' campaign is under way. Free speech is the theme.

Behind China's Conflict

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

AT eleven o'clock on the evening of July 7 Japanese troops conducting night maneuvers in the countryside southwest of Peiping suddenly became engaged in a sharp armed conflict with the Chinese soldiers who were intrusted with the defense of that area. The immediate cause of the clash is shrouded in mystery. The Japanese assert that their troops were engaged in regular maneuvers when they were attacked by a band of Chinese soldiers. As proof of the claim that they had no aggressive intention they have stated that each soldier had only one ball cartridge, the remainder being blanks. The Chinese, on the other hand, insist that the Japanese did the attacking, and point out that the battle started deep in Chinese territory.

If this sudden outbreak of hostilities had occurred any time between May, 1933—when the Japanese first marched to the gates of Peiping—and the beginning of the present year, it would have occasioned no surprise. But for the past six months the relations between China and Japan have been unusually placid. Following the defeat of the Japanese-supported Mongolian-Manchurian troops in Suiyuan last winter and the change in Nanking's policy after the kidnaping of Chiang Kai-shek, Japan appeared to have abandoned its territorial and political aims in favor of a more subtle program of economic penetration. On China's side, there seemed to be a let-down in anti-Japanese agitation, accompanied, paradoxically enough, by a stiffening of Chinese resistance to all threats of Japanese aggression.

But beneath this seemingly placid surface lay the fundamental instability created by Japan's five years of unceasing aggression. Japan had repeatedly failed in its efforts to create a five-province puppet state in North China similar to Manchoukuo. It had succeeded, however, in dividing this region into three zones which it dominated in varying degrees. Jehol and parts of Chahar are controlled directly by the Japanese administration of Manchoukuo. The so-called "demilitarized zone," with its capital at Tungchow, twelve miles east of Peiping, is almost as directly under Japanese domination, though nominally ruled by Yin Ju-keng, a renegade Chinese who has openly embraced Japanese "culture." The remainder of Hopei, the province in which Peiping and Tientsin are located, together with parts of Chahar, is controlled by the Hopei-Chahar Political Council, headed by General Sung Cheh-yuan. Although this council is composed in large part of old-line Chinese officials who are favorable to Japan, it has never formally severed its connections with Nanking. Some of the leaders of the council, including Sung Cheh-yuan himself, are at heart anti-Japanese but were too good politicians to oppose Japan as long as its power was predominant. The upsurge of Chinese nationalism in recent months has been reflected in a reassertion of Nanking's influence on the council. A Japanese protest against this development was filed, significantly enough, just a day or two before the outbreak of hostilities.

Equally disquieting to the Japanese has been the prospect of an alliance between Nanking and the Chinese Communists. Recent reports from China indicate that such an alliance would have been concluded by the end of this month. The Communists have called off their war against the Kuomintang; the soviet system is being abandoned in favor of a democratic system; and the Red Army has nominally recognized the authority of Nanking. The central government, in return, has apparently pledged itself to uncompromising resistance to Japanese aggression. Opposition to communism has long been the cardinal principle of Japanese policy. It served a multitude of purposes. It has been used as a smoke screen to conceal aggression; it has also been valuable tactically as a means of creating a breach within China and of forestalling an alliance between China and the Soviet Union. The possibility that the events of July 7 may have been deliberately planned to prevent the Kuomintang-Communist alliance from being consummated is supported by the fact that Japan has included the suppression of communism in its four demands for a settlement of the immediate controversy.

There still remains the question why Japanese troops were maneuvering late at night in Chinese territory. Technically, the Boxer Protocol gives Japan a right to station troops in Peiping. Most of the leading powers, including the United States, maintain small detachments in the former legation quarter. But in addition to its troops in Peiping, the Japanese have maintained a detachment at Fengtai, a strategic railway junction southeast of the city. In an attempt to justify this obvious infringement of Chinese sovereignty, the Japanese have cited the provision in the Boxer Protocol giving the powers the right to keep the railway open between Peiping and the sea. But this still does not explain the presence of the Japanese troops at Lukouchiao, which is some distance from the Peiping-Tientsin railway.

It is difficult to believe that the Japanese actually wanted a war when they planned these night maneuvers. All that was probably intended was an impressive demonstration of military prowess such as has been successful in the past. Japan has little to gain and much to lose by a war with China. It already has as large a colonial empire as it can handle in Korea, Manchuria, and North China. Without railroads and highways, it would be impossible to overrun the whole or even the larger part of Chinese territory. Moreover, the Chinese army must not be discounted. Numerically it is much larger than any the Japanese could possibly put in the field. While the greater part of it is wholly unfit for modern warfare, there are units, comprising several hundred thousand soldiers, which in equipment, training, and morale are at least the equals of the Japanese. If Japan were motivated solely by self-interest it would avoid war regardless of the loss of "face" that might be involved in backing down at this late date. But it is the law of aggression that there can be no turning back.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Reelect La Guardia

"THERE is no Ersatz for justice," said Fiorello La Guardia, Mayor of New York, recently, in one of those flashes of wit and wisdom which he often shows. It was a body blow to Hitler and all the dictators, for to that sentiment there is no answer possible. It was even more effective than his remark that Hitler ought to be in a chamber of horrors—a statement that I applauded; a statement that got so completely under the skin of the Führer that his errand-boy, the Ambassador in Washington, had to run to Secretary Hull. It is this frank speaking which makes the Mayor so likable and helps to make me eager for his renomination and reelection. I want an official in the City Hall who is not afraid to say what he thinks; who is not considering every minute what he ought to say lest he make some slip or offend somebody. Let us thank heaven Fiorello has so much of the Italian in him—if that is what causes him to say things to make dictators wince and set ambassadors running.

As the years go by the little Mayor seems to shrink in height and get rounder and rounder. On the back seat of his limousine he almost sinks out of sight, especially if he swings from the right-hand door the writing table ingeniously attached to it and goes to work on a pile of official documents in order to save time. The supersensitive are sometimes shocked when the Mayor appears. They say he lacks the impressiveness, the dignity, the fine appearance one might expect in the head of the greatest American city. But no one can listen to La Guardia very long without being impressed and forgetting his physical attributes. He was not too small to be one of the few Congressmen to do what all should have done who voted for the war—go abroad, learn to fight, and go to the front. Here is a genuine personality, hot-headed, perhaps inconsiderate, certainly no dandy, and quite the politician, yet an honest, fearless man withal, lovable in spite of his mistakes, for his humor, his courage, his refusal to respect human monstrosities because they happen to be in seats of power.

Errors? Quite enough. I, for one, have a genuine grudge against him. He asked some of us to serve on a committee to report on the evil conditions which led to the Harlem riots of 1935. We worked hard and conscientiously, only to have our work go largely for nothing because the Mayor received our reports and then delayed their publication for months until their timeliness and much of their effectiveness were gone. He insisted that before publication he must submit each report to heads of his departments criticized, and these gentlemen, perhaps understanding the game, jolly well took their time about replying. So Harlem thinks the Mayor's commission was a dud, and I can't quarrel with its thinking so. Had I been chairman, I should have released each report to the press the day after it was laid on the Mayor's desk, and to the devil with his consideration for his departmental heads. Most of them are not personally responsible for the errors and sins charged to their departments, for the city's abominable neglect of its colored people goes back at least to slavery days. But whether these officials are innocent or guilty of neglect, we were appointed not to regard their feelings and waste our time, but to tell the truth as we saw it.

There are plenty besides myself who have their sore spots. Some deservedly so. I have no sympathy with the complaint of the machine Republicans. Their grievance is at bottom that Fiorello has honored himself by not giving them more jobs and perquisites. Others have genuine cause for complaint because of this omission or that commission. Those of us who have for years fought the third-degree wickedness of the police grieve deeply that the Mayor killed the bill at Albany to end the disgraceful torturing that goes on in our prisons and police stations. The city has a right to growl some because Fiorello is one of those executives who seek to do everything themselves and are constantly behindhand or behind time—he sometimes fairly disappears behind the papers piled up on his desk. Work? Yes, he works all the time. Never in my lifetime has there been a Mayor who worked as hard or conscientiously and took so little time off for himself. Politics in his office? Yes, quite a little, for after all he is a politician, but I have not been able to say of a single act that he took the stand he did to advance his political fortunes. If he were thinking of himself and his future many of those fine "wisecracks" would die upon his lips. And as for honesty! Never have we had in the City Hall anyone more certainly or completely honest, more rigidly set against all graft, all favoritism.

So there he sits, and there he should be kept, this apparently cherubic Mayor. But cherubic he is not. He gets righteously and gloriously mad too often, mad against injustice, against any pretended Ersatz for justice, against those who bear down on the poor and struggling. He is for the underdog; he is for the disadvantaged; he is for labor; he is against special privilege, and he has proved it over and over again. Less important but true is it that as a whole his administration of New York stands unsurpassed for its great record of achievement in almost every line in the face of terrific social and financial odds, unequaled in its freedom from scandal. Under no mayor that I can recall has the city gone forward so steadily, so sanely, so economically, in short, just as the American metropolis ought to serve its people and ought to rise higher and higher in the scale of decency and humane trusteeship for all within its boundaries. I am for La Guardia's renomination and reelection, first and last and all the time.

Moonlight Sail

ON THE HUDSON

★ STARRING ★

SALOTTI—GUITARIST

REX INGRAM'S QUARTET

TALKING PICTURES REFRESHMENTS

3,000 SQUARE FEET OF DANCE FLOOR

Popular Swing Orchestra

Proceeds to

AID CHILDREN OF SPAIN

New York's Popular Excursion Steamer, Wilson Line

★ S. S. "State of Delaware"—Capacity 3,500 ★

TUESDAY EVENING — AUGUST 3RD

Boat Leaves from Pier 1 North River (Foot of Battery Place)

Auspices

United Youth Committee to Aid
Spanish Democracy
381 Fourth Ave.
Tel. MU 4-5301

Young Peoples Organization of
N. Y. Society for Ethical Culture, 2 West 64th St.
Tel. SUsquehanna 7-5200

TICKETS OBTAINABLE AT ABOVE PLACES, OR

UNIVERSITY BOOKSHOP
105 University Place

WORKERS BOOKSHOP
50 East 13th Street

LEBLANG-GRAY'S
1482 Broadway

TYSONS AGENCY
1531 Broadway

Subscription: $1.00 (per person)

MAKE YOUR RESERVATIONS NOW!

27% off

As a reader of The Nation you know you would not suffer the inconvenience of being without it. The Nation discloses the facts behind the news and interprets them authoritatively from the progressive point of view. It scrutinizes every public development to show you why it is a stride forward or a step backward. It helps you understand thoroughly the headlines of today and prepares you for those of tomorrow.

Harpers Magazine, the perfect monthly complement to The Nation, not only offers its readers factual information and critical interpretation of our headlong times but it frequently predicts events before they happen. Nine times, in as many recent months, Harpers actually predicted important events which later became front page news.

Now you may have The Nation and Harpers Magazine for only $6.50—27% below the regular publisher's price! Subscriptions to this popular combination may be new or renewal and may be mailed to different addresses. Moreover, payment may be postponed thirty days.

Order at once on this convenient coupon

THE NATION,
[illegible] Vesey Street,
New York City.

Enter my subscription for one year of Harpers Magazine and The Nation for $6.50 ☐ I enclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name ____________________

Address ____________________

____

7-24-37

TWO BASIC BOOKS ON ECONOMICS

By HARRY ELMER BARNES

An Economic History of the Western World

Tracing the development of economic life from the fist-hachet to automatic machinery and synthetic foods, from tribal barter to international exchange. Price, $5.50

●

By HENRI PIRENNE

Economic and Social History of Medieval Europe

In the belief that this book provides the best survey of the economic and social development of Europe in the Middle Ages, which has hitherto appeared in any language, this translation from the French was undertaken. Henri Pirenne, Professor Emeritus of the University of Ghent, is generally recognized as one of the most eminent economic historians. Price, $2.00

●

REMINDER: AMONG THE MEMORABLE BOOKS OF 1937 ARE:

Virginia Woolf's THE YEARS

The best-selling novel in the United States, and an outstanding example of this distinguished writer's art. $2.50

●

Robert S. and Helen M. Lynd's MIDDLETOWN IN TRANSITION

"They have sunk a shaft clear through to the raw substance of American life and culture. And in making a laboratory of a community, they have also made a laboratory of a country. For it is America that is here revealed."—Current History. $5.00

●

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY,
383 Madison Avenue • New York

BOOKS and the ARTS

HOW GERMANY PERSECUTES WRITERS

BY LION FEUCHTWANGER

THE resolution which the German group has submitted to the congress* is in no wise prompted by political considerations, but emerges from a sincere and profound anxiety for German literature, which we consider a notable part of world literature. As you are aware, this protest is directed against the German government's interference with the activities of a large number of German authors who stand opposed to the regime, and against its attempts to defame them in the eyes of the public at large.

Book catalogues before Hitler's advent had listed about 10,000 German authors. It is not easy to discover objectively which of these writers enjoyed eminence and reputation within Germany. If one applies as a yardstick the size of the editions and the number and fervor of the reviews—at best, a rough measuring device, although there is scarcely a better one—it appears that out of these 10,000 authors roughly 100 may have been of importance within the boundaries of Germany. It is somewhat easier to ascertain which of these authors were renowned outside Germany—i.e., were of world importance. American scholars have been at pains to answer this question.

As a basis for their calculation they took into account the number of translations, the size of editions of such translated works, and the number of reviews exceeding fifty lines in length. In this manner they reached the conclusion that eleven authors writing in the German language enjoy world reputations.

The figures which I now have the honor to place before you are based on booksellers' statistics which endeavor to be as objective as possible. From these statistics it appears that of the one hundred authors who were highly regarded within Germany twelve are still living within its boundaries. Even if one adds to them, to maintain complete objectivity, the authors Hitler, Goebbels, and Rosenberg, they number only fifteen. Of the authors who, according to these methods of calculation, are of international importance, just two are living within the German frontiers—if one includes Hitler the author, there are three.

I beg of you to consider these figures; they are worth thinking about. We believe that the literature of a country cannot flourish when its most important representatives are forced to live outside the country in which their language is spoken. We believe that such a condition is harmful not only to the individuals concerned but also to the country itself—indeed, to the world. It must also follow that the German language, both spoken and written, must lose in vigor and purity from month to month, and that, in consequence, all intellectual life must suffer.

Permit me now to tell you something of the petty warfare carried on by the German government against German authors who, like ourselves, are living in exile. You can scarcely imagine, dear colleagues, the meanness and spitefulness of this struggle.

The German authorities were not content to prohibit and to burn the books of these authors. The property of many of them has been confiscated, the homes and libraries of some have been pillaged and destroyed, and the most prominent of these writers have been deprived of their citizenship, so that, without papers of identification, they are robbed of their liberty and freedom. Furthermore, the official German publishers and booksellers threaten with every form of reprisal foreign publishers and booksellers who print or sell works of these exiled German men of letters. Moreover, the authorities drove a good bargain by exiling those writers who do not support the Nazi cause. For example, they did not destroy all the copies of the books which were so spectacularly consigned to the flames. A great number of them were saved, and these copies, with the approval of the authorities, were shipped abroad and sold. The German government therefore has permitted books which were suppressed within Germany as poisonous and destructive to be offered and sold to Germans abroad. The authors, however, were not credited with the royalties from the sale of these books; the profits thus made were returned as foreign exchange into the coffers of the Reich government. It thus became impossible for an author to have his works reprinted abroad, because the market was glutted with these cut-price books, which the German government had ordered sold without paying the writer the profit to which he was entitled.

The German government has used its entire state machinery to prosecute this campaign against the free German authors. The government-controlled newspapers and the government-controlled radio proclaim that these authors are guilty of high treason; they even attribute to their literary activity the vilest of motives. One and all, we are corrupt and bribed. The official organs of the German government publish the exact figures. I, for instance, am supposed to have received 450,000 francs. If one believes the German government, those whom the world in general considers representative of German literature are scoundrels and fools—with the exception of the two who remain in Germany.

---

* Lion Feuchtwanger, noted German author, now in exile, headed a delegation of his countrymen to the Fifteenth International Congress of the Pen Club in Paris last month, on which occasion he delivered the above address.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Ca.

In its classical period, German literature gave currency to the idea of a universal literature and a commonwealth of learning. Its representatives, in the finest sense of the word, were cosmopolitans. They would have turned away in disgust from the program of self-sufficiency which now trammels all intellectual life in the Reich, and many of their works read as if they were protests against what is going on in Germany today.

I think, dear colleagues, we all have good reason to protest vigorously against the methods with which the German government persecutes the free German author. It seems to me that this is a fight which concerns not only the writers of Germany but all who are interested in literature.

Therefore the German group asks the Fifteenth International Congress of the Pen Club to resolve:

"The fight which the German government is waging against the German author Karl von Ossietzky, winner of the Nobel Prize, is unworthy of a cultured state. Unworthy of a cultured state are, furthermore, the methods by which this same government tries to prevent a great number of noted German authors who remain steadfast to their convictions from the pursuit of their craft. The congress disapproves of these methods and protests against them."

BOOKS

Pitimini's Advocate

SPAIN: A TRAGIC JOURNEY. By F. Theo Rogers. The Macauley Company. $2.50.

THIS book is dedicated to the proposition that General Franco (known in Spain as Pitimini, on account of his treble voice and hysterical nature) is the savior of the Spanish people. The reader is informed in an introduction, on the dust-cover, and in all the ads that Mr. Rogers is a liberal newspaperman who was a sympathizer with the republic when he went to Spain but later turned to Franco as the only hope because of what he saw. We are assured of this by the Reverend Francis Talbot, S.J., and by Mr. Rogers himself.

No one, says Mr. Rogers, could have been better equipped than he to judge between the two sides without partiality. If his opinions diverge sharply from the findings of the great majority of foreign newspapermen who have been reporting the war, it is because they were not as well equipped as he to ascertain the true facts. The best people, he says, can be fooled: witness a British Catholic M.P. named McGovern who went to look on his own and came out sympathetic to Madrid. Mr. Rogers speaks Spanish, has lived for many years in the Philippines, and went on vacation trips to Spain, where all the nicest people called him Theo. Mahatma Gandhi calls him Theo too. When he got to Barcelona in July, certain wealthy friends told him the army was going to take over the government in order to save Spain. It was to be a "democratic uprising," backed by "everybody" in Spain—everybody, that is to say, except the populace, which, as Mr. Rogers is sure, is made up of Anarchists and thugs. True, the republican government was a legally elected government, but it wasn't democratic and it wasn't a government, because there was so much unrest and so many strikes. Only one man, Gil Robles, could have saved the country. But the president wouldn't hand the government over, so what could the army and the best people do?

Mr. Rogers was in Barcelona on July 19. If one pauses to consider the thesis of his book, the two pages in which he describes the fighting make odd reading. He classifies the contenders as "the military" and the "Popular Army" consisting of "civil guards, national guards, and the mob." What Theo Rogers saw from his balcony is worth quoting:

> Slowly the military seemed to be gaining the upper hand. Suddenly there was a lull. Some one from the Barcelona mob shouted in stentorian tones, "Soldiers, brothers, why are you fighting us?" And the reply came from a deep-throated infantryman, "We don't know." Then a flag of truce was displayed and there came calls for a conference. . . . The officers could do nothing to prevent fraternizing. All the soldiers knew was that they had been ordered out with war equipment, told that the watchword was "Viva España." . . . It did not take long for the orators of the mob to convince the soldiers that theirs was the side of oppression. . . . Before this spectator could realize it, the soldiers, almost in a body, had changed sides.

Yet Mr. Rogers maintains that "the military" represents the true Spain and that even in Catalonia 90 per cent of the people favor them. The reason for that, he says, is to be found in the atrocities committed by the Popular Army. In Barcelona Mr. Rogers himself did not see any. He was in a house that was fired on and searched, and in that case the Popular militia not only hurt no one but actually left a guard to watch over the family of the big tobacco industrialist Theo was staying with. Theo walked around until late that night with a little white dog at his heels and nobody bothered him, but he attributes that to the probable intervention of his mother in heaven. The rest he knows only from hearsay, but he assures you that it's reliable hearsay. You can take his word for the atrocities.

Mr. Rogers's vacation was spoiled, and you would think he would have gone home after the war broke out, yet he stayed six months longer. He tells in detail how he got wealthy friends out of Spain by using his American passport and threats of American destroyers (many of these friends are now working elsewhere for Franco). Mr. Rogers also relates how helpful the American consul Lynn Franklin was. The Ambassador evidently wouldn't cooperate, thereby earning the contempt of Mr. Rogers. Theo then went to Biarritz, where there was "a gay cosmopolitan circle," practically all of them dukes and counts and all of them very helpful to Franco. Rogers went into Pitimini's Spain, where he held conferences, he says, with the chiefs. He also saw a good deal of Franco's head press-agent, Major Bollins. From end to end of Franco's territory, he says, he saw not a single Italian. He did see Moors, but his Moors are Spaniards. On the other hand he knows from absolutely reliable hearsay that there are whole regiments of Russians on the Madrid front. Needless to say, the conferences with Pitimini and his friends convinced Theo that their cause was a sacred one.

Next Mr. Rogers, still on vacation it would seem, went to London and through the influence of Marcus Samuel addressed the Commons on behalf of Franco. After that he came to this country, where he saw President Roosevelt and a number of other people in the same cause. No doubt he urged recognition of Franco and the granting of belligerent rights. Mr. Rogers finds it lamentable that in America Franco is regarded as a fascist. To be sure, the general admires

Which Brands Are Best Buys?

Consumers Union Reports for July give you unbiased judgments of experts on the products below—in most cases with ratings, based on laboratory and use tests, as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable"

Miniature Cameras

WHICH IS BETTER—LEICA OR CONTAX?

Camera experts report on the comparative quality of over 40 leading makes of American and foreign made miniature cameras—including Leica, Contax, Rolleiflex. Eastman Bantam Special, Korelle, National Graflex, Argus, and Retina.

Electric Fans

Tests of 22 models show marked differences in efficiency between apparently similar fans. Only one is rated a "Best Buy."

Golf Balls

THERE'S A 30-YARD DIFFERENCE between the yardage you can get from one of the good balls in this test and one of the poor ones. Sixteen brands are rated.

Summer Gasolines

SAVING 1 TO 4c ON EACH GAL.

Sixty-seven samples from the East, South, Mid-West, and West, including Esso, Sinclair Tydol, Co-op, and Shell, were tested this year. Savings of from one to four cents a gallon can be made on some of the "Best Buys"

Sunburn Preventives

SOME WORK—SOME DON'T

CU's tests of sun oils, lotions, and creams disclosed only one that gave complete protection, three that gave reliable partial protection, five that were fair, and fourteen that were "Not Acceptable."

Bathing Suits

Seven women's and seven men's models were tested. The most expensive suit tested had very poor colorfastness to sunlight. The cheapest suit tested had the best colorfastness to sunlight.

Tennis Balls

AND RACKETS

One of the most popular balls was the poorest

Leading brands of balls, rackets and strings are rated as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable" and "Not Acceptable." American-made balls compare very poorly with the best English products.

Coming in the August Issue

REPORTS ON

Refrigerators
Inner Tubes
Photographic Films, Exposure Meters, etc.
Raincoats

Start WITH ANY OF THESE ISSUES:

☐ Sept.—Shoes. Tires, Whiskies;
☐ Oct.—Gins, Electric Razors, Dentifrices;
☐ Nov.—Radios, Wines, Children's Shoes;
☐ Dec.—Fountain Pens, Vacuum Cleaners, Blankets;
☐ Jan.-Feb.—Men's Suits, Cold Remedies, Shaving Creams;
☐ March—Autos, Flour, Face Powders;
☐ April—Shirts, Cold Creams, Gardening;
☐ May—Trailers, Washing Machines, and the first of a series of articles on the causes and treatment of constipation;
☐ June—Large Cameras. House Dresses, Radio Tubes, Sanitary Napkins.

START NOW TO SAVE MONEY!

Join Consumers Union today! Membership costs but $3 a year. It brings you twelve issues of Consumers Union Reports plus the 240-page yearly Buying Guide. You can start with the current issue or any of the previous ones listed above. Mail the Coupon now!

MECHANICAL Refrigerators

Ratings of 1937 Models

Westinghouse, Coldspot, Ward's, Leonard, and Crosley models are rated in this issue on the basis of performance tests. The August issue of the Reports will carry information, including ratings, on a number of other makes.

Motor Oils

CHEAP OILS ARE "BEST BUYS"

Summer oils from 13 to 20 cents a quart are rated as "Best Buys." Several 25 and 35 cent oils are rated "Not Acceptable." Penn-Rad, New Texaco, Atlantic, Mobiloil, and Essolube included in tests.

Ice Boxes

Fifteen models rated. Recent models show great improvement over ice boxes of past years.

Constipation

The third of a series of articles. This one deals with "auto-intoxication" and the symptoms associated with constipation.

WITHOUT EXTRA CHARGE—THIS 240-PAGE BUYING GUIDE

listing over a 1000 tested and rated products goes with your membership in Consumers Union. Get this Guide by mailing coupon NOW!

To: CONSUMERS UNION of U. S., Inc.
55 Vandam Street, New York, N. Y.

I hereby apply for membership in Consumers Union. I enclose:

☐ $3 for one year's membership, $2.50 of which is for a year's subscription to the complete edition of Consumers Union Reports.

☐ $1 for one year's membership, 50c of which is for a year's subscription to the limited edition of Consumers Union Reports. (Note: Reports on higher-priced products are not in this edition.) I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is so designated.

Signature..................................

Address..................................

City & State..............Occupation..........

N-7

PUBLIC LIBRARY

the totalitarian system, and it is true he is a dictator and has declared that the corporative state would be a good idea for Spain. Yet, like Theo himself, Pitimini is not only a staunch liberal but God's gift to suffering Spain. Rogers really uses language like that.

The Reverend Francis Talbot, S.J., and Sir Willmott Lewis vouch for the integrity of Mr. Rogers. If he tells stories he can't prove and if he twists facts to fit these stories and if he sees Spain from the same angle as Juan March and Hitler, that's just his liberal, impartial, and objective outlook. Another introduction—the book is full of testimonials—says that Theo is a fine fellow, and honest, too. Colonel Theodore Roosevelt wrote that one for him.

ANITA BRENNER

History and Case History

NORTHWEST PASSAGE. By Kenneth Roberts. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.75.

THE WHEEL TURNS. By Gian Dàuli. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

THE historical novel offers the reader an escape from contemporary realities, just as it offers the author an escape from any significant literary problems and judgments. Its concern is with the arrangement rather than with the interpretation of fact, and the author's task is one of carpentry and reconstruction rather than of creation. Its value, consequently, depends more upon the reader's mood than any literary qualities inherent in the work, while the author's talent is almost determined by his ability to render facts unconvincing and to surround recorded events with the atmosphere of fictitiousness and unreality. Kenneth Roberts's talent is of just this kind. His pre-Revolutionary yarn reads like a schoolboy's dream of the Wild West. Its action seems hallucinated, its characters somnambulistic. History itself seems reduced to melodramatic implausibility. What saves the book from the furnace and provides its substance and coherence quite beyond Mr. Roberts's ingenuity is fact. Fact comes to the rescue of inferior writing, just as the writing itself often enlivens the fact. Blustering heroism and blood-and-thunder claptrap, when based on real events, cannot avoid the ring of authenticity—even if the authenticity is not the author's own. Accuracy of detail and conscientious research are Mr. Roberts's saving grace. His work is otherwise undistinguishable from the blood-curdling paper-backed G. A. Henty of another generation. Briefly, "Northwest Passage" is an account of Colonel Rogers and the Rogers Rangers, of their adventures during the French and Indian wars, of the taking of the Indian stronghold of St. Francis, of hunger and death and heroism, of Rogers in London, of his attempt to discover the Northwest Passage, of his humiliation and disgrace in debtors' jail, and finally of his exploits against the Colonials during the American Revolution. Rogers is variously represented as childishly naive, poetically brave, superbly heroic, incorrigibly human, as versatile as Da Vinci, as much of a "card" as Davy Crockett. Those are, unfortunately, literary rather than statistical dimensions, and Mr. Roberts's hero does not carry them with convincing aplomb. The lesser characterizations, on the other hand, are automatized, facilitate the movement of the narrative, and do general justice to Mr. Roberts's research.

In contrast to Kenneth Roberts's novelized history, we have Gian Dàuli's novelized case history. Where one author concerns himself with the fact, the other is preoccupied with the "act" and its relationship to the individual in terms of his past, his immediate environment, and his early habits. If Mr. Dàuli had, in turn, related the individual to society, generalized the "act" (which in this case happens to be prompted by sexual unbalance) into causes external to the individual himself, "The Wheel Turns" would be a significant portrait of the decay of the bourgeoisie.

But Mr. Dàuli's method, like the psychiatrist's, is particularized; the individual is interpreted as an isolated "consciousness" whose subjective realities have merely an accidental reference to the greater realities of the world outside. Giovannino is neurotic because his mother and father were neurotic. The cause of their neuroticism, however, is never analyzed or explained. The gradual dissolution of the entire Penta family, their fall from middle-class respectability to beggary and insanity, though brilliant in its recital, is no more general in its implications than the predicament of a household suffering from a special disease. The tragedy of Giovannino himself—his fixation on the victim of a boyhood seduction, his final degradation and death—is, one feels, the result of Giovannino's own weakness in his conflict with himself. Mr. Dàuli's treatment is clinical in its fatalism. The enemy of the Pentas is too invisible, too internal; their struggle becomes mystic and futile, just as their defeat, unrelated as it is to an objective force, loses meaning and dramatic inevitability.

CHRISTOPHER LAZARE

Everlasting Yea and Everlasting No

THE POWER TO GOVERN: THE CONSTITUTION—THEN AND NOW. By Walton H. Hamilton and Douglass Adair. W. W. Norton. $2.50.

"THE Power to Govern" is not just another bolt in the current "storm over the Constitution." Like so many others of late, the authors have drawn heavily upon the words of the men who wrote our constitutional scripture; but they have done more than pile up ipse-dixits in support of the New Deal proposition that "the power is there." They have succeeded in recreating the economic climate of opinion in which the founding fathers were nurtured.

Their starting point is the majority opinion in the Guffey Coal case, in which Justice Sutherland liquidated the power to govern on the grounds of an alleged constitutional distinction between commerce and manufacture. The authors deny such a distinction, and proceed to give "the learned Justice" an elementary lesson in the rudiments of American constitutional text. Their immediate purpose is to point out that by "commerce" the Constitution meant something entirely different from what latter-day judicial glossators have made it mean. But in doing this they are led to reconstruct the general economic backdrop against which the framers at Philadelphia played their parts. Their most creative research has been devoted to laying bare the underlying drives of eighteenth-century historical development in the mother country and the colonies. Their appeal from the Supreme Court has been not so much to Philadelphia scripture as to that final arbiter which Hegel called "the world court" of history.

The verdict is unanimous, and Justice Sutherland's definition is read out of court. To an enlightened eighteenth-century statesman, whether in Paris or London or at the Philadelphia convention, the word "commerce" denoted the organic sum total of economic activities which distinguished the mercantilistic type of economy from more primitive types. There was no basis, in eighteenth-century usage, for setting off "manufacture" from "commerce." "Commerce" was the seamless web that a market economy spins for itself; a web which by the eighteenth century had become the mantle of national prestige and imperial unity.

The story is told of Flaubert, that when he asked Gautier the secret of becoming a good writer, he was advised to spend most of his time studying the dictionary. It remained for the authors of this book to reveal so delightfully that the same holds true for the good historian of ideas. Until we have had the patience to do for words like "liberalism," "constitution," "constituent power," "democracy," what Professor Hamilton and Mr. Adair have done for the word "commerce," we shall not know where we stand in our fight for the power to govern.

But the authors have not set "the new constitution" of 1787 in quite as historically accurate perspective as they have intended. The high lights of "the constitution then" they have painted in with telling effect; but they have not dealt nearly so effectively with the shadows. The work of the men at Philadelphia was flooded with the light of eighteenth-century mercantilism; but it was also suffused in the long shadow cast by the Middle Ages. Legislators like Hamilton and Madison officiated at a strange marriage between mercantilism and medievalism. And whereas mercantilism was synonymous with power to govern, medievalism was synonymous with non-power to govern. The American Revolution was more than a struggle between two rival camps of mercantilists; it was a struggle between the advocates of the modern doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty and the advocates of the medieval doctrine of a limited constitution.

Because the founding fathers understood and feared the full implications of the power of the democratic majority to govern, they made provision in their document for the anti-governmental tradition which the American colonists had transplanted from Stuart England. Because of their fears that the democratic majority might turn out to be proletarian in its instincts, the framers of the "limited constitution" of 1787 sought to restrain that majority by reinvoking the nebulous law of the Middle Ages—that "brooding omnipresence in the skies" about which the skeptical Justice Holmes liked to twit his fundamentalist brethren. Because they could never be too sure that their quasi-aristocratic senate and their quasi-monarchic executive could really hold out against concerted democratic pressure, they hit upon the formula of an irresponsible Supreme Court which might serve as the carrier of the older medieval concepts of judge-declared law and non-power government.

It is worth remembering that in its recent rebuttal to the New Deal proposition that "the power is there," the Senate Judiciary Committee directed one of its most telling appeals to the "arch-mercantilist" Alexander Hamilton. For it was the author of the 78th and 81st Federalist Papers who by verbal contortions and subtle misreadings of authorities explained away an irresponsible judiciary on the ground that there must be someone in the government with sufficient "fortitude," as he expressed it, to utter a final, unappealable "no" to the duly declared wishes of the majority of voters. It is this "everlasting no" of the Middle Ages which the authors of "The Power to Govern" have tended to drown out with their "everlasting yea" of mercantilism.

From the democratic point of view, the authors have done yeoman service in disproving the notion that the founding fathers believed in laissez faire. But the power of the people

White Heat Means a Cooler Kitchen

WORKING with searing heat at 5400 degrees Fahrenheit, G-E scientists have evolved more durable, more efficient heating units. These CALROD units, used in General Electric and in Hotpoint electric ranges, provide quick, clean, even heat—localized just where it is needed. This means a cooler kitchen. In thousands of plants, CALROD units are being used for industrial heating because they provide heat at a remarkable saving in cost.

But the CALROD unit is only one achievement of the ceramics experts in the G-E Research Laboratory. New and unusual kinds of glass serve as vital parts in sodium lamps that light miles of American highways—light them for greater safety for drivers and pedestrians. Large insulators support the wires that bring electric power from the generators to your home; tiny insulating blocks help to maintain the high quality of reception in your radio tubes. To these, too, General Electric scientists, in Schenectady, have brought important improvements.

These examples are but a few of the contributions of research which has stimulated industry, increased employment, made available more things for more people at less cost.

G-E research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric to govern is beset by an even more redoubtable adversary than the myth of laissez faire. The "brooding omnipresence" of the Middle Ages, as reembodied in American constitutional logic, is a far more difficult ghost to lay. In coming to grips with the second adversary we cannot turn to our Philadelphia ancestors with any real confidence. There is plenty of 1787 scripture substantiating the right of an irresponsible judiciary to say "no." So it would pay us to dispense with the notion of a race of giants before the flood, on whose broad shoulders we can proceed to doze. The founding fathers were living in as profoundly transitional an era as we are. Their thinking encountered as many dilemmas as our own. The incipient democratic movement of 1937 will not get very far toward the realization of its own objectives by resting on the authority of the distinguished anti-democrats who said so-and-so about so-and-so one hundred and fifty years ago.

GENERAL ELECTRIC

PUBLIC LI

EDWIN MIMS, JR.

In Bothwell's Defense

LORD BOTHWELL AND MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS. By Robert Gore-Browne. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $4.

BOTH the defamers and the glorifiers of Mary Stuart found it convenient to blacken the memory of Bothwell, says his biographer. He has been portrayed as a vicious and sinister figure, murderer, and seducer; at best a great lover and fighter; criminal, but with vices which were the tribute forced from his strength by his passions and the barbarous and confused duplicities which surrounded him. Mr. Gore-Browne takes a different view. He has spent seven years of research to build up a picture of a statesman and patriot, loyal to his country and to his queen both before and after she became his wife; no angel, but superior to his enemies in religious tolerance, generosity, and honesty. Such a radical reconstruction necessarily affects every big scene in the tragedy of Mary Stuart, and where light is thrown on the dark figure of Bothwell it illumines also that of Mary.

In the welter of politico-religious and dynastic strife, involving nations, groups, and individuals in complex and unstable relationships, a network of double-dealing and crime, it is difficult to follow the shuttle of demonstration with clear perception and judgment. There are eighty-four chief figures in the drama as here presented, and the treatment is often, and especially in the most crucial matter of all—the murder of Darnley—confused and inconclusive. But certain important points are made, it seems to me, convincingly. The long casket letter and the sonnets, the author holds, were not written by Mary but by Anna Throndsen, Bothwell's Danish sweetheart, whom he deserted and who reappears in the last act by a trivial coincidence, unwittingly to seal his fate in a Danish dungeon.

The analysis of the letters, of the interpolations and forgeries held to have been combined with the words of Anna and possibly of Bothwell's wife, is consistent with the author's view of the relations of Bothwell and Mary. Their marriage was not one of passion but of reason on his side, of resignation on hers. Bothwell saw the snares closing in on him and thought that only as her husband and as king could he be safe, and only under his guidance could she be so. Yet on Mary's part one is permitted to surmise a growing affection after the fact and, in both, a sustained and necessary loyalty to each other. Bothwell is acquitted of the actual murder of Darnley, who, forewarned in some way, is seen rushing

SPAIN WHAT DOES IT MEAN TO YOU — AND TO HISTORY?

* Spain in flames, sending sparks flying to every corner of the earth—affecting your life, and altering the course of history! How? Where? When? Why?

THE ANSWER . . .

The August issue of THE FIGHT gives you a complete coverage of the first year of the Spanish war. Read about: American and British Policies Toward Spain (Mauritz A. Hallgren, Harold Laski), Culture of Spain, Spanish Labor Movement, A Week-by-Week Account of the War, American Aid to Spain, In a Spanish Hospital, and much other material.

THE PICTURE . . .

What does Spain look like? THE FIGHT gives an extra 16-page section with paintings and drawings by George Biddle, Wanda Gág, Paul Cadmus, and many others, plus many photographs!

THE FIGHT America's anti-war, anti-Fascist magazine that prints all the facts

■ A five-color magazine that brings you the best writers and illustrators of today. No enlightened American should be without it. Start your subscription with the August issue!

Not $5, Not $3, But $1

THE FIGHT, 268 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

I enclose $1 for a year's subscription to THE FIGHT, beginning with the special August issue.

Name ....

Address ....

City and State .... (N8)

out of the house to be killed by his enemies outside, but the suggestion that Bothwell touched off the explosion and the explanation of his doing so leave both the quantity and the quality of his guilt and the act itself in doubt.

Certain aspects of this devoted and searching study impress one, particularly its air of realism and reasonableness. In spite of gaps and discrepancies, Mary and Bothwell seem more understandable in this version than in most others, less romanticized and fantastic for good or evil; and even though the character of Bothwell is hardly consistent with the author's complete intention, yet its inconsistency is psychologically convincing enough as the opportunistic struggle with forces too strong for him. Mary's tendency to trust and forgive the wrong persons appears as a major element in their fate, but one is glad to see her rescued from the sultry "womanliness" of Zweig's conception.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

A Rural Strain

HOUNDS ON THE MOUNTAIN. By James Still. The Viking Press. $2.

COUNTRY MEN. By James Hearst. The Prairie Press: Muscatine, Iowa. $2.

THESE two books of regional pastorals prove that the poetic huntsmen are similarly up in the Middle West. In each instance the work of these young Americans springs from a single locale and expresses itself in what is almost a single vein: Mr. Still sings in a hushed, though more bitter-edged, voice of the highland farmer and the highland flowers of Troublesome Creek, Kentucky, while Mr. Hearst, introduced with restraint by Miss Suckow, confines his more muted songs to descriptions of Iowa exteriors. Both poets appear to have taken to heart the preface to the "Lyrical Ballads." Certainly they go the full way with Wordsworth and Coleridge in believing that the principal end of the poet should be to choose the incidents and situations of common life and render them in familiar language.

The common things of rural character and rural scenery out of which Mr. Still and Mr. Hearst make their poetry stand upon daily knowledge. The titles are homespun and suggest the Frostian influence. Mr. Hearst writes of Farm on a Summer Night, of Cows Bawl on Sunday, of Spring Plowing, of When a Neighbor Dies; and Mr. Still uses mountain preachers, horse-traders, passenger pigeons, fox-hunting, and mountain dulcimers for his subject matter.

Mr. Still, by reason of his illative mind and his broader sympathies, seems the better poet. He gains his effects by a slow, cumulative method and through the compressed line that opens suddenly to allow a sheer, sudden ingress of light. In Spring on Troublesome Creek and Pattern for Death the concentrate of awareness and close imagery distinguishes his poetry from the more facile but looser observations of Mr. Hearst, and from those of his fellow-Kentuckian, Mr. Jesse Stuart, whose bucolics have been lately over-drummed.

Neither of the poets under review seems much concerned with the new struggles and the pressing fears of the moment, although Mr. Still, in his small section Earth-bound, writes of the bleak mountain coal towns with a cold inner fury. But for the most part, both poets write detailed descriptive observation that is confined to comment upon life and death, the seasonal changes, and man and nature within what appears to be a static society.

STANLEY YOUNG

HELP
the Scottsboro Boys

By the conviction, with death as the penalty, of Clarence Norris on July 15, Alabama has served notice that regardless of everything, she means to go on demanding the blood of the nine youthful defendants in the world-famous Scottsboro case.

The remaining defendants have been ordered to trial in a sort of chain-belt system at the rate of two a week, one on Monday and another on Thursday.

The Scottsboro Defense Committee is in desperate need of funds to carry on the fight. There can be no letting up in the struggle to save these lads and to save American justice.

Send your check today to:

SCOTTSBORO DEFENSE COMMITTEE
112 East 19th Street, New York

DR. ALLAN KNIGHT CHALMERS Chairman
COL. WM. JAY SCHEIFFELIN Treasurer

AFTER UNIONIZATION—WHAT?

Conflict between Workers?
Conflict between Labor and Capital?
These will not solve the problem. A real solution which should interest everyone is offered by OSCAR NEWFANG, a student of Economics, in his

ECONOMIC WELFARE

$1.50 • At Your Bookseller—or order direct from:
BARNES & NOBLE, Inc., 105 Fifth Avenue, New York City

TWIN PINES
A Camp for Adults

Individual screened sun porches, semi-private adjoining baths in de luxe rooms of new main house; comfortable bungalows. Tennis, handball, basketball, baseball, sand beach bathing, boating, fishing, etc.

For further details, address
TWIN PINES ON TROUT LAKE
S. SAIDEL, LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

MOVING?

If you subscribe to The Nation and expect to move soon, please give us three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new. We ask this to assure uninterrupted delivery of copies to you. Write to

The Nation • 20 Vesey Street • N. Y. C.

Letters to the Editors

Challenging Mr. Villard

Dear Sirs: In his column Issues and Men in The Nation of July 10 Oswald Garrison Villard writes: "With England in an alliance with Hitler, what would become of the passionate demand of so many of our American liberals that we be ready to go to war in behalf of the democracies?"

Mr. Villard is not the first to make the charge that American liberals, meaning those who are giving vigorous support to the Spanish Loyalists, are in favor of American participation in a war between the democracies and the fascist powers. But no one, so far as I know, has made the charge in such outright fashion as Mr. Villard does here.

It is time that the accused liberals ask for names and quotations. I know many American liberals who passionately denounce our present embargo regulations. But not once have I heard or read the suggestion, not to speak of a "passionate demand," that America should participate in a war on behalf of democracy against fascism.

The North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy has taken a leading part in asking American sympathy and support for Spain in her struggle against fascism, and one imagines that if anyone must plead guilty to Mr. Villard's indictment it would be the leaders of this committee. Bishop Francis J. McConnell is its chairman and wholeheartedly supports its work. I challenge Mr. Villard to find the slightest justification for his attack in anything written or said by Bishop McConnell or by any other executive of the committee. Dr. Harry F. Ward, another liberal who has spoken often and vigorously in defense of the Spanish Loyalists and criticized our so-called neutrality, has declared explicitly that he does not favor American participation in a war against the fascists, and precisely for the same reason Mr. Villard gives—that it would mean a dictatorship here.

It will not do for Mr. Villard to reply that agitation against our present embargo regulations is equivalent to a demand that America go to war against fascism. Indeed, if anything is calculated to make a general war inevitable, it is refusal of aid to a democracy fighting for its life and the granting of aid to warring fascism. Nor can Mr. Villard claim that even the most vigorous speaking and writing in defense of the Spanish Loyalists or the solicitation of money for humanitarian relief in Loyalist Spain constitutes a "passionate demand" that the United States be ready to go to war. He might as well say that his own denunciation of the Nazis is a request that the United States go to war with Germany.

HERMAN F. REISSIG

New York, July 12

Not Guilty

Dear Sirs: Since Mr. Reissig gratuitously assumes that I referred in my article of July 10 to the American liberals who are supporting the Spanish Loyalists, I suspect that his letter is nothing but a would-be clever publicity stunt for the benefit of the organization which employs him.

The simple truth is that I did not have the members of any organization, or any liberals working for Spain, specifically in mind. But I did mean to refer to a number of American liberals who deliberately take the position that we must if necessary go to war for the so-called democracies if they are attacked by the dictators. Recently, for instance, in a group of some thirty liberals only myself and one other spoke up against the attitude in favor of going to war on behalf of democracy. I had also in mind the editorial policy of The Nation which points in that direction.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

New York, July 13

Staggering Statement

Dear Sirs: My attention has been drawn to an article in your issue of April 24 by Frank C. Hanighen entitled The War for Raw Materials in Spain. The point which interests me particularly is the somewhat staggering statement that "Sir Andrew McFadyean, commercial director [of Rio Tinto] vociferously proclaims his sympathy for the rebels."

The consistency of my views is of no particular importance to anyone but myself, and I am not so foolish as to suppose that my name is known in the United States except to a few valued friends. It happens, however, that I am associated in a humble capacity in my own country with liberal views and policies, and as your journal deservedly circulates in Europe, this must be my excuse for asking you to correct a statement which is devoid of any foundation.

I severed all connection with the Rio Tinto Company on March 31, 1936. I can hardly, therefore, as commercial director of that company have expressed views, vociferously or otherwise, on rebels who did not come into existence until many weeks thereafter.

So far as my memory serves, I have made no public utterance about the Spanish situation. It is of course difficult to remember everything one has said in private, but it is not difficult for an honest man to remember the things that he has not said, and I can assert, without claiming to possess a particularly retentive memory, that I have never in private expressed "my sympathy with the rebels." On the contrary, I hold, and must have expressed, the view that it would be an unspeakable outrage if a properly constituted government were overthrown by a section of the population which can only batter its way to power with the aid of Moorish soldiers, the Foreign Legion, and foreign troops.

ANDREW MCFADYEAN

London, May 1

Apology with Notations

Dear Sirs: First of all I acknowledge my mistake in designating Sir Andrew as managing director of Rio Tinto during the present Spanish Civil War. At the time I wrote the article, last March, all available reference books—the British Stock Exchange Manual and the Directory of Directors—so listed him. In the new manuals, just out, this has been corrected.

An international publicist of high reputation who had met Sir Andrew abroad in October, 1936, conveyed to me in conversation the distinct impression that Sir Andrew was "vociferously" sympathetic to the rebels. A distinguished historian who was present at this conversation tells me that he received the same impression. My informant, however, now wishes to correct this impression. He says that Sir Andrew was very critical of the Spanish government because of its labor policy but did not take a stand in favor of the rebels.

Since neither my informant nor witness wishes to be quoted I apologize—

RESORTS

FUN FOR ALL!
All sports facilities . . . Private lake! Swimming pool! Social and theatrical program directed by JOHN FORD, N. Y. stage director of "STEEL." Reasonable rates.

COOKS FALLS LODGE

COOKS FALLS, NEW YORK
N. Y. Office—250 W. 57th St.
Phone COlumbus 5-3690
RESERVE NOW!

A Quaint Pre-Revolutionary Farm 60 Miles From New York, Near Danbury, Conn. Lying in the Foothills of the Berkshires. All Land and Water Sports. A Fisherman's Haven.

LAKE CANDLEWOOD ORCHARDS

Splendid Accommodations. Jewish American Cooking. Write for Reservations to: Lake Candlewood Orchards, Brookfield, Conn. R.F.D. 44.
SONYA SNOWE, MANAGER

Carefree! Friendly! Informal!

LAKE CHODIKEE LODGE

HIGHLAND, N. Y.

Hampshire Players in Dramatic and Musical Repertoire. Adult Social and Athletic Activities. Lecture Forum. Open Air University now in Session under leadership of Irving Davidson, Popular Lecturer and Humorist. Private Lake.

Rates $27.50 up

N. Y. C. 1202 Kings Highway, B'klyn, ES. 5-4330

The Vacation Buy of the Year

COPAKE

The Island Paradise, on Beautiful Lake Copake, Craryville, N. Y.

Nationally selected as the Ideal Camp. The only Resort with all lake front. Modern Bungalows with every convenience and private showers. Magnificent 18-hole championship golf course. 12 fast tennis courts. Hand ball. Saddle horses. Aquatics. Unsurpassed food and entertainment.

$100 Worth of Vacation Enjoyment for $32.50

N. Y. Office: 116 Nassau St., BE 3-5590

ONE OF THE BETTER RESORTS
Pauls
SWAN LAKE, N. Y.

BARLOW FARM
Sherman, Conn.
Modern conveniences, swimming, tennis, etc.
$20 PER WEEK
For information N. Y. MAin 4-8276, evenings

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL
37 MINUTES TIMES SQUARE
MAKE THIS YOUR SUMMER HOME
Recreational Facilities. Solarium Singles $8 up
SHeepshead 3-3000

RIVERSIDE INN on Lake Housatonic. Swimming, boating, tennis. 1¾ hours from New York. $3 per day. $19 weekly. Station Derby. P. O. Seymour, Conn. Tel. Derby 598-12.

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks. One mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, badminton, swimming and canoeing. Cabins. Guests met at Lake George. $20.00 and $21.00. Tel. 27-F-12. R. J. Venton.

RESORTS

The Fieldstone

on Round Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and recreation in the heart of the Ramapo Mountains, one hour from New York.

Swimming, boating, tennis, riding, golf and other sports

P. O. BOX 297
MONROE, N. Y.

TELEPHONE:
MONROE 2501

A descriptive folder will be [illegible] at your request
By Reservation Only

CAMP MILFORD
The Camp with that Wonderful Spirit!
KENT CONN.

IN BERKSHIRE HILLS, ON BEAUTIFUL LAKE
Interesting social activities. Well Planned Athletic program. Wholesome food. Gay informality in a setting of rustic simplicity.
Write for Booklet
11 West 42nd St.
PEnn. 6-7842

JULY RATE $29.50
Daily $5

NOW! New Features at
NAPANOCH COUNTRY CLUB
add extra enjoyment to your vacation

- ★ New NAUTICAL OUTDOOR DINING ROOM Overlooking the Lake
- ★ New MOONLIGHT PAVILION Dancing Under the Stars
- ★ IMPROVED SOCIAL AND ATHLETIC FACILITIES.
- ★ SPORTY GOLF COURSE ON GROUNDS.
- ★ TENNIS, HANDBALL, SADDLE HORSES, BICYCLING, SWIMMING.
- ★ CONTINENTAL CUISINE Under direction Chef Jules Machol

July rates from $32.50

Send for Illustrated Circular

NAPANOCH COUNTRY CLUB
NAPANOCH, N. Y. — Ellenville 700
N. Y. Office 315 FIFTH AVE. MU 4-3806

Hillcrest Lodge among the Watchung Mts. 25 minutes by train, 50 by car. C. C. of New Jersey, commutation reasonable. Golf, tennis, swimming, handball.
Plainfield, N. J. Millington 364

Silver Birches, Canton, Maine. For discriminating women who want a quiet place that offers boating and bathing in a secluded and beautiful lake. Cabins with sanitary plumbing. Excellent table. Rates $15 to $20. Booklet.

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE
Pleasant Valley, N. Y., Dutchess Co.
An ideal place for rest. Beautiful surroundings. Wholesome food. Modern conveniences. Tennis, bathing, fishing, rowing. Rates: $18 Weekly.
Louis Sakow Pleasant Valley 2741

BERT FRIEDBERG welcomes you to a comfortable farm situated on 150 acres of beautiful country. Always pleasant companionship. Good Food. Tennis. Swimming. Riding.
HIL-BERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y.
Tel. Bert Friedberg Mahopac [illegible]

RESORTS

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
ADIRONDACKS
N. Y.

COLORFUL
CONGENIAL
COMFORTABLE
RATE $29.50 UP
Echo Lake Tavern
WARRENSBURG, N. Y.
City Tel. VAnderbilt 3-9875

Uncas Lodge

Plays — Activities
Directed by
JESS KIMMER
N.Y.U. Dramatic Soc.

TENNIS
directed by Murray Pincus is a major sport at
UNCAS LODGE

- 3 Fast Clay Tennis Courts
- Private Twin Lakes
- Boating — Fishing
- Handball — Ping Pong
- Saddle Horses and Golf
- Orchestra for Dancing

informal atmosphere
JULY RATES: $24.50 weekly: $4.00 daily
MANAGEMENT: DIANA and ABE BERMAN
Phone: Norwich 1858—Ring 5
New York: PResident 3-8649

CRADLE WILL ROCK
AT
UNCAS LODGE
MARC BLITZTEIN—WILL GEER
and original cast of 16
Sunday, July 25
Sunday Excursion to New London
$2.00 round trip
Phone—PResident 3-8649

Sponsored by and adjoining the BERKSHIRE COUNTRY CLUB
Woman— Stand back!
BERKSHIRE
Camp for Men ... WINGDALE, N. Y.

WEEKLY RATES
July, August
$25

Modern, Adult Camp for men. Do as you darn please. Golf, tennis, swimming, handball. Evenings you're guests at the Berkshire Country Club. Entertainment, dancing. Swell eats. Reservations, 11 W. 42 St., PE. 6-1940. Any Saturday Through Sunday Aft. [illegible]

STAR LAKE CAMP

In the glorious Adirondacks between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground for adults. 1800 feet elevation and right on the Lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Swimming, Canoeing, Handball, Baseball; Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Delicious wholesome meals that pep up the appetite. Rates $22.50 weekly.

Send for Booklet

New York Office:
116 Nassau St., Room 802a
[illegible] 3-6345

IT'S DIFFERENT . . . Charming is the word for ARTEMIS. If you love beauty, solitude, or sports; good food and fun—Come! $25 weekly. Couples special. Write: ARTEMIS, Brewster, N. Y., or phone: Brewster 555F5. Management: Rogers.

THE NEW EVSLIN HOUSE
FIFTH AVE. A ST. BELMAR, N. J.
Overlooking Silver Lake and Ocean
An exclusive hotel for an exclusive Jewish clientele. Located in the finest section of Belmar.
Phone 1208 S. NAT ROSENBLATT and rejoice that such a prominent public figure as Sir Andrew (I cannot accept his description of himself as "humble"—after all, he was secretary to the Reparations Commission from 1922-1924 and Commissioner of Controlled Revenues in Berlin, 1924-1930) has come out so openly in favor of Spain's "properly constituted government."

May I take this opportunity to do full justice to Rio Tinto in respect to a situation which has changed since I wrote my article? Rio Tinto's last annual report (April 30) stated in by no means disapproving language that after the arrival at its Spanish mines of Franco's troops labor troubles had disappeared and showed that under Franco 30 per cent less labor was required to produce 21 per cent more ore. But Rio Tinto is by no means satisfied. It seems that Franco credits the company at times—"some pesetas received, some owing"—in pesetas at the rate of 40 to the pound sterling, whereas the rate in London is about 70 to the pound sterling. Some millions of pesetas in the company's account are thus of such uncertain value that the balance sheet shows them as worth £7. The British government, according to the report, has assisted Rio Tinto in obtaining concessions from Franco which have "slightly temporarily eased the company's position." But the company still regards the situation as unhappy. And the shares which jumped on the arrival of Franco's troops, reaching a high of 32½, later dropped to 20. Time—and the level of Rio Tinto shares—will tell whether the British government has assisted Rio Tinto further. FRANK C. HANIGHEN

New York, July 5

Voyage of Discovery

Dear Sirs: In order to make it possible for qualified persons to study the Spanish situation at first hand a trip has been arranged by the Open Road in consultation with Spanish government authorities and the North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy. Fifteen carefully selected persons will be admitted to the group, and arrangements are being made in Spain for a genuine study of the social and political as well as the military situation there. It is just as important to understand Spain as it is to sympathize with it, and I believe that a few of your readers may be personally interested in this unusual venture. The group will sail on the Queen Mary August 11 and return on the Aquitania, arriving on September 14. Information about the trip may be obtained from its leader, Dr. Herman F. Reissig, at the North American Committee, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York.

ROGER BALDWIN

New York, July 14

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

LUDWIG LORE, a frequent contributor to The Nation, is at present studying conditions in various European countries, notably those of Central Europe. He will write for The Nation several articles embodying the results of his observations.

RUTH BRINDZE is the author of "Not to Be Broadcast: The Truth About Radio."

ROBERT DELL is the Geneva correspondent of the Manchester Guardian.

LION FEUCHTWANGER, one of the company of distinguished German writers exiled from their fatherland, is now living in France. He has written many novels, the best known of which are probably "Jew Suss," "Josephus," "The Oppermanns," and "The Jew of Rome."

ANITA BRENNER contributed to The Nation of April 29, 1936, an article entitled Spain Mobilizes for Revolution, in which she analyzed the antagonistic forces which were even then moving toward the present struggle for power.

EDWIN MIMS, JR., formerly an assistant editor of the Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, is now a member of the department of government at Harvard University.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN is the author of a life of Samuel Butler.

RESORTS

Get-A-Rest-Inn. In heart of Ramapo Mountains; bathing, solarium, showers; rational, delicious food, friendly atmosphere; moderate rates. Ovsiovitch, Pomona, N. Y. Route 305. Tel. Spring Valley 67F2.

Best Bungalows, Douglas Best, Proprietor. Young People's Colony at Valley Cottage, N. Y. (near Nyack). Pool 50 x 100, Handball, Tennis, Baseball, Social Hall. 1 hr. West Shore R.R. 45 min. from Bridge. Season, month, week, week-end. Tel. Congers 317.

FOR SALE

Unusual offer: Summer or year round home, good repair, 7 room Cape Cod Colonial house and barn with few acres of land, off main roads. Perfect spring water, mountain scenery, four miles from East Northfield, Mass., with direct New York connection. Sacrifice to settle estate. Wm. E. Johnson, Jr., Executor, I. H. Nat'l Bank Bldg., Nashua, N. H.

POSITION WANTED

Young writer wants to be caretaker, Long Island, N. Y., or nearby for maintenance, small salary. Box No. 938, c/o The Nation.

WANTED

Young Man able to drive car and interested in trip to Mexico. Communicate, Miss Constantine WIc. 2-0535.

ADULT EDUCATION

RALPH M. PEARSON'S

MAIL STUDY COURSES IN MODERN ART. PRACTICE in creative painting, modeling and drawing. THEORY: Analysis of current modern works. Bulletin on request. Summer address—E. Gloucester, Mass.

WRITER'S SERVICE

State Your Literary Problem. Instruction, criticism, revision, consultation, marketing. Unquestionably superior service, reasonable charges. ROBERT L. NEWMAN, 251 West 71 St., N. Y. C.

LANGUAGES

SUMMER SPECIAL. Language Records and 15 private lessons. French, Spanish, Russian, etc. $25.00. LANGUAGE SERVICE, 507 Fifth Ave., MUrray Hill 2-4221.

LITERARY SERVICES

Special Articles, Reviews, Theses, Speeches, prepared to specifications. Convenient Service. Authors Research Bureau, 516 Fifth Ave., New York.

LIMES-LEMONS FOR SALE

Seedless Limes delivered prepaid $8.00 bushel, $4.25 half bushel, $2.25, 1/5 bushel. Lemons, $6.75 bushel, $3.75 half bushel. Oranges $4.00 bushel. A. H. Burket, Sebring, Fla.

BOOK

HAVELOCK ELLIS
PSYCHOLOGY OF SEX
"The best one-volume treatment of Sex in the English language."—Carl Van Doren
$3.00 Postpaid
At Booksellers, or from
EMERSON BOOKS, Inc., Dept. 122-A
251 West 19th Street, New York

RECORDS

100,000
European Recordings
Announcing an extraordinary sale of 100,000 Parlophone, Odeon, Decca discs. These marvelous records comprise the cream of the world's finest music. A selection to gratify every taste. Sale prices: 50c & 75c per record. Values $1.50 & $2.00. Mail orders. Catalog.
GRAMOPHONE SHOP, Inc., 18 E. 48th St., New York

FILMS

ALL NATION READERS SHOULD SEE
FURY OVER SPAIN
See Amazing Heroism of Loyalist Forces. Courage of Women and Children Unparalleled in History—See Actual Fighting at Barcelona, Toledo, Madrid, etc.—Part of Receipts Go to Trade Union Relief for Spain.
WORLD CINEMA 153 W. 49th St | Near 7th Ave Circle 7-5747

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 31, 1937 · NUMBER 5

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 113

EDITORIALS:
- THE PACK IN FULL CRY 115
- WHAT IS A YARDSTICK? 116
- OPEN LETTER TO THE MIDDLE CLASS 117

BIG STEEL, LITTLE STEEL, AND THE C. I. O. by Benjamin Stolberg 119

ROOSEVELT'S DEFEAT—THE INSIDE STORY by Robert S. Allen 123

ENGLAND VS. ITALY IN PALESTINE by Herbert Solow 125

WILL EUROPE GO TO WAR? by Ludwig Lore 127

WHO CHASES AMBULANCES? by Loren Miller 129

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 131

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
- "BEAUTY'S ROSE" by Joseph Wood Krutch 132
- FIELD WORK IN BOHEMIA by Kenneth Burke 133
- THE DELPHIC LANGUAGE by Walton H. Hamilton 134
- MEDICINE AND PUBLIC HEALTH by Hugh H. Darby 134
- GONE WITH ANTHONY ADVERSE by William Phillips 135
- THE CONSUMER AND HIS MONEY by Leverett S. Lyon 135
- JOHNNY JOHNSON'S WAR MEMOIRS by Tom Squire 136
- RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 137

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates
HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

RECAPTURE OF BRUNETE BY THE REBELS HAS temporarily dashed the Loyalists' high hopes of lifting the siege of Madrid. Although it is too soon to say whether the rebel gains have been worth the fearful price that has been paid for them, any loss of ground is bound to be disappointing after the early promise of the government's offensive. Madrid has made no secret of its surprise at the strength of the insurgent counter-offensive. The strengthened Loyalist armies have been faced by new contingents of Moors and Italians, and have had to contend with large fleets of the most modern aircraft, such as were not in the rebels' hands even a few weeks ago. While England and France have debated the advisability of sending supplies, the fascist countries have poured in millions of dollars' worth of munitions for what they believed would be the final drive on Madrid. In the hope of maintaining this situation, the fascist powers have cleverly played for time on the international front, accepting the British compromise proposal for the withdrawal of "volunteers" in principle but imposing every obstacle to the discussion of practical plans for achieving this end. This strategy has been somewhat offset in Britain, however, by the signing of a commercial agreement between Franco and Germany, and by confirmation of the fact that the rebels, with German and Italian aid, had placed guns in a position to dominate the Strait of Gibraltar. Eden's speech in Commons warning Italy against attempting to dominate the Mediterranean suggests that British imperial interests are not yet wholly forgotten. A Loyalist victory might jog Britain's memory.

THE KILLING OF SOME FIFTY JAPANESE Embassy guards at the southwest gate of Peiping by Chinese troops defending the city has again brought North China to the brink of war. For a few days it seemed as if Nanking would quietly accept the terms of surrender forced upon General Sung Cheh-yuan by the Japanese. But subsequent developments illustrate the marked difference between the present-day political atmosphere in China and that which existed at the time of the notorious Tangku truce in 1933. Despite General Sung's orders, members of the 30th and 37th divisions refused to withdraw from their positions in the vicinity of Peiping, while Nanking dispatched Hsiung Pin, vice-chief of its general staff, to bolster the morale of the anti-Japanese officers of these divisions. Further reinforcements from the central government continued to pour into southern Hopei to match the huge Japanese reinforcements from Korea and Japan. Heedless of these obvious storm warnings, the Japanese continued their provocative tactics. After the Sung agreement had been reached, they shelled the Wanping barracks west of Peiping, inflicting heavy damage, and staged an impressive aerial display over the city. A few days later Japanese planes bombed Chinese barracks at Langfang, midway between Peiping and Tientsin, and additional Japanese troops were illegally dispatched to Peiping. Peace is still possible if China will submit to Japan's terms, but the possibility becomes more remote with every act of Japanese arrogance.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

*

WHEN SENATOR NYE CALLS THE LABOR Relations Board a C. I. O. adjunct, and when Representative Rankin accuses it of "conspiring with communistic influences to destroy industry," neither set of charges will bear scrutiny. The sufficient answer to Senator Nye would be to set him the rigorous but cleansing task of reading the evidence and findings in every Labor Board case since the C. I. O. was established and challenge him to match the board's record with that of any other body for absence of bias and for painstaking respect for facts. And Mr. Rankin should be asked to read before the House the disclosures about peonage in the Mississippi cotton mills made last year by Southern and Northern journalists alike. But neither desires that sort of answer. Mr. Nye, a reputed liberal for his munitions investigation, has national ambitions. Mr. Rankin, a reputed liberal for his T. V. A. sponsorship, has local worries. Both are piling up conservative political credit by joining the attack on the agency whose integrity is dangerous to the American business Bourbons.

*

IT WOULD BE A SAD MISTAKE TO THINK OF the dog-eat-dog mayoralty fight among New York Democrats as a struggle between New Dealers and anti-New Dealers. While there is no question about the bitter anti-Roosevelt stand of Candidate Copeland and his Tammany backers, it is the sheerest effrontery for the other Democratic leaders to offer Grover Whalen as a pro-Administration progressive. At best the intra-party battle is no more than a squabble between those who feel that City Hall can be recaptured for Tammany by an alliance with Republicans and Liberty League reactionaries and those party leaders who see more hope in lending lip-service to Washington in return for the powerful support of the national machine. It is important that such support be withheld. The picture of Dr. Copeland piping Tammany back into green pastures is more appalling than probable. The Hall at present is hardly strong enough to dictate the Democratic nomination, much less win an election, and the sudden death of James J. Dooling will probably weaken Copeland's candidacy still further. The fight now promises to become a three-way affair, with Whalen for the Flynn-Farley Democrats, La Guardia for the New Deal, and Copeland for an impending alliance between the Republicans and Tammany Hall. In a battle of that sort the New Deal and all its works will be the real issue. Only a desperate belief that Roosevelt's popularity is on the wane could induce the local Republican machine to jettison La Guardia, as they now seem ready to do, and merge their forces with the anti-New Deal Democrats of Tammany. With such a line-up in prospect and such an issue at stake, La Guardia has every claim to whatever aid Washington can afford.

*

ALABAMA'S ACTION IN FREEING FOUR OF THE nine defendants in the Scottsboro case came as welcome news after six and a half years of seemingly hopeless struggle to obtain elementary justice in the Southern courts. The importance of the victory may be judged from the fact that it has been only a few days since the state announced its determination to demand the death penalty for all but one of the Negroes. But the battle is only half won. One of the defendants, Clarence Norris, is still under sentence of death; another, Andy Wright, is faced by a ninety-nine-year sentence; while two of the others, Haywood Patterson and Andy Weems, face seventy-five years' imprisonment. Ozie Powell was cleared of the charge of rape, but sentenced to twenty years for his attack on Deputy Blalock. From the standpoint of justice, Alabama's position is even less tenable than before. The evidence against the four who were convicted was identical with that against those who were released, consisting solely of the unsupported, and frequently contradictory, testimony of Victoria Price. For some months rumors have been heard of a compromise agreement to free the boys on terms which would save the face of the Alabama authorities. But the final outcome does not appear to have resulted from any such bargain. Justice demands that the fight be continued until the state of Alabama not only frees all of the Negroes but makes some amends for their six and a half years in prison.

*

THE NAZI TALENT FOR MAKING ENEMIES HAS been getting a pretty thorough workout in the United States in the past few weeks. When the American Hitlerites manage to draw sparks from the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the American Legion, they are getting places. And when they provoke the labor-baiting Representative Dies of Texas into demanding an investigation of their "un-American" activities, they may be said to have arrived. The starting point of the inquiry would be the Nazi camps. Foremost among these camps, now twenty-one in number, is Nordland, at Andover, N. J., operated by the German-American Bund and the weekly scene of heiling, parading, saluting, and general swastika-worship, with beer and gymnastics on the side. Apparently the week-enders don't know where to stop, for feeling in the Jersey countryside is running high. August Klapprott, state leader of the Bund, even accuses the Legion of planning an invasion of Nordland. In his simple Nazi way Herr Klapprott warns: "If there is going to be any physical action by any of these private organizations, they would not get away alive." We can hardly be accused of siding with the Legion in its periodic outbursts against "un-Americanism," but when it comes to foreign military groups organizing in this country, we can only support the veterans' demand for a genuine investigation. By that we do not mean a sweeping heresy hunt, such as we fear Mr. Dies has in mind, but a realistic inquiry conducted by a man of Senator Borah's caliber.

*

THE ACTION OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS in passing the buck to the League of Nations in the matter of the Palestine partition plan suggests that it will be drastically modified before adoption. Since the pressure against the plan has come primarily from the Jews, it is probable that the territorial lines will be altered to their advantage. Fear of Italian influence over the Arabs may also lead to readjustments further protecting Suez and Egypt from attack by the new Arab state. It is significant, however, that in the welter of discussion over the Royal Commission's report no one has come forth with an alternative proposal which has the slightest prospect of success. For Jews and Arabs alike, the only practical line of procedure has become that of obtaining as many concessions as possible in their favor. From the standpoint of abstract justice, the delay in the final decision might seem welcome as a means of obtaining necessary adjustments in the program; actually, however, each week the plan is debated only intensifies the bitterness on all sides and increases the danger of serious outbreaks.

*

CONGRATULATIONS ARE BEING HEAPED ON the pertinacious A. P. Herbert, the English humorist and novelist who came to the House of Commons on a divorce-reform platform and who stuck to his bill until opposition melted and public opinion swung to his side. Without government support and against the resistance of the church the bill slowly made its way through the Commons and the Lords, emerging slightly battered and amputated but still a reform. By adding other grounds to the historic single ground of adultery, the new law should greatly reduce the practice of collusion and false evidence which had developed into a major trade under the old code. Under Mr. Herbert's bill as passed, divorce may be granted for desertion over a period of at least three years without cause, for cruelty, and under certain limitations for incurable insanity. It is easy to lament the serious operations performed on the measure in the House of Lords, but its final terms mark so striking an advance not only over previous English law but over prevailing practice in most of the United States that it deserves the general enthusiasm with which it has been received.

*

PRESIDENT MANUEL QUEZON'S HINT THAT the Commonwealth might welcome a substitute for the Tydings-McDuffie Act has been interpreted in many circles as proof that the Filipinos do not really want independence. A close reading of Quezon's statement reveals the falsity of this interpretation. His objections to the present status are based not on the pitfalls of self-rule, or even on the "Japanese menace," but on the fact that Congress has made a half-dozen alterations in the terms of the Independence Act, all of them unfavorable to the Filipinos. Quezon's remedy against a continuation of these arbitrary and unfair changes is not a prolongation of American rule, as was suggested in the Scripps-Howard press, but the granting of immediate independence. Under the present arrangements the Filipinos feel that they are suffering many, if not most, of the economic disadvantages of independence without having the privileges of complete self-rule. If Congress was really sincere in its solicitude for the Filipino people, instead of being motivated primarily by a desire to exclude Filipino products, it would accede to President Quezon's request for full freedom by 1938.

The Pack in Full Cry

THE defeat of the court plan is the most drastic blow the New Deal has thus far suffered. There can be no flinching from that fact, either by the President's immediate supporters or by those whose social objectives, while more far-reaching than his, nevertheless include his. We are aware that the principal feeling of most of the public, including our readers, is one of relief at the ending of a bitter and fruitless struggle. But a lifting of tension is not the same as a solution of difficulties. Perhaps we are bleary-eyed with too much reading of Senatorial statements and editorial rejoicings; but the outstanding thing our eyes encounter as they survey the national scene is the reactionary pack in full cry after the New Deal. And the taste of blood is not likely to slow them up in the pursuit of their quarry.

To be sure, there is a brave show of concord on both sides. Jack Garner, treason or no treason, is back in the councils. Ed Burke of Nebraska is given a Presidential handshake with special warmth. Everywhere there is forgiveness and gentlemen crying, "Peace, peace." But there is no peace. When President Roosevelt talks of having partially achieved the objective of court reform through the changed tenor of the court's recent decisions, he is only putting the best face possible on his defeat. We agree with Mr. Allen, in his article elsewhere in this issue, that Mr. Roosevelt is by no means through with court reform—not court reform in the sense of the shotgun liberalism of the recent decisions, nor the purely procedural "reform" that is now being discussed, but in the sense of making the court responsive to the national will without going through a major constitutional crisis each time. It is true that something has been gained by the court's change of heart; and that the judges will think twice in the near future before they invalidate another important New Deal measure. But the real gain thus far lies not in the liberalization of the court but in the education of mass opinion. Despite the middle-class pressure brought against the bill, it is still true that the common man knows a good deal more than he once knew of the role the court plays in our economic system. And it is upon this knowledge that the real court reform of the future must depend.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

So much for the President's side. The opposition is even clearer in its reluctance to accept the status quo. There are already ample signs of a movement against the New Deal as a whole. For those who care about the program which has been held up in the legislative log-jam, the immediate prospect is one to arouse despair. Undoubtedly there will be a good deal of talk of "constructive" legislation, carried out in a new spirit of harmony. But we are ready to climb out on a limb and risk the prophecy that the "constructive" legislation will be mainly desultory where it is not actually harmful.

Even when the Administration program is whittled down to a shadow of its former self, it still leaves certain measures that ought not to be held over for another session. Our own seven-point program, modest enough from a progressive standpoint, would run somewhat as follows: an adequate Black-Connery wages-and-hours bill; an adequate farm program to replace the AAA, including a farm-tenancy measure; an adequate housing bill; the Norris proposal for a network of T.V.A.'s to deal with the problem of conservation and electric power; a bill plugging the loopholes in the tax laws; an anti-lynching bill; and a bill reconsidering our neutrality policy in the light of developments in Spain and China. Last January, when Congress first convened, we hopefully published a fourteen-point program for its consideration. Now in mid-summer, with every force lined up on the side of adjournment, we know the country must go on half rations. But we realize that even the seven measures enumerated above stand little chance of enactment. The tax-loophole bill may go through; a housing act and a farm-tenancy act seem almost certain of passage, but in a form that drastically compromises the essential principles behind both; the Black-Connery bill, tragically meager as it is now, stands relatively little chance against the opposition of big enterprise; it would be utopian to expect the Norris proposal successfully to buck the utility interests; as for the farm bills, there seems a hopeless split between Secretary Wallace and the heads of the Congressional committees on agriculture—a split which is likely to doom any substantial legislation in this field; an anti-lynching bill, after the surprisingly good showing it made last week in the form of the Copeland rider to the McCarran freight-car bill, stands a fair chance of passage; finally, anything as valuable and socially conscious as a revision of the neutrality act seems almost incongruous amid the Washington shambles today.

Undoubtedly, adjournment will win the day. But adjournment is only the rhetoric to conceal the sabotaging of the New Deal program. The biggest drive today is the drive to take the country off the New Deal standard. The New York Herald Tribune tells Congress, editorially, that it has just two more mandates: one is to revise the Wagner Act; the second is to adjourn and go home. A Boston paper last week ran the alarmist headline that Mr. Roosevelt actually meant to go on with the New Deal. Walter Lippmann's new crusade is against the Black-Connery bill. Amos Pinchot's latest open letter to the President is important only as a sign of what is happening. It links the Black-Connery labor-standards bill and the government reorganization proposal along with the court bill as dictatorial measures. One letter remains for Mr. Pinchot to write, and we know he will write it: a letter pointing out that if Mr. Roosevelt does not take the lead in revising the Wagner Act, it will be because he and John Lewis are planning to divide the country into two dictatorship satrapies.

We have said from the beginning that more was involved in the opposition to the court bill than the court bill itself. We believe our analysis is being proved true. Exactly the same forces that started the cry against the court bill are now starting the cry against the Wagner Act and against further extension of the New Deal. These forces are reactionary, but already, as with the court proposal, they are being joined by so-called "liberals." Senator Wheeler's success in leading the light-horse liberal troops against the President while the heavy reactionary batteries stayed in the rear is sure to invite duplication. Thus Senator Gerald Nye, whose reputation as a liberal is chiefly based on his munitions investigation, seems to be aching for a chance to become the Wheeler of the anti-labor drive. His attack on the Labor Relations Board as a partisan body is so patently false in the face of the restraint and integrity the board has shown that it is best explained as a shrewd attempt to exploit a united business and middle-class sentiment. After the "liberal" spokesman appears, the other steps are sure to follow. A section of the Democrats split off from the rest of the party on the new issue. Maneuverings and betrayals go on, engineered by the Garners and others. The newspapers join the chase in full force. So does the Catholic church. Charges of dictatorships (or communism) are leveled against Mr. Roosevelt (or Mr. Lewis). A middle-class hysteria is built up. A new united front is formed in which the "liberals" do the talking, mushroom "leagues" prepare letters and telegrams—and the Liberty League stays in the background.

Thus a new formula is evolved for breaking progressive legislation, very similar to the Mohawk Valley-Johnstown formula for breaking strikes. Its success in the court fight means that it will be tried again and again. And the only thing that can meet it is further organization and more education.

What Is a Yardstick?

THE course of a true T.V.A. does not run smooth. Two winters ago there was the question of constitutionality. Last winter there was a Montague-Capulet feud among the directors. Repeatedly the T.V.A.'s path has been blocked by propaganda and snarled up with court injunctions. Now there is a new T.V.A. tangle for conservative rejoicing: Congressional friends of the T.V.A., headed by Representative Rankin of Mississippi, have become alarmed over the proposed contract to sell T.V.A. power to the Arkansas Power and Light Company (yes, the Harvey Couch outfit) without provision for resale rates. The Rankin group of about thirty Congressmen held a meeting last week in Washington at which they grilled Mr. Lilienthal on the "abandonment" of the yardstick principle.

Which raises the question: Just what is a yardstick in electric power? Does it mean, as some members of the Rankin group take it to mean, control by the T.V.A. through contracts with private utility companies over the resale rate of electric power? Or is it broader than that?

The essence of the yardstick lies in the fact that it is something to measure by. What is being measured in this case is private-utility rates for electric power, and the measuring-stick is provided by T.V.A. rates. There are, roughly, three broad courses open for dealing with electric power. One is complete nationalization, and it is the one we favor in the long run. A second is public regulation of private-utility rates. This is essentially the course that had been followed before the advent of the T.V.A. We have sought to regulate utilities through our state public-service commissions, operating on the principle that utility rates are to be fixed at the point where they will yield the companies a fair return on some mythical "fair value" of their properties. To determine what that "fair value" is, we have had to appeal over the heads of the state commissions to the courts. And the courts, despite the remark of Justice Stone that they "have been projected into the most speculative undertaking imposed upon them in the entire history of English jurisprudence," have almost uniformly given the benefit of all doubts to the utilities.

It was to remedy this situation that the T.V.A. and its yardstick policy were inaugurated. Very simply put, the yardstick idea is that any region, state, or local community can by generating and distributing power to its citizens furnish a means of comparison with the private-utility rates, and thus force them down. Reliance is thus placed not upon regulation by state commissions, in the field of government, but upon government example and competition in the economic field itself.

Thus the contract with the Arkansas Light and Power Company is not a violation of the yardstick but falls outside it. The government needed some money and had extra power waiting about unused because court injunctions have tied up the contracts it has made with municipalities in the T.V.A. area. It therefore proposes to sell the unused power on a five-year contract to the Arkansas company, which operates outside the T.V.A. area. Thus the T.V.A. will receive $3,000,000 for "secondary" power—that is, power which is made available to the Arkansas company for 300 days a year, at times selected by the T. V. A. in such a way as not to interfere with the peak load.

We can see nothing wrong with this contract as it stands. It does not violate the yardstick principle as that principle has been stated in Senator Norris's early speeches and in President Roosevelt's famous Portland speech in the 1932 campaign. It is a stop-gap revenue measure—not to be construed as a new T.V.A. policy. If it were considerably extended and became the basis of T.V.A. policy we should protest forcibly. As matters stand, however, it is a harmless expedient. The essential thing is not to confuse the yardstick idea with contracts carrying a resale clause. While Congress has before it Mr. Roosevelt's message asking for a network of T.V.A.'s over the country, it is of the first importance to understand what the T.V.A. principle means.

Open Letter to the Middle Class

YOU have recently received through the pages of thirty newspapers in twenty-two cities a full-page communication from the Citizens National Committee, with headquarters in Johnstown, Pennsylvania. It was headed Common Sense, a concept dear to Americans; and it appealed to your deepest feelings and convictions. It spoke of protecting the "individual citizen in his legal rights"; it advocated a "peaceful solution to the present industrial strife," a phrase that was welcome to your ears after the horror of the Chicago killings; it quoted the Constitution, a document of noble words from which even citizens committees are free to quote; above all, it defended the "constitutional right to work," a phrase that must have gone straight to the heart of every man who earns his bread and has at some time lost a job.

Altogether it was high-sounding and persuasive. But did you notice that this pronouncement, devoted to constitutional rights, ended with a resolution in which it was proposed that citizens take law enforcement out of the hands of duly elected officials in the name of the Constitution?

The communication was signed by the Citizens National Committee; it was in reality a letter from Big Business to the middle class; and it was designed to turn your sympathy away from the working population of this country which has dared at last to demand a living wage and to claim its share of wealth and power in this great industrial empire. This letter you have just received was suavely written because Big Business commands the services of such letter writers as John Price Jones; it appeared in the most respectable organs of public opinion because Big Business can afford to pay the high advertising rates of newspapers like the New York Times. It appealed brazenly to your dearest convictions because Big Business does not scruple to exploit the best traditions of men and nations if by so doing it can preserve or increase its own power.

The proclamation of the Citizens National Committee declares that it is not anti-union. But it was formed in Johnstown, Pennsylvania, a company town of Bethlehem Steel, which has declared unremitting war on unions. It has been careful, of course, to hide its tracks, but there are strong indications that its expenses have been underwritten by Bethlehem and E. T. Weir and other independent business men. The men who appear as its officers are, most of them, small fry but dangerous. For example:

The Reverend John H. Stanton is a fanatic red-baiter. Lawrence W. Campbell, secretary of the Citizens National Committee, is also secretary of the Johnstown Chamber of Commerce, and Johnstown is a company town. He hates aliens, unions, and "reds." George C. Rutledge is with the Johnstown Bank and Trust Company. Rembert G. Smith is a reactionary of long standing. He took an active part in the National Conference of Clergymen and Laymen at Asheville, North Carolina, a year ago; he is associated with Gerald Winrod, anti-Semite and editor of the Defender, a pro-Nazi publication in Wichita, Kansas. Ormsby McHarg is a regular right Republican.

One of the important people behind the scenes, John Price Jones, does not deign to sign the advertisement; but his connection with the movement was established in a dispatch from F. Raymond Daniell of the New York Times, when he visited Johnstown. Now let us look at Mr. Jones's other connections. He is a member of the firm of Thornley and Jones. Mr. Jones has had much more publicity than Mr. Thornley, but who is George H. Thornley? He is, for one thing, one of the closest friends of Henry Ford. He was formerly vice-president of N. W. Ayer, one of our most "patriotic" advertising agencies, and in that position he handled the Ford account. Is there any reason to doubt that Mr. Thornley, like Mr. Jones, is interested in saving America from the C.I.O. and that he could easily enlist his friend Mr. Ford in such a worthy project?

So much for the committee's background and motivation. So much for its claim that it is not anti-union, that it believes in the right to strike. In another section of its letter to you it expressly declares that it is not a vigilante committee; but in its resolution in the very same announcement it proclaims that

> WHEREAS occasions have arisen where we can no longer look to certain constituted authorities to protect human constitutional rights,
>
> THEREFORE, as loyal American citizens we feel it is our patriotic duty to perfect a nationwide organization whose function it shall be to restore and protect those constitutional rights that have been taken from American citizens by certain unworthy officials.

This is vigilantism in its simplest and most vicious form, and when we recall that the word "certain" was inserted in the first clause only after a furious debate at the meeting of the C.N.C. we realize the full implications of the Johnstown resolutions.

Surely you will realize by now that the committee's appeal for the "constitutional right to work" is of the same stripe as its defense of the "right to strike." This phrase is in fact the mainspring of the C.N.C. trap to catch middle-class men and women of good will and use them for its own ends. There is no such thing as the "constitutional right to work"—bourgeois capitalism provides for no such working-class right. Our Constitution does provide for the protection of life and liberty, and to the American worker that can have only one real meaning—the right to a decent and secure living in the industrial plenty he has helped to create. It is that right which organized labor, under the banner of the C.I.O., is now fighting to obtain. It is that right which the C.N.C. and the forces behind it are determined to drown in propaganda and in blood whenever necessary. They have on their side the Liberty League, the National Civic Federation (whose own plan of "law and order" for America we shall refer to specifically in a later issue), the Republican Party, the pro-Nazi groups—in a word, every reactionary in America. They work through, because they influence, chambers of commerce, editors of newspapers, and city officials. For a vivid example of how they control officeholders, read carefully the testimony of Chief of Police Switter of Massillon, Ohio, before the National Labor Relations Board. They will work through law-and-order leagues, such as were represented in the Johnstown meetings. They will, above all, woo you, the middle class.

And the middle class? Economically weak, politically important in a transition period, you stand between predatory capital on the one hand and aspiring labor on the other. Which is your enemy? The Citizens National Committee will assure you in expensive ads written by expensive publicity men that labor "threatens" you. But who forecloses your mortgage, or forces the local small-town banker to foreclose it? If you are a doctor, a lawyer, a real-estate man, a storekeeper, who is it that cuts wages, throws your neighbors out of work, and reduces your income, though corporation profits soar? Who runs your town? And do you think it would be better or worse if the workers in your town, through unionization, came to have an organized voice in the way it is run? Which is more likely to have genuine regard for human rights: a corporation striving to retain its power, or an organization of ordinary men and women seeking decent wages, a better life, a future of security and culture for their families?

In Germany and Italy, capitalism, crooning the sweet phrases of the right to work, of justice, and of freedom, has led the middle class into a trap of economic starvation and political degradation, without rights and without hope. We abjure sensationalism, but it is our firm conviction that the advertisement of the C.N.C., that suave letter from Big Business to the middle class, is the first insidious music of fascism in America. Follow it and it will lead you imperceptibly into political silence, where you cannot even discuss with the workers who will be your fellow-victims what might have been. The middle class can save itself only by joining its strength with that of labor to fight every trespass upon free speech and the right to organize and strike, every threat to override the law when it supports that right. The formation of the C.N.C. is a major attempt at such a trespass. Today the police of Massillon, armed by Republic Steel, are messing up union headquarters; tomorrow they will be shooting up liberal forums and church gatherings and suppressing liberal magazines and newspapers.

Last week in The Nation the Workers Defense League published an answer to the C.N.C. and called for a nationwide campaign to thwart its obvious purpose. Such a campaign will soon be overdue.

Big Steel, Little Steel, and C.I.O.

BY BENJAMIN STOLBERG

ON March 1, 1937, Big Steel, with a marvelous sense for dramatic publicity, recognized the union. It seemed that Myron C. Taylor, the strong, silent, far-visioned chairman of United States Steel, had successfully conspired with John L. Lewis to usher in a new age of industrial peace and statesmanship. Little Steel, on the other hand, is corrupting the authorities, is heavily subsidizing vigilantism, has turned its plants into arsenals, and has literally hired the organized underworld in its fight against organized labor. Obviously the House of Morgan, which is Big Steel, is enlightened. And obviously the Graces, the Girdlers, and the Purnells, who are Little Steel, are barbarians.

Such is the picture today in the more or less intelligent public mind. And indeed, half of the picture is quite true: the Graces and Girdlers are glorified industrial toughs who stop at nothing. Since the strike in Little Steel began, eighteen unarmed workers have lost their lives, ten of them were shot in the back. Hundreds have been wounded, many seriously. The steel citadels in the Mohawk and Mahoning valleys, in East and in South Chicago, are more like concentration camps than industrial centers. The Little Steel towns are not merely under a psychological but actually under a legal reign of terror. But the other half of the picture is not quite true. For the fact is that Big Finance interpenetrates behind the scenes in the domination both of the United States Steel Corporation and of the large independent steel manufacturers. The powers which control steel form a club whose members more or less act together or split apart according to the dictates of strategy.

United States Steel is controlled by the Morgans. But the Mellons and Kuhn, Loeb and Company are also large stockholders. The Mellons have also enormous stakes in Bethlehem; and through its relations with the Guaranty Trust Company and otherwise, Bethlehem Steel is also tied up with the Morgans. The Pickands, Mather interests of Cleveland, whose dealings with the Morgans have been many and close, are heavily interested in the Republic Steel Company, on whose board sits J. F. Schoellkopf, Jr., of the Niagara Hudson Power Company, one of the largest utilities with which the Morgans maintain close relations. And Pickands, Mather completely controls the Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company. Obviously the enlightened gentlemen who dominate Big Steel are at least on speaking terms with themselves and their cronies in Little Steel.

All this of course does not mean that there are no authentic and bitter rivalries for the market between the two groups. Nor does it mean that the Graces and the Girdlers and the Weirs are not outraged at the "treachery" of the interests which dominate Big Steel. Big Finance is never clearly conspiratorial and is often at odds with itself, because its immediate interests and its long-range diplomacy are as contradictory as capitalism itself. But it is also true that Big Finance in steel, and elsewhere, is at present consciously operating on two fronts against organized labor. One front is watchfully awaiting the outcome of the struggle on the other.

BIG STEEL

The independent steel barons of course hate the "irresponsible" John Lewis and the Steel Workers Organizing Committee with murderous bitterness. Still, they hate Lewis as Capone might hate a hard-hitting district attorney. For it is impossible to hate John Lewis without respecting him. Their really rabid and foaming rage is reserved for Myron Taylor. He "betrayed" them. He is the Judas in the Garden of Bessemer, the Benedict Arnold of the Iron and Steel Institute. But the simple truth commands us to come to the defense of Mr. Taylor, for he really was nothing but a stooge in recognizing the union. To be sure, he signed the contract, but it was practically automatic writing. And here is the story of how the United States Steel Corporation recognized the union, a story which has never been told.

Mr. Myron Taylor is on the eve of retirement from a long and successful career. He is impressive and handsome in the clean-cut, strong-weak sense. He is platitudinous-profound, inordinately vain, and none too bright. In short, he is a stuffed shirt. But his perfect linen is not stuffed with sawdust. It is stuffed with plaster of paris, which gives him both the sense and the appearance of unbending strength. Mr. Taylor can't be told. He must be patiently flattered into thinking that it is he who does the telling.

The steel business was on the up-and-up all through 1936. It promised to be even better in 1937. The American market was excellent, and the foreign armament business was growing. Mr. Walter Runciman, president of the British Board of Trade, paid us a holiday visit this spring, calling for a weekend at the White House and spending much of his time with our international bankers and big business men. Mr. Runciman felt reasonably certain that the British rearmament program would bring a good deal of trade to the American steel makers, especially in armor plate. But the British wanted to be sure of continuous production.

The most enlightened man in the House of Morgan, almost professionally so, is Thomas W. Lamont. By that I do not mean that Mr. Lamont could hold down, on his own intellectual merits, an ordinary instructorship in economics at one of our leading universities. I mean to say that Mr. Lamont is enlightened in the sense that he is shrewd, a clever strategist, and a man of wide worldly contacts. Above all, he knows what is good for the House of Morgan. He appreciated that the American steel trusts could not very well take on any British armament business and at the same time refuse to bid for our own naval construction because they objected to the labor provisions of the Walsh-Healy Act. He also knew that the Steel Workers Organizing Committee had a majority of the workers in United States Steel, especially in the Pittsburgh district; he also probably knew that the union had few members and would have much trouble in Little Steel. He wanted continuous production, and he was impressed with the fact that General Motors lost a whole season's business through the strike. He knew that the La Follette hearings were not doing big industry any good; and that if the hearings should ever get around to an exposé of Big Steel, the revelation of the number of gangsters and spies and personnel fakers employed by Big Steel would give him the shock of his life. He knew that the industry, in fighting the union, was messing up its entire productive process. Carnegie Steel, for instance, had 11,000 ratings for 100,000 workers. He knew that the intransigeant reaction of the Liberty League in the last campaign had enormously strengthened the New Deal. And finally he knew that John Lewis had not changed overnight from a conservative labor leader to a flaming revolutionary and that Lewis's record in the United Mine Workers—and Morgan dominates a lot of coal—has been highly responsible, indeed the most rationalizing influence in this most irrational of industries; Lewis is radical only in the sense that conservatism cannot organize the masses. And Mr. Lamont probably also suspected that the large independent steel companies, over which the House of Morgan has no immediate control, would keep the union worrying. All these factors decided Mr. Lamont and the House of Morgan to become far-visioned industrial statesmen. This attitude was shared by Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., the Morgan chairman of the finance committee of United States Steel. Their main problem was to make Myron Taylor believe that he had given birth to the big idea. The thing to do was to play on Mr. Taylor's vanity.

Mr. Taylor held out for a long, long time—in fact, to the very last. But finally he became convinced that his recent trip to Europe had been for him a journey of deep personal meditation, and that under the gaze of Italian primitives in his Florentine villa he had discovered what emerged as the famous Taylor Formula, with a capital F. The Taylor Formula is what the average high-school boy calls union recognition. John Lewis valiantly helped to build up the myth of Mr. Taylor's industrial statesmanship; it was a cheap price to pay. The House of Morgan kept out of the picture. And there was even a suggestion, made on whose authority no one knows, that the Ambassadorship to the Court of St. James's might come Mr. Taylor's way.

Accordingly, on March 1, 1937, Messrs. Taylor and Lewis were able to announce that United States Steel had recognized the Association of Iron, Tin, and Steel Workers of North America. Benjamin Fairless, president of United States Steel, learned about it for the first time on Sunday, the day before. On Monday Mr. Fairless began cleaning out all the stooges and spies from his various plants, put away the tear gas and machine guns, and started negotiations with Phil Murray and the other leaders of the S. W. O. C. On March 2 the agreement was signed. The corporation recognized the union as the sole bargaining agency for its workers. It raised wages, as of March 16, 10 per cent, with necessary differentials. It established the eight-hour day, a forty-hour week, and time-and-a-half for overtime. It laid the foundation for the machinery of bargaining. Within two months some 260 lesser steel companies followed in the wake of Big Steel, including the large independent Jones and Laughlin. Seventy-five per cent of the industry is now organized. Some 450,000 workers are in the union. And for the time being many of the Big Steel executives are cooperating with the union in rationalizing the industry.

"You must talk to Edgar Lewis, president of Jones and Laughlin," my old friend Clint Golden insisted. Mr. Lewis is one of those paragon steel executives who want to produce steel in a state of industrial peace. Unfortunately Mr. Lewis was out of town, and so I talked with Mr. Mossman, for many years the publicity director of Jones and Laughlin and an uncle of Alf Landon. Mr. Mossman's attitude toward the Graces and Girdlers makes him sound very much like a union official. Jones and Laughlin is especially angry at Tom Girdler, for the Republic Steel Corporation tried to swallow up Jones and Laughlin last year. Girdler was superintendent and president of Jones and Laughlin for sixteen years, and when he left the company to join Republic Steel he knew all about Jones and Laughlin. Senator Joseph Guffey was correct in imputing the use of this knowledge to Tom Girdler, who feels that John Lewis is too "irresponsible" to live up to his contracts. Jones and Laughlin had developed an enormous business in making caps and stoppers for beer and soft-drink bottles. These caps are made, through a secret process, of soft metal for the Crown Cork and Seal Company. Today the Republic Steel Corporation does a lot of this business. It is this sort of cutthroat competition which divides the executive officers of Big and Little Steel. The interpenetrating financial powers behind the steel industry speak much more softly of each other.

LITTLE STEEL

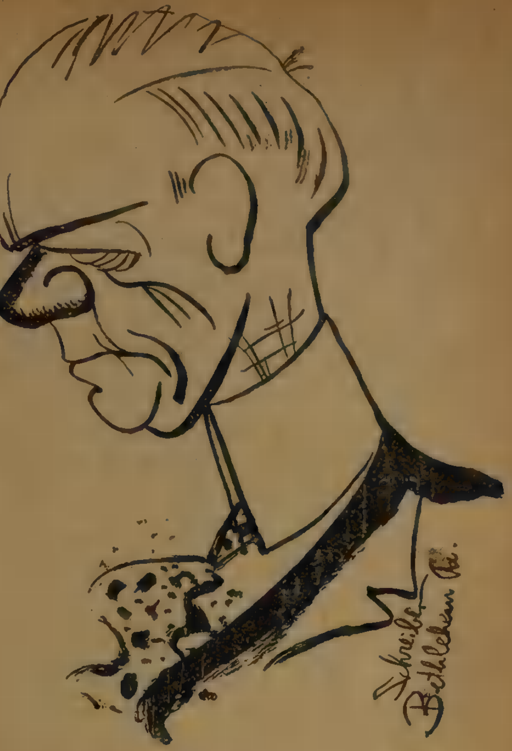
In the middle of May the S. W. O. C. decided to tackle the four large independents in steel: Bethlehem, Republic, Youngstown Sheet and Tube, and Inland Steel. The union did not dare strike Weir's National Steel Corporation for fear of a wholesale massacre. Weirton is literally a little fascist principality, patrolled by notorious killers who keep the plants in a state of terror. The S. W. O. C. has sent a complete dossier on Weirton to the La Follette committee. Without a national exposé of the underworld at Weirton the place is too dangerous to ask the men to strike for their rights.

From the very first Little Steel in weasel language refused to recognize organized labor, obviously defying the Wagner Act. And there can be little doubt that the independents were permitted by the large financial interests, who dominate American big industry, to test the strength of the C. I. O. The Youngstown Sheet and Tube and Inland Steel were not enthusiastic, and in the beginning were tempted to follow Big Steel in recognizing the union. But they were brought into line. Eugene Grace and Tom Girdler, on the other hand, are ideal men for the task of strikebreaking. Each combines the big industrialist and the congenital small-time vigilante in one and the same person. Grace is quiet and shrewd, a black reactionary. He achieved a national notoriety by paying himself almost $4,000,000 in salary and "bonuses" during the worst years of the depression. He is the General Franco of Little Steel, busily engaged in whipping up big industry to support a national vigilante movement. Tom Girdler is his chief of staff. Girdler is an open fascist, to whom Roosevelt, Miss Perkins, John Lewis are "Communists." He poses as an impulsive, plain-spoken, colorful, rough personality. But his colorfulness rests entirely on an unpicturesquely foul vocabulary. He is indeed plenty tough.

On May 26 about 76,500 workers were called out on strike on a steel front which starts at Chicago, swings along the lake front to Indiana Harbor, Cleveland, and Buffalo, and down through the Mahoning Valley from Warren to Youngstown. On June 11 some 13,500 additional workers were called out of the Cambria plant of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation in Johnstown. These workers were called out in a sympathetic strike with some 350 trainmen on the Conemaugh and Blacklick Railroad, which is the transportation unit of the Cambria. This sympathetic strike was a rather senseless stratagem, for a strike on a small intra-plant freight service can be easily broken with 100 scabs. And so it was.

As one looks back on the strike in Little Steel one is almost tempted to regret the easy victory of the S. W. O. C. over Big Steel. Though as yet not officially called off, the strike is lost. To deny it is plain silly. The strike has been lost for various reasons: the successful organization of the vigilante spirit; the corruption of the local authorities and the clever use of "incomplete" martial law; the incredible gall of Governor Davey's bold use of the National Guard in Ohio as a strikebreaking agency; the comparative isolation of the steel communities. But the strike has been lost mainly because it was called on too far-flung a front, without adequate preparation, and because it was conducted by people who have had no experience in steel.

Much of the enthusiasm of the S. W. O. C., which precipitated the strike prematurely, was infectiously derived from the brilliant campaigns in the rubber and automobile industries. Unfortunately the situation in steel is very different. For one thing, in the highly automatic belt-line industries the sit-down is an immediate and paralyzing weapon, whatever its dangers may be to an established union. Also, both in rubber and automobiles the rank and file is young, enthusiastic, and militant. Thousands of them are hillbillies, many of whom only recently were in the Klan and even the Black Legion.



Schreiber Bethlehem Pa.

Eugene Grace

But once their eyes were opened and they joined the union, they gave it the same militant allegiance they had formerly given to some know-nothing movement. Above all, during the last two years they had developed their own leaders, right from the belt line. The experience of these leaders is not wide or rich or deep. But it is relevant, immediate, and fearless.

The steel workers, on the other hand, never had a chance to develop leaders out of their struggles. In the Pittsburgh district, the heart of Big Steel, the S. W. O. C. was very successful in its organization work, partly because in 1936 the New Deal politicians were still strongly "for labor," partly because in the old Homestead area there is a great tradition of crucified labor. But in the fastnesses of Little Steel—in Johnstown, Youngstown, Massillon, Warren, Niles, Canton, in East and South Chicago, in Indiana Harbor—there is no tradition of militant labor. And the New Deal governors have become wary of "public reaction" against the C. I. O., whipped up by the big press and small-town Babbittry. The Little Steel communities are isolated, backward, dependent entirely on busy mills.

In Johnstown, for instance, most of the workers have worked for the Cambria for years; the turnover is small. Many of them own their homes, such as they are, and the mortgages are held by the local bankers. They have bought things on the instalment plan. Their families have been on starvation rations during the depression. And the women especially are not anxious for the men to strike. The worker in these Little Steel towns is half lower middle class, half labor. And under the pressure of vigilantism and the prospect of a long-drawn-out fight, the petty bourgeois in him is apt to win out—unless he and his wife have been thoroughly educated and organized by the union. And this has not been done. Newspapermen who were sympathetic to labor and knew the situation well told me that the majority of the workers in Johnstown would have voted at any time to join the C. I. O. and would also have voted against a strike. In short, the vigilante terror and the violence of the authorities were not entirely responsible for the "back-to-work" movement. A good deal of it was authentic. When in the course of three weeks 8,000 men out of 13,000 return to work it is foolish and insulting to call them all scabs. They return either because the strike is broken or because they have been prematurely called out, because they have not been sufficiently well organized. In my opinion the second is mainly what happened in Little Steel.

The weekly pay roll of the steel workers in Johnstown varies from $400,000 to $500,000; practically all of it is spent among the local merchants. In such a community, unless the working class in it has a long proletarian background, as in the mining industry, the business elements are always potentially vigilante. Every merchant is ready to join a citizens committee. The church is incredibly backward, the civil authorities are invariably corrupt, the newspapers are both amenable and reactionary, for all community life is a reflection of company tactics. The most loud-mouthed fascist in Johnstown is the Reverend John H. Stanton. The mayor is Daniel J. Shields, a former federal convict and large-scale bootlegger. The secretary of the Chamber of Commerce and of the Citizens Committee, Lawrence W. Campbell, is openly a company man.

Practically the same situation obtains in all the Little Steel towns. In Youngstown one of the leading politicians is Roy Thomas. He is a former district attorney of Mahoning County who left office some time ago under a cloud. He was called back by the Youngstown Sheet and Tube to be the attorney and leader of the "employees' representation" plan, which the company "recognized." "Give me 200 good, tough, armed men and I'll clean up them sons of bitches on the picket line in no time," he told me. Thomas and a bunch of gunmen, whom Sheriff Ralph Elser permitted the company to import, are responsible for a riot in which two workers were killed. The sheriffs and police chiefs in Warren, Canton, Massillon are all notoriously pro-company. In Massillon, a Republic Steel town, two workers were killed and one mortally wounded. The chief of police testified that he "deputized" company gunmen and accepted sawed-off shotguns, tear-gas guns, shells, and other munitions from Republic Steel.

All this murder and violence was made possible because the local authorities, guided by the vigilante forces and egged on by the companies, found a new way to misuse the state authorities. Both in Pennsylvania and in Ohio the National Guards were called out soon after the strikes began. The troops were to maintain the status quo—that is, to keep plants open or shut as they found them when they moved in. But soon Governor Earle and Governor Davey discovered that the right to work is no less "sacred" than the right to strike. The closed plants were allowed to open, and the state police and troops were assigned only to the immediate vicinity of the plants; otherwise they "assisted" the local authorities, who interpreted the civil rights of the strikers to suit themselves and used the state police power to help them break the strikes. Governor Earle had really intended to use the state motor police for neutral patrolling purposes. But his representative, Captain William Clark, played in with the Bethlehem Steel and the local authorities, and actually helped frame two union men on a charge of trying to dynamite the Conemaugh and Blacklick Railroad. Governor Davey of Ohio simply used the National Guard to break the strike.

In such isolated and terrorized communities an inexperienced, backward, and confused working class can be organized only through a thorough and patient process, by organizers who know the industry, the psychology of the workers, the whole social lay of the land. Unfortunately the easy victory over Big Steel and the overenthusiastic reports of the organizers, who seemed to see double all union activities, misled the top leadership of the S. W. O. C. This top leadership—Phil Murray, Van Bittner, Clint Golden, John Lewis himself—are extremely able men. But they are also desperately busy men. The incoming reports were optimistic. Little Steel was losing business. Big Steel was cooperating beautifully; and in its wake small firms were signing up right and left. And so the top leaders left the job of running Little Steel to the secondary tier of leaders, most of them officials in the United Mine Workers. In Johnstown the man in charge of the strike is James Mark, president of District 2 of the U. M. W. In Cleveland the two leaders are Bozo Damich and Lee Hall, both Ohio miners. In the Youngstown district, which includes most of the lesser steel towns, the leader is John Mayo, an Illinois miner. Most of their assistants are also miners. In the Chicago area the two most influential organizers under Van Bittner were Jack Russek and Joe Weber. These two gentlemen are political factionalists who were hell bent on a strike, reporting wonders from the field and seeing nothing but victory ahead.

The American miner is the most proletarian of all American workers. He has an old tradition of unionism. The union is his whole social life. He does not need to be educated to stick in a strike. The secondary leaders in the United Mine Workers had not had to organize anybody these last twenty years in Pennsylvania or Ohio or Illinois. For the moment a mine is struck everybody quits, and that's that. Mark and Damich and Hall and Mayo have had a great deal of experience in adjusting grievances and signing local agreements. They have had none in coping with the situation they found in steel.

I came into Johnstown on July 2. By that time over 8,000 workers had gone back to work. The atmosphere in the town was like that of a concentration camp. I went to see Mark. He is a man of sixty, quiet, kindly, fearless, honest, and obviously used to running things on a shoestring. He had no secretary, no publicity man, not even a typewriter.

"We have things pretty well under control," he said. "Like hell you have," I answered. And then we talked. The strike was obviously petering out, though Jim refused to admit it even to himself. Practically the same situation existed in Youngstown, Canton, Warren, Niles, Cleveland. The leaders knew that the plants were operating at half or three-quarters normal capacity.

Early in July the S. W. O. C. called off the strikes at the Youngstown Sheet and Tube in East Chicago and at the Inland Steel Company in Indiana Harbor. The union claimed victories in both cases. In the case of the Inland Steel Company there might be some highly theoretical claim of a far-fetched victory. Both the union and the company wrote letters to Governor Townsend of Indiana, leaving the whole issue to the National Labor Relations Board. In the case of the Youngstown Sheet and Tube the union was clearly defeated. The company sent a memorandum to the governor, repeating its willingness to recognize "collective bargaining." But it insisted that this memorandum must by no means be interpreted as a possible recognition of the S. W. O. C. And when the workers filed back the plants of the company were plastered with signs to the effect that "we signed no agreement with anybody."

The position of the C. I. O. in steel is far from desperate. After all, 75 per cent of the industry is organized. Over 450,000 workers are enthusiastic, dues-paying members. The union in steel is here to stay. The loss of the strike in Little Steel may be considered as a tragic but not fatal overhead expense in necessary experience. But the lessons of the strike must be taken to heart. The C. I. O. must realize that Little Steel is a hard nut to crack. Each of the great independent steel companies must be tackled separately and the ground must be laid carefully. The top leadership must devote a great deal of personal attention to the job. It must ferret out ability and leadership among the steel workers. Miners cannot organize steel. Political factionalism must be rooted out mercilessly. Patience is essential. Money must be spent. An adequate publicity machinery must be provided to expose corrupt local authorities, the vigilante movement, the gangster tactics of the companies. And the leadership must not kid itself with imaginary "victories."

Another year of hard and intelligent organization under the direction of people who know steel and its workers, and whose only interest is the union, and Little Steel may yet squeal for peace.

[This is the first of three articles by Mr. Stolberg. The second will appear in an early issue.]

Roosevelt's Defeat—the Inside Story

BY ROBERT S. ALLEN

Washington, July 25

JOHN NANCE GARNER finished Charles Evans Hughes's job of garroting the Supreme Court bill. The lofty, bearded Chief Justice led the measure to the gallows with consummate guile and finesse. The ruddy little Vice-President struck the death blow. Hughes betrayed it "to preserve the sanctity of the courts"; Garner killed it "to save the Democratic Party." Both are greatly pleased with their handiwork, although privately neither is sure he has laid the ghost of the issue.

There is good reason for their uneasiness. One reactionary decision by the court next term, and Mr. Roosevelt will be at the throat of the Chief Justice. And although the President took his licking calmly and pleasantly, the victorious rebel Democrats have no illusions about the depth of his smile. They know, as he knows, that there can be no lasting peace between them; that the bitter personalities they hurled in the heat of the fierce struggle have left burning scars, and that if the opportunity arises he will retaliate. Don't be fooled by the newspaper stories that Mr. Roosevelt is taking his defeat philosophically. He is putting on a good show of affability, but he hasn't forgotten or forgiven a thing.

Garner's role as executioner was accidental. The death of Senator Joseph T. Robinson brought him back into the capital picture and gave him the opportunity to finish Hughes's work. The extent and effectiveness of the Chief Justice's blows against the court legislation generally are little realized. Most of the press during the protracted struggle signally failed to grasp his real significance in the opposition's fight. Hughes was not the only factor in Roosevelt's defeat. There were a number of others: the President's overconfidence in the opening stages of the fight, his lack of loyal, aggressive leaders, stealthy axing by the Catholic church, the unexpected astuteness of the Republicans and the Liberty League in keeping in the background, thus depriving the White House of the chance to raise the party cry, personal ambition and pique on the part of Senator Burton K. Wheeler and other leaders, and the death of Robinson. But towering over them all was Hughes's wily sapping that destroyed the political underpinnings of the President's plan.

Chronologically, the inside story of the court fight falls into three phases. The first was Hughes's deft attack. Had the court invalidated one Administration measure last term, nothing could have prevented the President from winning. Hughes realized this with Machiavellian clarity—and, what was equally important, made Justice Owen J. Roberts realize it. Without Roberts's cooperation he would have been helpless, as Van Devanter, Sutherland, McReynolds, and Butler were willing to bring the court down about their heads rather than yield one point to the hated New Deal. But with Roberts's aid, Hughes, snuggling up to the three liberal justices, in a series of 5-to-4 decisions completely reversed the court's ruthless hatcheting of the AAA, the Guffey Coal Act, the NRA, and the New York minimum-wage decrees. It was a miraculous acrobatic feat, but not too miraculous for the agile Chief Justice.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

The second phase of the fight was the abandonment of the original six-judge bill and the substitution of the Logan compromise. One of the mysteries of Washington is why the President, after the smashing Wagner Act validation, did not drop his measure and propose a compromise. Such an offer in May would have certainly won over a number of the oppositionists. It is known that some of them, looking for a face-saving compromise, expressed willingness to support a two-judge bill. It is also known that some of the White House advisers urged such a proposition. What is not known is that the President was willing to accept it, but was stopped from doing so by the personal ambitions of Robinson. After the Wagner Act decision, Roosevelt realized fully that Hughes had outflanked him and was ready to give ground in order to gain at least a partial victory. But Robinson flatly refused to go along, and the President didn't dare go over the Arkansan's head. He was the only major Congressional leader who was making any show of supporting the White House on the issue, and the President would not risk offending him by overriding his objections.

The reason Robinson refused the two-judge compromise was this: In order to "sugar it up" the plan provided that all future appointees had to be appointed from circuits not represented on the present court. In other words, thereafter the Supreme Court would be made up of a justice from each of the eleven judicial circuits. Now it so happens, by some strange quirk of gerrymandering, that Arkansas is in the same (eighth) circuit as Minnesota. And Minnesota is represented on the court by that incorrigible defender of railroads, reaction, and monopoly, Justice Pierce Butler. That meant that Robinson would have no chance of realizing his ardent ambition to be a Supreme Court justice until Butler retired or died. Being sixty-five years old, Robinson knew that the adoption of the plan would slam the door on his hopes. So he refused to go along, the proposal had to be junked, and the President lost his great chance to make Mr. Hughes at least partially unhappy.

After the collapse of the two-judge scheme, Robinson went into a sulk. The Administration's position became increasingly embarrassing, but he made no move and prevented the White House from doing anything. The Van Devanter resignation, engineered by Hughes, Senator Borah and Hatton Sumners, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, gave Robinson the hope of gaining his long-desired goal. To close Senate pals of the Arkansan the President made it clear that he would name Robinson to the court only in a group of other appointees. That is, because of Robinson's advanced age and conservatism, the President was reluctant to elevate him alone, but in a panel of several other younger and more liberal men he would have done so. This information galvanized Robinson into action, and after several weeks of hard work he negotiated the Logan compromise, under which the President would have secured two new justices by January, 1938, and Robinson presumably would have been given the Van Devanter seat. Had he lived, the chances are that Robinson could have put through the Logan bill. At the very most the opposition did not have more than forty-two votes against it, and several of these were doubtful. It would have been a long and vicious fight, but the advantage was definitely with the Administration.

The third and concluding phase of the struggle was Robinson's sudden death, Garner's return to Washington on the funeral train, and his whirlwind double-crossing of the President in order "to save the party."

When Garner conferred with Roosevelt he told him that from his conversations on the train he was convinced there was no hope of putting through the Logan compromise. He also warned that the party was on the verge of a disastrous split and urged that, as a fresh hand in the situation, he be allowed to see what he could do to work out a peaceful solution. Senators Sherman Minton of Indiana and Lewis Schwellenbach of Washington, first-term New Deal militants, told the President they were convinced the Logan bill was not licked and counseled a finish fight. Their "pep talk" inspired the "My dear Alben" letter to Senator Barkley, declaring that the "fight must go on." But Garner was not disturbed by the announcement. He summoned Wheeler and, in effect, told him to "write your own ticket." Then, to hamstring the bitter-end Administrationites and to force Roosevelt to accept his betrayal as a fait accompli, Garner, with the connivance of Senator Clyde Herring of Iowa, engineered a meeting of seven Democratic fence-sitters who announced they would join with the opposition in shelving the Logan bill by sending it back to committee unless the Administration agreed to a compromise abandoning all provisions affecting the Supreme Court and lower courts—in other words, complete capitulation.

This desertion was the death blow. Next morning at the extraordinary session of the Senate Judiciary Committee, where the armistice terms were formally arranged, Garner made his pathetic plea for party harmony and good will. "I want to do everything I can to help my country," he explained, "but I also want to preserve the Democratic Party. The President is licked, and he knows it. Don't bloody his nose. Let's get together and be brothers again. I told Burt Wheeler that his side can 'write their own ticket.' I meant that; the Administration means it."

"What about political reprisals?" demanded Pat McCarran, beefy reactionary from Nevada who bolted to the opposition when he was refused a United States marshalship he demanded and who is facing almost certain defeat next year.

"There will be none of that," Garner assured him soothingly, "I can promise you that I will do everything I can to prevent it."

"I am sure," observed Borah with a smile, "that we Republicans will be glad to help you."

Then the camera men were admitted and all had their pictures taken amid smiles and handclasps. But in the inner White House circle there were no smiles and no hand-shaking. One of the President's intimates summed up the feeling there with the bitter remark: "Garner was told to compromise, and he did so by surrendering."

Zionism in Extremis

BY HERBERT SOLOW

THE idea of creating in Palestine a Jewish homeland extensive enough to solve the material problems of European Jewry or culturally rich enough to solve its psychological problems has long since proved to be utopian. With the publication of the new report of the British Royal Commission, Zionism after forty years' effort finds itself in extremis.

During the World War England, through such agents as Sir Henry McMahon and Colonel T. E. Lawrence, promised to create an independent Arab kingdom under the Sharif of Mecca in return for Arab aid against the Turk. At the same time, through Balfour, England promised to set up in Palestine a Jewish national home in return for Jewish sympathy and aid. England got what it sought, but, as it now admits, according to the New York Times, its promises were irreconcilable. The resulting compromise was the mandate for Palestine, which satisfied neither Jews nor Arabs. The prolonged struggle which followed proclamation of the mandate has cost hundreds of lives and boosted to $10,000,000 the annual police appropriation for umpiring the slaughter.

The Churchill White Paper in 1922 and Passfield's in 1930 eliminated Transjordan and otherwise narrowed the idea of a national home. The present proposal is to partition Palestine itself: Jerusalem is to be a permanent British mandate; the Emir of Transjordan is to get the lion's share of Palestine; the Jewish national home is to be restricted to the coastal region. Minor modifications are being discussed, but the British Cabinet has wide press and Parliamentary backing for the main lines of the partition scheme. Plainly that scheme is imperial: whoever dominates Palestine can easily move troops and supplies in the eastern Mediterranean, dominate the Suez, tap Iraq oil at Haifa, exploit rich markets. England will continue to hold not only Jerusalem but a corridor to the sea, will retain military, air, and naval bases, and will reserve to itself "ultimate responsibility" for maintaining public order. Partition, including abrogation of the present mandate, guarantees that the sun will still rise on Palestine without setting on the British Empire. Parliament has postponed final action but the delay is admittedly a finesse. After Geneva has played its hand, the British government, with an overwhelming majority in the Commons, will produce its trump. The outcome is quite certain.

To some extent recently, especially since the successful invasion of Ethiopia, England's Palestine policy has been increasingly pro-Arab to head off Italian efforts to organize anti-British sentiment. Mussolini, hunting a base in Spain, also covets one on the eastern littoral of Mare Nostrum. His pledge to Anthony Eden on July 7 not to stir up Arab Anglophobia inspires little confidence among informed observers. It means hardly more than that Jamal al Yussef, the Duce's anti-Zionist agitator who was recently deported from Palestine, will delay his debut as special lecturer for the Fascist radio station at Bari.

The Duce's basic plan is unaltered. He has not yet visited Jerusalem, as did Wilhelm II, but it is obvious that he seeks the status the Kaiser sought in the Near East as Defender of the (Moslem) Faith. Free Italian mission schools for Palestine Arabs have been supplemented by cheap tours to Italy, scholarships for Arabs expelled from Kadoorie School for anti-Jewish rioting, juicy advertising contracts for petty Arab papers in Palestine. Italian agents are busy in all the Near Eastern states, the Bari radio station continues its Arabic hour on the delights of Moslem life in the Prophet Mussolini's empire, and Zionism is proscribed in Italy.

In Mussolini's Near East ambitions is to be found the real meaning of anti-Jewish propaganda in Italy today. True, some third-string Fascist papers have published racial attacks against the Jews, and two Tripolitan Jewish merchants were recently flogged in public for resisting the abolition of their traditional Saturday closing rights. True, social and academic anti-Semitism, such as is known even in the United States, exists in Italy. But the Duce and the King still exchange visits with Jewish communal officials. Ambassador Fulvio Suvich remains in Washington, Senator Isaiah Levy remains wherever Italian senators remain, General Liuzzi remains on the Spanish front, and other Italians of Jewish blood have recently been given important posts.

The object of Mussolini's attack is Zionism. Under the heading Rome or Italy, Tribuna tells the Jews to drop Zionism or leave. Oreste Gregorio, in Mussolini's Popolo, denounces Zionism as the concept of "the English Jew, Balfour," and "how can one claiming to be an Italian and a Fascist support a movement opposed by Arabs and Moslems, in view of the well-known pro-Islamic policies of the Fascist regime?" Again, Gregorio shows readiness to believe that Italian Jews have not "the same mentality" as wicked foreigners, but insists they "acknowledge themselves the outspoken enemies of international Judaism, which is Masonic, subversive, and always anti-Fascist, or renounce Italian citizenship and residence." Stampa complains about Anglo-Franco-American Jewish missions to the Falashas (Ethiopian Jews) out of fear that Zionism may be implanted among them. One Italian writer declares that "Zionism tends to establish in the Mediterranean another permanent zone of British expansion," and on May 25 Mussolini's own organ denounced Zionism as "definitely opposed to Italy's Mediterranean spirit."

Hitler commands Jewish writers to work in Hebrew;

Mussolini has compelled Tripolitan Jewish clubs to abandon Hebrew for Italian names. Hitler drives Jews abroad, Mussolini orders them to remain good Italians. Hitler tolerates, the Duce fights, Zionist activity. While Hitler tells the Jews to go or die, Mussolini brusquely offers the 50,000 culturally assimilated Italian Jews the classic alternative of liberal nationalism: Rome or Zion. The proscription of Zionism, of course, is carefully reported to Mecca by the Duce's agents.

Of course, to anybody who would rather have his right hand wither and lose its cunning than forget Jerusalem, all these words from London and Rome are cold comfort. Nor are Arab reactions to the partition scheme of a sort to reassure informed Zionists. Judged superficially, the reaction seems to be opposition. Haj Amin al Husseini, chairman of the Palestine Arab High Committee and Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, has denounced partition and, with the support of his Moslem clergy, threatened to excommunicate any Arab who accepts it. It should be noted that Haj Amin, who is a highly paid British official, thus not only defends himself against the loss of prestige involved in separating Jerusalem from the Arab states but also provides the government which employs him with a counterweight against Jewish criticism.

The anti-partition statements of Chisba-Difa al Watani (Palestine National Defense Party), the Sheik of Koweit, and Iraq's premier are characterized by the Times correspondent as "a big bluff." These gentlemen ultimately want a partition which leaves Zionism in the sea. But if the Emir of Transjordan decides to take the cash and let the credit go, they will "bow to the inevitable."

The fact is that the decisive word must come from the outstanding Arab chief, Ibn Saud, king of the Wahibis. Ruler of Mecca and leading candidate for a pan-Arab throne, Ibn Saud waits, builds his army, lets all bidders come to him. And they come. Recently the Grand Mufti went to Mecca, where Ibn Saud cold-shouldered him. In reply to the Grand Mufti's telegraphed appeal against the proposed division, Ibn Saud said not a word about partition. With Ibn Saud's approval, the Emir of Transjordan will accept the share partition now offers him. Tomorrow's protests against leaving Zionism even a shred of what it once hoped for will be no bluff but the basis for a united Arab sovereigns' front.

Talk about "independent" status for the new Jewish area does not change the fact that Zionism is undergoing the most extensive surgical operation in its rich clinical experience. No doubt the World Zionist Congress next month will be philosophical and find that the patient is doing as well as can be expected. What else can the congress say? As one Jerusalem Zionist puts it: "Though the government has failed us, we dare not court irretrievable failure by failing the British. We are the allegorical earthen pot; woe to the pot if it fall on the stone; woe to it if the stone fall upon the pot." Zionism is entering its greatest historic crisis since it secured the Balfour Declaration in 1916. The movement which became a real political factor in one war is being ground to pieces in the scramble of the powers preparing for the next.

The crisis is variously reflected in the national segments of the Zionist movement. Already the Italian Zionists are surrendering as those of Germany did when England put an Allied uniform on the movement. Milan Jewish spokesmen, while defending Palestinian charity, have attacked political and cultural Zionism. The Florentines have renounced a communal election slate. Representatives of fourteen communities have adopted a joint anti-Zionist resolution. Italian Jewish leaders support the Fascist remaking of Ethiopia and exclude Zionism. Carlo Viterbo, who recently surveyed the Falashas for Italian Jewry, reported directly to the colonial minister. The Italian Zionists' answer to the Duce is "Rome!" Perhaps the Duce will finally reward them with the project that Professor Corrado Gini tried to peddle to American Jews when he came to this country to get a degree at Harvard's tercentenary: a new "Zionist" movement, with the Isle of Rhodes, whose Greek population the Duce has been unable to break thoroughly to his yoke, as the scene of their labors.

Polish Zionists, become desperate, are to a great extent supporting Captain Vladimir Jabotinsky, Zionist "revisionist," who stands for preparing the forcible seizure of all Palestine and Transjordan, to create a Jewish state with a Jewish population. Warsaw revisionists, who are something of a "shirt" movement, recently demonstrated aggressively before the British Embassy. The Polish police, who as a rule crack down on Jews for sneezing out of turn, tolerated the demonstration. The Warsaw government press has denounced partition, since it is pushing mass emigration of Jews. In Palestine Jabotinsky also has followers, and in the reduced area may gain at the expense of old-line leaders who have led the Zionist movement from one operating table to another.

British Empire Zionists are beefing about partition, but they will forget their resentment against the Royal Commission. It is royal, after all, and Viscounts Samuel and Swaythling, Lords Melchett and Reading are vassals of George VI as well as Jews. Moreover, there is still a virgin luster on 226 Coronation medals gratefully accepted by deserving Jewish imperial servants in Palestine. As for American Zionists, they always denounce the latest "astounding" treachery of Albion—and soon indorse its terms.

In short, when partition is put before the League's commission for approval, there may appear delegations of protesting Arabs and Jews, but the real battle will come after partition, and it will be initiated by the Arab leaders in order to finish the liquidation of the Jewish national home.

Problems remain not only for the 400,000 Palestine Jews but for Jewish masses the world round and for the Arab peasants, exploited both by clerically oriented feudal landlords and the rising nationalist Arab bourgeoisie. Today all these problems are one in Palestine, and can be solved only with reference to general international politics. The question presses: Can there be any human, stable solution under a social order in which Italian fascism and British democracy are equally eager to harness Arab and Jewish national aspirations to their imperial chariots?

Will Europe Go to War?

BY LUDWIG LORE

II

IT has been reliably estimated that the World War cost Germany more than 80,000,000,000 marks. What the country produced at home was paid for mainly with treasury notes covered by war loans which lost whatever value they had in the ensuing inflation period. What was bought abroad usually had to be paid for in cash. A few figures will show what enormous sums went out of the Reich to pay for its imports during the war years. There was an unfavorable trade balance for 1915 of 4,000,000,000 marks; for 1916 of 4,600,000,000 marks; for 1917 of 3,400,000,000 marks—altogether, for the duration of the war, about 16,000,000,000 marks. How was this deficit covered?

Two decades of prosperity, interrupted briefly by a few short crises, had made Germany one of the richest countries of Europe. At the end of 1918 the Reichsbank still had a gold reserve of 2,250,000,000 marks. In addition it had foreign securities variously estimated at or near 30,000,000,000 marks. A part of this was confiscated by the Allies, but there remained enough for one of the most audacious maneuvers of modern times. The war had not seriously affected the solidity of Germany's foreign credit. Its domestic securities were sold all over the world. German paper money found a ready market, thanks to the fiction that it was due for a rapid rise. Hundreds of thousands of patriotic German-Americans bought heavily of Fatherland currency and lived to see the day when they could paper their walls with those worthless lithographs.

A large part of Germany's post-war imports was paid for by the sellers themselves, for the money they received was valueless before it reached their hands. During the war the Reich carried on a vigorous "buy in Germany and keep our money at home" campaign. Where this policy was really put into practice, it meant overwork and hunger for the population at home. It was not applied to raw material for ammunition and war supplies. To get these the Reich mortgaged its shirt without the slightest compunction.

Today the situation is incomparably worse. Before 1914 the foreign market had only a hazy idea of the Reich's financial status. Today everybody knows that the Reich government is deliberately spreading a cloak of darkness over its financial condition because it does not dare reveal the full extent of its bankruptcy. Germany, which was once a creditor, is now a debtor nation. Its gold reserve, including that which is still in the hands of private individuals, does not exceed 300,000,000 marks. Dr. Hans Priester, in an investigation of Germany's foreign investments, estimates that just before Hitler came to power Germany owned foreign securities to the amount of 1,500,000,000. These securities have since depreciated in value; what remains has been liquidated by the Third Reich in exchange for Reich bonds; the securities themselves the government used to finance the buying of raw material abroad.

At present, Priester estimates, Germany's reserve of foreign exchange and securities is somewhere between 300,000,000 and 400,000,000 marks. It may even be slightly higher. German credit abroad is, in other words, practically non-existent. In case of war Germany would have to pay cash for everything it needs. Washington has made this quite clear where the American market is concerned. Yet, in spite of the Four Year Plan and autarchy, Germany's needs would greatly exceed the requirements of the World War.

From every point of view Germany is worse off than any other power, with the possible exception of her Italian ally. Military cooperation from Italy may or may not be valuable. In any war which the two fascist nations would fight against the rest of the world Germany would have to bear the brunt of the financial burden.

It is noteworthy that of all the countries which went through the World War, Germany and perhaps the Soviet Union have been the only ones to learn from their experiences. Perhaps it is true that only unsuccessful generals learn from the experiences of the past. Certainly the energy and perseverance with which the German government and its military leaders have gone about correcting past errors would be admirable if it were in a better cause. The first and most important of these lessons is the necessity of economic as well as military preparedness. All Germany lives and breathes "war economy." Social production, industrial planning and organization, the systematic subordination of the individual, of science in all its phases, of education, and of propaganda to the social and economic needs of the community; its foreign policy, and its preparedness program—that is war economy as the Third Reich understands it. There is—to mention only one of many—a Reich Bureau for Industrial Redistribution (Reichsstelle für Raumordnung) to which has been intrusted the task of adjusting and transferring industrial units into those localities in which they will best serve the nation's defense apparatus. The idea originated in Great Britain, but nothing was ever done about it there. Germany, on the other hand, is building up a new economy, step by step, against the background of its war needs. In the legend-filled forests of mountainous central Germany

—Futuro

(Harz, Holstein, Thüringen, etc.) the wanderer comes upon closely guarded areas of which not even the local population knows the exact purpose. The men who work in these areas are brought from other parts of the Reich and live in strict seclusion. A dense secrecy surrounds all these operations, but everybody realizes that another fortress, another flying field, another stronghold, or another ammunition or airplane factory is being built for the use of the German army in case of war.

What this process of reconstruction has cost the German government we cannot even estimate. Fantastic sums have been spent on the strategic redistribution of industries, on subsidies for Ersatz experiments and the creation of Ersatz industries, on the building of war-material and ammunition factories, on barracks, airdromes, automobile highways, etc. The figures are carefully concealed and one can only guess at their size from the evidence that meets the eye. In his book "Das deutsche Wirtschaftswunder" (Germany's Miracle Economy) Dr. Priester estimates that the government of the Third Reich spent some 30,000,000,000 marks over and above its normal budget between the beginning of 1933 and the end of 1936. These 30,000,000,000 marks went almost exclusively for armaments and related purposes. Other German and foreign experts place Germany's preparedness budget at double that figure. Nothing before or after the World War can compare with this criminal drain on the nation's financial resources. It is comparable only to the terrific sacrifice of the World War years.

HUMAN MATERIAL

I have already spoken of the importance of material in a new world war, but the decisive factor will still be the human quantity. In the last war the Central Powers fought against overwhelming odds, yet they held out against their adversaries for four long years and fought numerous successful battles. The source of this extraordinary strength was the high state of Germany's cultural development. German tradition always had it that it was the "German schoolmaster" who won the victory over Austria in 1866. In 1914-1916 it was Germany's industrial worker who went from victory to victory. It was the German industrial worker who in 1918 swept away the old Junker rule. It was the realization that Germany's strength lay in her people that impelled the Allies in Versailles to limit the German army. The General Staff made a virtue of necessity and set about organizing a small but highly efficient army of professional soldiers. Recent experiences have proved the fallacy, however, of the conception that a small, highly trained, and highly mechanized army can advance into the enemy's territory with a short offensive and an immediate victory practically guaranteed.

The Nazi government was quick to draw its conclusions and translate them into practice. It denounced the arms limitation clause of the Versailles Treaty almost at once and set about preparing the nation for war. Every man in Germany knows where he will stand when war breaks out, on what day he must report for service and where, though this is merely an intensification of the old imperial army system. Every prospective soldier, old and young, is closely scrutinized for his peculiar abilities and placed where he can render most efficient service—at the front, in industry, behind the lines.

Before the greater need of the state more than one National Socialist theory has had to be discarded. Women are being brought back systematically into industrial life, after having been ousted from the factories and mills and offices of the Reich by the hundreds of thousands to make room for unemployed males. During the World War female labor in the basic war industries—mining, metal, machine building, and chemistry—rose from 195,000 in 1913 to 1,043,000 in 1918. The Nazi government is training women for the most skilled occupations in anticipation of the time when they will be needed to replace every man who can shoulder a gun.

An important problem, and one that must be prepared for by systematic organization, is the question of the nation's morale at home and at the front. The soldier will not starve and suffer for months, perhaps for years, without rebelling unless he is given an ideal he can understand. What will it be? Will he fight to defend the slave state Hitler has given him? Will he fight for conquest and expansion? For colonies? For Anschluss? Even Hitler doubts it. Instead of relying on the enthusiasm of the German people for these concrete aims, he infiltrates young and old, man, woman, and child, with that transcendental spirit of militant nationalism without which war becomes a long, dark nightmare of unmitigated horror, anguish, and deprivation. The child in school learns to carry a gun. The Hitler Youth is trained in soldiery and marksmanship. Newspapers, motion pictures, the radio—every medium for influencing public opinion is used to prepare the spirit of the German people for the coming struggle. Racial and religious mysticism is producing a nation of megalomaniacs. The spirits of Thor and Wotan walk again, lifting the young German above the drabness of a life of self-abnegation with intoxicating delusions of grandeur. Mass murder has become a religion, mass propaganda the end and aim of all cultural endeavor. The creation of the new German soul has only just begun.

What has this propaganda accomplished? At home it has won the unconditional support of a large part of the younger generation. Abroad it has injected a new element into international relations: the element of fear—fear of the coming greatness, of the conquests, of the ruthless adventurism of the Hitler regime. Fear, too, in the hearts of Germany's rulers, of the spirit they have created—a Frankenstein monster carrying arms which may at any moment turn and shake off their terrorist regime.

When Dr. Friedensburg, after investigating the question of oil and its relation to war, came to the conclusion that Germany could not possibly accumulate or procure enough oil to carry her through a major war, he proposed as the next best alternative an army on horseback in place of a motorized force. General von Seeckt had a better idea. He knew that a war on two fronts would inevitably ruin Germany's chances. Having no faith in the doctrine of self-sufficiency, he favored an alliance with Russia against Germany's Erbfeind on the west. With Russia as an ally, Germany would have access to unlimited food and raw-material supplies. In Russia, bread, oil, and iron—the three ifs on which Germany's success in any war so largely depends—could be produced in limitless quantities. In his eyes any war that Germany would fight would be a war of revenge. But the new Germany is not interested in revenge. Latter-day capitalism in the Reich is interested in expansion, in colonies, in markets, not in national honor and moral rehabilitation. The things German capitalism needs lie in the east, and war on the east means war against the Soviet Union.

With this new formulation of Germany's war aims, the difficulties she would encounter in any case become colossal. In this crisis German diplomacy appears upon the scene of action. It stretches its feelers toward the Balkan states with attractive concessions in exchange for a foothold in the European southeast, where meat and bread and the precious petroleum abound. It carries its propaganda into the Scandinavian countries in the hope of getting milk and butter and the other dairy products. The Third Reich needs to feed its population with food from Denmark; it needs iron ore from Sweden.

But diplomacy's usefulness stops on the day war is declared. When that day comes diplomatic conquests and trade relations must be backed up by military occupation. Germany would have to take possession of the whole of Scandinavia in order to beat England. Control of the Baltic Sea alone would avail her nothing, since a large part of Sweden's ore shipments goes over Norway, which, of all Scandinavian countries, would be the one most likely to stand by the British. Germany would have to push her offensive southward to the Black Sea, whether backed by Hungary alone or with the aid of a Poland and a Little Entente willing to break with France and her associates. Moscow, knowing only too well that in southeastern Europe lies the answer to Germany's crying need for oil, will do anything to keep the Little Entente intact by holding Rumania's friendship.

In short, as things are at present, any war Germany could precipitate would immediately involve all Europe, with Germany fighting for life on all fronts. Nazi leaders know this and will be cautious in their international relations in consequence. Nevertheless the fact that Germany has thus far failed to win positive allies outside of Hungary and Italy, with Poland as a possible but not a certain backer, is by no means a guaranty against war. Where there is so much powder, explosions will happen, in spite of fear and precaution. Abroad Germany's policy of bluff and terror is piling up resentments. At home the growing burden of living will ultimately lead to complications from which war may become the only escape.

[The first part of this article appeared last week.]

Who Chases Ambulances?

BY LOREN MILLER

WE wanted to stop him, but the Mexican insisted on telling us the story of his wife's injuries in an automobile accident. There was no question of liability: the driver lost control of the car and it crashed into the woman as she was standing on the sidewalk. Her injuries were severe: a broken leg, sundry bruises and abrasions, and internal injuries; doctors agreed that she would never regain normal use of the broken limb. But as lawyers we could do nothing for her; she and her husband had joined in a release of "all claims and demands" for the sum of $350. No, they hadn't consulted a lawyer beforehand. The insurance adjuster said it wasn't necessary.

That case may be extreme, but any layman can skim through the law books and find plenty of cases in which some unfortunate plaintiff has tried to set aside some such ridiculous settlement. Generally the attempt fails because the courts hold fast to the theory that a man is bound by his contracts and that if he is foolish enough to enter into a disadvantageous adjustment he must abide by the terms of the agreement. He must show fraud or duress—and necessitous circumstances do not constitute duress. That is the side of the story that is never told when insurance companies whip the public into a frenzy over the admittedly malodorous practice of ambulance-chasing.

What really happens when an automobile or traction accident occurs is that the driver or motorman notifies his insurance company as soon as he makes out the police report. The first ambulance-chasers on the job are the insurance adjusters, and they aren't there as public-spirited, impartial observers either. They're there to help their company escape liability if it can. These adjusters are hard-boiled, bright young men who know all of the legal angles. They construct a possible defense to the possible lawsuit—generally contributory negligence—and they're very keen about insinuating that possible defense into the minds of the witnesses they interview. The driver is made to understand that if the injured person wins his claim, insurance rates will go up. Add that to the very human frailty of not wanting to be in the wrong, and the driver, no matter how remorseful or how negligent he may have been, is soon convinced that he is entirely in the right.

As soon as the witnesses are disposed of, the adjuster goes to see the injured person. I know of a traction case in which the adjuster brought a twenty-five-dollar check with him after the woman had been in bed for two weeks: "You don't need a lawyer; we're willing to settle." At any rate, the adjuster takes the complainant's statement, always careful to frame his questions to help out the possible defense that is being constructed. The injured person has no objections to having the company doctor examine him? Of course not; it's just a formality. The doctor's call follows. An entire article could be written around the inability of some—most—of these doctors to find serious injuries. If the case ever comes to trial the doctor will be called as an expert, but on the stand he won't be an expert in the real sense or even an impartial scientific observe, because he's on the company's pay roll at a handsome fee, and if the company loses many large claims on his testimony he won't have a job.

Or perhaps the injured person procures an attorney before the adjuster can get to him. In that case the adjuster must not interview the client without the lawyer's consent, and most lawyers are rather wary of such interviews. They don't want to arm a possible defendant with a great deal of advance information. The adjuster has to wait for the inevitable letter from the attorney suggesting that settlement can be made out of court. Back goes the reply: "We do not admit liability but . . ." The "but" clause revolves around the fact that the company is willing to settle for a small sum if the company thinks the action is doubtful. If the client is a workingman and in necessitous circumstances he will be tempted to take the sum, however small. Perhaps he takes his lawyer's advice and files suit. Filing suit costs money, and the attorney may have to advance filing fees.

Then acute delay sets in. Clever insurance companies always take depositions where the law permits. A deposition enables them to take the plaintiff's statement under oath and learn just what he will testify to at the trial. Of course, the plaintiff may also take a deposition of the defendant, but we're talking about poor plaintiffs. After the deposition has been taken the defendant calls at the insurance company's legal offices and sees just what his opponent is going to claim. He isn't human if, after the lawyer has explained the possible defense, he doesn't cut his testimony to fit the cloth of the plaintiff's claim.

Meanwhile the insurance company is going over the plaintiff's life with a fine-tooth comb, and when the case comes to trial the company is ready, through its medical "experts," to prove that the plaintiff's injuries many not have come from the automobile accident at all. Isn't there a possibility that the plaintiff is still suffering from the bump he received when he fell off the back porch at Aunt Hattie's thirty-two years, six months, and ten days ago?

The ordinary defense in accident cases is contributory negligence, an anachronistic legal rule which holds that the plaintiff may not recover if he was guilty of the slightest degree of negligence, no matter how great the negligence of the defendant. Circumstances surrounding automobile accidents are never very clear, and the defense of contributory negligence is ordinarily very efficacious. Of course, insurance companies have plenty of ready cash for witness fees; our mythical poor plaintiff hasn't. I remember one case in which a defense witness testified that he had received twenty-five dollars for his appearance. No, he wasn't working. No, he didn't think the fee was too large. The court found for the defendant.

Perhaps, in spite of all, our client wins a judgment. The usual motion for a new trial is made. More delay for the client, badgered with doctors' bills and other expenses incurred during his period of enforced idleness. If the motion for a new trial is denied, the defense threatens to appeal. That is, it will appeal unless the plaintiff will reduce the amount of the judgment. Most hard-pressed clients fall for that one. Maybe the defense does appeal, and attorney and client settle down to a long wait, meanwhile trying desperately to get funds for appeal briefs or run the risk of doing without representation in the higher court. If judgment is reversed the client takes whatever is offered and swears off lawsuits for life.

In short, insurance companies have tremendous advantages over the injured person. They have the machinery of investigation, they have plenty of money, they have keen legal staffs, and every one of the multitudinous delays of the law is in their favor. No stigma attaches to them for the use of these devices in their own favor. That is just good business. Of course, they are mulcted in fraudulent claims; they also pay off many claims at ridiculously low figures. Which is worse for society?

Frankly, I cannot see how either the evils of ambulance-chasing or those of "good business" tactics in seeking the lowest possible settlement regardless of the merit of the case can be eliminated so long as personal-liability insurance remains a private business run for profit. The presence of millions of automobiles on city and country streets, high-speed highways, complicated traffic rules, and the like dictate a new approach to the problem. The old saw that accidents are bound to happen was never more true than today. This multiplicity of accidents breeds ambulance-chasers and insurance companies, both anxious to make a profit. As a lawyer I would like to second the proposal often made that society step in and make provision for this new emergency by constructing a new plan somewhat analogous to the workmen's compensation acts whereby impartial agencies investigate accidents, apportion blame and damages, and provide for the unfortunate victims without recourse to such strained legalisms as contributory negligence and other technical dodges. To be thoroughgoing the plan would call for the elimination of private insurance companies and in the process would eliminate ambulance-chasers. We sponsors of the plan can expect a mighty battle if we propose it seriously. I'll wager that it will produce a very effective united front of those mortal enemies, the insurance companies and the ambulance-chasers.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

IN a world which whirls and makes history as rapidly as ours I suppose I have no right to be vexed that the oncoming generation of young women is so completely uninterested in the history of the liberation of their sex in the United States during the last hundred years. They have almost all the rights and privileges anyone can ask for, so why should they care how they were achieved? If this is quite natural, I still cannot help feeling a regret, especially as I have just read the new life of the gentle and lovely Lucretia Mott, and wish more than ever that the pioneer work of such as she might be known and cherished.

Today young people will not believe that a hundred years ago it was an unheard-of piece of license and indecency for women merely to attend any public meeting in the United States, however benign the purpose and however respectable the meeting-place. Thus the mob which dragged William Lloyd Garrison through the streets of Boston on October 21, 1835, intending to hang him, was inflamed not merely by reports that George Thompson, a British Abolitionist, was to address the Female Anti-Slavery Society, but by the fact that there were women in Boston as "froward" and shameless and unsexed as to come together to discuss a public, yes a political, issue. Thompson, having been notified of what was likely to happen, did not appear. Garrison's offense was merely sitting in his nearby office; it all but cost him his life. The women were compelled by the mayor to depart, which they did two by two—some of the loveliest "females" in all Boston—and were soberly warned never to offend again. Five years later some of these same women went to the First World's Anti-Slavery Convention in London, Lucretia Mott, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Mr. Garrison, and others going also. But they were denied recognition as delegates by the Quakers who were running the convention. Women could not plead in England in public for the freedom of those in bondage! They were compelled to be passive spectators in the gallery, where Garrison took his seat with them, refusing to be a delegate if all could not be admitted.

Next fall Oberlin College will celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of the matriculation of the first women students in a collegiate institution—the beginning not only of college education for females but of coeducation in the United States. For 201 years after the founding of Harvard College no woman was allowed to sample a college training! Two years previously Oberlin had founded a Female Department, which was presented to the public in its first catalogue in these words:

> Young ladies of good minds, unblemished morals, and respectable attainments are received into this department and placed under the superintendence of a judicious lady, whose duty it is to correct their habits and mould the female character. They board at the public table, and perform the labor of the Steward's Department, together with the washing, ironing, and much of the sewing of the students. They attend recitations with young gentlemen in all the departments. Their rooms are entirely separate from those of the other sex, and no calls or visits in their respective apartments are at all permitted.

Whether the real purpose of this announcement was to get free chambermaid service for the young gentlemen's rooms or not, Oberlin moved on quickly to the higher education. Not without some scandal of course: a dismissed student wrote a pamphlet asserting that "joint education" was very similar to free love and that there was quite undue intimacy between the sexes—a charge ever since leveled at every coeducational institution. Mary Hosford, Mary Kellogg, Elizabeth Prall, and Caroline Rudd were the first to be enrolled as regular freshmen; three of them graduated, the other withdrawing at the end of the first year. A year later William Woodbridge wrote in the Annals of American Education: ". . . the experiment is unequivocally successful. We consider it now fully established that the sexes may be educated together. This discovery is one of the most important ever made. The benefits which are likely to flow from it are immense. Woman is to be free. . . . Daughters of America, rejoice!"

When I was appointed an assistant in the History Department at Harvard in charge of the written work of Albert Bushnell Hart's course in United States history, I was asked to do the same work in Radcliffe. Where there were 400 men enrolled in our Harvard course, there were only six women at Radcliffe, all of them older than my 22 years, experienced school-marms eager to get belated degrees and taking most unfair advantage of their callow instructor. As for admitting my six students, who knew so much more than I, to our Harvard classroom, that would have been dismissed as a menace to our oldest and best university, and still would. So we crossed Harvard Square and repeated our talks, and at the end of two years I received a salary voucher from Radcliffe reading: "For two years' instruction in U. S. History—$20.00" —beyond question a fair valuation of the services rendered.

Today women throng to 570 college institutions, and President Wilkins of Oberlin believes that more than 1,000,000 women have received a bachelor of arts degree. Surely some of these living degree-holders ought to pause on October 8 next, when Oberlin celebrates their centennial, to praise the two Marys, the Elizabeth, and Caroline who dared obloquy and social dishonor to pave the way for college generations to come.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

BOOKS and the ARTS

"BEAUTY'S ROSE"

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IT was recently my privilege to hear a witty speech by a college professor in the course of which he regretted that students of literature ordinarily devote so little attention to literature itself. The investigations they undertake are commonly either linguistic or historic or biographical, and only rarely do they so much as touch in passing upon the qualities which make it seem worth while to investigate, linguistically or historically or biographically, the work or the writer in question. Professing to be no less guilty than the rest, and remembering that his own books were primarily works of scholarship, he concluded: "But at least I make it a rule not to let my research interfere with my intellectual life."

Now the charge is one which critics and journalists are always ready enough to applaud, but I could not help wondering whether, when they had done so, it would not then be a question of pot and kettle; whether what commonly passes for criticism is not frequently just as remote from the central issue as the frankly collateral research of the schools. Suppose we propose a test of significance, suppose we say that no critical or explanatory remark about a writer or his work is valid unless it appear that the remark would not be equally true of any other writer or writings. Surely the test is not unreasonable, but how much would it leave of any of the currently popular "explanations" of a literary masterpiece, whether these "explanations" be psychological on the one hand or economic on the other? Even assuming that all that is said in any one of them is true as far as it goes, how much light does it throw on the fundamental question, which is simply why the work under discussion is more or less valuable than others written by men who grew up under the same economic conditions or whose psychological pattern could be drawn in precisely the same terms?

It happens that I have recently read Sir Sidney Lee, Frank Harris, and a contemporary Russian critic on Shakespeare. Much that the first and last had to say is probably true and, in certain respects, not unenlightening. Even Harris's speculations are sometimes interesting as simple speculation; but even if we assume with him that the sonnets were addressed to a man whom the author loved in an abnormal fashion there are two important facts which remain: homosexuality is not rare; Shakespeare is unique. And suppose, going further, we admit that much in Shakespeare's plays is somehow connected with the economic conditions of his day, or even, as our Russian author maintains, that Falstaff is to be understood as a type of the decaying feudal knighthood. Does anyone really suppose that Falstaff has been remembered for any such reason or that there was no good reason for remembering him until this critic explained his true significance?

Shakespeare's father was once fined by the village of Stratford for failing to remove a pile of manure from his door yard. The uncovering of this fact (duly recorded by Sir Sidney) is one of the proud results of old-fashioned historical scholarship, and it is not a very illuminating one. But at least it does not pretend to be, and one may ask in all seriousness whether homosexuals are, by virtue of their homosexuality, any more likely to write like Shakespeare than are men-whose-fathers-have-been-fined-for-failing-to-remove-manure-from-their-door-steps. Would knowledge that a particular man fell into either one of these classifications enable us to predict that his writings would be supreme works of genius or throw light upon the merits of the work of a man whom, for the moment, we are supposing to belong in both?

In other words, it appears that "explanations" of an author—whether they be in terms of his psychological pattern or in terms of his historical setting—fail to be very significant, for the simple reason that they do not explain the one thing most worth knowing: why the writer in question differs from others whom the same explanation would fit. Any explanation of Shakespeare in terms of the social or economic forces of his time must inevitably explain his contemporaries as well. It may explain why he was an Elizabethan but it does not explain why the other Elizabethans were not Shakespeare. And that is, after all, the important question, since the thing which makes him most interesting is not the way in which he resembled his fellows but the way in which he differed from all the rest of them. I still, to take a different example, believe that Edgar Allan Poe had a "mother complex" and that the fact influenced his work. I still believe that to bear this in mind illuminates to some extent his prose and his verse. But until it can be shown that all sufferers from that supposedly common ailment write as well as he did, I must admit that the secret of his power remains still a secret.

The simplest as well as the severest test of a work of literary criticism is applied when we read immediately after it some part of the work which furnished its subject. Opening Shakespeare's sonnets I find that Number One begins:

> From fairest creatures we desire increase,
> That thereby beauty's rose might never die,

and I ask myself what any of my three critics has to contribute which will help me to perceive, account for, or evaluate the monumental beauty of those lines. Mr. Harris's theory has at least the negative merit of seeming totally irrelevant, while the other two furnish me chiefly with reasons which would render it highly improbable a priori that the lines would be interesting. My Russian could explain them away as by-products of the class struggle, and historical research can only demonstrate that what they say has been said many times before. Thanks to his learning, Sir Sidney Lee can show that the thought was commonplace even in the author's own time, that it may be found in various other sonnet sequences, and that the whole business of urging reproduction on a handsome young man goes back at least to the Pastor Fido. But what I really want to know is why, despite the commonplace nature of the idea, the lines are read with an excitement which neither any of the other sonnet sequences nor the Pastor Fido itself can produce. Shakespeare inherited the same tradition as the other writers, he grew up in the same society, and if he was (as is, of course, extremely doubtful) the victim of an unnatural passion, so in all probability were scores of others among his contemporaries. Two lines constitute a unit large enough to demonstrate his greatness and therefore also constitute a unit large enough to test any critical discussion for its relevance to the qualities which make him unique. One may need a whole play or group of plays to prove that he was the representative of a certain stage in the development of society; one may need a certain group of selected lines even to suggest the suspicion that he might have been a homosexual. But one needs only two lines chosen almost at random to prove what is much more important—namely, that he was a poet.

The moral of all this may be that those of us who call ourselves critics are no less likely than scholars to be in reality what is nowadays denounced as "escapists." We escape into history or psychology or economics (which are relatively easy to discuss), and we hesitate to face the problem which remains when history or psychology or economics has done its uttermost. All three are useful enough in their way. The danger is in forgetting what that way is, and it ought to be one of the first cares of the critic "not to let his research interfere with his intellectual life."

BOOKS

Field Work in Bohemia

THIS ROOM AND THIS GIN AND THESE SANDWICHES. By Edmund Wilson. The New Republic. $1.

THERE are the people who work with materials: farmers, men in factories and on construction. There are the people who carry on the services that coordinate these acts: trainmen, telegraph operators, shipping hands. There are the people who keep the books involved in the productive and distributive pattern: the accountants, stenographers, filing clerks. There are the people who trade in the symbols by which the books are kept: bankers, financiers, speculators, promoters, business men. There are the people who coach the responses to these symbols: educators, publicists, journalists, editors, politicians. There are the "contradictions": people out of jobs, business men crippled by other business men, monopolists fighting monopolists, racketeers, gangsters, radical propagandists.

And there is a special, somewhat abstract, highly mobile group of people who may, with varying degrees of success, live off the total muddle. These are in part the people with income, and the entertainers, the artists. Materially they are rewarded, or hope to be. Occasionally they may "go away" to some earthy spot in search of, and sometimes in temporary discovery of, an idyll. When congregating they can build up a somewhat isolated world, with its own values, its own scandals, its own concepts of obligation, trial, heroism, and defeat. They are on the fringes—the fringes of political radicalism, of philosophy, of wisdom, of service, of the soil, of ecstasy and drought, of religion, of moralization and demoralization. They make up the stratum of life depicted in Wilson's three clever, engrossing, and moralistic plays.

The steam locomotive is said to be a very inefficient machine; but it is the essence of sound performance as compared with the operations of contemporary society—yet the social plant jerks along somehow, and while it continues it can manage to support a certain percentage of people in this mobile, abstract way of life, with their peculiar kind of secular "other-worldliness." In particular it did so during the war and post-war periods of inflation. And Wilson here gives us a vigorous and imaginative version of this way.

The three plays are points that plot a curve. In the first, "The Crime in the Whistler Room," we get a mixture of realism and fantasy serving as the rites of initiation. It is a ritual of rebirth, a shift in perspective exemplifying in imaginative terms the following proposition: If one abandons one mode of living for another, and the two seem sufficiently at odds, one can call the second mode "life" only by feeling that the earlier mode was "death." Hence we watch a preparation for bohemian "life" in contrast with a respectable family who act like corpses. The heroine is the Beatrice who guides the hero on his journey—and she helps a lot through being got by him with child, though he appears in some of the fantastic scenes as a werewolf.

In the second play, "A Winter in Beech Street," we are wholly within this special world. I doubt whether any one else will catch as well as Wilson does here the norms of sociality that developed about the theater projects of the Provincetown Players as the American center of bohemian protest. The inventiveness of the dialogue is very appealing; one is sometimes startled out of his engrossment at the sudden realization that it is even depicting delirium tremens joyously.

In the third, "Beppo and Beth," we come closest to attempts at finding a way out. And after a scene of violently alcoholic protest against the void lurking beneath alcohol, with one suicide stopped only by another attempted suicide, we end:

> BEPPO: We'll get married again tomorrow and we'll take the first boat to Mexico!
>
> BETH: Why Mexico!
>
> BEPPO: Because Mexico's the place where they make those little pottery animals!
>
> BETH: You broke the little bank just now when you pulled the tapestry down.
>
> BEPPO: I know; I want to get a new one!—The train to Mexico City will be our P. L. M. Express! We'll revive the old rebellion!
>
> BETH: You'd better pick up those pennies: we'll need them!

Not forgetting Chang and Chung, the Chinese servants, who had patiently, at intervals, explained to Beppo the Marxist theories of capitalist decay, and did it very well, with what looks like a good stage effect, in the midst of all the hubbub and the antics.

The talent and the incongruities of bohemianism are conveyed in lines that are bright and limpid. The void is made tremendously real, all the more so since the patter that conceals the void is given with verve. "Well, we may not have got the whole of everything," says Sally of the Beech Street Players in a moment of inventory, "but we've got something very precious at this moment—we've got this room and this gin and these sandwiches, and we've got each other's very agreeable company!" Or, as another character who has invented a new religion puts it: "All the religions of the past have either mortified the flesh in the interests of the spirit or have stinted the spirit in the interests of the flesh: and this is the first religion in history that has promoted the highest development of the spirit and at the same time facilitated the ecstasies of the flesh!"

If one would see Murger's world again, shown with an accuracy and taste for comedy that Murger's sentimentalizing made him incapable of, one should read these plays. And if one feels moralistic, he can discern on every page the pressure of the money economy behind the antics.

KENNETH BURKE

The Delphic Language

THE COMMERCE CLAUSE UNDER MARSHALL, TANEY, AND WAITE. By Felix Frankfurter. University of North Carolina Press. $1.

A STUDY of legal history is a means to judicial freedom. If idea, occasion, and issue are stripped away and only the stark lines of decision are left, the reasoned expediencies of one age become the decadent precedents of the next. The results of analysis become mere tags; verbal compulsion strips judgment of its balance of values; and the living law hardens into a system of rigidities—and "no formula can make great judges of little men." The past forever imposes its irrational pressure upon the present; and "unless we know history we may be unwittingly imprisoned by it." So Felix Frankfurter invokes historical perspective and with never so much as a reference shows the littleness of recent judicial utterances.

To secure an effective result he employs the utmost economy. He selects a single doctrine, "commerce"; he presents, from the past, three Chief Justices; his account runs barely beyond 100 pages; he uses the adroit phrase and the overtone of meaning to crowd the stuff of a page into a sentence. The beat of his compact, modernistic line is forever on the judicial process. Here is nothing of such questions as "What is commerce?" "Exactly where is the boundary between national and state authority?" or "What are the lines by which the category is pent in?" Instead the query runs to how "the power over commerce" as "a lawyer's artifice" is used as an instrument of judicial policy. In its preoccupation with commerce the Supreme Court has indulged in statecraft—but "a statecraft bound in by the restrictions of the adjudicatory process." The opportunity to speak arises only through "the accidents of unrelated and intermittent cases"; consideration is limited to "issues confined by the exigencies of the legal record"; elucidation is restricted to "the learning and insight of lawyers fortuitously selected"; and judgment is imprisoned "within legal habituations and past utterances."

For more than a century "commerce" has been a counter of judicial statecraft. The Constitution drew no line between state and federal authority; a state might act if the nation had not invaded the domain. In only three cases did Marshall have occasion to expound the doctrine of commerce, for questions of public control were not yet insistent. The opinions voiced by him are those of his court. If Marshall spoke, his brethren had to be conciliated; "Story had devotion to Marshall, but also vanity and views." And in his speech Marshall created a "dormant" federal power—exclusive in its domain—as a means of subjecting state legislation to federal judicial review.

Taney and Waite took a different view of the matter. Taney was unwilling "to open the door to judicial policy-making wider than the Constitution obviously required." So he was "tolerant of legislative freedom for the states" and willing to override a statute only if "in conflict with the law of Congress." Waite with a rare insight complained, "I cannot give the reasons as I wish I could"; but his outlook had no place for "any attempt to confine legislative powers by a mechanical formula." He sought to hold the court to its litigious orbit, for he believed that questions of public policy could not be handled within "the confined procedure of a lawsuit and the uncreative resources of judicial review."

It is, according to Frankfurter, style which makes the judge. "Humdrum, matter-of-fact, dry lawyer's English" is not likely "to carry a judge's reputation down the stream of history." The cathedral tones of Marshall and the severe clarity of Taney give long life to their utterances; the importance of Waite's cases alone saved him from oblivion. And the gift of style—which is really a tool of the craft—packs into the pages of this book far more of understanding than is to be had from ponderous tomes on the Constitution now emerging from the press. As Frankfurter quotes Maitland, "Today we study the day before yesterday, in order that yesterday may not paralyze today and today may not paralyze tomorrow." Here is history, in the service of current perspective, making a little clearer "the creative role of the Supreme Court" in giving meaning to "the Delphic language of the Constitution."

WALTON H. HAMILTON

Medicine and Public Health

AMERICAN MEDICINE: EXPERT TESTIMONY OUT OF COURT. The American Foundation. Two volumes. $3.50 the set.

IT is no slight to the medical profession that the American Foundation has found it necessary to make a survey of medical care as it stands today. The growth of large cities with their typical diseases, the advance of science, and changing economic conditions have all had their effects on the practice of medicine. The doctor cannot escape his environment.

Although the foundation fully appreciates that medical care is as important to the public as to the medical profession, it has made its survey through the eyes of the doctor. To complete the picture, it would be well to fill the recognized gap by investigating medical care from the point of view of the patient. The method of inquiry used was to send a form letter to some twenty thousand medical men of over twenty years' experience, distributed throughout the United States, and another letter to some five thousand young physicians recently licensed. The enormous volume of material contained in the thousands of replies was then boiled down.

These replies show in no uncertain terms the interest of the medical profession in the problem. But the analysis and synthesis presented in these two volumes could hardly have been worse. The task of summarizing the data was clearly beyond the powers of those engaged to do it. High-sounding sentences are all too frequent. The final conclusions on state medicine, quoted in part, are typical of the poor quality of the summarization, yet at the same time show the wealth of material that has been uncovered. "The views quoted in this chapter are in general the concrete proposals of the writers interested in evolutionary extension of the present functioning of government in the field of health and medical care. These views indicate a growing recognition that this evolutionary process may be expected progressively to continue, . . . that permanent and continuous cooperation between scientific medicine and the governments, national, state, and local, must be achieved, perhaps through a council of scientific medicine acting with public authorities."

Yet in spite of their defects, these two volumes represent a real advance. Other medical men can turn to them and see that the trend toward federal interest in national health is even now a reality. The difficulties of medicine can be attributed partly to the fact that it is becoming daily more a science and less an art. Modern medicine depends increasingly on the "thorough work-up," in the course of which blood, urine, and sputum are sent away for laboratory examination and the results returned to the doctor for his use. X-rays, cardiograms, blood counts, hormone determinations, all done on the same patient, furnish as complete a picture as modern science can draw of his condition at the time of examination. How can the private physician provide this service for even two patients a day? He cannot. He is obliged, more and more, to rely on laboratories. These are to be found only in the large centers of population, and even in these communities there are not enough of them. Such are the physical facts which are driving conscientious medical men to look to government assistance and control, or to such experiments as group practice.

These data should be handed over to some competent authority to be digested and summarized. They could then be presented in some 250 pages rather than 1,500, with corresponding improvement in coherence. The subject warrants a clear, concise statement.

HUGH H. DARBY

Gone with Anthony Adverse

AND SO—VICTORIA. By Vaughan Wilkins. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

IF this picaresque novel does not head the new batch of best sellers it will be no fault of the author. Lodged in pre-Victorian England and built around the rivalries within the ruling family, the novel has the "glory and excitement" which have become the trademark of the past. Its 600-odd pages are swollen with passion, intrigue, and murder; and the reader is swept through a series of romantic escapades as he follows the career of the hero. Naturally enough, a point of surfeit is reached when the swoonings and seductions mount up, yet reading soon becomes automatic as the events of the novel pass before one like some historical pageant, with its lovers and rogues, its full-bosomed Cinderellas and scheming countesses, and its uniformed champions of chastity and honor. Nor are the close-ups of crime and perversion unduly offensive, for Mr. Wilkins's euphemisms keep these gruesome episodes well within the limits of respectability—a respectability, in fact, as archaic as the story he tells.

At bottom, "And So—Victoria" is a simple and sentimental tale of the fortunes of Christopher Harpish, from his tortured youth to his swashbuckling manhood. The child of an incestuous marriage, Christopher is snatched up by one royal guardian after another in the course of the struggle for power within the reigning bureaucracy. Not until he reaches maturity, however, does Christopher discover the secret of his parentage, and except for some boudoir predicaments in which he barely escapes seduction, the rest of the novel is given to Christopher's efforts to repudiate his ancestral taint. A number of duels fail to provide the necessary catharsis: he tours the world; he foils a plot to prevent the succession of Victoria to the throne; finally his frantic search for some act which will plunge him into an honorable existence ends in the arms of a renowned actress. Countless other people play their part in the novel, but they are hardly more than accomplices in the adventures of Christopher. They do, however, provide an atmosphere of regal pomp and gossip, living in a kind of glass house where they constantly expose their most intimate activities to each other and to the reader.

As though to insure the pace of the narrative, none of the characters is burdened with consciousness, and Christopher is equipped with the mentality of a foreign legionnaire. In this respect "And So—Victoria" seems admirably suited for Hollywood production as a historical drama, with perhaps very few changes, for even in its present form it has episodic variety, physical conflict, fireside idealism, and the therapy of love. The novel combines the pageantry of history with the adventures of fiction. Unfortunately, there is a contradiction between its streamlined action and its Victorian sensibility; but that is a failing which the historians of Hollywood can easily overlook.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS

The Consumer and His Money

THE BACKWARD ART OF SPENDING MONEY. AND OTHER ESSAYS. By Wesley C. Mitchell. McGraw-Hill Book Company. $3.

THE FIRST essay in this volume, The Backward Art of Spending Money, was written in 1912; the last, Economics, 1904-1929, in 1931. The papers were prepared for different occasions and at regular intervals. While many deal with economic themes, the subject is, as often as not, economics itself, or the social sciences inclusively. Again, it may be a man and his ideas—Veblen, Commons, or Bentham—that is under discussion. The common denominator is the thought and point of view of an able, reflective, and broadly interested mind, an agreeable, easy style, and a concern with economics which includes its history, its methods, its systems, and its point of contact with social life generally.

One of the earliest of these essays, and yet one of the timeliest, is the title piece, The Backward Art of Spending Money. Although it has been part of the literature of consumption for twenty-five years, it takes on new value in the contemporary discussions of consumers and their problems. Most of the points currently presented as "discoveries" of the consumer's position (perhaps they are; there is a wide difference between discovery and priority) are made somewhat more clearly and thoughtfully in this essay.

Dr. Mitchell clearly indicates that family organization for production and consumption is divided in modern life and that the separation is through changes in carrying on production rather than consumption. He considers the degree to which the dominance of women in spending is a factor in the backwardness of the art. He shows how scientific research

LINGAME
BRARY

Moonlight Sail

ON THE HUDSON

★ STARRING ★

REX INGRAM'S QUARTET

SALOTTI—GUITARIST

PEN AND MANN, well-known dance team

TALKING PICTURES REFRESHMENTS

3,000 SQUARE FEET OF DANCE FLOOR

Popular Swing Orchestra

Proceeds to

AID CHILDREN OF SPAIN

New York's Popular Excursion Steamer, Wilson Line

★ S. S. "State of Delaware"—Capacity 3,500 ★

TUESDAY EVENING — AUGUST 3RD

Boat Leaves from Pier 1 N. R. [illegible] P. M. (Ft. of Battery Pl.)

Auspices

United Youth Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy
381 Fourth Ave.
Tel. MU 4-5301

Young Peoples Organization of N. Y. Society for Ethical Culture, 2 West 64th St.
Tel. SUsquehanna 7-5200

TICKETS OBTAINABLE AT ABOVE PLACES, OR

UNIVERSITY BOOKSHOP
105 University Place

WORKERS BOOKSHOP
50 [illegible] 13th Street

LEBLANG-GRAY'S
1482 Broadway

TYSONS AGENCY
1531 Broadway

Subscription: $1.00 (per person)

MAKE YOUR RESERVATIONS NOW!

COSTS ARE RISING

BUT YOU STILL CAN GET

The Nation and Reader's Digest for $6

You need not look beyond your breakfast table to realize that a dollar doesn't buy as much food as it did twelve months ago. Nor does it buy as much printing!

But so long as we possibly can afford it, we are determined to continue to offer you our most popular combination—The Nation and Reader's Digest—for only $6, just $2 less than you pay for both magazines when you order them separately. You need no introduction to The Nation. By this time, we hope, it is a "must" for you.

Reader's Digest affords a delightful yet inexpensive way of keeping informed. Each issue reprints 35 articles so skillfully condensed they preserve the essence of the original without loss of thought, spirit, or style. In its monthly harvest of 136 pages you find the very articles you would mark for reading if it were possible for you to check through all the current periodicals.

Subscriptions are for one year, new or renewal, and they may be mailed to separate addresses. You need send no money for 30 days. But do not delay too long before using the form below which we offer for your convenience.

The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. 7-31-37

Please send The Nation and Reader's Digest for one year at $6. ☐ I enclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name ________________

Address ________________

____

in physics and chemistry feeds production advance, while the arts of consumption await similar nourishment from physiology and psychology. So with values. The relatively prompt and precise answers which the business man finds in the market are not the replies for the housewife.

But to what is it that she seeks a reply? Is it merely to a better comprehension of the scale of conventional values provided ready made, or to deeper and more philosophic ends? It is through the raising of this issue that a reading of The Backward Art of Spending Money would wholesomely leaven the ideas of many who assume that the cure for all consumer problems will be found in grading, labeling, and housewife science (good as these are), or in less capitalistic advertising and salesmanship and more consumer cooperative selling, more national planning, and a different distribution of national income.

The book is not avowedly presented as a mark of recognition, but to many it will appear to be something of a monument suggesting the abilities, variety, and unity of interest of Dr. Mitchell's mind. LEVERETT S. LYON

Johnny Johnson's War Memoirs

MY WAR WITH THE UNITED STATES. By Ludwig Bemelmans. The Viking Press. $2.50.

MR. BEMELMANS, who came to America from the Tyrol expecting to shoot Indians and joined the army instead, was sent during the World War to guard lunatics in a New York military camp. There he collected acquaintances and adventures thriftily, studied the American scene with a perspicacious if slightly impertinent eye, and recorded his conclusions in a diary that reads like a catalogue to our national portrait gallery with explanatory notes by Lewis Carroll's Alice. The brilliance of Mr. Bemelmans's observations on American characters and characteristics is undeniable. He is a born raconteur, and, like an Old World Johnny Johnson, proclaims many truths in few words. He loses no time in understanding that more than geography separates Germany from the United States, that Americans resent authority, are skeptical of dignity, and clamor to learn any fantastic dance except the goose-step. Ever mindful of his own German training, he is courteous and wise enough to hide his sarcasms under a naivete of statement that is meant to be disarming.

Yet there is a danger in Mr. Bemelmans's brilliance, as there is in that of a forward child or a hurried traveler. When the reader gets the glare of bright colors out of his eyes he realizes that he has been looking at a deftly drawn two-dimensional picture of a three-dimensional scene. Americans are not as they seem. It is easy to be witty at the expense of a widow from Scranton with a new permanent wave and a Bronx family quarreling among its mission oak, and to appear profound by cultivating a superior attitude of understatement. The warmth of feeling the author infuses into a few nostalgic pages about his uncle's inn in the fatherland serves only to show up the cold scintillation of the rest of the book. Yet when one has allowed for surface charm and inaccurate conclusions, the diary still makes amusing reading and is bound to be informative to those interested in how Americans look to their foreign neighbors. Mr. Bemelmans has decorated his text with illustrations that promise at first to have the directness of Rousseau and the conciseness of Klee but turn on close examination into just drawings by a talented German amateur. TOM SQUIRE

RECORDS

THE new Victor set of Beethoven's Quartet, Opus 59, No. 2 (four records, $8), provides new evidence of the fact that the playing of the Budapest String Quartet—in its unanimity of understanding, feeling, execution, its precision of intonation and beauty and balance of tone, its warmth and vitality, and withal its unfailing purity and distinction of style—represents the highest excellence in its province. On the other hand, Victor's album of songs sung by Flagstad (five records, $7.50) reminds us that her present international career follows a career of twenty years in Oslö. Like her recital programs, the album is overloaded with songs of the old local career—five by Grieg, one by Alnaes. Worse are the two songs in English—Cyril Scott's "Lullaby" and Charles's "When I Have Sung My Songs"—acquired for the new international career. What remain are two songs of Beethoven: "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur" and "Ich liebe dich." And of course Flagstad herself, who in the worst trash no less than in the exquisite "Ich liebe dich" commands wonder not only with the physical beauty of her singing but with its musical quality—the unfailing rectitude of the feeling for the phrase that manifests itself in the coloring and placing of every tone.

Matching the unusual conciseness, for Brahms, of his Third Symphony is the unusual directness, for Bruno Walter, of his performance with the Vienna Philharmonic, which is the finest of those now available (Victor: four records, $6.50). Except for a ringing quality and sharpness in the high register of the violins, which can be reduced by use of non-metallic needles, the recording is excellent.

On Victor single records Stokowski nullifies Debussy's precise and fastidious sense for timbre, evident in the cool tone of the piano in "Clair de lune" ("Moonlight"), with a lush orchestral arrangement and performance of the piece by the Philadelphia Orchestra ($1.50); Schnabel is heard in superb performances of Beethoven's Rondo, Opus 51, No. 1, and "Für Elise," assembled from odd sides of album sets ($2); in the Andante from Bach's Sonata in A minor and the Sarabande from the Partita in B minor, both for violin unaccompanied, one is aware chiefly of difficulties of the medium being overcome by Menuhin ($2); if you like Heifetz's playing you will like it in Vivaldi's Suite in A (recorded recently by Milstein as a sonata) ($1.50); the B.B.C. Symphony, under Boult, does well with Walton's gay overture, "Portsmouth Point" ($1); there is a little nervous tautness in brilliant performances by Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra of the charming Dance of the Apprentices and the Entrance of the Mastersingers from Act 3 of "Die Meistersinger" ($1.50).

Of recent records of the Benny Goodman Quartet (Victor) I like "Vibraphone Blues" and "Runnin' Wild" best; but I continue to wish the quartet were the trio once more. "Honky-tonk Train Blues" (Victor), played on the piano by Meade (Lux) Lewis, is unique; and the records of the Quintet of the Hot Club of France (Victor and Decca) offer phenomenal guitar-playing by Django Reinhardt.

Timely Records, Inc., has issued spirited performances, by the Manhattan Chorus and Mordecai Bauman under the direction of Elie Siegmeister, of several strike songs: "Sit Down," "Casey Jones," "On the Picket Line," "We Shall Not Be Moved," "Hold the Fort," "Solidarity Forever."

B. H. HAGGIN

a novel by a leading poet and liberal

WHITE MULE
by WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS
$2.50

"Williams employs his characters as instruments to register with unwonted sensitiveness the peculiarities of the American scene."—Philip Rahv, The Nation.

"The action evokes so many of the sights and sounds of life that we are stirred at every point by remembrance."—Alfred Kazin, N. Y. Times Book Review.

"From a number of angles 'White Mule' is literary news. It is a powerful and resonant novel."—N. L. Rothman, Saturday Review.

"Its excellence lies in the intensity with which each scene and each character are visualized, and the honesty with which they are set forth."—Carl Van Doren, Boston Herald.

and books of poetry

NOT ALONE LOST
by ROBERT McALMON

Here is McAlmon at his best—an individual perception and poetic idiom that set him apart from any other writer of his time.

$2.00

POEMS 1929-1936
by DUDLEY FITTS

"One of the few American masters of modern verse forms." —Archibald MacLeish.

$2.00

NEW DIRECTIONS—NORFOLK, CONN.

WAS IT A WRITERS' CONGRESS?
John Chamberlain says "NO!"
...in the August Common Sense "I had a very good reason for not attending the Congress of American Writers. I am a democrat and a radical — but . . ." Don't miss this honest analysis of the issue that is splitting the ranks of American writers wide open. Order Now.
This issue: 25c; 6 Months: $1; Common Sense, 315 4th Ave. New York

TWIN PINES
A Camp for Adults

Individual screened sun porches, semi-private adjoining baths in de luxe rooms of new main house; comfortable bungalows. Tennis, handball, basketball, baseball, sand beach bathing, boating, fishing, etc.
For further details, address
TWIN PINES ON TROUT LAKE
S. SAIDEL, LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

LOUIS FISCHER

is the author of a new 10c booklet, "The War in Spain," which is published by The Nation. Over 15,000 copies were sold in advance of publication! In this booklet Mr. Fischer authoritatively analyzes the social and economic background of the war, discusses the progress of the fighting, predicts the outcome, and explains the international significance of the struggle. Every progressive should read it! To order send 10c to

The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City

Letters to the Editors

Dramatic Incident

Dear Sirs: With the aid of "an agitated voice," a "sigh," a "handkerchief," a "gust of despair," and a "back" that he "will never forget," Mr. Grobin has made a very dramatic incident out of his meeting with me in Johnstown. If I had anything to be ashamed of I would hide behind the anonymity which he has given me. But he has made me out a coward and a hypocrite, and I resent it for myself and for my profession, which is frequently the victim of the man who finds this a cheap way to get a hand from left-wing audiences. To be suspected as a "semi-Communist" by some of the extreme conservative elements of one's own town, and then to be used as a horrible example of a kept preacher of the Bethlehem Company—well, it is something of a laugh.

In our first conversation I had a natural reserve in the presence of one who introduced himself as a reporter of a metropolitan daily, as I later told him; I therefore gave him a noncommittal answer when he asked me if I were a "McConnell Methodist." I had no need to hide from any of my own men, as he implies, the fact that I am an admirer of Bishop McConnell and agree in general with his point of view. They all know it, as I also told him.

And the paper which I so excitedly "thrust" at him! Mr. Grobin did not state in The Nation that this was presented to him for the purpose of subjecting its contents to criticism after he had made what I thought would be valuable observations in our community. Our only difference of opinion at the time was whether a majority of the Bethlehem workers were out on strike or not at the time Governor Earle shut down the mill. Subsequent developments have justified my opinion, not his.

I am a liberal, as Mr. Grobin rightly judged from the sermon he heard me preach. May I remind him of its text? "Pilate saith, What is truth? And when he had said this he went out." Perhaps you can tell me why it is that there are always liberals who try to support the cause by exaggeration, intolerance, and cynicism, when truth itself is a far better instrument?

There are phony things in Johnstown, as there are everywhere else (even in news reporting), and a struggle such as we have had shows some of them up. But it does no good to add to the number. Too many of Mr. Grobin's "facts" are phony, including the item that the "Bethlehem Steel Company contributes to the support of all Johnstown's churches." I know of no church of which this is true.

WILLIAM K. ANDERSON

Johnstown, Pa., July 10

Look at the Record

Dear Sirs: Mr. Anderson has seen fit to identify himself as the minister to whom I referred in my article. That the article did not mention his name or denomination should be sufficient proof that the aim was to expose not minor personalities but major forces of pressure behind the steel strike in his city. This reply to his letter still maintains that attitude. I am taking the time and The Nation's valuable space to reply to him as a symbol and not as a person. Let us turn to the record:

Mr. Anderson personally drafted the resolution on June 21 asking Governor Earle to rescind martial law at Johnstown. He repeated in that resolution the reactionary propaganda that the civil authorities must maintain the right to work equally with the right to strike. Who wanted the martial law rescinded? Was it the strikers, with whose cause Mr. Anderson told me he sympathized? No. It was the Bethlehem Steel Company.

Next, why did Bethlehem want martial law withdrawn? Because the order proclaiming martial law disbanded the vigilantes whose violence was serving to break the strike, prevented the Johnstown police from terrorizing pickets, and because, objectively, by keeping the steel mills shut it was helping the union win the strike. Whose chestnuts, then, was Mr. Anderson pulling out of the fire?

As a "liberal" he espoused the so-called right to work as being as sacred as the right to strike. Is it as a liberal that he echoed this subtle reactionary propaganda of the vigilante citizens' committee of Johnstown? Is the right to work meant to protect workers honestly opposed to a strike? Or is it meant to protect strikebreakers and to serve as a "cover" for back-to-work campaigns which by physical terrorization and by economic intimidation drive strikers into deserting their fellows?

Has it not occurred to him that in practical and objective terms the right to work can be protected in only one way—by sending in the armed forces of the state to balk, terrorize, and destroy strikers' picket lines; in short, by breaking the strike?

Then, on July 4, Mr. Anderson preached a "strike sermon." In that sermon he demanded incorporation of unions, he imputed all violence in the steel strike to the unions and none to the steel companies, he attempted to persuade his parishioners that employer opposition to unionization had dwindled to minor proportions, and he condemned the "coercion" used by labor leaders to force workers into unions.

Mr. Anderson further deplored the "opportunities" the Wagner Act has given "racketeers to use labor for their own wicked purposes." And he illustrated the argument with that utterly fantastic story of the "bulldozing foreigner with two pistol-toting bodyguards, who owned a labor union" and "summarily rubbed out all the honest workers who demurred at paying him tribute" of a dollar a week.

By the way, he was mistaken when he assured his parishioners that "the railway unions have not lost anything by being incorporated." They are not incorporated. Maybe that's one reason they haven't lost anything.

All of the foregoing are positive acts. Now, how about the negative acts—the sins of omission? Ten days after the strike broke out in Johnstown Mr. Anderson wrote his notorious resolution. It was "justice" for his community he was seeking, he said. But for ten days before, the mayor of Johnstown and his police were inflicting outrageous injustice on members of Mr. Anderson's community. Why did he not write resolutions about that? As typical of the scores of cases that can be cited, why did he keep silent when Mayor Shields sentenced Thomas Meyers, a striker, to ninety days in jail or $100 fine and costs? His crime? He picked up a rag from the ground to wipe some mud off his shoes. The arresting officer, Corporal Tebelin, admitted Meyers did nothing with the rag, but said he thought Meyers might have intended to throw it at someone. Also, why no resolutions when Mayor Shields gave the same sentence to Charles Dragovich, a striker, for sitting admittedly peacefully on a fence a block away from the picket line? Or when Policeman Krise shot two strikers and Mayor Shields congratulated him on his fine marksmanship?

ALLEN GROBIN

New York, N. Y., July 18

Certain Inaccuracies

Dear Sirs: As a resident of Johnstown and a member of the middle class, I am compelled to protest against certain inaccuracies in Allen Grobin's article in the July 10 issue of The Nation which greatly mar its effectiveness. The author states, for example, that "there is only one bank in Johnstown . . . which does all of Bethlehem's business." Actually there are at least seven banks in Johnstown, although the United States Bank does handle Bethlehem's business. It is similarly untrue to say that the Penn Traffic is the only department store at Johnstown. There are actually three or four, one of which is possibly even larger than the Penn Traffic.

More serious is the accusation that the Bethlehem Steel Corporation contributes to the support of all Johnstown churches, whose wealthiest parishioners are steel executives. This is untrue. I have access to the financial reports of the two largest Methodist churches. One of them has no steel executives at all, and the nearest to steel executives in the downtown Franklin Street Church are some white-collar men. So far as I know there is only one steel executive in town who goes regularly to church, and there are certainly none in the church of the minister mentioned in your article. One dropped out of his church several years ago, declaring the minister was a "Bolshevik," and an officer in the United States Bank dropped out this spring on similar grounds.

MRS. C. M. HOOVER

Johnstown, Pa., July 15

Militance and Realism

Dear Sirs: I wish to express my admiration for the consummate skill with which your reviewer, Mr. Lore, has taken every opportunity to misunderstand my book on fascism. To make me appear "ardently optimistic" over the prospects for the workingman in fascist countries, he quotes a passage which I had marked as a purely theoretical "blueprint"—and is silent about my many references to the fascist practice of depressing real wages and giving immaterial benefits to labor in exchange. Words to the effect that the fascist party machines were organized for other than warlike reasons in Mr. Lore's register look like an assertion that fascism as such is pacific, although I have devoted a full chapter to the thesis that it will always tend to embroil itself in international conflicts. Indignantly Mr. Lore then asks how I can say that there is freedom under fascism, referring to a phrase torn from a chapter entirely designed to show that freedom, as we understand it, is, under fascism, a logical impossibility. Altogether he confronts me accusingly with "things as they really are" and carefully overlooks the fact that my avowed purpose was not to describe present conditions in Italy or Germany but to acquaint the American public with the mentality of the fascist rank and file.

It is only natural that to German Socialists like Ludwig Lore the regime of Hitler seems a nightmare, imposed by a force of darkness upon the "real" Germany in which and for which they have spent the better part of their lives. Hope that the future might revive the past is what keeps most of the exiles going. But the people of other countries have to make up their minds whether they want, out of sympathy with the victims of fascism, to falsify their own picture of its supporters. It is not a question of siding with or against the anti-fascists.

If Mr. Lore asks how I can dispute "the evident fact" that fascism is the creature of capitalists afraid of working-class action, I refer him to the latest issue of Foreign Affairs, in which one of Germany's foremost monopoly capitalists voices their distaste for the Hitler regime in no uncertain terms. If Mr. Lore tells me that opposition in Germany and Italy is growing and not abating, I challenge him to name one responsible and disinterested newspaper correspondent who found in the last two years that the normal and never avoidable displeasure of particular groups at particular grievances has spread into a comprehensive and increasing sentiment against the fascist regimes as such. Or even that any one group's resentment has grown vivid enough to create solidarity with other sufferers; that Germany's fighting churchmen showed sympathy with disfranchised labor, or the exploited consumer with the scapegoat Jew.

Mr. Lore accuses me of not drawing a "militant" conclusion, like the one he quotes from Robert Brady's book. I plead guilty. But I should like to point out that even according to Marxist history books this country's "wars of freedom against a tyrannical power" were instigated and fought by the capitalist class of the time and that at least the brains which built its wealth and culture were mostly capitalist brains. Mr. Lore concludes that I am a defeatist. From his angle, I probably am. I do not believe that the world faces a choice between fascism and communism. I believe that progressive aims can be realized without social upheaval. And I happen to dislike the idea of saving democracy from fascism, only to fatten it for the proletarian revolution. I have full confidence in American democracy, and I think I have expressed it in my book, but I fear that its supporters will labor under a great handicap if they let self-appointed auxiliaries prevent them from really learning what they are up against.

E. B. ASHTON

New York, July 15

Ideology of the Dance

Dear Sirs: In his article, New Forms of the Dance, in your issue of June 12, Mr. Love nominates Doris Humphrey's trilogy, "Theater Piece," "With My Red Fires," and "New Dance," as "undoubtedly the strongest work to date" in the dance field. I, for one, view it as one of the most confused, utopian, and equivocal compositions produced by any dancer of note these last seasons. Now Doris Humphrey has been superbly active in various dancers' collective and progressive organizations; she has looked to the social scene for the subject matter of her work; generally she has followed the line of the liberal who, because of circumstance if not conviction, has unavoidably moved left. But a certain lack of clarity, a confusion that is primarily a post-war hangover of impressionism, symbolism, expressionism, has marked her work to the degree that it may easily develop in a direction completely contrary to the dancer's intention. Miss Humphrey's "Theater Piece" represents a futile, isolated, and utopian opposition. Nothing comes from this sort of revolt. It lacks material strength and is buried in psychological and spiritual sentimentalities.

When Mr. Love represents Martha Graham's ideologically well-built "Chronicle" merely as a series of foot movements, changes of costume and of décor, he reveals how completely his approach to dancing is concerned with technical exhibition to the exclusion of idea. All his mention of social idea has a tinny and unconvincing sound. Apropos of his heroic closing call for the removal of modern dance from "Sunday night cultism," is he not aware of the WPA production of Tamiris's "How Long Brethren?" (unequivocal Negro songs of protest) and Charles Weidman's satiric "Candide"? These have been playing to standing room only every night for the past six weeks! I have no reason to debate at length with Mr. Love on esthetic preference, but if the "substance of the dance" is to be considered "movement—not story, not pantomime, not music—but movement," then the dance will prove a rather sorry, thin, and meaningless medium for both artist and audience.

OWEN BURKE

New York, June 14

Catalans Don't Like Franco

Dear Sirs: A few weeks ago you wrote in one of your editorial notes that "the Catalans have done very little to help the Loyalists win the war." The reverse being generally known, I dismissed the statement as a harmless remark. Now comes Louis Fischer in a cable from Madrid (July 17, page 62) charging that "Franco has many friends among the Catalan separatists." This I cannot pass without a few words of dissent, for, if not corrected, it is likely to produce some confusion in your readers' minds. The "unified" Spain proclaimed by Franco and a "separated" Catalonia are as far apart as the North and South Poles. Furthermore, Franco being the embodiment of everything which is repellent to the Catalan character and ideals, I doubt whether it would be possible to find a single sane Catalan willing to call this traitor his friend.

JOAN DEL PLA

New York, July 19

Claim Sustained

Dear Sirs: The Nation for June 26, 1937, describes Richard L. Neuberger as "a Seattle journalist." Now, California attempts to arrogate to itself Crater Lake, which is located in Oregon, as well as Mount Hood, but is usually rebuffed in its efforts by the Portland Chamber of Commerce.

Everyone in this part of the country knows that Mr. Neuberger was born, raised, and cut his eyeteeth in Portland, Oregon, and that he still makes Portland his headquarters. We demand that you relocate Mr. Neuberger in Portland—though the Portland Chamber of Commerce, which usually concerns itself with such geographic inaccuracies, would in this case probably be very glad to lose Mr. Neuberger to Seattle.

ARTHUR A. TARLOW

Portland, July 1

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address [illegible] well [illegible] the new [illegible] required for change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

BENJAMIN STOLBERG has just returned from an extended trip to the steel and automobile centers of the Middle West.

HERBERT SOLOW has been a newspaper correspondent in Palestine and in Europe.

LOREN MILLER is a contributing editor to the New Masses and a lawyer in Los Angeles.

KENNETH BURKE is the author of "Attitudes Toward History."

WALTON H. HAMILTON is economic adviser to the Social Security Board and Professor of Constitutional Law at the Yale Law School.

HUGH H. DARBY is an investigator in the Department of Biological Chemistry at the College of Physicians and Surgeons.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS is one of the editors of the Partisan Review.

LEVERETT S. LYON is the executive vice-president of the Brookings Institution.

TOM SQUIRE formerly conducted the book section of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle.

SCHOOL CAMP

LAKEWOOD MODERN SCHOOL CAMP
CARMEL, NEW YORK
A [illegible] for boys and girls from four to fourteen years of [illegible] where the keynote of happiness is in creative activity with [illegible] social environment developing responsibility and comradeship.
For reservations [illegible] further information write:
JAS. H. DICK

WANTED

Couple driving Jaspe, Nova Scotia, Aug. 21. Want couple share expenses, driving. Return Labor Day. Box No. 939, c/o The Nation.

Young lady, 28-30, intelligent, Jewish. Secretary to executive. Work mid-west State. State phone. Box No. 940, c/o The Nation.

FOR SALE

Forty acres one mile from lake, partly completed small house, $350. Suitable for summer or hunting camp. Ten miles from Brattleboro. R. R. Hawkins, Putney, Vermont.

LIMES-LEMONS FOR SALE

Seedless Limes delivered prepaid $8.00 bushel, $4.25 half bushel, $2.25, 1/5 bushel. Lemons, $6.75 bushel, $3.75 half bushel. Oranges $4.00 bushel. A. H. Burket, Sebring, Fla.

FILMS

2ND BIG WEEK!
FURY OVER SPAIN
See Amazing Heroism of Loyalist Forces. Courage of Women and Children Unparalled in History—See Actual Fighting at Barcelona, Toledo, Madrid, etc.—Part of Receipts Go to Trade Union Relief for Spain.
25c to 5 P. M., Mon to Fri.
WORLD CINEMA 155 W. 49th St. | Near 7th Ave. Circle 7-5747.

EXHIBITION

From a Moscow Museum
FREE EXHIBIT of beautiful reproductions by Soviet technicians from the French section of the MUSEUM OF MODERN WESTERN ART in Moscow. Admission free.
WORKERS BOOK SHOP
50 E. 13th St., N. Y. C.

ADULT EDUCATION

RALPH M. PEARSON'S
MAIL STUDY COURSES IN MODERN ART. PRACTICE in creative painting, modeling and drawing. THEORY: Analysis of current modern works. Bulletin on request. Summer address—E. Gloucester, Mass.

LANGUAGES

Language Phone Sets
Bought, sold, rented, exchanged. Language Service, 507-5th Ave. MUr. 2-4221.

MAGAZINE

WHAT IS YOUR STAND ON THE SOVIET UNION TODAY?

Are you a disillusioned radical?

Are you a Utopian liberal?

Are you shocked by recent events in Soviet Russia?

Are you a fair-weather friend?

For a forthright and stirring answer to the critics of recent events in Soviet Russia, read: "Faith in the Soviet Union," by Corliss Lamont, noted writer and lecturer, in the AUGUST issue of SOVIET RUSSIA TODAY

now on newsstands 15c the copy

If your bookstore or newsstand cannot supply you, send to Soviet Russia Today, 824 Broadway, N. Y. C.

WRITER'S SERVICE

State Your Literary Problem. Instruction, criticism, revision, consultation, marketing. Unquestionably superior service, reasonable charges. ROBERT L. NEWMAN, 251 West 71 St., N. Y. C.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · AUGUST 7, 1937 NUMBER 6

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 141

EDITORIALS:

NO PHILANDERING, MR. LIPPMANN 143
WAGE AND HOUR DECENCY 144
NEUTRALITY IN THE FAR EAST 144

ARMED REBELLION ON THE RIGHT by Paul Y. Anderson 146

FRANCO CANNOT WIN by Louis Fischer 148

GOD AND DR. BUCHMAN by Samuel Duker 150

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 152

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

NEW MOON by Louise Bogan 153
BICENTENARY by Joseph Wood Krutch 153
BLUEPRINT OF MEXICO by Anita Brenner 154
ANNE TO VICTORIA TO WALLIS by Harry Levin 154
LIBERTY: A REDEFINITION by Abram L. Harris 156
SHORTER NOTICES 156
FILMS by Mark Van Doren 158

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates
HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

✶

THE JAPANESE INVASION OF NORTH CHINA is not hard to interpret. In contrast to the seizure of Manchuria six years ago, Japan has made no pretext of self-defense or of the need of an outlet for its teeming population. Nor has there been any suggestion that Japanese citizens were maltreated. No resort was even made to the threadbare story that the local population demanded liberation from Chinese misrule. Without pretext or legal fiction, the Japanese attacked Peiping for the evident purpose of annexing North China to their existing domain on the Asiatic continent. To this end they bombed and burned defenseless cities and destroyed one of the leading universities in the Far East. They even threatened to extend their warfare against French and American troops because the latter did not cooperate in "cleaning up" Tientsin. Despite these crude and blundering tactics, Japan has succeeded in taking over the greater part of North China but at the cost of alienating practically the whole of world opinion, including that which is normally not disturbed by imperialist advances.

✶

THE SPEED WITH WHICH JAPAN HAS CLEARED northern Hopei of Chinese resistance is not to be taken as an indication that the Japanese can similarly crush the main Nanking armies. Peiping was strategically untenable, and the only first-class troops in the whole region were the Japanese-equipped soldiers of Yin Ju-keng's East Hopei Autonomous Area, who somewhat unexpectedly put patriotism ahead of their jobs. As the Japanese have not yet clashed with the main bodies of Nanking troops north of Paotingfu and Tsangchow, there is still a possibility that Japan may refrain from pushing its conquest southward. But with Chinese nationalism at white heat as a result of the wanton destruction of Tungchow and Tientsin, it is difficult to see how Nanking dares delay longer in forcing a final showdown.

✶

IN REPORTING NET EARNINGS OF $66,000,000 for the second quarter of 1937, Alfred P. Sloan, chairman of the board of the General Motors Corporation, launched a vicious attack against the C.I.O. for permitting the "unauthorized strikes" which cut into the corporation's profits. In view of increasing costs, Mr. Sloan indicated that a substantial increase in the price of cars was to be expected in the near future. Taken at their face value, the two statements indicate rather forcefully that capitalists have learned nothing since 1929. Let us set aside the charges and counter-charges of "irresponsibility" as irrelevant to the economic analysis. It is still clear that despite the increased wages and the losses suffered from strikes, General Motors made a net profit, after deducting taxes, of roughly $100 on each of the 658,000 cars sold during the quarter. Instead of passing on a portion of these huge earnings to the consumer in the form of lower prices, and thus obtaining greater volume, the management has served warning that it will increase prices even at the expense of reduced sales. The Brookings Institution studies have shown just how such short-sightedness precipitated the 1929 crash.

*

FRANK MURPHY HAS GOT HIMSELF TANGLED in as hopeless a web as ever troubled the dreams of a well-meaning labor governor. The Industrial Relations bill which he so hopefully introduced a few months ago came out of the legislative mill a thoroughly bad measure. It placed severe limitations on the right to picket, failed to define unfair practices, and gave a government board wide and dangerous power to control and prosecute unions. The A.F. of L., though opposed to some sections of the bill, urged Murphy to sign it, but from the C.I.O. came emphatic denunciation of the measure as "anti-labor." Responding to heavy and widespread pressure, Murphy vetoed the bill and reconvened his legislature to consider certain changes. These were not fundamental, however, and the revised draft met with no more approval from the C.I.O. than the original. But C.I.O. vs. A.F. of L. was only one part of the tangle. Mr. Murphy has a stubborn and reactionary Senate on his hands, and that body proceeded at once to reenact the original measure and adjourn without the required concurrence of the House. State police may round up the Senators and bring them back to Lansing, but what good that will do is certainly not apparent. The sum and substance of the matter is that Murphy and the A.F. of L., in their craze for some sort of regulation, must have an Industrial Relations bill, and they appear willing to trade with reactionary legislators to get it. In the nature of things, bargaining of that sort can only work to the advantage of the Girdlers and the Graces. Unless a state has both a progressive governor and a progressive legislature, friends of labor would do well to place their reliance on trade-union strength rather than fight for "enlightened" government regulation.

*

NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN MUST APPEAR TO Robert Vansittart as the perfect image of a British prime minister. Inspired by a combination of ancestor worship and plain reactionary sentiments, Mr. Chamberlain is busy placating all the fascist and near-fascist rulers of this unhappy world. The spectacle of the British prime minister exchanging personal letters with Mussolini will shortly be followed, no doubt, by the tableau of British recognition de jure of the Ethiopian conquest while Spain burns under the bombs of Italian planes in Mussolini's latest essay in imperialism. Mr. Chamberlain has even said that he would not mind visiting Mussolini himself, but foresees instead a meeting between Count Ciano and Mr. Eden, who will have a lot of distinguished world malefactors to write about in his memoirs. Meanwhile there is a new agitation for a visit to London by Baron Constantin von Neurath. All that is lacking is an exchange of greetings between Mr. Chamberlain and Prince Konoe of Japan, whose army is at present "operating" in China. We are all for cooperation, conciliation, and peace, but the inter-imperial-fascist "peace" which Mr. Chamberlain's policy portends holds little promise for the ordinary man in Ethiopia or Spain or China.

*

TRADE PAPERS PAY THEIR WAY BY PLAIN speaking. But sometimes we wonder whether the gusto with which these publications tell all springs entirely from the commercial necessity of giving the trade the "straight dope." Tide, trade paper for the advertising business, carried in its issue of July 15 an engaging item about Dr. James Rowland Angell, who recently became associated with the National Broadcasting Company in the capacity of educational counselor. Tide began by quoting the fulsome statement of the president of NBC: "Our organization is greatly honored by the privilege of having associated with it in a full-time capacity a man of Dr. Angell's distinguished attainments. . . . In joining us he is only changing his base of educational endeavor from New Haven to New York, from a university to the air. . . . " Tide then continued in its own merciless patois: "To most radio men the signing up of Dr. Angell was patently a shrewd bit of public relations." It went on to cite an article by Dr. Thomas H. Reed as revealing the true attitude of the commercial broadcasting companies toward education by radio, and concluded thus:

> Reed's doleful account of the actualities of the situation substantiates handsomely the trade's thinking that while Dr. Angell may be worth his $25,000 salary as a front man, he won't mean a thing as a programmer himself; his ideas either, unless he's guaranteed time and stations.

*

THOSE WEARY SOULS WHO SEE FUTILITY IN the work of the La Follette Civil Liberties Committee are referred to a letter sent out by the office of Governor Benson of Minnesota. It is addressed to Pinkerton's National Detective Agency in answer to that company's routine request for a renewal of its state license. "This is to notify you," writes Governor Benson, "that I have determined to refuse renewal of the license. . . . My reason for doing so is that I do not believe it sound public policy for any detective agency to operate in the state of Minnesota which carries on espionage activities against organized labor. I am satisfied that the Pinkerton agency carries on such activities, after having examined testimony taken before the La Follette Senate committee investigating violations of civil liberties pertaining to the activities of your agency."

PUBLIC LIBRARY
lingame, Cal.

SOMETHING CALLED THE CONSTITUTIONAL Educational League has been circulating a pamphlet entitled with heavy irony: "Join the C.I.O. and Help Build a Soviet America." Now in its fifth printing, the little work is packed tight with information such as that "the one place in New York where C.I.O. pamphlets are publicly on sale is at Communist Party headquarters." Powers Hapgood is revealed as using the C.I.O. to organize "on behalf of the Communists." Frank Palmer is described as editor of a "Communist tabloid." And revelation is made of "a very significant step . . . taken in the Red capital." It seems that before Moscow could go ahead with the plans for the American revolution the map of the United States had to be redrawn and the names of its principal cities changed. "The city of Detroit was renamed Lewistown." "Information" of this sort is neither new nor surprising, but the League goes on to strike a fresh note. To anyone "who can prove that a single charge made in this booklet is untrue" it offers a reward of $1,000. It is now two months since Robert Dunn of the Labor Research Association reported some twenty misstatements and demanded his check, but so far the League has been deliberately evasive and has refused to take action. However, Mr. Dunn's action may not have been in vain. The League has just issued a pamphlet version of a bitterly anti-C.I.O. speech by Clare Hoffman, Michigan's vigilante Congressman, and this time it is not offering even fifty cents a lie.

No Philandering, Mr. Lippmann

WITH the debonair playfulness that sometimes relieves his crusading columns, Mr. Walter Lippmann last week rallied the editors of The Nation for being "amiable philanderers" with the notion of a farmer-labor party. The occasion was an exultant commentary he wrote on the defection of Senator Nye and Representative Rankin from the progressive ranks and their attack on the Labor Relations Board. Any objective observer could have told us, says Mr. Lippmann, that agrarian radicals and industrial workers cannot make common cause. What separates them is an inherent conflict of economic interest.

We do not want to discuss philandering—either ours or Mr. Lippmann's. If he will forgive us our trespass on the farmer-labor movement, we will forgive him his advances to the Union League Club. We do want to thank Mr. Lippmann for giving prominence to a theme that is among the most fateful in our time. But in doing so, he has muffed the point. It is true that the city worker and the farmer have a conflict of economic interest. Each consumes the product of the other, and each has partly to pay for the increases in the other's income. But Mr. Lippmann should know from a knowledge of our history that American party politics has always cut across just such conflicts of interest. Jefferson, Jackson, and Van Buren successfully united the working farmers and the city workers in the same party. Lincoln performed the even greater feat of adding to this combination the northern industrialists. Since the Civil War both parties, Republicans and Democrats alike, have vied with each other in trying to bring under the same tent the worker, the farmer, the industrialist, and the financier. The control has lain with the last two, who have sought to bribe the worker with the promise of the full dinner pail and the farmer with incessant subsidies. Such bribery was possible as long as we were on the rising arc of national income. But with the Great Depression and the Not-So-Great Recovery, it has become clear that capitalism is not a permanent cornucopia—that our economic life needs to be reorganized and our national income redistributed in a way that makes sense.

Farmers and workers alike are therefore losing faith in the old parties. That much is clear. But it is also clear that they have not learned to pull together. And this not because of any inherent conflict of interest, for there is none. But let us distinguish between two groups of farmers and a third. Out of 6,000,000 American farmers, there are only 23,000 who employ more than ten workers. The rest—the large majority—are working ("independent") farmers. There are thus the agricultural workers, the working farmers, and the large landowners. The real conflict of interest lies between workers in field and factory alike and the large employers in both. The beet-sugar companies, the packing houses, the cannery owners, the cotton barons—these are as much industrialists as the steel moguls. Their fear is that the 3,000,000 potentially organizable farm, cannery, and packing-house workers will be organized. And their fear has some basis. At a convention at Denver early in July a start was made toward such organization, and affiliation with the C.I.O. was voted.

Hence the wave of anti-C.I.O. propaganda that has swept over the Middle West and Northwest. There has always been a standing hostility between town and countryside, between metropolis and hinterland. On this hostility the propaganda feeds. In Minnesota, the Dakotas, Kansas, Missouri, Ohio, Nebraska, and Wisconsin, the Granges and Farm Bureaus, which are dominated by the big landowners, are using press and radio to tell the working farmers that the C.I.O. is organizing against them. And it is because many of the farmers are believing this propaganda that the Nyes, the Burkes, the Bennett Clarks dare take their stand against labor and against the progressive phases of the New Deal.

No, Mr. Lippmann, this is not a philandering proposition. It may hold the destiny of your country and ours. The farmers of the Northwest and Middle West may easily, along with the white-collar city workers, become the backbone of American fascism. They have yet to learn that the identity of interest between them and the industrial workers is greater than any conflict of interest. There is a task ahead in teaching them that. It is a task for which no leader with adequate equipment has yet emerged. Meanwhile the C.I.O. must exert every energy not only to fight its enemies in industry, but to fight the lies its enemies are spreading among the farmers.

Wage and Hour Decency

IT is a wise government that limits its labor regulation to three functions: preserving civil liberties in strikes; providing machinery for collective bargaining; and setting minimum labor standards. Paul Y. Anderson's starkly factual account, elsewhere in this issue, of the employers' violence that has been tolerated in the steel strike points to a bad Administration record on the first count. The record on collective bargaining is much better. For the third, the Administration is making a start with the Black labor-standards bill, which passed the Senate last week and is due out of the House committee as we go to press.

We have no high illusions about the bill. It will not legislate a labor Utopia and is not meant to. It is meant to build a ceiling and a floor that will at least shut starvation out. For the industries whose products enter into interstate commerce, it establishes a federal board of five to determine maximum hours and minimum wages and to fight child labor. It was crushed in the Senate by an avalanche of amendments that have squeezed out much of its original strength. Where it once covered some 12,000,000 workers it now covers about 3,000,000. Various industries have been exempted. And what had formerly been an outright ban on child-labor products, basing itself squarely on Justice Holmes's famous dissent in Hammer v. Dagenhart, the second child-labor decision, has now been made more digestible for finicky Supreme Court stomachs by being modeled after the formula of the Sumner-Ashurst prison-goods act. All in all, the final Senate bill reminds us of Lincoln's remark about soup made by boiling the shadow of a pigeon that had been starved to death.

But a start is unquestionably better than nothing. The essential thing is to enact into law the principle that the federal government cannot escape the responsibility for setting minimum wages and maximum hours and for extirpating child labor as a barbaric survival. Of course there are divided counsels on the bill. There are those on the left whose fervor for labor is so great that they would rather see no legislation enacted at all than see an imperfect bill passed. Such end-of-session perfectionism seems to us as bad as the hypocrisy of those on the right who are (of course) all for wage-and-hour decency but who fear the powers granted to the board and want further time to study the bill.

We do not mean to belittle any sincere opposition. But it is well to eliminate first the specious objections. There remain two serious questions. One is economic: what effect will the bill have on marginal plants and on sectional differentials in the factors that enter into production cost? The answer is not clear in detail but clear enough in general terms. The effect will be to limit the use of labor exploitation as a competitive weapon in cutthroat and sectional competition. That it will also have an effect on the price structure is clear. But no nation can call itself civilized that keeps prices down by starvation wages and exhaustion hours. And the net economic effect, balancing increased purchasing power against increased prices, is certain to be a gain.

The second question is, on its face, political and sectional. Whose toes are trodden on by the bill? Judging from the direction of the cries of anguish, the pain is chiefly located in the Southern regions. It is no accident that the leader of the Democratic forces opposing the bill is Senator Pat Harrison of Mississippi, just as it was no accident that Representative Rankin of the same state was so bitter in his attack on the Labor Relations Board. Both of them take their stand on the five-dollar-a-week wages paid in the Tupelo mills. And whatever may be their liberalism when the issue does not strike home, they will fight the Civil War all over again before they will allow Tupelo pay rolls to be increased by outsiders from the North.

But we should not be misled into placing undue stress on the sectional aspect. The Harrisons, the Byrneses, the Georges are not defending the South: they are defending sub-human wages and working conditions. It is important to note that of twenty Democratic Senators from ten states below the Mason-Dixon line, eleven voted for the measure and nine against. The sectional influences operate within a larger economic framework. The real split in American life is between progressives and reactionaries. And that is true within the ranks of labor as well as among the spokesmen for the middle class. The C.I.O., despite a temporary crossing of wires between Mr. Lewis and Mr. Hillman, is for the measure. The A.F. of L., despite a similar crossing of wires between Mr. Green and Mr. Frey, is lukewarm about it. The sectional fight serves merely to obscure the more basic conflict.

Neutrality in the Far East

WITH war actually under way in the Far East, the discussion of how to keep the United States out of the next world conflict ceases to be academic and becomes one of the most pressing problems facing the American people. Nothing could be more false than to assume that because the war is being fought in Asia the United States is not likely to be involved. The fact that the last World War had its origin in Europe has led many, if not most, Americans to believe that the next must have similar roots. Our Neutrality Act and our national defense program are both based on that assumption. Actually our interests and commitments in the Far East are much greater than in Europe, and second only to those in Latin America. The Hay "Open Door" policy, the Nine Power Pact, and the Stimson non-recognition principle constitute a logical and consistent policy comparable to the Monroe Doctrine.

The present state of the European tinder-box undoubtedly increases the danger that the spark of the Sino-Japanese conflict may start a world conflagration. In

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

1931 the agencies of collective security at least exercised a moral influence; now they are completely impotent, destroyed by the shameless weakness of the democratic powers in the Ethiopian and Spanish conflicts. The formation of the Fascist Front has given Japan powerful allies in Europe who may be counted on to come to its support if the Soviet Union becomes involved in the hostilities. While Russia does not want war and is not likely to be drawn in immediately, the chances of its becoming entangled in the event of a protracted struggle are far from remote. The Soviet Union cannot be neutral at heart in a war of aggression launched by Japanese imperialism. If the Chinese Communists become deeply involved, as now seems likely, the Soviet Union can hardly do other than insist on its legal right to ship munitions and supplies to China, a step which will be relatively easy in view of its geographic position. Japan, on the other hand, will not hesitate to provoke a world war if Soviet assistance threatens its stake in Asia.

Even without a world conflict, there is more than a possibility that the United States may ultimately be drawn in. One incident involving the loss of lives of several Americans would not in itself be sufficient to precipitate us into war. But with Japan in its present temper, it is not difficult to envision a series of outrages in which American rights are brazenly disregarded. And since most Americans view Japan with a suspicion that is tinged with contempt, our jingoist papers would soon be crying for Japanese blood. Our financial stake in China may be relatively small, but our sentimental stake, the outgrowth of huge missionary interests, is perhaps greater than in any other country.

Against this threat our present neutrality legislation offers a very feeble defense. Indeed, it is an open question whether it does not actually increase the possibility of our becoming involved. As the act stands, the President is compelled to impose an embargo on the shipment of munitions and implements of war to both belligerents whenever he finds that there "exists a state of war." This embargo would not injure Japan in the slightest, since it already possesses its own munitions factories, but would work to the detriment of China, which is almost totally dependent on outside supplies. More serious would be the application of the discretionary cash-and-carry clause. Lacking both ships and cash, China would be denied access to the American market, while Japan would have no difficulty in obtaining the cotton, scrap iron, oil, and other raw materials which are essential to its war machine. Contrary to a widespread impression, the President has no power to restrict the export of these secondary war materials. Thus the United States would become an indispensable partner in the rape of China. Our economic machine would become geared with that of Japan, so that ultimately we might find ourselves no more able to call a halt than we were in 1917.

Defenders of the neutrality legislation do not deny that Japan would obtain the lion's share of our supplies, but they insist that the effect would be the same whether or not the neutrality law is invoked. The New Republic pointed out in a recent issue, for example, that if Japan blockaded the Chinese seacoast, as it is amply equipped to do, we would be denied the possibility of trading with China, and there would be nothing to prevent our building up a vast war trade with Japan. And it argues that under the present law the cash-and-carry provision would ultimately restrict this trade.

One answer to this argument has already been given by Senator Pittman, the author of the Neutrality Act. Under modern conditions countries do not declare war, and consequently cannot legally enforce a blockade. If the President were to declare that a state of war exists, Japan would utilize this as a pretext to impose a blockade which would throttle all trade with China. Left to its own devices, Japan may hesitate for months before taking an illegal action which would bring it into conflict with the other powers interested in China. Considerable doubt also exists whether the cash-and-carry provisions would limit our war trade with Japan in the slightest degree. The Island Empire has gold reserves of more than $450,000,000, and it normally sells some $170,000,000 worth of goods in this country each year. Credits are not barred under the Neutrality Act, and there is always the possibility of utilizing loans obtained elsewhere for purchases in the United States. Furthermore, experience has shown that credits have a way of being transformed into loans if business demands it.

Most Americans are not likely to take kindly to an arrangement which links us so closely with Japan in its attack on China. Yet if we apply the new neutrality regulations, it would be difficult to withdraw them later without openly insulting Japan. The logical way to deal with the dilemma in which the United States finds itself is to repeal the Neutrality Act. The present situation illustrates better than any amount of abstract argument the very real danger which is involved in attempts to avoid war by ignoring our world responsibilities. But the chances for repeal are very slight. It would be difficult for the Administration to reverse itself so completely after the fanfare which accompanied the adoption of an act which was "to keep us out of war." A much easier course would be to do as Senator Pittman suggests and ignore the law as long as possible. Unless war is declared, the President is under no compulsion to invoke the act; he has not done so in the comparable invasion of Spain by Italian troops.

Insistence on the right to trade equally with China and Japan may be a feeble substitute for the penalties of collective security, but it is probably the most that can be done under present circumstances. There is no reason, legal or moral, why the United States should go out of its way to aid the aggression, as it has in Spain, merely because it passed a law which was designed to keep us out of the last war. This does not imply that we should impose unilateral sanctions. Such action on the part of a single state would be an act of war. This does not, however, preclude individuals, organized or acting independently, from imposing such penalties as their conscience dictates. No country can expect to defy the mandates of world citizenship with complete impunity.

Armed Rebellion on the Right

BY PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, July 30

FOR several months an important section of American industry, led by the Republic Steel Corporation, has been in a state of open, armed rebellion against the authority of the United States government as expressed in the Wagner Act, and its mercenaries have inflicted heavy casualties in dead, wounded, and captured, without suffering any appreciable losses. The explanation of this astonishing military success is to be found in the fact that the government thus far has refrained from sending regular troops against the insurgents, being content to rely on the efforts of citizen volunteers armed with nothing more deadly than moral suasion. And moral suasion is a poor defense against bullets.

The object of this dispatch is to parade recent incidents of the rebellion in a connected sequence, and thereby attempt to explain why the commission of mass murder in certain localities of the United States has become bolder, safer, and more systematically organized during the last two months than at any other period since Al Capone, Dion O'Banion, the Genna brothers, and Bugs Moran made Chicago their private battleground. The two periods are alike in one respect, that the motive was profit. But whereas the police were merely corrupt and quiescent when the gangsters were killing one another, they are now doing the killing themselves; and whereas all sides in the gang wars were well armed, the police victims have all been unarmed workingmen or innocent bystanders.

On the afternoon of Memorial Day Sunday a holiday crowd of some 2,500 men, women, and children attended a mass meeting several blocks distant from the South Chicago plant of the Republic Steel Corporation, where a strike was in progress. At its conclusion most of them proceeded to a point a few blocks removed from the plant, and there a group of about 400 detached themselves from the main body and walked along a dirt road across an open field in the general direction of the plant, with the intention of marching past the gates, displaying signs appealing to the non-striking workers to come out and join them.

At the far corner of the field, before the gates were in sight, the paraders were halted by a long line of uniformed Chicago policemen, numbering 200 or more. During a parley which lasted not more than four minutes individuals at the front of the procession asked the police for permission to proceed through the line and establish peaceful picketing, as had been promised by Mayor Kelly, and were told in reply to "get the hell out of here." Then, upon a signal which consisted either of the firing of a shot in the air or the tossing of a gas grenade into the midst of the crowd, police charged into the left flank of the crowd, clubbing its members ferociously. From back in the throng a shower of small stones and sticks was thrown toward the police.

Instantly there was a terrific roar of pistol shots from all along the police line, and as the front rank of the marchers went down in a bloody tangle the bluecoats charged with smoking guns and flying nightsticks. Total dead: ten, of whom seven were shot in the back. Total suffering from gunshot wounds: approximately 50, of whom 62 per cent were shot in the back. Total injured from all causes: approximately 75, of whom at least two will be crippled for life. Three policemen were hospitalized. No policemen were shot. Cook County authorities took the position that the victims, including those shot in the back, were killed by policemen acting in self-defense. The coroner's jury sustained that position. Among the 67 persons arrested by police and fortunate—or unfortunate—enough to recover from their wounds, a large number are to be prosecuted for "conspiracy to commit an illegal act," a penitentiary offense.

On June 19 a mediation board appointed by Secretary Perkins met in Cleveland. It consisted of Charles P. Taft, chairman, son of the late President and Chief Justice; Lloyd Garrison, dean of the law school at Wisconsin University, and Assistant Secretary of Labor Edward F. McGrady. Also present were Tom Girdler, chairman of Republic Steel; Eugene Grace, chairman of Bethlehem, and lower-ranking spokesmen for Inland and Youngstown Sheet and Tube. The mediators had undertaken their task under the impression—theretofore shared by virtually everyone else—that the only issue was whether the operators would sign an agreement with the union. They were promptly disillusioned.

Spouting purple profanity, Girdler took the floor to declare that John L. Lewis was a so-and-so, that the C.I.O. was a racketeering outfit, that he would never enter into any kind of an agreement, oral or written, in this connection, and that it was his determination to "make wages conform to the price of steel, if it involves changing them from hour to hour." The more delicate sensibilities of Mr. Grace appeared to shrink when exposed to the rigors of his colleague's vocabulary, but at no stage did he fail to support his position. Patiently the mediators strove to devise some formula, but each successive attempt ended when Girdler pounded the table and bellowed: "God damn it, I tell you the answer is no!" The atmosphere of tension eased somewhat when Girdler departed for Washington to stage his act before the Senate Post Office Committee, to the applause of Senator Bailey, patron saint of the North Carolina textile industry, but after a week the negotiations collapsed and the board members returned to Washington to report to Secretary Perkins.

LIBRARY

After his appearance before the Post Office Committee Girdler presented himself at an exclusive press conference attended by six correspondents, and there he really took down his hair. His remarks about Governors Murphy and Earle, Myron Taylor, chairman of United States Steel, Secretary Perkins, McGrady, Taft, and Garrison cannot be printed here or in any other publication which is destined for the mails. They were not merely profane; they included insinuations which are not tolerated in ordinary locker-room conversation. He left a distinct impression that one of the things he needs most is to go to a competent psychiatrist and have his mind washed out with soap and water.

On June 29 President Roosevelt waived the rules of his press conference to allow himself to be quoted as follows: "Charlie Taft and I agreed that in the nation as a whole, in regard to the recent strike episodes, the majority of the people are saying just one thing—'A plague on both your houses!' "

Four days later Representative Ditter, a Pennsylvania Republican who had been tormenting Secretary Perkins for an opinion on the legality of sit-down strikes, received a reply in which she "deduced" from an opinion by the Third Circuit Court of Appeals in the Apex Hosiery case "that strikers may not lawfully use the sit-down method." Two days later Secretary of Commerce Roper made a radio speech in which he said: "The right to strike must be safeguarded, but equally fundamental is the right to work. . . . Extremists on either side of the prevailing controversy should harmonize their views with the attitude of the majority."

Meantime "the prevailing controversy" had continued to prevail at Republic's struck plant in Massillon, Ohio, but something was being done to "harmonize" the situation. Just when President Roosevelt was washing his hands of the distasteful affair by calling for "a plague on both your houses," Carl Meyers, district manager for Republic in the Canton-Massillon district, was sending for Chief Switter of the Massillon police. Switter later testified before the Labor Relations Board:

"Meyers wanted to know what the hell was going on over there—letting those hoodlums run the town. He wanted to know why we hadn't done like the Chicago police had done. They knew how to handle a situation, he said. He told me if the mills closed down Massillon would be nothing but a junction point, with no need for a mayor or a chief of police or any other city officials."

A Law and Order League, composed of Massillon's "leading" business men, was urging Switter to commission extra policemen for strike duty and offering to pay and equip them. General Marlin, who with a fine sense of impartiality had quartered two companies of the Ohio National Guard in the Republic plant, urged Switter to accept the offer. Harry Curley, a retired army officer, now in the contracting business, offered his services in organizing a larger police force. Finally two officials of Republic presented a list of "loyal" company employees and suggested that the proposed new policemen be selected from it!

Switter resisted valiantly for a few days. He emphasized that there had been no loss of life and no serious disorder. Local manufacturers held a luncheon and demanded action. The Law and Order League "climbed all over the mayor." General Marlin wanted to know why Switter wasn't "showing some signs of life," and when the chief of police explained that he was trying to select "neutral" men for the proposed new commissions the gallant general retorted: "This is no time to be neutral!"

On July 7 the city government and the chief of police capitulated, and thirty or forty Republic employees were sworn in as special policemen. Curley picked them from the proffered list. Republic indemnified their bonds. They were given badges and guns. On the evening of July 11 Chief Switter drove out of town on a picnic. Almost immediately, it appears from testimony, Curley took command of the department. He had no official standing. During the afternoon John Veto, a striker, passing a group of the new special policemen, heard Bill Henderson, a Republic foreman, remark: "We're going to clean them out tonight."

About eleven that night some fifteen or twenty of the "specials" arrived in front of strike headquarters and deployed in a line on the opposite side of the street. Two or three hundred strikers were loafing on the sidewalk in front of their building. An automobile occupied by a striker drew up, and the headlights shone on the police.

"Turn off those lights or we'll shoot them out," ordered a policeman. The motorist turned them out; then, becoming frightened and wishing to drive away, he turned them on again. From among the police came a shout: "All right, they asked for it—let 'em have it!"

The order was obeyed. Wild screams and shouts filled the air as the hail of police bullets crashed into the dense crowd before the strikers' building and tear-gas grenades whizzed through the windows. A dozen men fell to the sidewalk and others staggered about in the street moaning with pain. Total dead: two—one of them shot in the back of the head. Total wounded: 15. Total police injured: none.

In the hours following the killing, squads of police and special deputies raided rooming-houses in the vicinity, breaking down doors, dragging men from their beds, and questioning them as to whether they belonged to the union. Those who said they did—along with some who denied it—were loaded into National Guard trucks and carted off to the Massillon jail and the Canton workhouse. They were held two days, after which most of them were freed—but not before they had signed waivers releasing the city from any liability arising from property damage or false arrest. In that respect they fared better than their comrades at Chicago who will be tried.

Early this week a picket was killed before the gates of a Republic plant in Cleveland when he was run down by a truck operated by a "loyal worker." The latter has been arrested and may be tried for manslaughter. It would serve him right: he should know by now that under the rules of this game you are not permitted to kill a striker until you have been provided with a badge, and then you are expected to shoot him in the back—not run over him with a truck.

A few days ago the writer inquired of an authorized spokesman for the C.I.O. whether there had been a "break" with the Administration, and if not, whether one was anticipated. This was the reply:

"We don't want to 'break' with the Administration. God knows we worked and sacrificed to keep it in office. But we don't understand its attitude in the steel strike, and we are resentful to find that suddenly we are no longer politically respectable in the eyes of the Administration. Labor's money and labor's votes were welcome enough last fall, when the Girdlers and the Graces and the reactionary press were damning Roosevelt from hell to breakfast. But now, when Girdler and Grace have their claws in labor's throat, all we hear from the White House is—'A plague on both your houses!'

"We could quote Shakespeare—and the Bible, too—in this situation. President Roosevelt is not the first magistrate to wash his hands when faced with an issue of innocence and guilt. Neutrality ceases to be a virtue when authority is confronted with wanton, cold-blooded, deliberately planned murder. Nor does our case rest on moral grounds alone. The Department of Justice is prosecuting nobody for violating the Wagner Act. It is prosecuting nobody for violating the National Firearms Act. It is prosecuting nobody for violating the act prohibiting the interstate transportation of strikebreakers.

"Yet, with Tom Girdler and Eugene Grace defying the law and spitting in the eye of Secretary Perkins's mediation board, Attorney-General Cummings rushes to indict eight men on charges of obstructing the mails, brought by Tom Girdler's lawyer, although the Post Office Department had informed the Senate that no violation has been reported.

"We expected the Administration to be subjected to the drumfire of criticism now being hurled at it by the Tory press and the vested interests who fought Roosevelt for reelection. Knowing him as we did and do, we expected him to yield a little. But there is a difference between giving ground for strategic reasons and beating a full retreat. There is a stage at which one degenerates into the other. Has that stage been reached? We shall wait a little longer to see."

Franco Cannot Win

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Paris, July 20

I ARRIVED in Paris from Valencia on July 14. Armored cars, big tanks, small tanks, and cannon moved through the streets. I had seen the same kind of machines three days before in the hot hills of Castile. Holiday crowds watched a peaceful parade. In Spain similar equipment, spitting fire, was deciding the fate of villages, of men in uniform, of classes, of regimes, of a country, and perhaps more.

Each time I come out of Spain the calm and peace seem abnormal. Loud sounds do not come from bursting shells nor do airplanes drop bombs. The battalions and material that defiled through the Champs Elysées to celebrate the fall of the Bastille could finish Franco in a month and save France. France and England and Spain. Governments allege that their sole purpose is to keep the civil war from spreading throughout Europe. But why should the Spanish people alone face the forces of darkness?

I have allowed a week to intervene between me and Spain before undertaking a review of the first year of civil war. On July 17—twelve months ago—Franco rose in Morocco. Twenty-four hours later his rebellion was carried to the mainland. What has happened since then?

The oath-breaking generals must be disappointed. They never respected the common people. They never understood the social processes which they wished to stop. They therefore expected victory in a fortnight. Hitler and Mussolini fell into the same error. The whole Spanish civil war rests on a miscalculation. For actually the fascists have nursed their enemy to maturity and power. The Spanish republic was never as strong and real as it is today. When I suggested to a Spanish leader in Valencia that the war was substituting nationalist cohesion for feudal particularism—the Andalusian, Asturian, Castilian, and even the Catalan is becoming a Spaniard—he said the same thing began to happen in 1808. Mussolini is completing the work of Napoleon. Russia and Spain defeated Bonaparte. They thereby resisted the French Revolution and their own future.

Spain's feudal classes impeded economic change and the emergence of a fruitful nationalism. Now the masses, aided by those bourgeois elements whose weakness gave them the time and detachment to read history, have assumed both these tasks. Since July 18, 1936, the Spanish Loyalists have achieved a miracle of organization and discipline. The people of the depths have asserted themselves and discovered unsuspected sources of vigor, resistance, and leadership. The friends of Loyalist Spain are proud of its successful struggle against tremendous odds. Loyalist Spain is beginning to be proud of itself. At public meetings every reference to the beauty and potentialities of Spain, and to the nobility and glory in sacrifice of the Spanish people, is vociferously applauded. Once, when a lyrical speaker used the phrase "from Asturias to Aragon to Catalonia to Andalusia," a soldier shouted "Viva Andalusia." It sounded strange, and there was no echo. In Francoland they cry "Viva España" and mortgage Spain to Germany and Italy. The fact that the war in Spain is more and more a struggle against foreign invasion tends to intensify nationalist feeling. Deserters who have passed into Loyalist lines in recent months usually explain their act by disgust with foreign domination among the insurgents. Nationalism thus offers opportunities for propaganda in rebel territory and makes a pointed and honest argument for outside consumption. Spain is undoubtedly fighting to remain independent and free, and Franco is an enemy of his country because he is defending his class. The radicals must undertake a function which the reactionaries have discarded—to protect national interests. Negrin, the Socialist, is by the testimony of events a better Spaniard than the "nationalist" Franco. He is a better Spaniard because he is anti-fascist and socialist.

Bourgeois-born nationalism seeks to ignore or blur or suppress class differences. The nationalism that has grown out of the class conflict in Spain has the same name but another nature. It contains potentialities of evil, to be sure, yet it is first of all inevitable. Nobody in Spain invented this phenomenon; it came. It is, moreover, a mighty weapon. And as long as revolutionary regimes are few and isolated and therefore confined to limited geographical areas, their form must be national though their content need not be bourgeois.

The civil war was born a class war. In its present phase it is a war between nations. But the Loyalist nation is inspired by a social purpose, and the opposing camp is fascist. Thus the class issue has not disappeared. It has expanded. President Azaña, with whom I had a two-hour talk—it was a thrilling but unpublishable interview—thinks of himself as the standard-bearer of the republic and the supreme exponent of the new nationalism. At the same time, however, he accepts and supports the Communists' economic program. The Communists regard that program as national. Indeed, all Loyalist factions are agreed on the fundamental line of social development—anti-capitalism—so that I was able to ask a prominent left bourgeois Republican why he did not join the Communist Party. For in outlining the policy of the left Republicans he had stressed the necessity and desirability of agrarian collectivization and nationalization of industry.

Actually, bourgeois generals and politicians, and many peasants who approve the Communist Party's policy of protecting small property-holders, have joined its ranks. I think these people influence and are influenced. But essentially their new political affiliation reflects a despair of the old social system as well as a hope to salvage one or two of its remnants. This common platform of the progressive bourgeoisie, the Socialists, and the Communists lends tremendous power to the new Negrin government. Ideological bonds hold it together. The bourgeoisie knows that it is incapable of independent existence as a class. Its little parties are therefore the most weak and modest. It is no bar to the complete unity of all proletarian and peasant groups.

The obstruction lies rather in the moderation which the government parties advocate for the present in the old Spanish dispute as to whether political organizations or trade unions should be the axis of political life and economic activity, and in regrettable personal and group rivalries. The "outs"—the Caballero Socialists and the Anarchists—would stimulate anti-capitalist tendencies to a point where they might easily damage the Loyalist cause. This the government will resist. The Caballero group moreover is now being enmeshed in a peculiar contradiction: although its leadership is presumably Marxist, and therefore in principle anti-Syndicalist, it has lost control of the Socialist Party but still holds on in the U.G.T. trade-union federation. It sees its best chance of returning to power by forming a U.G.T.-C.N.T. coalition. The Anarchists, however, regard the C.N.T. not merely as a possible factor in a government but as a body whose individual trade-union units are to operate factories, collective farms, hydro-electric power stations, mines, trolley-car companies, etc. The entire U.G.T. tradition is hostile to this economic form, and the elements which now compose the government will have none of it. Syndicalist management became practically universal in Loyalist Spain immediately after July, 1936. The result often was ruined industrial equipment, reduced output—to which, however, the scarcity of raw material also contributed—and peasant disaffection. In recent months thousands of enterprises which ran themselves into bankruptcy have petitioned the government to intervene with financial assistance. Thus invited to become a receiver, the federal authorities intend in most instances to step in and take control. The Anarchist movement accordingly is being weakened not only by direct political and police repression, but also by economic measures which broaden the scope of government economy and eliminate the syndicates from industry. Simultaneously the central authorities are increasing their economic prerogative by establishing export monopolies for various important products and by setting up the government itself as sole importer. For the national exchequer is the only source of gold and foreign currency for purchases abroad.

Negrin's firm hand has created order and greater productivity in the rear and put an end to the obnoxious Anarchist terror. But the Anarchists should be courted as well as squeezed, for, notwithstanding the impurities in their membership, their political naivete, and their indiscipline, they are a revolutionary movement of considerable though exaggerated strength which can make a contribution to the new Spain. Under present conditions a danger lurks in the internal political situation. The Anarchists are being eliminated as an active factor. The Caballero Socialists, if they persist in their present tactics, may be outlawed within three months. There would remain the bourgeois Republicans, whose role is a minor one, the Communists, and the Negrin-Prieto Socialists. The Communist Party is conducting an intense, unrelenting, whirlwind campaign for the fusion of Communists and Socialists. If successful, this would mean an enlarged organization under Communist domination even if it joined the Second International. But a Communist political monopoly or the monopoly of any party would threaten the democracy which exists today in Spain and which can and should be maintained.

I recently walked down several central streets of Valencia with a cabinet minister at eleven o'clock in the morning and drew his attention to many hundreds of young civilian men. They were not in factories, they would be in their offices if they were government employees, and they were not in the army. All cities and villages in Loyalist Spain show a similar picture. The government needs greater power to put these vast human resources to work at winning the war. Yet the power necessary to accomplish this object might easily become excessive and assume the quality of dictatorship. This is a delicate matter which further complicates the problem of political parties.

Through it all, much better economic and military organization has been achieved in the last twelve months. The dislocation of economy is far less than one would expect in a civil war so murderous and prolonged; in fact, in many ways life is much too normal and comfortable. Thanks to the valiant efforts of the Minister of Agriculture, Vincent Uribe, farm output is expected to be 10 per cent higher this year than in the last year of peace. A clever handling of the peseta, energetic mobilization of domestic gold and foreign bond accumulations, and a wise foreign-trade policy make Valencia a financial Gibraltar. I suspect it even profited from the fall of the French franc. The country is not exhausted by the war. Some provinces, indeed, have felt it very little. Nor has the spirit tired. The nearer one gets to the front the more enthusiasm one encounters, and in Madrid and its environs there exists something which is sublime—suffering with dignity, perfect calm in the midst of ubiquitous danger, and a passion for victory.

The most encouraging change has taken place in the army. The war used to be laughably amateurish. What I saw at the fronts recently was impressive in its seriousness. The technical equipment employed in the latest Madrid offensive was superior in quantity and quality to that employed in any similar battle during the World War. And—mirabile dictu—the preparations were kept secret. This surely shows that Spain is changing.

I am more convinced than ever that the Loyalists will win. They can hold out for years. Can Germany and Italy hold Franco up for years?

God and Dr. Buchman

BY SAMUEL DUKER

THE dismissal of the Oxford Group movement as well-groomed revivalism is unrealistic. Purely from the religious point of view this movement constitutes a departure from previous revivalist sects, for it has penetrated the upper middle classes and professional groups almost exclusively. Dr. Buchman has achieved this by the adroit use of evangelistic concepts. Talk about sin and God is employed to give religious significance to a comfortable credo of possession in an uncomfortable world. And he has gone beyond enlisting the spiritual allegiance of the wealthy. He has furnished activity which to them has a socially useful meaning; they are "life-changers" and "world-changers." In their work they commute between continents. They stop at the best hotels, meet the most charming people in each community—and all for God. Many have given up their normal occupations to engage in changing lives. These live purely on manna, on "faith and prayer," but in their own words this doesn't mean living in a log cabin; prosperous brethren help the few less affluent. Dr. Buchman himself has been maintaining a high standard of living on faith and prayer for over ten years. He explains it by saying, "God is a millionaire."

But today a religious credo without a social program, however general, must fall flat. The Group, too, reaches out beyond individual conversion and makes its social message a basis of additional appeal. "The Oxford Group," its leader declares, "is a Christian revolution. Its aim is a new social order under the dictatorship of the spirit of God, making for . . . cleaner business, cleaner politics, for the elimination of political, industrial, and racial antagonism." The language differs from that of other political and social cure-alls, but it is eminently palatable for good people, for respectable citizens.

Yet this call to revolution should not be thought an attack on a faulty social system, for primarily it is the individual who is at fault and in need of changing. "I saw it was not a new system we needed, but a new people; not a new division of wealth, but a new discernment of where wealth lies; not a new kind of government, but a new quality of life," writes an American follower. At the same time leaders of the Group freely lambaste the "paradox of poverty in the midst of plenty." They go no further than denunciation, and shy away from analysis of the relationship between that poverty and the distribution of wealth. Spiritual wealth is the sole wealth worth sharing.

The incongruity of crying even such revolution from a Rolls-Royce is made possible by the theology of the Group. God has a plan for everyone and for everything—a detailed plan of thought and action. The faithful in regular "quiet times" listen to him and note his messages. Sometimes these are trivial; like sending the name of an undergraduate who is wickedly cutting classes. But if one is in search of a message, God will not deny it; he is in fact always "broadcasting." Under such circumstances the Christian revolution naturally assumes the character desired by its adherents. The possibilities of such guidance are infinite, and the writings of the Group are sprinkled with references to what will happen under "God-guided statesmen" and, of late, "God-guided dictators." On specific topics the stand of the movement has been sufficiently clear to rally conservatives in the church, politics, and business to its support. Not Christianity, but what Christianity can do against radicalism, is the theme of their doctrine. At meetings of the Group the flags of the nations, including the swastika, are displayed. But the flag of the Soviets is never there.

The Group does not shrink from the problems which radicalism tries to face. On such subjects as unemployment, social unrest, and labor its stand is reassuring to the status quo. The nature and cure of unemployment are illustrative. The Group starts with a redefinition of the term. Members speak seriously of the "leisured unemployed" as well as of "people without fixed jobs." A convert to the movement, without a fixed job, told one of their international gatherings that "there is no such thing as unemployment. Everybody who is not working for God is unemployed." He himself had found employment eighteen hours a day in life-changing. His point of view moved the chairman of the meeting (one of the leisured unemployed?) to remark, "Unemployment on this basis ceases to become a problem and becomes an opportunity." The substance of this view has received official approval from Dr. Buchman. "The church, if it so willed, could quickly dispose of unemployment. It could set every unemployed man to work for Christ."

Now let us look at the Group's specific treatment of social problems. Since it is an "inner revolution" rather than social change which is the answer to the world's needs, the life-changers have been hard at it among the "slum-dwellers." One of the Group, a hotel director, talked with a Communist who had led marches of unemployed on the town hall. As a result the Communist agitator decided "to throw in his lot with Christian revolutionaries." The report of this conversion concludes: "Now there has grown out of a group of his friends who were a center of disaffection a group of disciplined life-changers." Two mayors in the section of England where this revolution took place welcomed "the new spirit which the Group was bringing to their towns."

Restless workers become marvelously tractable under the spell of contact with "changed" persons. The "change" in a foreman in an Oslö factory led the strike committee which had been gathering funds for a strike to abandon its wicked design. The publication of this news caused a Norwegian business man to exclaim that he was reading things in the newspapers which previously he had seen only in the New Testament.

Some members of the Group had taken part in the settlement of a West Coast cannery strike. On the basis of that experience one Grouper reported that neither side was honest, since each tried to get as much as possible. The president of the Vancouver Stock Exchange and a British Columbia packer both thanked the Group for its efforts "which had saved the industry millions of dollars." While the president of the stock exchange later sent a cable to a Group at Oxford, declaring, "My vision for Canada is complete realization of God as the only power, and we must all be about our Father's business, as there is no time to lose." The definitive pronunciamento on this historic achievement comes from the founder, Dr. Buchman. "The strike," he says, "was dissolved before the potent standards of absolute honesty, absolute purity, absolute unselfishness, and absolute love."

The strength of the movement is a matter of speculation. It has grown amazingly in the last three years; at the Stockbridge session last summer more literature was sold than ever before in this country. Its expansion, however, is not that of a mass movement. The entire trend of activity is directed toward a strongly centralized organization, with nuclei of faithful and dependable "teams" throughout the country. David Lawrence (United States Daily, December 21, 1936) suggested that the Oxford Group movement should follow the organization methods of American political parties and "mobilize" the country against class warfare by the technique used to "mobilize" it for Roosevelt.

No figures on membership are available. Indeed, the leaders of the Group deny that it is an "organization" or that it has "members." They are merely interested in the revivifying of existing institutions. So long as the support of the churches remains one of the prime sources of strength for the movement, the leaders will not attempt to build up a membership body outside the churches. Such rivalry would mean the alienation of the churches. Perhaps another important factor is the view that the Group should "sell" its ideas to the public and get the public's support without its allegiance. "The American people are dumb," a man prominent in the movement in the East declared; "tie a bell to an idea and they'll follow it." The effort is to build public opinion in support of the program of the Group.

As a result, the attendance at propaganda meetings is significant, indicating the activity and efficiency of the inner groups controlling the movement. In America there have been no meetings of 10,000 or 15,000 people, such as have been held in Europe and Canada. However, America is the most recent of the English-speaking countries to receive Dr. Buchman's attention. At the Stockbridge session the attendance during the week varied between 2,000 and 5,000 people. Of these some 1,500 were members of teams, leaders, and regular hangers-on. The names of a few of those affiliated are an index to the appeal of the movement: Mr. and Mrs. Cleveland Dodge, James D. Newton of the Firestone Tire and Rubber Company, Mrs. Harry Guggenheim, Mr. and Mrs. George W. Hale Smith, Mrs. Henry Noble MacCracken. Mrs. Henry Ford was the featured visitor.

To what extent the political potentialities of the Oxford Group will be exploited is a matter of speculation. Dr. Buchman is politically ambitious. He has repeatedly expressed a longing for a dictator and admires Hitler greatly. He is ever on the search for "key people" who might adopt his movement as their political platform, and the propaganda of the Group is widespread and unceasing. But in effect it is biding its time now; Dr. Buchman is waiting for those who need him and his philosophy most to take it up and exploit its possibilities. Without them he will get nowhere; with their aid he may go far.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

SENATOR Hiram Johnson, the former Bull-Mooser, long considered a dangerous radical, cried out "Glory be to God" when he was told that the Supreme Court bill was finally shelved. If I cannot be as dramatic as the Senator, I cannot deny my happiness at the result for various reasons. None of them will seem valid to those who are able to perceive in the opposition to the President's measure merely a desire to strike indirectly at labor and the whole New Deal program; who believe that the hue and cry was solely due to Big Business machinations, to the utterly discredited Republican Party machine, and to the capitalistic daily press; who felt that all the liberals who opposed the proposal had either become senile, like myself, or had been bought, or gone bad out of innate, if hitherto hidden, depravity.

While I have never been among those who accused Mr. Roosevelt of seeking to be a dictator or believed it, there can be no question that the road to dictatorship was opened wide by Congress in the first two years of his administration. Indeed, it has never been denied that seventy-seven new powers and authorities were conferred upon him in the first one hundred days of his rule, and that despotic economic powers no one ever dreamed of bestowing upon an American president were given to him when Congress was too terrified to do else than vote the bills he asked for without even stopping to read them. I hold it, therefore, in these days of incipient fascism a cause for congratulation that Congress has exercised its constitutional right to make its will supreme, for better or for worse.

It must not be forgotten that no one in House or Senate proposed this legislation or had a hand in drafting it. It was secretly prepared and sprung upon the Congress in a manner to raise a question of vast importance—whether the President shall allocate to himself the law-drafting initiative and then demand that his party majority pass it, and back his demand with all the tremendous power of patronage which he wields. Leadership we ask and expect in the President, of course, and the right to recommend measures whenever he sees fit. But to draft such a bill as this in secret without any public demand for it—when he declared the people gave him a mandate for this legislation in the last election he certainly misstated the facts—and then seek to jam it through by cracking the party whip, that is a procedure which if frequently or regularly repeated will lead directly to the downfall of Congress and again open the path to a dictator.

I am pleased by the President's defeat because I believe it will put a crimp in the third-term talk so glibly voiced by Governor Earle and others. If there ever was a time in our history when the country should hold fast to the two-term tradition, it is now. Yet I have before me a letter in the Wisconsin Progressive which demands the renomination of Roosevelt for a third term because we have no one else to turn to! When General Grant tried for a third term people were sufficiently aroused to put an end to that aspiration of the victor of Appomattox, which was then only eleven years in the past. Then there was no such world-wide drift to fascism, no such hot impatience with democratic government as has affected many Americans today. There were not many serious domestic issues, although much indignation at the corruption of the Grant regime; but none the less, the revolt against any third term was widespread and effective. If Mr. Roosevelt should make the dreadful mistake of seeking to run again—I am confident that he is far too great a patriot to consider it—I for one should expect to campaign against him by day and by night as for the very life of the Republic.

Again I rejoice that the vote to shelve the Supreme Court proposal was so overwhelming—seventy to twenty—for it proves the truth of what has been said by the opposition, that really only a handful of Senators were, like Senator La Follette, sincerely for the bill. A close vote would have led to all sorts of charges. It is now established beyond refutation that the bulk of the Senators were opposed, and those who were going along merely because of party loyalty took advantage of the first opportunity to throw off their party bonds. My next heresy is that I feel that this affords proof that public opinion can still be aroused and, if aroused, can control. There will be many to hoot at this and say that it was all cooked up and bought by reactionaries and Republican politicians who saw a chance to hit the President effectively at last. Perhaps so. I can only affirm my honest dissent from that on the basis of forty years of experience in observing and gauging public opinion.

So what? Well, I know exactly what. It is up to us who opposed the President's measure but who have always favored the curbing of the Supreme Court's veto power to demonstrate that we are sincere in our demand that Congress shall be free to exercise the same right to legislate along lines of social and economic advancement and security that inheres in every other parliament which is still intact and unchained. I have already been asked whether I would heed a call for a convention to start the fight for an amendment and to marshal the arguments which seem to me unanswerable. How I wish that the President would come forward, admit his defeat, and work for such an amendment! In my judgment it could then be got quickly. But whether he does or does not come along, the demand for the amendment must make itself felt at once.

RLINGAME LIBRARY
Cal.

BOOKS and the ARTS

New Moon

BY LOUISE BOGAN

Cruel time-servers, here is the crescent moon,
Curved right to left in the sky, facing planets attendant.

Over the houses, leaned in the silent air,
Purest along the edge of darkness infinite.

Under it, men return from the office and factory,
From the little store at the corner of Eighty-eighth Street.

On the gnawed snow, or under the breezes of autumn,
With hope and fear in their hearts, and their arms full of groceries.

Above the trim suit, above the flesh starved or satiate,
Above the set hair, above the machines in the beauty-shops;

Above the young men, thinking the popular song;
Above the children, who now in the dusk go wild.

Crescent, horn, cusp, above the clinics, the lodgings,
Sweet curve, sweet light, new thin moon, now purely at ease,
Above the old, going home to their deafness, their madness,
Their cancer, age, ugliness, pain, diabetes.

Bicentenary

EDWARD GIBBON. By D. M. Low. Random House. $3.50.

WHEN Gibbon came to write the purple passages of his autobiography he had ceased to be Edward Gibbon and had become instead "the Historian of the Roman Empire." What he produced is a masterpiece in its own way, but it is less the life-story of a man than some account of the origins of that already recognized institution, himself. He had had no Boswell; he most assuredly did not want one; and when he called attention to the fact that he was giving no intimate portraits of his contemporaries he was probably politely implying that he would thank these contemporaries to treat him with the same reserve. By no means contemptuous of fame, he wanted to be remembered chiefly in such postures as those he himself preserved in the famous passages which describe how he conceived his great project in full view of the Roman Forum and rose from composing the last page of the last volume to meditate upon a solemn but dignified thought: "Whatsoever might be the future date of my 'History,' the life of the historian must be short and precarious." On the whole he would probably have preferred that posterity should know no more of his one significant romance than he thought it proper for himself to tell: "I sighed as a lover, I obeyed as a son."

Some years ago Mr. Low edited the more intimate "Journal" and now, in a bicentenary biography, brings together what can be collected from scattered sources to supplement Gibbon's own account of his life. It is not, to tell the truth, a very great deal—partly, no doubt, because Gibbon's official and intellectual life was, in actual fact, so much the largest part of the whole. He enjoyed being mildly foppish in the fashionable circles of Lausanne; he attended the dinners of The Club in London; and he so far adopted the reigning convention as to complain on one occasion of being treated more as a writer than as a young gentleman of fashion. But he was bookish by nature and probably never thoroughly at home in society. It would be easy indeed to think that one was being funny at the expense of this shy and pompous man who, besides being fat, falsetto, and less than five feet tall, bulged ludicrously in a particularly embarrassing place. But to the credit of Mr. Low's good judgment be it said, he tries nothing of the kind and is content for the most part to chronicle quietly what he has been able to find out.

From Fontenelle—one of Gibbon's favorites—he quotes a passage in which Fontenelle expounds a pet idea concerning the essential changelessness of human nature. Nothing, I think, could give a more useful clue to the defect which a modern reader of the "Decline and Fall" is likely both to feel most keenly and to find most difficult to specify. It has been said that no other major historical work written before the nineteenth century is so little subject to correction, and that may well be true so far as fact is concerned. But to read on past the point where one has ceased to be hypnotized by the majestic march of the style is to feel more and more strongly that what one is witnessing is primarily a pageant, almost a puppet-show. Down through the long, slow centuries only the costumes change. Men are always acting from the same motives and seeking the same ends. Virtue, Vice, Avarice, Patriotism, and Courage remain the same simple abstractions, meaning precisely the same in the third century as in the sixth. There are great men and small, good men and bad, but they are great or small, good or bad in precisely the way that an eighteenth-century gentleman brought up on the classics would be. Gibbon conceives of no psychology except that of his own day. He cannot think himself into any culture or civilization not his own. To believe that human nature never changes and to interpret that belief as narrowly as he did is to come very close to having no historical sense as we understand the term.

Thanks to the existence of certain letters, Mr. Low is able to tell pretty fully the story of Gibbon's abortive romance with Susan Curchod, the attractive Swiss belle whom he found it necessary to jilt in the end. She was persistent enough to force him into an explicit renunciation, and he felt sufficiently uncomfortable to persuade himself that she was somehow unworthy. But the truth probably is that Gibbon always preferred faintly erotic friendships to any more passionate relations and that he did not suffer too deeply. Mr. Low undertakes to defend him on the ground that a young man dependent on his father's bounty could hardly do anything but obey. The fact remains that a good many young men, whether wisely or not, have found other things to do, and the real defense is not that no other course was open but simply that Gibbon knew himself well enough to know that he was not one to count the world well lost. He may not seem heroic in the role he chose to play, but it is much easier to respect him than it is to respect a man who so overestimates his capacity for feeling as to make gestures he will later regret. Gibbon in love is a comic figure because acquiescence in the anti-heroic is the essence of comedy, but he is not a farcical one and there is nothing contemptible about the hero of a comedy. "I sighed as a lover, I obeyed as a son" is probably perfectly sincere and perfectly accurate. To see oneself that clearly and to estimate one's capacities that justly is not to be ridiculous. Fortunately Susan was able to marry a wealthy, agreeable man, and if Gibbon, grown very famous, was almost too well satisfied with his position as an honored intimate in the family circle, there is no reason why anyone else should be more disturbed than he was himself by the fact that Susan's husband trusted him with what others might have found an unflattering completeness.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Blueprint of Mexico

PORTRAIT OF MEXICO. By Bertram Wolfe, with 249 illustrations of paintings by Diego Rivera. Covici-Friede. $4.75.

YEARS ago, judging by the work that went into his book, Bertram Wolfe decided to supply the crying need for a popular history of Mexico by providing it in pictures modestly "footnoted." The "portrait" would be Rivera's, the catalogue raisonné Wolfe's, and the combination a subjective-objective exposition of Mexico that would be, as it is, unique and invaluable. It isn't an art book and it isn't a history; and it is too analytical and methodical for a "portrait." Blueprint is a better word.

Mr. Wolfe, who is a careful and scholarly chronicler, compacts into thirteen chapters a history of Mexico from its beginnings to the time of Cárdenas. More than once this reviewer was compelled to disagree with his analyses in matters of detail, and remained unconvinced by his interpretations; but the book will nevertheless serve for a long time as the most brilliant articulation of the complex Mexican political and social pattern yet made available.

The chronicle proper is weakest in its presentation of pre-European material. Mr. Wolfe is a historian, not an ethnologist, and he over-simplifies the native cultures into familiar Marxist phenomena. But he brings great order out of the political-economic-military chaos of the nineteenth century, coupling it cleanly to what came before and what came after, thereby rendering the modern history of Mexico really comprehensible. His sections on the revolution of 1910-1920 and its leaders are especially valuable in view of all the sentimental confusion that clutters most of the literature dealing with these figures. And on page 173 there is a summary of the contemporary political pattern that ought to be neatly engraved on something durable and given to newspapermen along with their credentials. One such hornbook, for example, would have spared Mr. Kluckhohn thousands and thousands of excited words. Wolfe gives General Obregón the credit for having evolved the cynical dialectic by which he and every ruler since has controlled Mexico. In all likelihood the technique is hardly so deliberate and conscious as he would have us believe. Yet the effect is probably very close to Wolfe's general estimate. According to the author, it is a kind of see-saw between the internal peasant-worker bloc and the external capitalist force, with army politicians at the fulcrum to determine the point of balance.

Obregón, says Wolfe, "discovered a rough mathematical formula . . . the masses could generally be kept contented with a maximum of radical phrases and a minimum of actual deeds; on the other hand, the hard-boiled financiers were not too exigent as to phraseology but fearfully exacting as to actions." The word for this combination is demagogy, and constitutes an explanation of three-fourths of what goes on and what bewilders newspapermen—especially those who like to think they are watching over American interests.

This, declares Wolfe (furnishing details about Obregón that might as patly be applied to Cárdenas as well), "explains why on one day Obregón nullifies the oil sections of Article Twenty-seven of the Constitution, granting every demand to the American oil companies, and the next day makes one of the most radical pronouncements as to governmental theory ever heard outside of the Soviet Union; why with one hand . . . he gives land in homeopathic doses to the peasants, and with the other he gives away the land as a whole to oil and mining companies. . . ."

The interesting consideration is that, whereas Obregón and Calles, who both ruled by this formula, were unprincipled men, Cárdenas, who is not, nevertheless steps into exactly the same pattern. The mechanics of the situation itself tosses him back and forth between capital and labor, and the net result is a zigzag traveling steadily right. It is a pity Mr. Wolfe does not describe how, when Calles had gone so far to the right that no leeway was left for a zigzag, Cárdenas was thrown up to displace him—Cárdenas as an expression not primarily of his own shrewdness, which is how Wolfe sees him, but of a tremendous nationwide resentment and discontent, which is what made him a kind of Jack the Giant-killer and the most popular president in the whole history of his land.

Nevertheless, as has already been suggested, Wolfe's book is an essential article of Mexicana; it belongs next to Gruening's, and has the advantage of being shorter, though unfortunately no easier to read, since it covers a great deal of ground and the style itself is pedagogical. The Rivera plates are all together in the back of the book (the back half). It would have been much more illuminating and exciting to combine text and illustrations, and there is no excuse for having wasted space providing margins around pictures already reduced in scale from meters to less than inches. The plates do Rivera the justice of completeness but a great injustice as to character; you get no adequate sense of scale, texture, or tonal value from the way they are reproduced, and though great loss is of course unavoidable from fresco mural to half tone, there is more loss here than necessary.

ANITA BRENNER

Anne to Victoria to Wallis

FROM ANNE TO VICTORIA. Edited by Bonamy Dobrée. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.75.

THE English eighteenth century is the preserve of systematizers and the playground of sentimentalists. In the abstract it has been interpreted by a series of drastic generalizations—Augustan enlightenment, pre-romanticism, the assumption that rules were universally obeyed, reason held inviolate sway, and human nature somehow differed from what it has been in the centuries before and since. In the concrete it has charged the atmosphere with picturesque details—powder and pomatum, sedan chairs, a theory of cultural development that radiates from the Pump Room and the Cheshire Cheese. The plan of the present book is well calculated to upset these generalizations and overshadow these details.

Bonamy Dobrée conducts us, with characteristic tact, through a gallery of fifty portraits by various and congenial hands. His collection is neither a pantheon nor a curio cabinet; it remains random enough to constitute a scientific sampling of the time and place. It is integrated by the play of cross-reference and animated by the jostling of points of view. By carrying the chronology as far as Byron, it asserts a new continuity and challenges the old impression of a historical enclave. As a pictorial supplement to the more compendious volumes of Leslie Stephen, Lecky, or "Johnson's England" it intends and deserves to be popular.

Apparently the English have no trouble in mustering their writers out for such an occasion. The hands are old hands, their work is journeywork, and their names are those which are most familiar to readers of English reviews. An occasional retired officer or expatriate American can be descried among the college dons and denizens of Bloomsbury. The essays vary in tone and intention; Horace Walpole, for example, is discussed merely as a victim of expurgation. Naturally, the treatment of Swift or Johnson is cursory and banal, but it is refreshing to have satisfactory short accounts of less obvious figures—Joseph Priestley, Coke of Norfolk, Mary Wollstonecraft. Contributors are free to worship their respective subjects in their own way, yet the work as a whole seems suffused with promiscuous piety.

To read it from cover to cover is to learn that the age of Lytton Strachey is becoming almost as remote as the epoch from Anne to Victoria. Everything is extenuated and only a little is set down in malice. Where there is revision and revaluation, it is uniformly apologetic; biographical sketches almost succeed in convincing us that Marlborough was intransigeant, Clive humane, Wesley orthodox. Is not post-war skepticism ebbing fast? Has not the Archbishop of Canterbury called for a new age of faith? Thus these case histories of, by, and for Englishmen on the make comprise a series of program notes to the Coronation.

The stellar performance happens to be the work of an American—if George Santayana can be called that. His soliloquy on Bishop Berkeley makes explicit with sympathetic irony the worldly ties that held together the transcendent vision. This extreme case demonstrates how completely an undertone of worldliness pervades the volume's idealism. Edwin Muir, in a shrewd appraisal, traces the parallel curves of Scott's literary success and commercial failure, with the implication that qualities inherited from a romantic mother and a prudent father were only merged in an artistic stalemate. And Rebecca West, in a charmingly spiteful piece, makes a Pamela-heroine out of Mrs. Montagu.

As between the way of the world and the craft of the artist, some vital considerations are put forward in Herbert Read's study of William Hogarth. Read shows clearly enough that Hogarth's determination to revive native tradition and to popularize his art forced him into a medium which would broadcast his work and ultimately debase it by emphasizing content at the expense of form. But he refuses to recognize that, in the very process, Hogarth was making an important technical contribution; he ignores his morbid preoccupation with the serpentine line; he fails to read "The Rogue's Progress" in the light of "The Analysis of Beauty."

Contributions by the poets are most conveniently regarded as chapters in their peculiar critical autobiographies. The essay on Pope, like so much of W. H. Auden's writing, dissolves into a restless sequence of tossed-off suggestions. Keats and Shelley give Stephen Spender a further opportunity to explore the relations between the writer and his time, as well

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S

Romeo and Juliet

by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY—CONDUCTOR

New Victor Higher Fidelity Recording

Tschaikowsky's most romantic work . . . at once an overture and a tone poem . . . richly interpreted and magnificently recorded in this Victor Album.

5 sides on 12″ records. 6th side, Maiden with the Roses (from the Suite, "Swan-White") by Sibelius.

RCA VICTOR-ELECTROLA R-97, $84.50*. New automatic table-type electric phonograph that reproduces music with remarkable tone and volume, changes 10″ records automatically. Plays 10″ or 12″ records.

*f. o. b. Camden, N. J. All prices subject to change without notice.

RCA presents "The Magic Key" every Sunday 2 to 3 P. M., E. D. T., on the NBC Blue Network

The world's greatest artists are on Victor Records

VICTOR RECORDS

A Service of the Radio Corporation of America

as his technique. And finally we come to T. S. Eliot, who finally has come to Byron, and, with a masterly exhibit of fairness and patience, heard his recitation and given him his mark.

HARRY LEVIN

Liberty: A Redefinition

THE FUTURE OF LIBERTY. By George Soule. The Macmillan Company. $2.

THE conception of liberty that we have inherited from the eighteenth- and nineteenth-century economists and social philosophers is that of the freedom of the individual from the restraints of society. Fashioned on the economic basis of an early and expanding capitalism, it assumes a society of freely competing individuals secure in the enjoyment of property and more or less equal in the struggle for wealth. It holds that the individual is free when society exercises a minimum of control over his pursuit and enjoyment of wealth, over the public expression of his political and other opinions, and over his religious activities. Mr. Soule weighs this idea of liberty and concludes that today "it is not only useless" but "also actively dangerous."

As long as a considerable number of men could acquire property the "conception of liberty as absence of restraint" and the "assumption that the chief function of society is to protect this negative liberty" harmonized with the facts of the social order. But the conditions that gave birth to laissez faire, free competition, and civil liberty have long since passed. The capitalism of today is not that of petty traders, small industry, and men on the make. It is a capitalism of corporate wealth and large-scale enterprises dominated by a few industrialists and financiers and one in which the competitive market of small producers has receded before monopoly and quasi-monopolistic forces. Whether we like it or not, in our society the vast majority is without property while a small minority possesses vast wealth, and no great consolation can be found in the fact that some members of the middle class and some of the better-paid workers own automobiles and homes. This type of property does not confer on its owners any power to control the conditions under which they work and live. Moreover, many of these middle-class homes and automobiles, like the holdings of numerous small farmers, are hopelessly mortgaged. On the other hand, property which the minority of bankers and industrialists own is the means of production which gives them control over the nation's means of subsistence and the lives of workers and small-salaried people. Under these circumstances the conception of liberty as freedom from restraint can only mean repression for the mass of propertyless men. For it is to this concept that the American Liberty League and other organized property interests appeal when the propertyless seek to exercise control over their working and living conditions. To these interests liberty means freedom to enjoy property without interference from the government and, more especially, from the propertyless. To protect this liberty they have not only sought to obstruct social reforms through a closely knit system of lobbying but have also financed vigilantism, strike-breaking, race prejudice, and mass murder. Liberty as understood by the organized capitalists of our society is altogether vicious from the standpoint of the security, happiness, and freedom of workers and the propertyless middle class. If it is to have positive meaning as a guide to their action, it must be redefined.

In redefining liberty Mr. Soule begins not with the idea of absence of restraint but rather with that of "the existence of a coherent individual with ordered needs and purposes." These needs and purposes are, first, the satisfaction of material and cultural wants and, second, the free expression of human personality. Liberty is to be seen then as the freedom of the individual to satisfy these needs and purposes within a given industrial system and its institutional framework of values and ideals. When a given institutional set-up no longer affords the individual the opportunity to realize these ends his liberty disappears. And this, according to Mr. Soule, is the present plight of the overwhelming majority of propertyless and wage-earning mankind in capitalist society. He thinks that nothing short of a complete reorganization of economic life and a change in the symbols of social faith can restore liberty to the masses of men. A return to laissez-faire capitalism is out of the question. Socialism is much less difficult to achieve. A capitalism modified by planning, the manipulation of credit, the revaluation of currency, public works, and unemployment and old-age insurance may postpone necessary social change. But these modifications touch only the periphery of the economy. They do not reach the basic causes of insecurity, inequality, and the repression of liberty. In fact the great danger is that the forms of economic control, for example cartels and the NRA, instituted by a regulated capitalism will further depress the material life of the masses by restricting output and maintaining prices and will ultimately destroy their few remaining liberties.

The author's analysis of the economic sickness of our society is lucid. His defense of a planned socialist economy is able though brief. These, however, are not the chief merits of the book. Its importance is that it is an essentially Marxian analysis expressed in language that is intelligible and acceptable to an American audience. Mr. Soule believes that in this country "necessary social change can be made only by association with traditional American symbols." Therefore he does not appeal to the authority of Karl Marx for the right of revolution. This right, he thinks, is deeply imbedded in the traditions of American liberalism and it is stated in the Declaration of Independence that whenever any government becomes destructive of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness "it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute new government." Thus his sanction for revolution is a "revivified" and "transmuted" liberalism. This association of social change with the revolutionary traditions of liberalism is not only valid but a necessary basis for the development of a native radicalism in the United States.

ABRAM L. HARRIS

Shorter Notices

HOME IS WHERE YOU HANG YOUR CHILDHOOD, AND OTHER STORIES. By Leane Zugsmith. Random House. $1.50.

MISS Zugsmith writes the kind of stories that magazine editors usually take at first sight. Quite naturally so, for once the short story becomes the product of literary skill systematized into an applied science, the problems of imaginative perception fall away and mechanical inspiration makes everything easier for all concerned. But another result has been that the short story has become something that might be called the hardware of literature. Thus the stories in this volume are good enough as utensils, but quite empty of food and drink. Devoid of individual temper, insight, or language above the common level of the feminine hand in fiction, they combine social conscience of a conventional type with the sort of technical expertness which the academies of the genre try very hard to impart to their pupils. Miss Zugsmith does not spare herself at the conveyor-belt, and in the end the little story-machines emerge neat and shiny, ready to be packed and shipped away. Taking her themes from ordinary life—the small griefs of a young girl, a striker's wife learning the meaning of her husband's fight, the slow death of a crotchety old man, and so on—she handles them with frugal care, but on such a low-visioned plane that they are no sooner read than forgotten. PHILIP RAHV

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame Cal.

GLITTERING DEATH. By Joseph Peyré. Translated from the French by James Whitall. Random House. $2.50.

M. PEYRE, French provincial schoolmaster, with the aid of such stock properties as brothels, arenas, sanatoria, and much local color, has set in motion a synthetic little drama about the spiritual disintegration of Madrid's favorite torero. The plot is a familiar one, and even the most gullible reader can, after a few pages, predict Don Ricardo's eventual return to the arena and his death there in a grand and gory scene. Peyré has concentrated on the clinical aspects of his hero's downfall, hovering with a rather out-moded interest over each new psychopathic symptom. The book, in spite of its crisp style and Hemingway ending, appears old-fashioned and falsely supersensitive. Repeated references to current French snobbisms like Lincoln cars, Miami Beach, Johnny Walker whisky, and Joan Crawford, introduced perhaps for the benefit of an American audience, do not help bring the book up to date. Wedged in among the machine-made conversations, however, are brief flashes of labor disputes and cafe brawls, more French than Spanish, that give the reader courage for the gray pages to follow. As a great chronicler of bull-fighting M. Peyré, with all his documented information, still leaves Ibañez, Hemingway, and Montherlant in full possession of the arena. TOM SQUIRE STAR-BEGOTTEN. By H. G. Wells. Viking Press. $1.75.

SALON intellectuals who find history lacking in urbanity will be glad to hear that H. G. Wells has discovered a painless method for improving society. "Star-Begotten," his new scientific fantasy, assures us that social reform—even revolution—can now be left to cosmic rays, which are slowly creating a humanity without greed, without war, without profit. Right under our very noses cosmic rays are filling cradles with supermen who will some day direct the affairs of the world; and since their superior intelligence is irresistible we can be certain that they will have no difficulty in seizing power. To these anonymous messiahs Wells gives the name of Martians. Unlike some of Wells's thrillers, "Star-Begotten" is largely a record of gossip and debates about the benevolent effects of cosmic rays. The burden of the meager narrative is carried by Joseph Davis, a potential Martian, and the novel is the Odyssey of his wandering from boudoir to drawing-room to spread the new gospel. It is hardly necessary to add that these exercises in armchair science do not make very lively reading and suggest that Wells's power of entertainment is waning or that he is beginning to take his own dreams seriously. In either case the novel is a symptom of senility; nevertheless at the present stage in Wells's career this can scarcely be regarded as a loss to literature, and it is all to the good that Wells was unable to make so fantastic a version of science and society more palatable to his readers. WILLIAM PHILLIPS

The Ejido
MEXICO'S WAY OUT
By Eyler N. Simpson

MEXICO today—her land problems from pre-Conquest times to the present—suggestions for her future economic and social organization, brilliantly presented by a man who spent eight years in Mexico studying the agrarian question.

■ ". . . It is the most informative and stimulating book on Mexico the present reviewer has ever seen. It contains, in addition to its main theme, more of Mexican politics, history, ethnology, geography, and even of tourist lore, than most popular books which deal with these subjects individually."—Christian Science Monitor

850 pages. Illustrated. $5.00

U. N. C. PRESS ■ CHAPEL HILL, N. C.

Dynamic!

- Is Concentration of Control in Industry Increasing . . .
- Will Our Population be Greater in 1960? In 2150? . . .
- How Would a New European War Affect the United States . . .
- Should the Government Own the Federal Reserve Banks . . .
- Taxation for Revenue or Social Control . . .

?

You will find the answers—Complete and Unbiased—in

DYNAMIC AMERICA
381 Fourth Avenue, New York

P.S. Nation readers can get the next seven monthly issues for $1.00

TWIN PINES
A Camp for Adults

Individual screened sun porches, semi-private adjoining baths in de luxe rooms of new main house; comfortable bungalows. Tennis, handball, basketball, baseball, sand beach bathing, boating, fishing, etc.

For further details, address
TWIN PINES ON TROUT LAKE
S. SAIDEL, LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

MOVING?

If you subscribe to The Nation and expect to move soon, please give us three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new. We ask this to assure uninterrupted delivery of copies to you. Write to The Nation ■ 20 Vesey Street ● N. Y. C.

The Socialist Call announces that

JAMES T. FARRELL

OUTSTANDING NOVELIST AND CRITIC

has been added to its staff of top-notch writers. Mr. Farrell is writing a 1,000-word article each week, entitled

"THE CULTURAL FRONT"

in which he will discuss important books and articles of social consequence.

This outstanding feature is added to the regular Socialist Call columns, which include:

Norman Thomas
Herbert Zam
Benjamin Wolf
McAlister Coleman

These regular features, together with frequent contributions by Devere Allen, Gus Tyler, Anita Brenner, Roy E. Burt, Frank N. Trager, John Newton Thurber, James Rorty, Liston M. Oak, Sam Baron, Marceau Pivert, Jack Altman, Lillian Symes, Harry W. Laidler, Travers Clement, Howard Brubaker, Rose M. Stein, James Casey, and others, make

The Socialist Call

official organ, Socialist Party, U. S. A.

America's Left-Wing Pace-Setter Today!

Special Subscription Offer—1 year for $1

— USE THIS BLANK —

CALL PRESS, INC.
21 East 17th Street, New York City.

Enclosed find $1. Please send me The Socialist Call for the next 52 weeks. I want to read James T. Farrell's articles.

Name ....

Address ....

City .... State .... N

THE Nation ANNOUNCES . . .

Legal Peonage in Florida

In Florida, a statute makes the leaving of employment after receiving "advances" of money or sustenance prima facie evidence of intent to defraud, punishable by six months on the chain-gang. The passage of the law was backed by the big turpentine operators. The law is enforced only in cases which concern unskilled Negro labor in the piney woods.

Mr. O. K. Armstrong, who has investigated conditions of peonage in the lumber and turpentine camps in Florida, shows readers of The Nation, in an article scheduled for early publication, how this astonishing statute holds Negro workers in bondage.

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year for $5 ☐ two years for $8 ☐ three years for $11 ☐ I enclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name______________________________

Address______________________________

Extra Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50c 8-7-37

FILMS

SINCE last summer I have seen twenty-one films that would be worth discussing in any extended article on the season. They divide themselves into two groups:

I

"The Woman Alone"
"Razumov"
"Carnival in Flanders"
"A Day at the Races"
"Son of Mongolia"
"Great Guy"
"Janosik"
"The Devil Is a Sissy"
"Romeo and Juliet"
"The General Died at Dawn"
"The Plainsman"
"History Is Made at Night"
"Night Must Fall"

II

"Revolutionists"
"Prisoners"
"Kimiko"
"Elephant Boy"
"The Wave"
"Captains Courageous"
"Millions of Us"
"The Yellow Cruise"

They are not arranged here in the precise order of my preference, for the simple reason that I do not know what it is; though I am sure that "The Woman Alone" and "Razumov" were the two best pictures of the year. And the second group is to be considered not as inferior to the first, but as different from it. I found that the films arranged themselves quite naturally in two lists: those that were interesting primarily for their stories and those that were interesting primarily for their information, or at any rate for something secondary to the action.

This secondary interest can be of many kinds. In "Revolutionists" and "Prisoners," for instance, it is the interest of history; I do not remember the stories of those films at all, but I know I learned a great deal in the one case about revolutionary techniques a generation ago and in the other case about the psychology of sabotage in contemporary Russia. "Son of Mongolia," equally interesting for the glimpse it gave of a little-known race, was nevertheless a clear and excellent narrative with a memorable hero; so was "Janosik"; and consequently they belong elsewhere. "Kimiko" told me a little more about Japan than it did about its heroine and her father; and in their differing ways the other five were valuable for special reasons, not for the general reason which has to do with story—or, to take a larger term, with poetry.

That I prefer poetry to history I have hitherto confessed. So it is perhaps plain after all that the second group is in my opinion inferior to the first. But that is not to deny its importance, or to forget that the uses of the film are perhaps unlimited in number. It is simply that two seasons of moviegoing have convinced me of this: the camera, with brains and imagination behind it, is as much a master of the story-telling art as anything or anybody else. It will continue to attempt things which it cannot do as well as plays and novels do them, and possibly its duty to itself is still to make a great many mistakes from which the limits of its medium may be learned. Yet it has already produced its masterpieces—stories which no other art could have told as amusingly, as nobly, as swiftly, as well—and in the season just passed it has amply proved its right to be respected. To any doubter I can do no more in this column than recommend that he see either "The Woman Alone" or "Razumov."

MARK VAN DOREN

Letters to the Editors

Fascism Loses Ground

Dear Sirs: According to recent reports from different sections of Latin America, my article (Latin America: Boycott Fascism), published in The Nation of June 5, has promoted widespread discussion. I am also informed that the suggestion of a boycott of German and Italian trade has been taken up by various Spanish and Spanish-American organizations both here and in Latin America, among them the Apra. Frente Popular, organ of the Sociedades Hispanas Federadas, a federation of more than 100 Spanish societies helping the Spanish people with food and clothes, is urging a boycott of German and Italian goods and stores.

A reader of The Nation recently asked how Latin Americans could boycott German and Italian trade "when all bankers, importers, brokers, and buyers are also fascists." In the first place, not all of them are. But I did not expect bankers and importers and brokers, certainly not those serving German and Italian trade, to cut their own throats. I did not even expect their trade rivals to support the idea, even though the competitors of Germany and Italy in Latin America would gladly do anything to make Dr. Schacht's frantic schemes fail. The suggestion was addressed to the large body of consumers that might be reached through organizations — workers, students, teachers, professionals, residents of the various Spanish colonies, etc.— and petty shopkeepers and artisans who in many instances do their buying from visiting European salesmen. And they are beginning to respond. It is not business boycotting business, but a passive protest of many thousands of outraged people.

The last two months have seen a setback for fascist propaganda in Latin America. From the strangulation of Bilbao to the naval massacre of Almeria, the pro-fascist press has had a hard job to explain Italian boasting and German bombing. Headlines have weakened, and circulation figures dwindled in some capitals. What is even more significant, new anti-fascist journals, such as La Nueva España and España Republicana in Buenos Aires, have appeared and gained instant popularity.

A letter of recent date from Havana says that "up to a month or so ago most of the press was with the rebels." A straw vote taken by Bohemia, a magazine, to determine the comparative strength of fascist and anti-fascist opinion, showed that the anti-fascists are ten times stronger. My correspondent adds that "the undeclared boycott" of the pro-fascist press had threatened their circulation when Pueblo appeared. "Within two weeks of its appearance, Pueblo became the most widely read and solicited paper," and this swung the other newspapers to a change of tone.

While the fascist powers, after the conquest of Ethiopia and the attack on Spain, seemed to offer a serious threat to British control of Europe's sea routes, the governments of South American nations, whose foreign trade depends largely on Europe, remained silent. But as Spanish resistance stiffens, as Britain hastens the completion of her huge naval program and the threat seems less and less imminent, South American rulers are beginning to ask themselves what is the real strength of the fascist challenge.

The war boom that boosted South American export values during the past year has been weakening of late. And the fascist powers, in their commercial dealings with South America, are showing a fundamental financial feebleness. In the meantime the democratic powers and their allies have remained in control of the world's monetary resources, and South American dictators and diplomats are now hastening to proclaim their faith in "democracy." Some are even invoking the Monroe Doctrine. Saavedra Lamas, the famous Foreign Minister of Argentina, whose policy has for decades been antagonistic to the Monroe Doctrine and who even refused to recognize it before the League of Nations, has now climbed down by the mule's ears, as they say in Spanish, to declare that it is the best way to protect the republican form of government in the New World against "foreign ideologies."

German trade, by the way, recently sustained the most serious defeat in the South American market since the World War when the Brazilian government signed an agreement with the United States on July 15 undertaking to stop the subsidized expansion of German exports to Brazil in exchange for the granting of a $60,000,000 gold credit which the United States Treasury will make available to Rio de Janeiro in dollar exchange.

G. ARBAIZA

Branford, Conn., July 20

New Wrinkle

Dear Sirs: I have not noticed in your columns any comment regarding the recent interesting decision of the United States Supreme Court entitled "Senn vs. Tile Layers Protective Union, 81 L. Ed. 829." This case involved an interpretation of peaceful picketing under the Wisconsin Labor Code of 1935, and resulted in another five-to-four decision holding the Wisconsin statute constitutional.

The dissent, written by Justice Butler and concurred in by Van Devanter, McReynolds, and Sutherland, presented something new in legalistic acrobatics— namely, that a union which wished peacefully to picket a place of business, by using a sign advising that the employer was unfair, must first establish that the employer was actually unfair. This conclusion would force a union to resort first to some legal proceeding to determine whether or not the employer was unfair, and until the matter was adjudicated the picketing, no matter how peaceful, would be unlawful.

HARRY DRUKER

Marshalltown, Iowa, July 15

Plea from a Scottsboro Boy

Dear Sirs: I am quite sure you all have read the outcome of my trial, and seen that I was given a miscarriage of justice. I feel it is my duty to write you all the facts of my case, which you perhaps overlooked, or perhaps it was not published in the papers. I was framed, cheated, and robbed of my freedom. First, beginning March 25, 26, and 27, 1931, I wasn't charged with criminal assault on either girl, and was carried through the first, second, and third degree, and even on the basis I would gain my freedom by turning state evidence against the other eight boys. Just because I didn't know nothing, nor neither would I lie on the other boys the charge of rape was framed and placed against me on the 28th day of March, 1931.

I was tried, convicted, and given the death sentence, and in November, 1932, the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the sentence and a retrial ordered. The 19th day of July, 1937, I was retried and sentenced to 99 years' imprisonment.

Now I wish to call your attention to how the judge charged the jury. He charged them in a perjury way. Out of his one hour and twenty-five minutes summation he only mentioned acquittal three times and each time he contradicted it by saying if you juries find a doubt which goes to me reconsider it. Never did he mention a single defense witness in his hour and twenty-five minutes summation to the jury.

How can I receive justice in the state of Alabama, especially of Morgan County, when perjury is used against me and my attorneys too? And I beg you, dear friends, readers, all stick together and work and struggle together and see that justice be brought to light. Let us all pull and struggle together and see that justice be done. It is not that I hate to go to prison, but I am innocent, and the slander is being thrown on our race of people and my family, is my reason of wanting to fight harder than ever.

ANDY WRIGHT

Montgomery, Ala., July 24

Dictionaries Back Down

Dear Sirs: Your reviewer of "Milton and Wordsworth" on July 3 says "to distinguish among three kinds of poetry." This is bad English for "distinguish between three kinds." The dictionaries, stubborn as they have been, have now grown reasonable enough to back down from their attitude of permitting us to say "among" instead of "between" wherever more than two persons or things are involved. Not only do they no longer give such a sweeping permission, but they confess that the permission was invalid when they did give it, and that those who said "among the three" where they ought to have said "between the three" were speaking incorrectly even when they had the dictionaries at their back. It is now agreed that under many circumstances we have to say "between the three," not "among the three"; see especially the plain words in the big Oxford Dictionary under "between," definition 19. And "distinguish" is one of the words after which "between," not "among," is required; see the same dictionary under "distinguish."

STEVEN T. BYINGTON

Ballard Vale, Mass., July 3

CONTRIBUTORS

PAUL Y. ANDERSON, a Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, wrote the now famous description of the suppressed Paramount News film of the Memorial Day massacre in South Chicago.

SAMUEL DUKER, a student at the Harvard Law School, has made a study of Buchmanism.

LOUISE BOGAN, the poetry critic of the New Yorker, has just published a book of verse, "The Sleeping Fury."

ABRAM L. HARRIS, professor of economics at Howard University, is co-author with Sterling Spero of "The Black Worker" and author of "The Negro as Capitalist."

TOM SQUIRE formerly conducted the book section of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS is one of the editors of the Partisan Review.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

STATEMENT OF THE OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT, CIRCULATION, ETC., REQUIRED BY THE ACTS OF CONGRESS OF AUGUST 24, 1912, AND MARCH 3, 1933.

Of The Nation, published weekly, at New York, N. Y., for August 7, 1937.

STATE OF NEW YORK } ss.:
COUNTY OF NEW YORK }

Before me, a Notary Public in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Hugo Van Arx, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the business manager of The Nation, and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management (and if a daily paper, the circulation), etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, as amended by the Act of March 3, 1933, embodied in Section 537, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business manager are: Publisher, The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.; Editors, Freda Kirchwey, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.; Max Lerner, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.; Business Manager, Hugo Van Arx, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

2. That the owner is: (If owned by a corporation, its name and address must be stated and also immediately thereunder the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding one per cent or more of total amount of stock. If not owned by a corporation, the names and addresses of the individual owners must be given. If owned by a firm, company, or other unincorporated concern, its name and address, as well as those of each individual member, must be given.) The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.; Freda Kirchwey, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: (If there are none, so state.) None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

5. That the average number of copies of each issue of this publication sold or distributed, through the mails or otherwise, to paid subscribers during the twelve months preceding the date shown above is. (This information is required from daily publications only.)

HUGO VAN ARX,
Business Manager.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 7th day of August, 1937. TERESITA GRANT.

(My commission expires March 30, 1939.)
(Seal)

LITERARY SERVICES

Special Articles, Reviews, Theses, Speeches, prepared to specifications. Convenient Service. Authors Research Bureau, 516 Fifth Ave., New York.

WANTED

Couple driving Gaspé, Nova Scotia, Aug. 21. Want couple share expenses, driving. Return Labor Day. Box No. 939, c/o The Nation.

Educated, liberal couple to share Greenwich Village apartment with widower of many interests and son, 3, attending progressive nursery school. Box No. 941, c/o The Nation.

Gentleman to accompany party going Yellowstone Park in auto leaving N. Y. August 14th, share expenses. Phone: BEnsonhurst 6-5475.

RECORDS

MASTER PIECES OF MUSIC Announcing an extraordinary sale of 100,000 Parlophone, Odeon, Decca discs. These marvelous European recordings comprise the cream of the world's finest music. A selection to gratify every taste. Sale prices: 50c & 75c per record. Values, $1.50 & $2.00. Mail orders. Catalog.

Gramaphone Shop, Inc., 18 E. 48th St., N.Y.C.

EXHIBITION

From a Moscow Museum

FREE EXHIBIT of beautiful reproductions by Soviet technicians from the French section of the MUSEUM OF MODERN WESTERN ART in Moscow. Admission free.

WORKERS BOOK SHOP
50 E. 13th St., N. Y. C.

LANGUAGES

Language Phone Sets
Bought, sold, rented, exchanged. Language Service, 507-5th Ave. MUr. 2-4221.

DO YOU WANT—

A house in England—an apartment—a room—an office—a ranch—a secretary—a piano—a lecturer—a tutor—a telescope—a grandfather's clock—a bicycle.—

All of these have appeared in our Classified columns.

We have more than 41,000 readers you, too, can reach. Call the Advertising Department, COrtlandt 7-3330 by Friday, so your advertisement may be in the next week's issue.

RATES: 62 cents a line. Minimum three lines.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 14, 1937 NUMBER 7

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 161

EDITORIALS:

COURT REFORM: A RECESS 163
WILL CHIANG FIGHT? 164
THE GUILD VOTES 165
VIGILANTISM, 1937 by Benjamin Stolberg 166
SPANISH VILLAGE by Josephine Herbst 169
BEHIND THE SCENES AT SCOTTSBORO by Morris Shapiro 170
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 172
BROUN'S PAGE 173

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

"PART OF A POEM, PART OF A PLAY" by Philip Blair Rice 174
SOJOURN IN SODOM by Philip Rahv 174
PROLOGUE TO REVOLUTION by Avrahm Yarmolinsky 175
RELIGION IN WOOD by Mark Van Doren 175
WANTED: A SUPREME COURT PRIMER by Max Lerner 176
FOUR IN MIDSUMMER by Paul Love 177
SHORTER NOTICES 177
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 178

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates
HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

*

CONGRESS AT THE ELEVENTH HOUR PASSES bills pretty much the way one slaps things into a bag five minutes before train time. Viewing the resultant melange, we can only say that our legislators have served their constituents miserably. The axing of court reform was, after Mr. Roosevelt's surrender and Mr. Garner's betrayal, to be expected. So also the failure to deal with neutrality revision and the national resources message. The unashamed determination, in the face of a threatened veto, to push a sugar-quota bill, which would hurt America's island possessions in order to benefit the large Western sugar growers, is part of the ancient pattern of pressure politics. About the failure to take action on the executive reorganization bill we have few regrets: it needs time and debate. The wages-and-hours bill, as we said last week, is despite its inadequacy at least a start. But the most tragic failures have been the inaction on the farm program and the tragi-farce of the housing bill. The first must be set down to the vendetta of "Cotton Ed" Smith and the conservative Democrats against Secretary Wallace and to their fear that adequate legislation would help build him a political machine for 1940. Embittered by the failure of farm legislation, some of the farm Senators deepened their hatred for the large Eastern cities and spiked the Wagner slum-clearance bill. The President has, however, a very effective hold on the Southern Senators who have betrayed both the farm and the housing legislation. It is for him to determine whether the cotton-crop loans shall be renewed. And he would be a poor leader indeed if he did not first get an assurance that there will be adequate legislation both to raise farm living standards and to attack the city slums.

*

THE MID-SUMMER LULL IN THE SPANISH WAR has been made the occasion for a renewal of sensational reports of disaffection within both camps. Although several of these reports, such as the rumor of fighting on the streets of Barcelona and the death of Andres Nin, leader of the Trotskyist P.O.U.M., appear to be unfounded, the existence of disaffection on both sides is indisputable. In the rebel camp, feeling against the Italians and Germans has aroused serious opposition among elements that were previously inclined to favor General Franco. In government territory, friction with the Anarchists and P.O.U.M. does not appear to have vanished completely despite the recent rejuvenation of the Catalan armies on the Huesca and Teruel fronts. Particularly disconcerting is the report, thus far unconfirmed, that ex-Premier Largo Caballero, leader of the left-wing Socialists, had issued a statement criticizing the military and political policies of the Negrin government. Responsible observers have insisted from the beginning that the Spanish government could have suppressed the fascist revolt within a few weeks if it had been given the undivided support of all the various anti-fascist parties. While it is true that more progress in obtaining unity has been made in the past three months than in the previous nine, the task is yet far from completed.

*

THE SLUM POPULATION OF OUR CITIES WILL be benefited slightly, if at all, by the passage of the Wagner-Steagall Housing bill as amended in the Senate. Out of a number of weakening amendments, three stand out as particularly unfortunate. The Byrd amendment providing that no structure shall be built which costs more than $1,000 a room or $4,000 a family unit will virtually prevent construction in New York and other cities of the East where land and construction costs are exceptionally high and rising rapidly. Of a similar tenor is the provision that no one state should obtain more than 20 per cent of the $700,000,000 to be set aside for loans and subsidies. It may be assumed that this amendment will lead to great pressure from the less populous states for their "share" of the housing appropriation. Finally, the Logan amendment placing the Housing Authority under the Department of the Interior would seem to assure, in view of the department's record in recent years, that no houses will be built for many months to come. At best, the $700,000,000, with an additional 5 per cent contributed by the local housing authorities, will provide homes for no more than 200,000 of the 15,000,000 American families who are now living in insanitary, sub-standard houses. Is this to be the end of the long and arduous trail of housing reform?

*

MASSACHUSETTS POLICE SINCE THE FIRST OF the month have swept down in successive raids on Birth Control League clinics at Salem, Brookline, and Boston. Some contraceptives and a considerable quantity of literature were seized, and four women were placed under charges of violating the state law. League officials contend that the statute was never intended to bar doctors from giving contraceptive advice to patients for legitimate medical purposes. "We consider," says Mrs. Hawkridge, president of the Massachusetts League and one of those under arrest, "that a doctor has the right to do what he can to preserve the life of his patients." There are countless numbers who agree, and it will be hard for the Massachusetts officials to hold otherwise. The point at issue obviously lies in the degree of latitude to be allowed to responsible medical authorities in charge of the clinics. Those who face charges are doing the women of Massachusetts a genuine service by forcing a clarification of the law.

MAYOR LA GUARDIA IS REGARDED AS A friend of labor. He is also a doughty champion of religious freedom and a sworn enemy of Adolf Hitler. All of which is the stuff of which strong mayoralty candidates are made in New York. The Democrats know this, but they are of two minds as to how the menace is to be met. There are those who would fight fire with water—and they could hardly have found a more watery candidate than Dr. Copeland—and those who think that a synthetic flame of their own is needed to turn the trick. These last put their hopes now in Jeremiah T. Mahoney. Certainly Mr. Mahoney is a foe of der Führer, and on grounds that do him honor, but at that point his similarity to the Mayor does a quick fadeout. Mr. Mahoney is still Tammany leader of the 15th Assembly District, and he has "the highest regard and affection for Christy Sullivan," whom he himself indorsed to succeed Dooling in the Tammany leadership. While supporting the New Deal against Copeland in the primaries, he is just cautious enough to put himself down as a "hearty" rather than a "wholehearted" supporter, with a possible eye to future strategy of a different sort. And finally, he is now permitting his backers to form a spurious "Union Labor Party" to use as a counterweight against La Guardia's support from the State Labor Party. The hedging that Mr. Mahoney finds necessary and his continued allegiance to Sachem Sullivan make it seem quite possible that even now the hook is being extended for the Doctor, and that in November it will be Jeremiah himself who will wear Tammany's colors in the joust with the Little Flower.

*

WE HAVE JUST READ A DOCUMENT. IT IS forty-one pages long and has eight illustrations. If it is not one of the most important documents ever to come from a Congressional committee we surrender all claims to perspective. It is the report of Senators La Follette and Thomas on the Chicago Memorial Day massacre. Unimpassioned in tone, thoroughly factual and judicial in treatment, it is nevertheless merciless in the way it marches to the ineluctable conclusion that the killings by the Chicago police were unprovoked and criminal. The men who rule our economic destinies do not like such reports. The committee which made it is in grave danger of being denied further funds with which to carry on its work in the protection of civil liberties. If this were to happen it would be the greatest blot thus far on the record of the Administration. Here is one case where liberals of all persuasions can be united and make their unity felt by addressing themselves to their Senators.

*

THE EFFORTS OF HITLER TO COORDINATE the Protestant church into the Nazi propaganda machine met two amazing setbacks during the past week. Dr. Friedrich Dibelius, a leader in the Confessional church, was acquitted on August 6 of misrepresenting Herr Kerrl, the Church Minister, when he charged the latter with saying that it was absurd and trivial to hold that Jesus is the son of God. As the trial was elaborately staged in an effort to show that the Nazi state was not interfering with matters of faith, its failure may be expected to make a correspondingly profound impression. Even more significant is the postponement of the trial of the Reverend Martin Niemöller following an unprecedented mass demonstration in his behalf. The growing Protestant revolt has put the government in an awkward position. It cannot expect to persuade the people that the reactionary German church is Socialist, Communist, or pacifist. It dare not attack Christianity as such; neither does it dare permit an effective opposition to grow up under the church aegis. But least of all can it afford, as in the delay of the Niemöller trial, to admit its uncertainty as to the most effective method of procedure.

*

WELL, THE YACHT RACES ARE OVER AND WE don't care. A jowly Englishman who made his money building British warplanes throws away a couple of his millions to capture a cup from a smooth-faced American who inherited a railroad fortune. Granted the frivolity of the rich and the unutterable dullness of a contest in which few of the onlookers know what's going on, our chief kick is still that a yacht victory, no matter how overwhelming, never proves anything. Even with the Ranger winning all four starts, the rocking-chair admirals are not certain whether to assign the victory to Vanderbilt's skill, the superior construction of his boat, or the unfamiliarity of the challenger with the waters, winds, and tides. We are always asked to make our editorials constructive, so here goes. Why not let the two sides swap boats in alternate races? Tennis players change courts; in fact, Budge and Austin in their Davis Cup match even swapped rackets. It would sharpen the victory, promote sportsmanship, and put a crimp in the sports writers.

Court Reform: A Recess

THE end of the court-reform bill was as inglorious as anything in its history. It was a sickening spectacle to see the Senate, which had fought the original bill and the Logan bill to the death in the name of freedom from steam-roller tactics, allowing Vice-President Garner to steam-roller the final mutilated bill without uttering a word of protest. And it was a ludicrous spectacle to see the same Senate which had equated the number nine with the moral foundations of the republic debating gravely whether the court as it stands consists of nine members or, as Senators Borah and Logan both assert, ten.

Well, anyway, you will say, the pother about court reform is over, and while we didn't get the moon we are getting some real procedural reform. Let us see just what we are getting. Nothing about the Supreme Court is touched in the final McCarran bill: the only provision affecting the court is to be found in the Sumners-McCarran bill, passed in February, making it possible for judges to retire on full pay after reaching the age of seventy, and raising the question that is currently raging whether Judge Van Devanter's retirement under this act removes him from the court or merely from active service on it. For the rest, there is a four-point reform program for the lower federal courts: the federal government is allowed to intervene in any case in the lower courts that involves the question of constitutionality; provision is made that these cases shall be given the right of way on appeal to the Supreme Court; district judges may be reassigned whenever the dockets show signs of congestion; and, where injunctive relief is asked, only a court of three judges, one of them a Circuit judge, may pass on it.

There is real merit in these provisions. They should have been embodied in a bill long ago, but it seems to be a rule of American politics that only when a crying need causes a stir over big things do the minor things get accomplished. Meanwhile the question of Supreme Court reform itself is left exactly where it was.

Mr. Roosevelt is one of those who have not forgotten it. He was probably guilty of unpardonable manners at his press conference last week when he called the attention of the farm Senators who had voted against court reform to the AAA decision of the Supreme Court. For Congress, having forgotten and forgiven all the trespasses of the court on the legislative function, prefers not to be reminded. That was one reason why Jack Garner wielded his gavel so effectively that he passed the McCarran bill all by himself. He knew perfectly well that there was a liberal Administration bloc waiting to attach to the bill an amendment requiring a two-thirds vote of the court to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional. Whatever the chances of the amendment, debate was dangerous. Jack Garner was not going to take a chance at having the sins of the court paraded in Congress again. Hence his strong-arm tactics.

Instead of talking of Supreme Court reform, Congress has been talking about the next Supreme Court judge. Senators rose and debated the latest piece of Roosevelt tyranny in daring to suggest that he might make a recess appointment. The President finally backed down. Now there are three things equally clear in this whole business. One is that the President has a perfect constitutional right to make a recess appointment if he so chooses. The second is that tactically it was a mistake to so choose, or even to talk about it. The third is that Elephant Boy Vandenberg and his cohorts cared not a whit about constitutional right in attacking the President on this score, but were only making shrewd political capital. At the time these lines are being written, the President is supposed to be looking over the records of possible appointees. He owes it as his duty to the people to select a man whose liberalism is unquestioned and has been tested in action.

For the President is now in the position of a leader who, having made one serious error and finally written it off the books, must move on to the attack in other ways. He was slow in taking up the cause of court reform: he must not easily lay it down again. More important than the question of minor procedural reforms in the lower courts or the question of who the next judge will be is the question of whether anything will be done to curb the judicial power itself. During the heat of the controversy over the President's proposal, many of its opponents came out bravely for limiting the power of the court by a Constitutional amendment. Now is the time to take them at their word. The President must go to the country, using press and radio; he must put himself at the head of a real movement for a Constitutional amendment. For Congress has a rendezvous with the people in 1938 and again in 1940. If those who came out for a Constitutional amendment do not go along with the President, the people will know what to do with them.

The cause of court reform is not ended. It is only recessed.

Will Chiang Fight?

As the days pass without a major battle in North China between the Japanese and the crack troops of Chiang Kai-shek, suspicion has gained ground that Chiang may repeat his evasive tactics of 1931 and 1932. It will be recalled that when the Japanese entered Manchuria, Chiang gave an inspired speech before the Central Committee of the Kuomintang, in which he declared that he would give his life rather than permit the Japanese to seize a foot of Manchurian territory. Yet not once in Manchuria, Shanghai, Jehol, or North China did Chiang's personal troops clash with the Japanese. Nor did he himself ever direct operations against them.

It must be recognized, however, that the situation which Chiang faces is markedly different from that which existed in 1931. At that time anti-Japanese sentiment was confined almost exclusively to students and intellectuals. There were anti-Japanese boycotts, but they died without a struggle the moment student leadership was withdrawn. Today the demand for resistance to Japanese invasion is all but universal. The action of the peasants in North China in digging road traps for the Japanese is unprecedented in Chinese warfare. Yet in the face of this almost universal demand for war, there are groups within the Nanking government who are known to be quietly working for complete surrender to Japan, men who would sell their national birthright for the riches and power which a Japanese victory would give them.

Leading this pro-Japanese group are two brothers—Chen Kuo-fu, Governor of Kiangsu province, and Chen Li-fu, secretary of the Kuomintang. These men are believed to be the leaders of the semi-secret, fascist clique among the army officers which has been responsible for the terrorist activities against left-wing elements in recent months. In the month of May alone more than 100 intellectuals and members of the National Salvation Association disappeared, victims of this terrorist band. In many instances possession of the association's paper was the only evidence against these men. Supporting the fascist Blue Shirt elements are several score Italian and German advisers who have recently been brought to Nanking. Although Chiang Kai-shek himself has never given way completely to the terrorist elements, his failure to rid himself of his Nazi advisers during the present crisis has left him open to suspicion.

While China has as yet no popular front against this double-barreled fascist threat, the recent agreement concluded between Nanking and the Chinese Communists stressed two points: (1) preparation for resistance against Japan, and (2) greater democracy in governmental affairs. Admittedly, more progress has been made in the anti-Japanese campaign than in the struggle for democracy, but even on the latter point Nanking is known to have made concessions. A National Kuomintang Congress was to have been called in the fall or winter in which Communists and other left elements were to have been allowed to participate. The whole party mechanism was to have been overhauled to get a more popular representation.

The bitter factional struggle at Nanking has been reflected in foreign policy. The Chen clique has more or less openly favored affiliation with Japan and Germany and the international fascist front. While nominally anti-Japanese in public, they have quietly advised Chiang to make his battlefront at the Yellow River—which implies the cession of the five northern provinces. The moderates, on the other hand, have looked to the western democracies for support against Japanese-inspired fascism. The recently concluded silver agreement and the $1,500,000 loan for the purchase of locomotives, which were arranged by Dr. H. H. Kung in his recent visit to this country, were steps in this direction. Even more significant is the $100,000,000 loan which Dr. Kung is reported to have obtained in London. It is safe to say that none of these arrangements could have been concluded had the United States and Britain not been assured that China would spurn the fascist powers. A hundred million dollars is cheap insurance against fascist control of China.

With the attention of the world riveted on Spain, China's importance in the world struggle between dictatorship and democracy has not been generally recognized in this country. A victory for the fascist forces at Nanking would open the whole of China to Japanese exploitation. More significant from the fascist point of view, it would give Japan a base of operations from which to attack central Siberia and thus cut off the Soviet Far East. Economically, it would mean the end of the Open Door in China, and would give Japan virtual control over China's rich natural resources as well as an almost inexhaustible market for its products.

At the focal point in this world struggle stands Chiang Kai-shek. Although Chiang has never distinguished himself as a democrat, he has shown firmness in resisting fascist pressure since his release from captivity six months ago. Above all, he is a Chinese, and as such must burn with anger at the Japanese outrages. World history during the next decade may be influenced very largely through the direction in which he is driven by the forces now struggling for mastery in China.

PUBL Burlingame

The Guild Votes

THE American Newspaper Guild has been having a family row—while the publishers rejoice, William Green gloats for publication, and Walter Lippmann, representing those pontifical members of the union who have long since taken on the protective coloration of publishers, moves to the attack in a letter to the Guild which he promptly releases to the press. Needless to say, the Guild in its current troubles has become "news" as it never was before; and it is in an atmosphere of tension that it must undertake a crucial referendum. The main questions to be voted upon by the whole membership are these:

> Affiliation with the C.I.O. Extension of the Guild's jurisdiction to include business-office employees. Indorsement of the idea of independent political action. Opposition to fascism in Spain. Support of the demand for increased WPA appropriations. Indorsement of the President's Supreme Court plan.

All of them were answered in the affirmative at the St. Louis convention of the Guild in June, but a sizable minority opposed certain of the proposals as well as the manner in which they were presented. This same minority favored a vote of the membership on the disputed issues. The referendum was voted down—and thereupon became inevitable, since the demand of any local for a referendum need only be seconded by five others. As a matter of fact, the demand of the Columbus, Ohio, local called forth sixteen seconds; and the whole episode suggests that the procedure of handling a motion for a referendum needs to be overhauled.

To our way of thinking, the referendum is extremely desirable and, assuming conscientious and unionwide participation, can have only a salutary effect on both the membership and the officials of the union. Nothing is to be gained by pretending that the St. Louis convention did not make mistakes. By far the most serious was the adoption of a position from which, under member pressure, the executive board has been forced to recede in full view of the A.N.P.A. But the referendum itself should be the signal for a demonstration of Guild solidarity which will not only rectify the mistakes of the convention but also set the pace for a much broader and more active participation by the membership in Guild affairs.

Nor is the solidarity we have in mind the sort which demands that the actions of the St. Louis convention be upheld at any cost on the ground that the Guild is under fire and that repudiation of any of its actions would split the ranks and give comfort to the enemy. That is a steam-roller argument which has become all too prevalent in social-political and trade-union affairs.

As for the questions themselves: The affirmative vote on affiliation with the C.I.O. should be overwhelming. The A.F. of L., especially in the past two years, has consistently sabotaged union organization and has, in instance after instance, thrown its weight to the side of employers. At the moment it is busy trying to set up a rival newspaper union, fortunately with no success. A strong affirmative vote on this issue would effectively down the talk of a split and make it clear that division of opinion on other questions is evidence of full and free discussion, not of disruption.

On the question of extending jurisdiction to include business-office employees there is room for an honest difference of opinion. The Guild has made great progress, but it is a young union and it still has far to go in the matter of organization and union agreements. One can be wholeheartedly in favor of industrial unionism and yet question the wisdom of the Guild in assuming jurisdiction at this time over another large group of workers of disparate status and aims. On the other hand, the plan drawn up by the executive board which allows for the organization and functioning as separate units of the editorial, advertising, circulation, and other departments makes this expansion of jurisdiction less sweeping than the original decision seemed to contemplate.

On the question of opposition to fascism in Spain there can, of course, be only one answer. Fascism first of all destroys trade unions; and even those Guild members who voted for Landon cannot maintain a neutral stand on fascism in Spain. Support of the demand for an increased WPA appropriation is less clearly indicated, though it can be justified on the principle that trade unions must do everything possible to raise the status of all wage-earners, if only to prevent labor's bargaining power from being undermined.

It is the indorsement of an independent political party and of the President's Supreme Court plan that raises sharply the whole question of the Guild's objectives and policy. Its first objective presumably is to build a strong progressive labor union which will encompass most of the country's newspapermen and command contracts from American publishers, who have a good thing in their slogan of freedom of the press. In general it is the business of trade unions to take sides on political issues, but the Guild occupies a unique and delicate position, both in relation to its members and to the employers it must deal with. Many newspapermen are conservative in their politics; but that does not mean that they cannot be good union men or that they cannot be educated to a more progressive view; after all, it is not so long since many of them got over the hurdle of admitting that they were workers at all. As for the publishers, their bad motives do not vitiate the logic of their argument that a reporter whose trade union is committed to a political party might be biased in his handling of political news.

In general the Newspaper Guild will best serve its members and the cause of freedom of the press by pursuing a progressive trade-union policy and by refraining from political partisanship. That way lies steady and constructive growth. If in the coming years a labor party is actually formed and trade unions are called upon to indorse or join it, the issue of the attitude of the Newspaper Guild will once more have to be faced. For the present the labor party is only in its incipient stages, and the Guild still immature. It has better things to do now than make political commitments.

Vigilantism, 1937

BY BENJAMIN STOLBERG

THE NATURE OF VIGILANTISM

THE average innocently educated American has a certain picture of American vigilantism which, like so many of his stereotyped vagaries, he gets from our so-called liberal historians, who know a lot they do not dare to understand.

In this view, vigilantism is a peculiar American phenomenon. It began, the story goes, in California in 1851, when outlawry was in wild and bloody flower and when every adventurer could buy a woman for the asking plus a sack of gold. Naturally, the better elements of the community wouldn't stand for it, and so they started a vigilante movement for law and order. (That, as you can see, was the only thing to do.) During the same 1850's there also flourished the know-nothing movement, composed of native white trash, which swept into office a lot of politicians of the Townsend and Coughlin type. (That, of course, was a bad thing.) Then came the post-Civil War KKK, because such narrow bigots as Thaddeus Stevens and his fellow Northern radicals did not know that the war was over and that the "best elements" of the South would not be run by a lot of carpetbaggers, scalawags, and too suddenly emancipated Negroes. (That was a bad thing, but quite understandable.) Then came the Mollie Maguires—Irish, Catholic, and labor—who went around killing mine superintendents. (That was a bad thing; it hurt labor.) After a number of more innocent know-nothing movements, we finally get into our own century, which is punctured by all sorts of violence, frame-ups, labor wars, and judicial assassinations. (This is all terrible; it hurts democracy.) And since the World War things have got worse. The last decade, especially, we have had a veritable plague of new moronic, inverted-populist movements—infantile, illiterate, confused, and vicious. In the late 1920's there was a revival of the Klan with its mummeries and wizardries. Today there are innumerable shirt organizations, night-gown rackets, the Black Legion, the Friends of New Germany, the Americaneers, the Committees of 100, of 200, of 1,000,000, the Women's National Association for the Preservation of the White Race; literally hundreds of such outfits. These in turn reach over into the darker corners of the D.A.R., the R.O.T.C., the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the chambers of commerce, the Lions, the Elks, the Eagles, and the rest of the zoo of small-time Babbittry. (It's all very dreadful, and Lord knows where it's leading to.)

Such is the hazy historic view of vigilantism that floats in the mind of the average middle-class liberal American. It leads him to one of two conclusions, depending on whether he is a right liberal or a left liberal, whether his respectable perplexity is passive or active. If he is a right liberal, he usually decides that, since we have always had the vigilantes with us, they cannot be very dangerous. If he is a left liberal, he is likely to join some happy, innocent front like the American League Against War and Fascism, which without any class analysis lumps into a "united front of all democratic forces" everybody from prima-donna left-wing movie stars and drawing-room communists to steel workers and Georgia sharecroppers.

Now what's wrong with this liberal conception of American vigilantism? It is not so much the facts. For all their nebulous outline, they are substantially correct. What's wrong with the picture is its complete classlessness, its slightly pompous sociological naivete, which is far more peculiar to the more or less educated American mind than is vigilantism to its more or less illiterate counterpart. For obviously vigilantism is the most brutally clear of all class phenomena, the most desperate and regressive, and hence, in its last analysis, the deepest expression of class domination; which means that it is no more peculiarly American than is sex or sport, though like them it parades in every country in its own national costume. Vigilantism is as old as anti-Semitism and as new as the persecution of revolutionaries by the G.P.U. under Comrade Yezhov. It may be as brutally ignorant as the Black Hundreds under the Czar or the Black Legion in Flint or the Black or Brown Shirts. Or it may be as hoary with sophistication as British imperialism, which is the greatest vigilante movement of them all. (It is well to remember that under the "labor" ministry of Ramsay MacDonald Indian villages were "pacified" by bombing planes.)

Vigilantism is the spirit of permanent counter-revolution, infinitely variegated by place, power, time, and circumstances. In days of peaceful social exploitation it is dormant. In days of growing social unrest it becomes more articulate and sinister. It may become articulate in the esoteric hokum and pretentious "scholarship" of a Pareto or a Sorokin, or in the rabble-economics of a Father Coughlin. But it is always nonsensical, because it would preserve class spoliation by violence without deepening social contradictions. Hence its logic is absurd and its sociology impossible.

The characteristic rationale of vigilantism is always the defense of class exploitation in the name of law and order. The appeal is never rational, but always directed to the deepest anti-intellectual and regressive instincts: to chauvinism, to race hatred, to the spirit of violence. And finally the technique is always the same. Since no movement can beat the masses without a mass base, such a base must be created. It is recruited from the most backward layer in the social pyramid. In modern society this is the lower middle class, which is bewildered by the split between its real and its fancied interests.

To what degree is vigilantism dangerous? Exactly to the degree in which the dominant classes of a society encourage, exploit, and, what is most important, subsidize it. The best thermometer of the menace of vigilantism is money. Thus the post-Civil War Klan was a dangerous force, which is still alive in the lynch law of the South, because it was guided and subsidized, behind the scenes, by the "best elements," the degraded Southern plantocracy, which had made a deal with the Northern conservatives against the Northern radicals. The Klan in the 1920's was not so dangerous, because big industry decided that it did not need it in defeating a prone labor movement. Today the Klan is once more riding in the South because of the textile drive by the C.I.O. and the stirrings of the sharecropper.

SMALL FRY

Just as Mussolini's access to power inspired Hitler and his many lesser imitators, so Hitler's rise encouraged vigilantism from Rumania to California. The fascist language and technique have been consciously copied by innumerable vigilante adventurers in America. But unless we include in this category the late Huey Long, all of them lacked the perverse afflatus of their European counterparts. Today the country swarms with these miscellaneous hick Führers who walk the streets of big business offering their wares. Often they run little scurrilous sheets, all-moron and half-blackmail.

Some of our vigilantes are free-lance writers, avowedly and philosophically fascist, as the group around the new American Mercury, most of them former radicals. Another reactionary free-lance writer is George Sokolsky, who sells his thinly disguised reaction in the name of American individualism. He extolled it on Independence Day to the workers of Weirton, who are terrorized by the notorious Hatchet Gang. Mr. Sokolsky is a rather tragicomic figure, for with his Eastern European Jewish background he ought to know better than to incite the vigilante spirit. Big business enterprises distribute numerous reprints of his articles. On one occasion one of his "debates" was paid for by a large industrial outfit which contributed to a forum the exact amount of his fee. But by and large, the big boys keep the various Sokolskys on space rates.

The vigilante entrepreneurs are forever on the lookout for angels to subsidize them until comes der Tag. Thus the Reverend Gerald L. K. Smith, who crowds his Committee of 1,000,000 into the ballroom of the Pennsylvania Hotel, is kept going by a New York broker named Henry Marsh. Now and then a frightened dowager gives him a check for the good work. In The Nation of March 11, 1936, I told how Governor Talmadge of Georgia received from the Georgia textile manufacturers $20,000 for "campaign purposes" in a sure election—and for breaking the textile strike; and how the Liberty League gave him $5,000 for his grass-roots convention. During the Little Steel strike the worst of the vigilante outfits—in Pennsylvania, Indiana, and especially in Ohio and in Michigan—did not hesitate to engage in plain thuggery and to provoke murder. Big industry used them where it found them and paid merely for their services.

The types and their activities vary. In Toledo there are the Young Nationalists, who talk "Americanism" over the radio every Sunday. In Akron there were the Stahlmate Clubs at Goodyear's, now pretty well shot to pieces. In Warren, Ohio, there is an active John Q. Public League. In Columbus, Ohio, the State University has become a regular center of young fascist activities. There are the Student Americaneers, run by Captain Arden S. Turner of the R.O.T.C. The Reverend Frank Throop of the Committee of 200 is also active among the students. Then there is the Ohio League for Constitutional Rights.

In Indiana and in Michigan the Klan is still going pretty strong. The automobile centers reek with vigilantism. In Dearborn, where Ford is, the Friends of New Germany and the Veterans of Foreign Wars hold joint meetings. Father Coughlin has a rather insignificant Workers' Council for Social Justice at Ford's. Father Coughlin is lying low because the Catholic Church is lying low. "My day will come in 1938," he says. But he still receives 1,000 letters daily and is selling widely an anti-C.I.O. editorial service. At Ford's there are also the Knights of Dearborn, made up of Ford Service Men under the command of Sam Taylor, a foreman at River Rouge. In Lansing the American Legion and the R.O.T.C. of Michigan State College are very active, neither of them officially. The worst vigilante in town is the Reverend Frank J. Norris, who once killed a sheriff in Texas. He now runs a paper and speaks in a church on General Motors property. He is also closely associated with K. T. Keller, president of Chrysler. The Flint Alliance, under George E. Boysen, is trying to get along now as the American Labor League; and Walter Chrysler is watching it interestedly. Such is the flotsam and jetsam of the local vigilante movements.

Then there is a multitude of service organizations, of which probably the best known and most characteristic is the National Civic Federation. It is now circularizing the American business community with "confidential" literature and cries of communism and more money, please. While Matthew Woll was acting president of the Civic Federation, it collaborated closely with all the official Nazi agents and organizations in this country. It probably still does. But of late Mr. Easley has taken a leaf from the Mohawk Valley Formula (about which more later) and is presenting a "set-up" for a new red-baiting campaign.

"To expedite the creation of a national organization," Mr. Easley wrote on July 2, 1937, in his "confidential" circular, "the existing membership of local organizations such as the chamber of commerce, Kiwanis, Rotary and Lion clubs, American Legion and Veterans of Foreign Wars, church, civic, and patriotic chapters" will be called upon to personally visit individuals. . . . The individuals to be visited in a community or city are those affiliated with the C.I.O., on Federal unemployment relief, and WPA workers." "It is safe to assume," Mr. Easley continues, "that the local editor will comply with the requests of local davertisers whom he depends upon for the existence of his paper." Of course, "appropriate literature will be supplied." Then Mr. Easley draws up a blueprint of a proposed "sales organization." "The advantage the sales organization created by the National Civic Federation will have over the sales organization conducted by John L. Lewis, et al., is that the National Civic Federation organization will consist of respectable citizens. . . ." Mr. Easley's final sentence is a plea for quick money—damned quick; for the revolution is almost on top of us.

BIG BUSINESS VIGILANTISM

There are literally hundreds of local, statewide, national vigilante rackets, all of them in search of fat cats. But the fat cats, no less than the little Hitlers, have also learned their lesson from the other side. Fascism is the effort to freeze a disintegrating economy through terror. But European experience has shown that the individual capitalist is apt to become the prisoner of the terror. The fact that Herr Thyssen is at present on an enforced and luxurious vacation in South America has made quite an impression on that section of big ownership which is willing to play the fascist game. It is therefore at this moment playing the far safer game of organizing its own vigilante movement which can be kept under control. The literature of this more respectable vigilantism is not written by crackpots or illiterates, but by high-powered publicity men in air-conditioned advertising suites.

A social movement is never a conspiracy. It lives and learns and crystallizes. When the C.I.O. showed every sign of becoming a real mass movement, during the great automobile strikes and in the beginning of the steel-organization campaign, big industry gradually moved to meet it. As I made clear in my last article, the financial interests which are behind both Big and Little Steel are by no means split. They merely function on two fronts—peace with the union in one sector, war on the union in the other. Nor did Little Steel go into the fight strategically unprepared. It had thought its tactics through. In the Little Steel strike, as indeed in every recent major strike, industry followed the so-called Mohawk Valley Formula.

This formula appeared in the form of an article in the Labor Relations Bulletin of the National Association of Manufacturers soon after the Remington Rand strike at Ilion, New York. It indicated in detail the steps to be taken in a campaign of national strikebreaking. It was supposedly written by James B. Rand, Jr., though there is every reason to believe that a well-known economist who heads a national research organization had much to do with this truly Machiavellian document. It is no doubt the most significant program in the history of American vigilantism. And here it is epitomized but with its essential outline unchanged:

First: When a strike is threatened label all union leaders as "agitators." In the plant conduct a forced balloting under the direction of foremen to ascertain the strength of the union and to make possible misrepresentation of the strikers as a small minority imposing their will upon the majority. At the same time disseminate propaganda, by means of press releases, advertisements, and the activities of "missionaries," such propaganda falsely stating the issues involved in the strike so that the strikers appear to be making arbitrary demands, and the real issues, such as the employers' refusal to bargain collectively, are obscured.

Second: Concurrently with these moves, by exerting economic pressure and threatening to move the plants, if that is feasible, align the influential members of the community into a cohesive group opposed to the strike. In this group, usually designated as a "citizens' committee," include representatives of the bankers, real-estate owners, business men, ministers, etc.

Third: When the strike is called raise high the banner of law and order, thereby causing the community to mass legal and police weapons against their wholly imagined violence, thereby suppressing all the civil liberties of the strikers.

Fourth: Call a "mass meeting" of the citizens to coordinate public sentiment against the strike and to strengthen the power of the citizens' committee, which organization, thus supported, will both aid the employer in exerting pressure upon the local authorities and itself sponsor vigilante activities.

Fifth: Bring about the formation of a large armed police force to be built up by utilizing local police, state police if the governor cooperates, vigilantes, and special deputies, the deputies being chosen if possible from other neighborhoods. Coach the deputies and vigilantes on the law of unlawful assembly, inciting to riot, disorderly conduct, etc., and make them anxious and ready to use their newly acquired authority to the limit.

Sixth: Perhaps most important, heighten the demoralizing effect of the above measures by a "back-to-work" movement, operated by a puppet association of so-called loyal employees secretly organized by the employer. (In a superb psychological analysis Mr. Rand discusses the effect of this back-to-work movement upon the strikers, the community, and the authorities, showing that it is the best way to kill all collective-bargaining sentiments.)

Seventh: When a sufficient number of applications to go "back to work" are on hand, fix a date for the opening of the plant, which opening is of course requested by the "back-to-work" association. Together with the citizens' committee, prepare for such opening by making provisions for a peak army of police by roping off the area surrounding the plant, by securing arms and ammunition, etc. . . . Even if the maneuver fails to induce a sufficient number of persons to return, persuade the public through pictures and news releases that the opening was nevertheless successful.

Eighth: Stage the "opening" as theatrically as possible.

Ninth: Capitalize on the demoralization of the strikers by continuing the show of police force and the pressure of the citizens' committee, both to insure that those employees who have returned will continue at work and to force the remaining strikers to capitulate. If necessary, turn the locality into a warlike camp through the declaration of a state of emergency tantamount to martial law and barricade it from the outside world so that nothing may interfere with the successful conclusion of the "Formula," thereby driving home to the union leaders the futility of efforts to hold their ranks intact.

Tenth: Close the publicity barrage on the theme that the plant is in full operation and that the strikers were merely a minority attempting to interfere with the "right to work" . . . the campaign is over—the strike is broken.

These ten scab commandments were followed religiously in the Little Steel strike. That's how the strike was broken. Just how the Mohawk Valley Formula was applied, just where the money came from, just who's who in the whole business—and the fantastic tales of the underworld at River Rouge—will be the theme of the next section of this article.

[Mr. Stolberg's third article will appear next week.]

Spanish Village

BY JOSEPHINE HERBST

THE road from Madrid to Valencia cuts across the Jarama, Tajuna, and Tagus river basins within a radius of seventy miles of Madrid. In this fertile area grapes and olives extend in rows, fields of wheat and corn make neat patchwork of riverbanks and low foothills. Some stiff fighting has gone on in the Jarama Mountains guarding the Valencia road.

From the little village of Fuentidueno de Tajo sixty men had gone to the front, and twenty more were drilling in the field used for threshing grain. Not many miles away several great mansions whose owners fled in July, 1936, are now convalescent-homes for wounded soldiers.

Life in the villages has changed since the departure of the rich men. Fuentidueno de Tajo had about ten well-to-do men who abandoned a fine crop of grapes. The people of the village sold the crop and paid 13,000 pesetas for an irrigation pump. Several years before they had formed an association that now came into active use. For a long time their mouths had watered for tomatoes, artichokes, peppers, and melons. As the money crop was grapes, every inch of land had been given over to commercial cultivation. There was a good amount of land capable of high production if irrigated, and into this area they now ran the new water system. By late April this year, tomato, pepper, and melon plants were already several inches high at Fuentidueno.

The state of the land in Spain reflects clearly the predicament that led to the present conflict. In some places the soil is hoarded to the last spoonful. In other sections great tracts have been allowed to lie idle at the disposal and whim of the great landowners. Seeds were made to grow, to bear, and to flourish in crypts in the rocks; hundreds of thousands of people grubbed away at the soil in one part of Spain in order that elsewhere vast acres might remain as playgrounds for a few gentry who might take it into their heads to come once a year to hunt wild boar.

When the republic made timid efforts at land reform it had no power to enforce great changes among the latifundists. In 1929 this class numbered around 9,000. In all Spain at that time about 1,023,600 were said to own land. Some 845,000 were estimated to gain less than a peseta a day from their holdings and had to resort to day labor for a living, about 160,000 lived precariously on their yield, and about 9,700 lived with comfort. The People's Front government of February, 1936, tackled the land problem with courage. Only a beginning had been made when the rebellion broke out. The impoverishment of the agricultural workers and small landowners was part of a national economy that had reduced Spain to the financial status of a colony. Peasant producers had no buying power. Crude olive oil went to Italy for refinement, enabling Italy to capture a world market. Wines were refined in France and resold to advantage. Valencia oranges were cheaper in England than in Madrid.

The soil itself eluded the people. Crazily administered, only about 10 per cent of all Spanish land is judged fertile, 45 per cent is moderately fertile, 35 per cent is termed infertile, and 10 per cent is nothing but rocks. The little owners were forever in debt to usurers, who finally gobbled up their plots and in turn became a new class of latifundists. In the town of Fuentidueno the men who ran away were not great latifundists, but they had been well to do and had controlled the valley. The little fellows worked for the big fellows, and their standard of living was pitifully low.

The town had houses in the village proper and caves in the nearby mountain-side. The village houses were chalky white, with rough tiled floors. The only running water was at the village spring. Kitchen sinks, sewerage systems, bathrooms, and toilets were unheard of. There was, however, electric lighting. By a curious paradox the same forces that had diverted the produce of the valley to the use of a few men had endowed the village with power. Just as a poor consumer may occasionally benefit in a price-slashing war between rival business groups, so did the people of the village find themselves with electricity. Even the caves in the mountain were wired.

The caves are dugouts with clean, whitewashed walls and big wooden doors studded with nails. From a distance the smokestacks of these dwellings mystify a stranger. The big, clay, cigar-shaped stacks protrude from what appears to be a smooth mountain-side. In the area outside the dwelling, composed of one outside and one dark inside room, plants grow in pots, chickens strut in and out, a goat is tethered to a chair near a crawling baby. The average family is between five and seven. Many children have sores that they attribute to "airplanes." The village had been bombed and an entire family buried in debris.

The entire day in this village is laborious as always, but since the workers are running things to suit themselves it goes better than formerly. Every workingman gets five pesetas a day; women get three-fifty and children two-fifty. Animals are owned individually, but with time new animals and machinery will be bought for the group. It is, as yet, a fumbling proposition born of need, but the productivity of the valley is estimated to be higher this year than ever before.

The women still wash at the common pool and cook over the most economical fire I have ever seen. A sack of chaff is spread on the bricked floor under the flue. A little bunch of twigs made from the clippings from pruned grape vines is applied and lighted. The chaff keeps the flame at a smoldering tempo, over which a tiny griddle is placed. The housewife crouches on the floor beside her cooking. The day I was there tiny potatoes were pared and wiped dry with a cloth, sliced fine into olive oil. When done, the surplus oil was poured into a pot. Two eggs were broken over the potatoes and the mixture flopped. With bread and wine, it made a meal.

The housewife was forever on the go. The wife of the alcalde, or mayor, had two goats with two kids, six unproductive hens, and a rooster. Her mother, who lived in one of the caves, had extra eggs that she counted out to her daughter carefully each day. The women all shopped with little black bags. The shopkeeper was a big, hearty fellow in a white apron who had a photograph of Ernst Thälmann on the wall. Rice, lentils, and grains were plentiful, but raisins came high. There was also a herd of brown goats and three cows belonging to the village. The men were busy putting in crops and cultivating others when I was there. They start out with mules and plows very early. Older men and the women do most of the field work.

The one church was tightly closed, and I did not see anywhere a sign of images or religious mementos. Sunday was very much like any other day, except that people dressed up in the afternoon and watched the new recruits drilling. For a town so near a front line, it was extraordinarily cheerful. Many of the young women wanted their pictures taken to send to their husbands at the front. The wife of the mayor got a present of a new pair of shoes from her husband. That was evidently an event. Everyone wears, for the most part, rope-soled sandals, but these were real leather shoes with heels. She took them all around in their box with tissue-paper wrappings, showing them with a kind of wonder. Miracles had no end; the townspeople went up to their irrigation project frequently to admire the new plants sprouting from what had been a desert.

In that part of Spain held by Franco the land reforms begun under the People's Front government a year ago in February have been completely undone. Big estates, uncultivated for years, were divided among the peasants, only to be returned to the great landowners since the rebellion. At Torrejon el Rubio in Carceres the Duke of Arion had a thousand hectares enclosed for wild game. Deer and boar often broke through to pillage the little plots of the neighboring villagers, who, 3,000 of them, were permanently unemployed. When the Popular Front came to power it was considered proper to make use of this great preserve for the people. Many such hopeful enterprises had only begun when the rebels returned the property to the former owners.

The workers in rebel territory have been thrown into prison. Their leaders have been shot or are awaiting execution. Among them is Antonio Palomo of Jaraicejo, who rose up and declared that this estate must no longer remain at the mercy of a single man. For this he will die at the hands of those who like to call themselves "the saviors of the culture of Spain." The great estates would be kept sacred by these "saviors" and, like idols of old, be watered with human blood. But the Spanish people have tasted freedom, and they have other plans for the future.

Behind the Scenes at Scottsboro

BY MORRIS SHAPIRO

ALABAMA justice has yielded to expediency in the Scottsboro case. No other explanation is possible for the farcical finale which left the state in the anomalous position of providing only 50 per cent protection for the "flower of Southern womanhood." Four of the nine Negroes originally arrested on March 25, 1931, for rape still are in prison—one under sentence of death, two for seventy-five years, and one, for some reason inscrutable to all save the members of the jury which convicted him, for ninety-nine years. Four others, with no less evidence against them, have been freed by the state, while the ninth, as though to make things exactly even, was spared a trial on the charge of raping Victoria Price and allowed to plead guilty to assault on a deputy. For that he got a twenty-year sentence in prison, Judge W. W. Callahan explaining that if the rape charge had not been dropped, he would have let him off with fifteen years on the assault charge.

Thus did a self-serving prosecution seek to appease both local and foreign opinion—meaning all opinion outside the borders of Alabama—not that justice might at last be done, but that a case which has become a stench in the nostrils of the more literate minority of Alabamans might be brought to an end. Whether even that objective will be achieved remains to be seen.

The release of four of the defendants, Roy Wright, Olin Montgomery, Eugene Williams, and Willie Roberson, was in no sense the result of a trade or compromise. The state decided what it would do, and informed the defense. The prosecution was tired of prosecuting. It wanted assurances, which it did not get, that there would be no more appeals and no more retrials. However, Alabama still holds as hostages five of the nine originally accused—and their sympathizers and lawyers.

It was no accident that Clarence Norris, the first Negro to be tried since Haywood Patterson was convicted and sentenced to seventy-five years' imprisonment, drew a death sentence from the hands of the jury which tried him. What better warning could have been delivered to a defense which previously had announced its intention of appealing Patterson's conviction to the highest court in the land? With Norris under sentence of death, the state, anxious to forestall further appeals in the cases that twice have been sent back for retrial by the United States Supreme Court, could afford a generous gesture. It came in the form of a waiver of the death penalty in the trials of Andy Wright and Charlie Weems. In exchange, Samuel Leibowitz waived his right to a special venire of sixty-five required by law in capital cases, and agreed to take his chances on the regular panel of thirty-five. "It was like being asked to swap a turkey for a horse," he said at the time.

One week before the trials ended, the state, represented by Thomas S. Lawson, Assistant Attorney-General, and Melvin C. Hutson, the local Circuit Solicitor, had determined on their course and had their minds made up to drop the indictments against four of the Negroes who were identified with the same degree of positiveness as all the others by Victoria Price, the lone complaining witness remaining since Ruby Bates recanted her charges.

Yet in subsequent trials Mr. Lawson and Mr. Hutson prosecuted Wright and Weems as relentlessly as ever. The mellifluous Melvin, clothed in righteousness and a wrinkled seersucker suit, dwelt at length, in his summation, on racial peculiarities which, he said, made it impossible for any Southern white man to believe that a dozen Negroes "flushed with their victory in a fight with white men" could have resisted the temptation offered by two freight-hopping white girls decked out in overalls.

The measure of their hyprocrisy lies in the comment one of them made in the interval between the time when the jury in the Weems case retired and the time when it rendered its verdict, which was the signal for the wholesale quashing of indictments against the remaining defendants. Victoria Price, repeating her testimony for the eleventh time before a jury, had become hopelessly entangled in her own contradictions. She had squirmed and wriggled for two hours on the stand, even disputing the stenographic record of her testimony at other trials. So palpably was she lying about some points of her story that Mr. Leibowitz, with the jury excused, asked Judge W. W. Callahan to dismiss the indictment against Weems. At the end of that trial a member of the prosecution staff remarked that he was glad he never would have to offer her testimony in another trial. "She was the sorriest witness I ever saw in a courtroom," admitted the harassed lawyer.

That probably is as near as anyone will ever come to getting an honest explanation from any Alabama official regarding the reason for the seemingly irrational outcome of six and a half years of litigation over the lives of the Negroes placed in jeopardy by a white woman's charge of rape. To those who have been closely associated with the case from the start, it is apparent, however, that while juries are as willing as ever to convict the Negroes on her story, the repeated defense assaults upon her often-repeated story have succeeded in shaking the faith of lawyers for the state in the veracity of the woman on whose honesty the whole case stands or falls. After six and a half years the high-pitched, screechy voice of Victoria Price has begun to sound a little hollow and tinny to "Buster" Lawson, whose eyes are on the attorney-generalship of Alabama. If it weren't for that latter fact nine Negroes instead of four might be free today. As long ago as last December the state made a tacit admission of this fact when the late Lieutenant-Governor Thomas E. Knight, Jr., the special prosecutor in earlier trials, came to New York with Attorney-General A. A. Carmichael on their own initiative and of their own volition to propose a face-saving formula to Mr. Leibowitz.

At a meeting in the New Yorker Hotel Mr. Leibowitz and Mr. Carmichael agreed that Patterson's seventy-five-year sentence should be commuted to five years, that four of the Negroes should get off with five-year sentences if they would plead to charges of simple assault, and that the remaining four—the same ones who now have been given their freedom—should go scot-free. Later there was another meeting in the Congressional Library in Washington, after which Mr. Carmichael said it wouldn't take him "more than five minutes to iron out the remaining differences" between himself and Mr. Leibowitz.

It fell to the lot of Mr. Lawson to report the negotiations to Judge Callahan, who ever since he entered the cases has been the ablest member of the prosecution staff. Mr. Lawson visited Judge Callahan at Decatur and was angrily informed that the court never would "agree to accept fifty-dollar fines for rape," which was his method of characterizing the agreement between prosecution and defense.

This apparently was enough for Mr. Carmichael, who without further ado betook himself to North Carolina, while Judge Callahan placed the trials of the Scottsboro Negroes on his calendar for July. The Attorney-General, who by reason of his office is known in Alabama as "General" Carmichael, did not return within the borders of his state until the trials ended, and he remained out of reach of influential members of the bar, editors of powerful Alabama newspapers, and others who sought to make him abide by his agreement, leaving it to Mr. Lawson, a candidate for the attorney-generalship in the next election, to take the rap for him.

His absence at this crucial time prompted a friend of Mr. Lawson's to tell a story about a Negro in the World War. A colored private, ordered over the top with his company, advanced for some distance over no-man's land, when, with machine-gun bullets whistling past his ears, he turned and ran back toward his own goal posts. In the haste of his retreat, he ran over his own trenches, back past the reserve lines, and finally burst out through a thicket miles behind the lines. There he stumbled, panting, upon the figure of a man with stars on his shoulder straps sitting astride a horse.

"Halt!" shouted the horseman.

"Who is you?" asked the Negro soldier.

"I'm the General," replied the officer on the horse.

"Lordy me," gasped the colored soldier. "I didn't know I'd come that far back."

The story-teller added: "They call Mr. Carmichael 'General' here. It's a sort of courtesy title, you know."

Appeals from all the convictions in Decatur have been filed. In each case the basis was laid for a final appeal to the United States Supreme Court.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

WORD has just come from the Civil Liberties Union that the La Follette subcommittee on violations of civil liberties is in danger of ceasing its investigations and must do so if it does not receive another appropriation before the impending adjournment of Congress. It has done its magnificent work on a budget of only $55,000 and now asks a modest $50,000 to carry on. If I had my way it would get $500,000 tomorrow. The decision rests with the Senate Committee on Audit and Control, headed by Senator James F. Byrnes of South Carolina, and if any of the readers of this page wish to serve the cause they should write to Senator Byrnes at once and urge that the La Follette subcommittee get the money it needs. The American Civil Liberties Union only states the truth when it declares that to the credit of these Senators lies "the most significant job ever done in exposing the violations of civil liberties in industrial disputes." To me that is inadequate praise. Bob La Follette has earned a distinguished-service medal if anyone ever did. He and his associate, Senator Thomas of Utah, have grimly stuck to their exhausting task with a determination that has compelled the admiration of all who have followed it.

If they had done nothing else than force the showing of the film which revealed the murderous attack of the Chicago police upon the strikers at the Republic Steel plant, the money they have so far expended would have been justified. Think what that series of pictures of base police brutality, worthy of Hitler's choicest Brown Shirts, accomplished right here in New York. It made the Times and Herald Tribune actually for once deprecate official police lawlessness instead of minimizing it or ignoring it altogether. It actually led Police Commissioner Valentine to show the film in slow motion to all his chief officers who might have to handle strikes, not once but two or three times, in order that they might learn what not to do in dealing with labor troubles. True, that was followed by direct charges of police brutality during the shipping strike in Brooklyn, but still the films should help. Now, as I have so often written before, the sort of official murdering which Paul Anderson described in last week's Nation has been going on all over this country for years, and yet those of us who have cried out against it either have had no support or have drawn opposition from the highly respectable and from the conservative press. They have invariably said that the police are always right and that it is necessary for them to shoot or to club hard and "show no weakness" in order that disorder may be stopped at the beginning.

Well, if I were dictator of this country I would make the preliminary report of the La Follette subcommittee compulsory reading by every member of every chamber of commerce and university club in this country—and throw in the Republican clubs, the fashionable women's clubs, and all the Union Leagues for good measure. I should especially make them read the story of what has happened in Harlan County, Kentucky, with its utter denial of every fundamental right guaranteed by the Constitution, the shocking story of murder, torture, abuse, horrible cruelty, and outright dictatorship over workingmen and all who dare to stand up for their rights—all this by the constituted authorities, notably the sheriff of the county, always the miserable, sycophantic servant of the industrial bosses. I would especially have Herbert Hoover, wearing his well-earned dunce's cap, sit upon a stool in a corner and read aloud first some of his own statements about the blessedness of the American standard of living and the "American system" and then follow it up by reading the facts about the deputy-sheriffs of Sheriff Middleton of Harlan County—men indicted for every crime, from murder to mayhem.

But it isn't only in Chicago or Harlan that these things have happened. For months Senator La Follette, the committee's counsel, John J. Abt, and his secretary, Robert Wohlforth, have ranged the country, turning up agents provocateurs, phony detective agencies, strike-breaking thugs used by most of the leading industrial companies. One reason I should like to make their findings compulsory reading is that it would put a stop to the talk that this wrongdoing on the part of industry is merely to be attributed to a few black sheep—"there will always be a few crooks in every walk of life." I defy anybody who has read the La Follette record and has followed the happenings in this country to say that these offenders are few and far between. Then I want to prescribe some of these reports for the men and women I meet who solemnly assure me that all the violence in our labor troubles is on the side of labor; who insist that the President has abdicated and has put John Lewis in his place; that we are really being ruled by a ruthless labor dictator.

A year or so ago some ignorant writer on the staff of the Waterbury Republican solemnly rebuked me for writing on this page that Franklin Roosevelt's worst failure was his refusal to say one word about the wholesale violations of civil liberties going on everywhere. That editor declared that my article proved what an utterly unbalanced man I am. Well, I wonder if that writer—he or another has just praised me for saying labor must not stoop to the level of the employers and use force in labor disputes—could be got to read Paul Anderson's article and this testimony before Bob La Follette. If he did, I bet he would hit the President's silence harder than I did; perhaps even accuse me of understatement.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame

BROUN'S PAGE

God and the Liberals

SENATOR Hiram Johnson cried out, "Glory be to God," when the Court bill died. Oswald Garrison Villard uttered a long "Amen." Burton K. Wheeler urged an adjournment upon the President lest he seem to be "defying God." And only a day or two ago Cotton Ed Smith praised the Creator for having lavished such bounty upon the South that the wages of textile workers were a matter of no consequence even to the workers themselves.

It is true that recent events have brought many men and columnists of varying caliber together in the drive against the New Deal. But I am wondering whether the unifying force has been that God upon whom these gentlemen call so piously. In his famous Liberty League speech Al Smith said in effect that God was committed to a nine-man Supreme Court and to a strict construction of the Constitution. Since that time Mr. Justice Roberts and even Chief Justice Hughes have written opinions displeasing to Mr. Smith. God, as far as I know, has not yet been heard from. When the still small voice runs through the ranks of men I doubt whether the message will be that the rights of property must always come first among the children of Adam.

But there I go like all my colleagues seeking to interpret the infinite and out of my puny wisdom express an opinion as to whether God is a liberal like Amos Pinchot. These delusions of grandeur tend to prey upon newspaper writers. Only the other day Dorothy Thompson, who has just been nominated for the presidency in London, urged the American Congress not to pass a wage-and-hour bill just now because she herself had been unable to make up her mind as to the precise form the measure should take.

"This column is itself written under far too great pressure," said poor Miss Thompson. "The public has no time to think things through." The voice of the public is the voice of God, and Dorothy Thompson is its prophet.

Now that the court issue has been laid in lavender, another point arises upon which an attempt is being made to combine God and some very curious liberals. I refer to the third-term-for-Roosevelt issue. The President has had less than a year since the last election, and yet he is being called upon to make ringing public declaration that under no circumstances will he run again. It is true that in a radio talk of many weeks ago he did indicate his decision to retire. But in any case I am under the impression that the fight to prevent a third term for Roosevelt is actually a struggle to keep him from having a second term. The threat of impeachment, to be sure, is still rather a far-fetched possibility, although the matter has been mentioned and editorially advocated in one or two Southern papers. But what I have in mind is the very plausible theory that reactionaries by roaring "third term" now hope to block any progressive program for the next three years and indeed undo the better legislation of Roosevelt's first term.

Perhaps I am being unfair to the reactionaries, at least those who sail admittedly under the black flag. They have, for the most part, held their fire. The work of destruction has been carried on largely not by pirates but by privateers. It is always easy to get a liberal to outfit an expedition to do the cruising which brings comfort to somebody safely taking his ease back home in a counting-room.

And of course the third-term holler is a device not only to wreck the Roosevelt administration now but also to make it certain that no man of New Deal faith shall by any chance receive the Democratic nomination in 1940. It is well to remember that the issue has been raised almost entirely by the political opponents of the President. It is true that Earle of Pennsylvania did publicly renounce the crown for himself and come out for Mr. Roosevelt to run again in 1940. But the utterances of Earle are not important, and there is no reason to believe that this statement was in any way inspired by the White House. Probably it was a mere spreading of oil by the Pennsylvania Governor. Mr. Earle has by no means quit his aspirations for 1940. On the contrary, it seems quite likely that by a crude piece of gallantry he hoped to solidify his position as the heir-apparent.

It has been said that Franklin Delano Roosevelt should make some very positive pledge not to run again. I do not see how any person can bind himself completely as to his course of conduct three years hence. Calvin Coolidge's "I do not choose to run" was accepted at the time as positive, and yet there are many political observers who now believe that Calvin was only flirting and that in his heart there lived an intense desire to be drafted. Far from laying the issue, any further statements by Mr. Roosevelt would tend to emphasize and underline it. Moreover there is nothing he could say which would satisfy his enemies. The dupes and the dupers would, at every mention of the subject, become increasingly outraged.

And speaking of the dupers and not the dupes, I might add that here and there certain American journalists are making good the title which Upton Sinclair bestowed upon our press. There are writing men who have definitely enlisted in a craft more ancient than that of journalism. And of course they have accepted certain obligations. Even so, their best friends should warn them not to be quite so precipitate lest they break a limb. It is not necessary for them to scramble quite so fast when the call comes, "There's company in the parlor."

BOOKS and the ARTS

"Part of a Poem, Part of a Play"

CONVERSATION AT MIDNIGHT. By Edna St. Vincent Millay. Harper and Brothers. $2.

MISS Millay seems to be trying to do two incompatible things in this book. One is to present the opinions, tastes, and prejudices of the male animal, after the fashions of 1937. The other is to show the predicament of the human animal in society and in the universe at an uncommonly perplexing phase of that animal's history. If she had stuck to the first, she would have written a clever little comedy of manners; if she had succeeded with the second, she would have written a philosophical poem of some magnitude. As it is, she could not quite make up her mind to do either the play or the poem, and compromised on a dialogue that has the full virtues of neither and faults of its own. The parts are interesting, but they counteract each other and work toward no unified effect.

The conversation, which takes place after an intimate stag dinner, lasts well beyond midnight. Its incoherence is, according to the author's foreword, designed. On bird-dogs, edible mushrooms, and race-horses, the discussion is technical; on religion and music, choice but desultory; on war and the dangers of flying, trite; on women—for Miss Millay delights in pulling the masculine leg—it is naive. True to type, it settles down solidly during the latter part of the evening to the topic of the revolution, without getting anywhere in particular. Only the tact of the excessively exquisite host keeps it from ending in a show of fangs between the broker and the communist poet.

Merton, the spokesman for Wall Street, inveighs against regimentation, and fears that the children of the proletariat will damage the Gobelins. Carl, the communist, now with scientific assurance invokes the inevitable, now flames with moral indignation. Merton, he says, is already regimented, and his culture is a fake:

> A thing might be beautiful as a dandelion-blossom—that won't do:
> If it's common as a dandelion-blossom, right away you're through.

The two liberals are weary and rather bewildered, both by Carl's manners and by the state of the world: Ricardo, the dilettante, wants to preserve a few beautiful things and wouldn't mind if the human race were extinguished; while John, an honest and groping soul, declares that the liberals are the leaven of society, "the angelic spies in the loud councils of the confident lost." Father Anselmo states his church's position precisely, plays Bach, and leaves early. Low comedy is supplied by Pygmalion, the natural man and successful popular writer, who gets drunkenly profane over the whole business. The young advertising man, Lucas, hates his job and talks about his girl.

The style ranges from cadenced prose, through New Yorker doggerel, proletarian ode, and Shakespearean fulmination, to halting sonnets. There is a reason, if hardly an excuse, for this medley. Miss Millay has now joined the ranks of those poets who are trying to mirror, or to reshape, the great world, and are seeking a medium of greater scope than the lyric, with its distillation of the personal emotion into a dainty bottle. They have no catch-all at hand which will serve them as the hexameter served the ancients, or terza rima Dante, or blank verse the Elizabethans, and in spite of some promising efforts they have not yet devised a new one. Miss Millay's solution is to throw everything in, higgledy-piggledy. The achieved fragments stand out from the rest like the rich jewel in an Ethiope's ear.

Part of Miss Millay's confusion, indeed, springs from a lack of order in her beliefs as well as from difficulties with technique, for it is hard at times to tell when she is writing parody and when she is in earnest. Her recent poems reflect a concern with the common human lot, and sober meditation upon it. For a writer whose gifts are naturally lyrical, it is not easy to think things through and at the same time to retain the grace of touch. Miss Millay is one of the few poets of her generation who have continued to grow, but her intellectual and moral insights are far from having reached an equilibrium, and even so her mastery of her craft has not kept pace with them. There are lines here which attain momentary power beyond anything to be found in her early verse:

> Why come you hither in hordes, your faces wild and exalted?
> What are these altars doing here in the Forum, and the reek of >   the warm, unsalted
> Sacrifice—the earth about the altars steaming and puddled?

But she is unable to sustain this intensity of vision for long. Despite a sprinkling of such passages, the interest in the present work is more in opinions than in things seen or imagined, and rather more in personalities than in opinions. One is conscious that these are men talking, talking wittily, sometimes passionately; rarely is one convinced that there is a real and very messy world that they are talking about.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

Sojourn in Sodom

MEA CULPA. By Louis Ferdinand Céline. Translated from the French, with an introduction, by Robert Allerton Parker. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

CELINE approaches the Soviet Union from the point of view of original sin, and, given his incendiary talents, the result is something of an intellectual side-show. Not that he makes any claims to heavenly guidance or takes the psalm-book for his social program; yet essentially his vision of man, regardless of the racy and ribald expression he gives it, is no more than a crude secular version of the orthodox clerical conception of human nature. It is the old tribal gods that speak here, though the voice is vibrant with the raucous accent of the streets, the language impetuous, and the posture convulsive.

Mea Culpa, the title essay of the volume, is ostensibly a record of his Russian visit, but actually it contains no factual reporting or empiric observations of Soviet life. Apparently Céline regards himself as such a deep seer that he expects us to accept his intuitions at face value, even on a subject so complex and tortuously controversial; and his apocalyptic manner only tends to strengthen our suspicions. His impressions of the country lack detail and tangibility, being for the most part merely a springboard for a frantic assault on socialism in all its aspects, whether as a theoretical system or a practice of the class struggle anywhere and at any time. Unlike Gide, whose comments on the ugly sides of the Soviet situation were inspired by his belief in socialism and disappointment in the particular application of it made by the present Soviet leaders, Céline takes the failures he has noted in common with other observers to be the ultimate proof of the absurdity and viciousness of the Marxist plan for the reconstruction of society. Where Gide sees the Revolution as a living process in which contradictions operate, Céline can see only a monstrous deception of the people by unscrupulous politicians who flattered them into believing that the tyrant is not in themselves—in the depraved and hellish nature of man—but in such "external" forces as social exploitation. It is these flatterers, as for example Marx and Lenin, that are the opium of the people. Lamenting the iniquities of progress and the futility of the machine, he finally impales politics as the force which "during the last three centuries has corrupted Man more than during the whole of pre-History." All talk of economics riles him, and he sticks his knife into the father of the materialist heresy: "Look at the mug of fat Marx, his belly full!" Now and then we come across some vague reference to the "inner revolution," which is contraposed to the "outer revolution" inherent in the political approach. But this bow to the church fathers is merely made in passing, as an afterthought. This writer's literary investments in despair are much too heavy to permit him any perspectives of change, no matter how dim and ideal.

The second essay in the book is a biographical work on Semmelweis, a Hungarian physician who was a martyr to medical science, and was written as Céline's doctorate thesis. It is by far the more integrated of the two essays, for it was composed in the fever heat of a personal identification and succeeds in creating the image of a man driven by fate and his inner need. Reading it after Mea Culpa, one wishes that in writing about socialism Céline had to some degree been moved by that passion for scientific method which he so much admires in his hero, Semmelweis. We might have been spared, then, the musty abstractions about human nature. His diabolic portrait of man is as unreal as the angelic one he so gratuitously attributes to Marx. And that literary demonism of his, which makes his novels into a kind of tabloid edition of Baudelaire, seems here to have been laid out in a spiritual heat-prostration so melodramatic as to suggest a piece of clever showmanship.

PHILIP RAHV

Prologue to Revolution

THE FIRST RUSSIAN REVOLUTION, 1825, THE DECEMBRIST MOVEMENT, ITS ORIGINS, DEVELOPMENT AND SIGNIFICANCE. By Anatole G. Mazour. University of California Press. $4.

ON December 14 (O.S.), 1825, a battalion of the Moscow regiment of the Guards stationed in St. Petersburg was incited by its officers to refuse the oath of allegiance to the new emperor, Nicholas I. The men were marched to the Senate Square and were joined there by a detachment of grenadiers and a company of marines. According to the plans, the leaders of the rebellion were first to force the Senate to issue a liberal manifesto abolishing the old regime and appointing a provisional government, and then to seize the Winter Palace and arrest the imperial family. However, no attempt was made to carry out these measures. When the insurgents appeared on the square, they found the Senate building empty. The Senators had held an early session, sworn allegiance to Nicholas I, and gone home; Prince Trubetzkoy, chosen to head the rebellion, failed to appear on the scene at all. By noon the rebels had mustered three thousand bayonets and were standing idly in the biting wind. The governor-general of the capital and an officer who tried to persuade the men to return to their homes were shot. Finally, toward evening, Nicholas decided to act. Artillery was trained on the square; a few volleys of shrapnel put the insurgents to flight and left many dead and wounded on the cobbles. A few hours later several of the conspirators were apprehended and brought to the Emperor for examination.

The so-called Decembrist insurrection was over. Yet the pathetic affair on the Senate Square was to have its counterpart in the south. On December 30 a lieutenant colonel placed himself at the head of a part of his regiment and raised the banner of revolt. He seized a small town near Kiev and inaugurated the new era with a religious service, in the course of which Christ was declared to be the only czar on earth. Then the little band of insurgents left the town, and for four days wandered from village to village in search of reinforcements, committing one strategic blunder after another, until they were routed by a detachment of loyal cavalry and artillery. Two of the officers committed suicide, the others were seized and sent to St. Petersburg in irons.

Such was "the first Russian revolution," of which the book under review is a history. It is, on the whole, a conscientious if pedestrian work by a liberal-minded scholar with a somewhat solecistic style. Its chief merit is that it utilizes much fresh source material, particularly the voluminous records of the trial of the conspirators, which were only published within the last few years. The substance of the volume is, of course, the story of the secret societies and of the feeble revolt in which their activities culminated. Dr. Mazour sees that the revolt failed because, for one thing, the leaders wanted "a government for the people but not by the people." He recognizes, too, the significance of this abortive effort as the first skirmish in a long-drawn-out battle, the beginning of a revolutionary tradition.

AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY

Religion in Wood

SHAKER FURNITURE. THE CRAFTSMANSHIP OF AN AMERICAN COMMUNAL SECT. By Edward Deming Andrews and Faith Andrews. Photographs by William F. Winter. Yale University Press. $10.

MR. and Mrs. Andrews know all there is to know about Shaker furniture. They know it as pieces of wood sawed, planed, and dove-tailed into useful shapes, and they can speak with authority about tongue-and-groove cleats, the lipped drawer, and the diameters of finials. But they know it also in its origin, which is the Shaker way of life, and they can speak with equal authority about a sect one of whose proverbs was the remarkable sentence: "Every force evolves a form." With the strict and loving care of scholars they have presented in this volume the forms of Shaker furniture; and with an even finer care they have expressed the forces behind the forms. They understand that carpentry was merely one of many rituals with which a certain American culture of the last century maintained for a while its purity. Only for a while, as is usual with such things; there were a thousand members of the United Society in 1800, there were six thousand on the eve of the Civil War, in 1900 there were but a single thousand again, and now there are almost none. But while this thing lasted it was pure and very strong, and Mr. and Mrs. Andrews come as near as anyone may come to knowing why. If they have chosen to write about the ritual of the woodshop it is because that ritual has left the most tangible traces in our day; though there are, of course, the wonderful houses and barns still standing at New Lebanon, Hancock, Canterbury, and so on; and there is an extensive literature of diaries and songs to be explored. Yet the rest of the rituals are in their minds as they write, for their final interest is the whole of Shaker life.

On more than one page they refer to the quality of that life. In an old Shaker room, they say, "the sense is strong of being above and beyond the familiar, the world as we know it, in an atmosphere purified, as it were, from the non-essentials of living—an intangible feeling, difficult to describe." But they have described it; or if it cannot be described they have recalled it to anyone who has stood in such a room and been disturbed by the certainty that those who once inhabited it were sure of every thought they had. Mr. Homer Eaton Keyes, who contributes a preface to the volume, says that "to enter a Shaker room today is to be profoundly conscious of this mystical emanation, at once so soothing and so strangely agitating." Mystical or not, there it is. And there it was in 1877, when A. B. Harris wrote for the Granite Monthly: "They, the Shakers, are there to stay. And that fact accounts for a great deal. It is partial explanation of the contentment on the faces of the Shaker sisters. It is a reason for the repose and settledness which pervade a Shaker village—that indefinable something, so altogether unlike the life of ordinary villages, and which you feel in the air, and are conscious of by some instinct, as men claim to be aware of the presence of spirits. . . . There is no restlessness, or fret of business, or anxiety about anything; it is as if the work was done, and it was one eternal afternoon." The Shakers have not, in fact, stayed. And much of their furniture has gone with them, through "fire and auction and neglect." But they expected to stay, just as they expected that there would always be thousands of Shakers to work incessantly and serenely at the making of objects which said as only wood can say it: "There is great beauty in harmony."

The three main points of the creed were purity, community, and separation. The Shakers, that is to say, were celibates; they lived as much like one another as possible; and they kept as free as they could of the world at large. It is not the creed as such, however, that explains them or their furniture. It is rather the happiness with which they held it, the light-heartedness with which they enslaved themselves to the various rituals it demanded, and also the circumstance that the first thousand of them at the end of the eighteenth century were poor people of New York and New England—"farmers, mechanics, and small tradesmen"—whose notions of chairs and tables were both ancient and basic. They brought with them in their minds the barest patterns, the purest beginnings of design; and then something converted them into artists with an exalted lyric gift for the plane surface, the straight line. What that something was even Mr. and Mrs. Andrews do not claim perfectly to know. Some of the Shakers were reported as believing in assistance from the angels. Whatever the source, the result is some of the most beautiful furniture in the world, as any of Mr. Winter's forty-eight plates will instantly prove, and as the analytical notes by Mr. and Mrs. Andrews will prove in the slower though no less powerful way of words.

MARK VAN DOREN

Wanted: A Supreme Court Primer

SELECTED SUPREME COURT DECISIONS. Edited by Myer Cohen, with an introduction by Alexander Meiklejohn. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THERE is a belief current among men who regard themselves as realists that what counts in government is power and power alone. This is a welcome reaction to the goo-goo school of civic virtue; but while we have needed some stiffening in our political thinking, we must beware of rigor mortis. We are in danger of yielding to the old utilitarian fallacy in a new form. The utilitarians felt that the object of government and the motives of men in it were ultimately reducible to pleasure and pain. We tend to feel today that government is reducible to what men can be taught to shout and how they can be taught to act. If, for example, they can be taught to cry, "Hurrah for the Supreme Court," or, "Down with the Supreme Court," it makes little difference whether these slogans are merely slogans or the outgrowth of experience. But that simply isn't true, just as "push-pin is as good as poetry" wasn't true. We are all learning about the judicial power now from experience: the Supreme Court justices are our best schoolmasters in the nature of judicial review, and they are never so revealing as when they reverse themselves under pressure. But experience does not carry its own lessons. It needs to be interpreted. Some day we shall have to tackle the judicial power with finality. When that day comes, knowledge must be there as well as slogans.

As his stint in this educative process, Mr. Cohen has compiled a casebook of Supreme Court decisions. It differs from other compilations in three respects. It is frankly addressed to lay readers rather than to law-school or college students. Its framework is economic: it premises that there is an economic order as well as a set of political dogmas and traditions, and that the court functions in that order. Finally, it deals with the Supreme Court decisions as a civic literature. Mr. Cohen has studied and worked with Walton Hamilton and Alexander Meiklejohn and has caught from their contagion the knack for seeing literature as a form of public utterance and public utterances as literature. Mr. Meiklejohn, in his introduction, explains with persuasiveness that just as Plato distils the Greek commonwealth and Henry Adams nineteenth-century American society, the Supreme Court decisions distil the nature of the American state.

It is a fruitful lead, worth elaboration. Mr. Cohen has gathered together and arranged excerpts from the great decisions, and thus gives us the material with which to test the thesis. He has used this material in adult classes in the San Francisco School of Social Studies, and used it with success. For other teachers it may be worth saying that the court's decisions are on their face neither great literature nor great statecraft, but generally logic-chopping and mumbo-jumbo. More than any other literature, court decisions will not explain themselves but need the skilful glossator, whether in lecture hall, discussion room, or book. A compilation of this sort, moreover, suffers from the fact that no sooner is the print on it dry than the material is out of date. Thus Mr. Cohen did not wait long enough to get the De Jonge criminal-syndicalism decision, the minimum-wage reversal, or the Jones and Laughlin decision on the Wagner Act. A more serious flaw in the book is that, unlike so many recent writers who have glorified Taney redivivus, Mr. Cohen turns an astigmatic eye upon the Taney period in the court's history. His book contains no federal decisions between Barron v. Baltimore (1833) and the Slaughter-house cases (1873). And yet these were forty years of intensely important economic development in the country and enormously interesting gyrations of judicial doctrine to mirror that development. Even the Dred Scott decision, in 1857, is being increasingly interpreted in economic terms.

But my chief quarrel with the book is its price. If the common man is to understand the contradictions of American culture through the Supreme Court decisions, they must be brought within his reach. Is there not a publisher who will risk a fifty-cent edition of the basic decisions in the history of the Supreme Court, with running notes and commentary that the ordinary man can understand? MAX LERNER

Four in Midsummer

EITHER IS LOVE. By Elisabeth Craigin. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

PLACE IN THE CITY. By Howard Fast. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

EVE'S DOCTOR. By Signe Toksvig. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

THE ANOINTED. By Clyde Brion Davis. (Selection of the Discoverers.) Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

IN a brief memoir, "Either is Love," Miss Craigin professes to contrast and reconcile the two loves of her unnamed "I"—one for the man she married in her late thirties, and the other for the girl, Rachel, for whom she has had a previous blind infatuation of which she feels obliged to tell her husband by letter. Unfortunately, in trying to convince us that both of these loves are possible for her heroine Miss Craigin makes two grave errors among several lesser ones. She insists too often and against all evidence that this Lesbian love was not Lesbian but a pure love heretofore unnoted by psychoanalysts; and she presents the account of the passion for Rachel in convincing narrative form, while that of the husband is given only in reminiscences, argumentation, and snatches of love letters after his death. Since no character or environment is evoked in the latter, the reader feels uncomfortably that Miss Craigin used the later marriage merely as a concession to squeamish moral tastes. The whole treatment is so limited to physical sensation that it is difficult to forecast what she might do in another vein.

Directly opposed is Howard Fast's "Place in the City," recalling any number of other novels offering a melodramatic cross-section of one alley in the city. It is a completely objective narrative of the Poet, the Moll, the Whore, the Preacher, and others, all of whom he knows by observation but none of whom he really understands. Mr. Fast, who is only twenty-three, has a certain pretentiousness in his asides and betrays his immaturity in many of his Causes and Reasons, but he tells his tale so swiftly and glibly that it doesn't make much difference whether the Causes fit or not. He writes easily, probably too easily, and you will find the novel enjoyable light reading if you hold your thought processes in abeyance and run with the words.

To those who recall Miss Toksvig's very capable biography, "Hans Christian Andersen," her recent novel is likely to prove bewildering. She has selected all of the most banal adjectives to describe the public and private life of a god, one Michael Murrough, a women's doctor in Dublin. Her theme had excellent possibilities: the clash between Catholicism and medical science, the adoring patients who insist on becoming lovers, and the interlarding of case histories, hospital routine, Caesarean sections, and the like; but she is not equal to the task. Her style is pedestrian; all her characters are smug bourgeois snobs and egomaniacs, although I am quite sure she didn't intend them to be.

Mr. Davis's "The Anointed" is another story. It is concerned with a young sailor, Harry Patterson, and his search for the Over Beyond across the Black Ocean, where even a captain gets scared and "throws his helm hard to port and races back to the harbor full steam ahead" to drown his inefficiency in a Hong Kong honky-tonk. In the book Harry never leaves the harbor either, but he knows he is going to, and prepares himself in a financial way by learning scientific crapshooting, in an intellectual way by observing the direction of an eddy over the drain in bathtubs both in North and South America and reading "Silas Marner," and in a spiritual way by pumping everybody from a Nova Scotia red to a Rio chippy who used to work for Madam Chamber in Kansas City and a Washed-in-the-Blood-of-the-Lamber on Mission Street in San Francisco.

Mr. Davis is adept in capturing lingo and shaping his characters quite unforgettably through a few bits of casual conversation. Occasionally he startles the reader with a sentence-long description of the sea and its inhabitants which is sharply beautiful. But above all, he sets a mood of perverse innocence and world-wise naivete, and maintains it consistently until the end, which is a difficult job. PAUL LOVE

Shorter Notices

TAKE CARE OF YOURSELF. By Jerome W. Ephraim. Simon and Schuster. $2.

This book is definitely not of the "Skin Deep" school. Mr. Ephraim names no names, and his primary concern is with the presentation of straightforward information about the care of health and looks, not with the debunking of advertised cure-alls and cosmetic preparations. For this reason the book is less exciting, and certainly it is less provocative than its predecessors, but guinea pigs who want facts, rather than scandal, will find them in "Take Care of Yourself." It is Mr. Ephraim's thesis that reforms in merchandising and advertising must come from the consuming public. In this way: When the public has achieved a sufficiently high level of intelligence so that it cannot be duped, fraud will become unprofitable and honesty be the best policy. Until this happy state is attained, consumers would do well to follow Mr. Ephraim's advice when stocking their medicine chests and beauty kits. Information about remedies that can be safely used and those that should be avoided is presented, along with understandable explanations of the causes of such disorders which trouble the human body as colds, dandruff, constipation, indigestion, athlete's foot, pyorrhea, insomnia, and even "hang-overs." Cosmetics and shaving preparations are amply discussed, and certain types of products are recommended and others condemned. In some instances it would have been helpful had Mr. Ephraim described products by their advertised names, but this is a minor complaint about a book which altogether is practical, sensible, and effective.

RUTH BRINDZE

WHY WAS LINCOLN MURDERED? By Otto Eisenschiml. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

Mr. Eisenschiml has dug up from limbo a number of mysteries pertaining to Lincoln's assassination and its aftermath which historians have ignored in a curious manner. Why were the telegraph wires leading out of Washington tampered with, but not cut, immediately after the assassination? Why was Booth's name withheld from the public for three critical hours? Why was every avenue of escape for Booth blocked, save—as the record seems to show—the most likely one, which he took? Why was the pursuit handled in such a bungling manner? Why was Booth not brought back alive, to tell what he knew? Why was Lincoln's bodyguard at the playhouse, guilty of the grossest negligence, not only not punished but never even questioned? And deepest, darkest mystery of all, did any double-dealing federal official, hating Lincoln's reconstruction policy, know of Booth's plot in advance? These and a number of other neglected questions Mr. Eisenschiml has discussed, readably, in calm, judicial temper, and with a scholarship in this particular field of Lincoln history hitherto displayed by none. Yet in spite of all his diligence and skill, Mr. Eisenschiml is obliged to confess that he does not know just why Lincoln was murdered, nor can he definitely answer any of the questions above enumerated. He does, however, give a convincing answer to one big question which historians have apparently blundered in handling: to wit, why was the Civil War, from the Northern side, conducted in such a bungling manner? The truth seems to be that McClellan was a very able commander, the best the North produced, and that, as he claimed in his autobiography, Stanton and other radical leaders blocked his support by deliberate design. Mr. Eisenschiml thoroughly agrees with McClellan on this point, and in view of the astonishing evidence which he amasses I do not see how future historians can escape the same conclusion.

CHARLES LEE SNYDER

TRAVEL

WITNESS
The 20th ANNIVERSARY of the
RUSSIAN REVOLUTION
in
MOSCOW
WITH VISITS TO LENINGRAD, KHARKOV, KIEV.
A selective group tour under authoritative leadership.
See the Soviet Union in the festival month of November
when theatres and other activities are at their height.
Sailing October 20 in the Queen Mary;
back in New York November 23.
Inclusive rate with Third Class steamship passage and Second Class in U. S. S. R.: $389
THE OPEN ROAD
12th Floor
8 West 40th Street New York
Cooperating with Intourist

U.S.S.R. 20TH ANNIVERSARY
NOVEMBER 7th CELEBRATION
SOVIET RUSSIA—this year of all years—a memorable tour under the experienced guidance of J. N. Golos, manager of World Tourists, Inc. Visiting London, Copenhagen, Helsingfors, Leningrad, Moscow, Kharkov, Yalta, Odessa, Kiev and Paris. $280 UP
WORLD TOURISTS, Inc. 175 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK
ALgonquin 4-6656

RECORDS

THE difference between Mozart at twenty-one and Mozart at thirty-one—which is the difference between Mozart young and Mozart old—is not the difference between immaturity and maturity. The Mozartian feeling and the form in which this feeling crystallizes are to be heard in miraculously matured perfection in the Piano Concerto K. 271 now recorded by Gieseking (Columbia: four records, $6), as in the Piano Concerto K. 488 recorded by Rubinstein. What happens with time is that they become richer, and that the melancholy, as it deepens, becomes all-pervasive. In the Concerto K. 271, then, we find a slow movement with the affecting poignancy of a slow movement of one of the later concertos; but in none of these do we find a first movement with the high spirits and wit of the first movement of K. 271.

By wit I mean, of course, wit that manifests itself through musical terms and operations and is therefore not expressible in words (though it resembles verbal wit in its economy of means) but is recognizable only by its effect—by the fact that it makes one laugh. I laughed at the entrance of the piano 1⅜ inches from the beginning of the first record of K. 271; the wit is what the orchestra is doing and what the piano does at that point—not only in the piano's trill itself, but in the precise point at which the trill occurs: as the orchestra repeats its little closing bow. And also in the quality of the trill as Gieseking plays it: one way to characterize his playing—so astounding in its physical and musical perfection—is to say that it brings to life every such detail of wit and expressiveness. Collaborating with him, and playing with excellent spirit, style, and finish, is the Berlin State Opera Orchestra under Hans Rosbaud.

Beethoven's String Quintet, Opus 29 (Columbia: four records, $6), is an early work of a different sort—one of those in which one is astonished in every movement by the first manifestation of the originality and power that are to reach their full development later. The performance by the Lener String Quartet and William Primrose is very good, and well recorded.

On Columbia singles (each $1.50) are Beethoven's beautiful Piano Sonata, Opus 78, and the charming Overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," superbly played and recorded—the one by Egon Petri, the other by Beecham and the London Philharmonic. On another, Huberman impresses me with his magnificence of style in the arid Sarabande of Bach's Partita No. 1, and with the quality of his phrasing in Bach's wonderful Choral Prelude, "Nun komm' der Heiden Heiland," in which, however, the recording permits occasional stridencies of tone to be obtrusive. And on two others, Meyrowitz's slow-paced performance of the "Siegfried-Idyll" with the Paris Philharmonic makes the work dull.

There remains the duet of Eva and Walther in Act 2 of "Die Meistersinger," ending with the exquisite passage, "Geliebter, spare den Zorn," sung by Germaine Martinelli and Georges Thill with an orchestra under Eugène Bigot. A record of German music sung by French singers with French words and with a French orchestra should, by all the theories, be bad; actually, with the French words for the most part as unrecognizable as the German would be, and with the French singers and orchestra singing and playing very much as Germans would—and singing and playing very well, even with Mlle. Martinelli's occasional shrillness—the record is quite good.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Goebbels's Guiding Hand

Dear Sirs: "Coordinated" newspapermen under the Nazi regime are never in doubt as to what is expected of them. Dr. Goebbels issues daily bulletins for editors, called Merkblätter, telling the boys what to print and what to omit. They are secret documents, and when the Berlin correspondent of the Manchester Guardian got hold of some of them and used them for a good story he was expelled from Germany. The German editor who furnished the bulletins was tried for treason and is now in prison.

Previously this method concerned only newspapermen working within the Third Reich. A sequel to this, however, is that Dr. Goebbels is now issuing special orders for traveling correspondents; that is, those who cover events abroad. Journalists visiting the Paris exhibition, for instance, are instructed to report immediately to the information office of the German Building on the fair grounds to receive their written orders.

A Merkblatt of this kind has reached this country. Anti-French in its tendency, it is only surprising that the French government tolerates such an abuse of its hospitality after a mutual agreement regarding the Third Reich's participation had been reached. The following extract of this timely document speaks for itself:

"From the French viewpoint, the exhibition is intended (a) to increase the glory and prestige of France all over the world, and to serve in this manner France's imperialistic policy; (b) to make propaganda for the governing Popular Front regime in France and for Marxism; (c) to stimulate France's tourist traffic and, as a result of an unexpected economic revival, insure the political success of the Blum government.

"The dangers arising out of Marxism and bolshevism must never be forgotten, neither with regard to general European interests nor with regard to France—even if the Popular Front, for obvious tactical reasons, should during the time of the exhibition show greater moderation and veil the present setbacks as much as possible.

"In describing the exhibition, as well as in general accounts of the country and the French capital, the old mistakes of unrestricted glorification must be avoided; such events must merely be regarded as a shining and illuminated façade.

"The exhibition in its vast variety affords good possibilities for comparison and justified reason for the superiority of German accomplishments in the arts and sciences. . . . Besides the German House and other German exhibits (which in each journalistic description must be placed in the foreground) the pavilions of related or befriended nations—in close proximity to the German House: Portugal, Poland, Austria, Italy, and others —are welcome subjects for the appreciation of cultural and extra-political connections. . . .

"The exhibition may offer certain opportunities to further Franco-German relations. It may be mentioned that there was close collaboration in its preparation. Future problems, such as a German-French rapprochement, must be solved through official foreign channels, not through private, even if well-intended, endeavor. Whoever in his reports on the exhibition touches the German-French relationships must never forget that unfortunately a large majority of the French people, contrary to the Germans, have been prejudiced. Progress can only be made by a dignified attitude and an honest treatment of this difficult problem, not by a one-sided approach. . . .

"Reporters who visit the fair must report at once after their arrival in Paris to Hans Wendt, Paris. Telephone: St. Germain-en-Laye 200."

J. MULLEN

Philadelphia, Pa., July 20

A Reasonable Request

Dear Sirs: I have recently sent the following telegram to Dr. Hans Heinrich Dieckhoff, German Ambassador to the United States, in Washington:

Having observed the activities of the Friends of the New Germany in America for some time, I hereby apply for a special visa or permit to go to Germany for an unlimited period of time for the purpose of organizing branches of the Friends of Democracy among German citizens who are still friendly to liberty and the democratic way of life. Included in this permit I should like also to have the privilege of marching the members of the Friends of Democracy through German streets and highways, carrying the Stars and Stripes and shouting the slogans of Jeffersonian democracy from the American Declaration of Independence and our Bill of Rights. I should like, moreover, to have it specifically stated in my visa that the Friends of Democracy may set up semi-military camps on German soil and carry on both secret and open propaganda against German Nazism.

On my desk I have stacks of Nazi propaganda received from Nazi individuals, various Nazi propaganda groups, such as Julius Streicher, the Fichte Bund, World Service, the League of Anti-Comintern Associations, the Judenkenner, and others. In return for the privilege thus extended to your Nazi propaganda groups I want you to extend to the American Legion, the Daughters of the American Revolution, and similar patriotic American groups the right to send their propaganda in behalf of liberty and the democratic way of life to Germany and to circulate it there very freely.

Also I pray for the further right to arrange for special short-wave broadcasts to the Friends of Democracy in Germany from America at regular intervals.

L. M. BIRKHEAD

Kansas City, July 20

Imperialism in Palestine

Dear Sirs: On reading your editorial on the partition of Palestine I was struck by what you did not say. That the "extremist elements" among both Arabs and Jews should not command your sympathy is, I think, quite reasonable. But to express a measure of support to the "moderates" who are willing to take half a loaf rather than none, and at the same time to pass over completely the role of Britain, is a horse of another color.

In my humble opinion the White Paper reveals two very important facts: first, the fundamentally irreconcilable clash between general Zionism and the Jewish majority forces on the one hand and Arab nationalist movements on the other, which you discussed; and second, the fact, which was perfectly clear even to the New York Times, that Britain has been compelled to show her imperialist hand more clearly than ever. This you did not discuss.

Britain's interest in Palestine in relation to her empire is no secret to Nation readers. What is not so plain is her interest in preventing united resistance by the population. I believe the logical road for Palestine to be national independence for the Arabs, with minority rights for the Jews, with the Histadruth the main guarantee of the latter. Efforts in that direction are growing—with active support from minority groups in the Histadruth. (See the Jewish Frontier, July.)

The success of this movement spells a serious defeat for British imperialism. And the British Foreign Office knows it well. The proposed plan for partition is, from Britain's standpoint, good strategy. By the same token, those who call themselves progressive should oppose that plan for partition.

SIDNEY L. JACKSON

Mount Vernon, N. Y., July 22

Help for Needy Authors

Dear Sirs: I wish to call attention to the Authors Club-Carnegie Fund for needy authors. The applicant must be eligible for membership in the Authors Club, which means that he must have had a book published by a standard publisher, of such literary standing that it would pass the qualifications of our membership committee. Help is given in the form of a donation or loan, whichever the applicant may prefer. The address of the Fund is 173 Riverside Drive, New York.

N. L. LEDERER, Chairman

New York, July 9

Lewis Henry Morgan

Dear Sirs: I am gathering material for a biography of Lewis Henry Morgan (1818-1881), the distinguished American anthropologist, and also of his protege, Adolphe F. Bandelier (1840-1914), and am very eager to secure letters written by them. Any letters lent to me for this purpose will be guarded carefully and returned with gratitude. I would be thankful, too, for any information pertaining to letters written by them. Material may be sent to me at the University of Michigan.

Both Morgan and Bandelier contributed to The Nation during the seventies and eighties.

LESLIE A. WHITE

Ann Arbor, Mich., July 22

Victory in Indiana

Dear Sirs: A telling blow in behalf of civil liberties has just been delivered by the Supreme Court of Indiana in the Butash case. Paul Butash, a solicitor of subscriptions for the Literary Digest, was arrested in the village of Angola, Indiana, in May, 1936, and indicted under the Indiana Criminal Syndicalism Law for saying that "the masses should overthrow the rich uncles of Wall Street by seizing their property, that all colleges belong to the student body, that all business belongs to the masses, and that all factories if not given up peaceably should be seized and operated by the masses." He was convicted by a jury and sentenced to the Indiana State Prison for five years, where he served eleven months before he was released on bail in the sum of $5,000, furnished by the American Civil Liberties Union.

The Supreme Court found that the remarks of Butash were only the expression of his opinion on economic and political questions and a possible partial solution for them, or else a mere statement of existing facts; that the questions asked of Butash assumed that there was something wrong with our economic system of government; and finally that taking the evidence most strongly against him, no one could reasonably say that he had violated the provisions of the statute.

H. E. BAKER

Chicago, Ill., July 31

CONTRIBUTORS

BENJAMIN STOLBERG made a study of vigilantism during his recent trip to the steel and automobile centers of the Middle West.

JOSEPHINE HERBST, author of "The Executioner Waits," has recently returned from an extended visit in Spain.

MORRIS SHAPIRO, who is secretary of the Scottsboro Defense Committee, attended the recent trials in Decatur.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE regularly reviews poetry for The Nation.

AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY is the author of a life of Dostoievski and the editor of "The Works of Alexander Pushkin," recently published.

MARK VAN DOREN is film critic and a frequent reviewer of books for The Nation.

PAUL LOVE has been dance critic of the World-Telegram and has written on the dance for various other publications.

RUTH BRINDZE is the author of "How to Spend Money" and is active in the groups now seeking a new deal for the consumer.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

LANGUAGES

Language Phone Sets
Bought, sold, rented, exchanged. Language Service, 507-5th Ave. MUr. 2-4221.

WRITER'S SERVICE

DOES YOUR WRITING SUCCEED as it should? Intelligent, sincere students consider my help invaluable. ROBERT L. NEWMAN, 251 West 71st Street, New York City.

FOR RENT

English Cotswolds—Oxford 35 miles—Beautifully situated, sunny—well furnished house on edge of Village. Central heating—Electric light—6 bedrooms (4 with H & C water), convenient kitchen, living room, large sitting room—Studio—2 baths—For rent from October-winter or longer. Mrs. Miller, Campden, Gloucestershire, England.

WANTED

Small 1, 2 room bungalow by or near Lake Mohegan for rest of season. Moderate. Box No. 942, c/o The Nation.

PERSONAL

Driving to California Aug. 21. Can accommodate two. Write Mansfield, 309 East 23rd Street, New York City.

WHY NOT

pick up your telephone and give us that classified ad for next week's issue? You will reach a group of 21,000 readers of The Nation living in the metropolitan area, besides our readers out of town.

RATES: 62 cents a line minimum 3 lines

THE NATION
20 VESEY STREET COrtlandt 7-3330

Going Places?

Take The Nation with you! But remember that when reporting a change of address subscribers are requested to give us three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new. Please write to The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · AUGUST 21, 1937 NUMBER 8

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 181

EDITORIALS:

SALUTE TO JUSTICE BLACK 183
WHAT JAPAN WANTS 185
THE LOYALIST DILEMMA 185
ROOSEVELT STRIKES BACK by Robert S. Allen 187
WILL FRANCE GO SYNDICALIST? by Robert Dell 188
VIGILANTISM, 1937—II by Benjamin Stolberg 191
THE DUST BOWL by William Gropper 194
LEGAL PEONAGE IN FLORIDA by O. K. Armstrong 195
THE MAILED FIST IN GREECE by Julian Bach, Jr. 197
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 199

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

MATINAL by Charles Hudeburg 200
UNLOCKING THE WORLD'S ARSENALS by Frank C. Hanighen 200
A RECIPE FOR WORSHIP by Kenneth Burke 201
DAY AT HOME by Louis Kronenberger 202
THREE FOR PASTIME by David Greenhood 202
BIG CITY PRIMITIVE by William Phillips 203
MAN AS PHYLUM by J. F. Brown 204
BETWEEN CASTES by Martha Gruening 205

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editor
MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

THE BOMBS FROM CHINESE AIRPLANES WHICH rained death on the International Settlement at Shanghai, killing thousands of persons, including three prominent Americans, have brought home to the Western World the full seriousness of the hostilities now under way in the Far East. While the actual bombing was done by the Chinese, the responsibility, as pointed out by the Settlement authorities, rests entirely with Japan. In the past week, as in 1932, the Japanese have utilized the Settlement as a shield for military operations against the Chinese. Illegally and against the opposition of the Shanghai Municipal Council, they have constructed a huge barracks in the Hongkew area, which has been converted into a veritable fortress. Japanese battleships anchored close to the shore have fired with impunity over the Settlement at the Chinese sections of the city. It was an attempt by the Chinese to drive these ships out of range of the city which led to the frightful loss of life in the heart of the Settlement. The lives of thousands of Americans and Europeans are endangered as long as Japan is permitted to use the city as a base for operations. For years the Japanese have pushed their aggressive designs in China under the protection of the special privileges which Europeans wrested from the Manchus nearly a century ago. They will not be stopped by spasmodic protests. Only through the most vigorous of joint diplomatic representations by all the powers can American and European lives be safeguarded and Western powers absolved of complicity in Japanese terrorism.

*

THE FRIGHTFUL EVENTS AT SHANGHAI HAVE made a clarification of American policy on the Sino-Japanese conflict a matter of immediate importance. From some quarters has come a renewed demand that the President invoke the Neutrality Act. Yet that act offers little, if any, protection against the sort of incidents which might involve us in the Far Eastern conflict. None of the American citizens so far killed had been trading in contraband; none were aboard enemy ships or in a legitimate zone of battle. It would be virtually impossible to uproot and repatriate the 4,000 Americans permanently settled in Shanghai. And it goes without saying that legitimate American business will not passively stand by and see the Chinese market absorbed by its chief competitor. Invocation of the Neutrality Act would, moreover, give Japan an excuse to declare a blockade of the China coast, while the cash-and-carry clause would serve to make us, in effect, an ally of Japan. There is little that the United States can do single-handed to check Japanese aggression. An official embargo of scrap iron, as proposed by Senator Nye, would be unneutral and dangerous. Sanctions cannot be unilaterally applied without risk of war. But this does not close the door to unofficial action by Americans who feel that aggression, wherever it occurs, is of universal concern. Since Japan is notoriously short of foreign exchange, every dollar spent on products from Japan is virtually a contribution to the Japanese war chest. A nationwide boycott of Japanese goods might be the most telling argument that could be devised against the lawless greed of Japanese militarism.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

✶

CONGRESS REACHED THE LOWER DEPTHS OF politics as its session approached a close. To the forgotten crop-control legislation and the mutilated housing bill, on which we commented last week, it now adds the tragic death of the wage-hour bill. Robert S. Allen's article in this issue tells how the bill, after passing the Senate and being assured of a large House majority, was killed in the reactionary Rules Committee. No more brazen instance of the overriding of the majority principle has occurred even in the present Congress, which has had more than its share of instances. And when even the major "preferred" legislation is scrapped, it should occasion no surprise that nothing has come of the anti-lynching bill, that Congress is ignoring the President's objections on the sugar bill, or that the excellent Schwellenbach-Allen resolution on the use of W.P.A. funds has been lost sight of. The legislative chaos is best shown by the agricultural mix-up. The blame for the present fiasco lies not only with Congress but also with the President and Secretary Wallace, who, depending on prosperity and good prices, offered no concrete program of crop control to Congress. Then the bottom dropped out of the cotton market, and loud yammerings were heard for a renewal of the cotton loans. The Administration had passed the buck to Congress, and Congress now passed it back to the Administration. The result is that the President has agreed to make government loans to peg a carry-over of close to 10,000,000 bales of cotton at twelve cents a pound. And all he gets in return is a promise that crop control will be the first item on the next session's agenda. Much has been said of the need for Congressional independence. If this is it, we join in welcoming adjournment.

✶

SENATOR PITTMAN PAINTED A DIRE PICTURE last week of the wives and children of foreign ambassadors in Washington who live "in fear and trembling" when their embassies are picketed. As a result, the Senate promptly passed a measure making it unlawful for American citizens to stage even the mildest demonstration within 500 feet of any building housing official foreign representatives. There is considerable doubt that even Senator Pittman was taken in by his oratory; there is no doubt at all that whatever "fear and trembling" there was in the matter centered in the State Department. It was Secretary of State Hull who put up Senator Pittman to this dangerous piece of nonsense. Everything should be done to bury the bill in the House, not only because it is a clear-cut violation of the constitutional rights of free speech and assembly but because it introduces a foreign and wholly objectionable principle into the American scheme. It would make the Washington government diplomatically responsible for its citizens' hostility to foreign governments. If picketing is to be forbidden because it is "embarrassing" to the State Department, what is to prevent that agency's assuming similar responsibility for "insults" to friendly governments in the American press?

✶

VOTERS WILL NEED A WORLD'S ALMANAC, a Baedeker, and a copy of Culbertson on Bridge in order to make their way through the New York mayoralty situation. The latest event to complicate matters is Thomas Dewey's decision to run for district attorney as a La Guardia man on the Republican ticket. Dewey's last-minute decision was reached only after La Guardia, who had been nominated both by the Labor Party and the Fusion group but had shown little interest in the Republicans, agreed to make a vigorous attempt to win the Republican primary as well. Dewey's move, although hailed by all except the two Democratic groups, may ultimately cut both ways: for if La Guardia loses to Copeland in the Republican primaries, Copeland will have in Dewey (who is unopposed on the Republican ticket) a strong running-mate to help swell his total votes. There can be little doubt, however, that the Dewey candidacy on the whole strengthens La Guardia by associating with his name that of a man who has won great prestige through his successful racket-prosecutions and who has no taint of radicalism. The Labor Party's warm indorsement of Dewey was a wise move, for it is well to make it clear that labor has no interest in defending the cause of racketeering union officials.

✶

AROUND THE WALLS OF THE FLINT ARMORY last week were banners that must have made the eyes of the local soldiery pop out of their heads. National Guardsmen, after all, are not used to seeing their places of business decked out with such inscriptions as "Vigilance against Vigilantes"; "Picketing Is Labor's Right"; "Outlaw the Law-and-Order Leagues"; and "Defend Your Civil Rights." The occasion was the first of a projected series of regional anti-viligante conferences and was called by the Michigan Civil Rights Federation and the Flint local of the United Automobile Workers Union. More significant than the ironic site of the convention was the broad slice of Michigan citizenry represented: 225 trade-union delegations, 32 political groups, 36 social-welfare organizations, 85 fraternal societies, 5 church groups, 2 farm-and-tenant organizations, and 11 civil-rights defense groups. This is only one part of the answer to the mushroom growth of citizens committees, law-and-order leagues, and vigilante groups—legislation and militant trade unionism make up the rest of the formula—but it is an extremely important part. The Flint affair was only the first of these broad mass reactions to the challenge of vigilantism. In a revealing poll of the American Institute of Public Opinion seventy-six per cent of the voters opposed vigilante "citizens groups" in strike areas. In this movement lies the grand chance to check the organized strength of vigilantism with the organized strength of democracy, to meet the fire of "citizens committees" with the fire of civil-rights federations.

*

ELSEWHERE IN THIS ISSUE IS AN ARTICLE BY O. K. Armstrong describing the workings of a statute under which peonage is freely practiced in Florida. Forced labor is a federal offense, and the Florida law, which may bind a worker to a turpentine or lumber camp for months under the most brutal conditions once he has accepted so much as a pair of overalls, is palpably unconstitutional. As Mr. Armstrong points out, it is next to impossible for the federal government to wipe out peonage by obtaining convictions from Southern white juries. But it is possible at least—and certainly desirable—to force a Supreme Court review of the infamous "fraud contract" law which is the legal protection for the peonage system. It could be done by appealing any one of the hundreds of cases in which men who attempt to escape from forced labor find themselves on chain-gangs, building roads for the state of Florida. To conduct such an appeal would require, of course, not only a brave defendant but extremely courageous counsel. Men have been lynched for less. The best guaranty of the safety of those involved in such a case would be publicity and more publicity. As a first step to that end we can think of no more effective spotlight to throw on that dark and noisome corner of American industry than the glare of the La Follette subcommittee investigating violations of civil liberties.

*

EDITH WHARTON INSISTED ON A ROOM OF her own, but she located it in the mansion in which she was born. Coming from one of the "best families" of New York, she needed great courage to undertake anything as useful as a writing career. But her revolt was personal, and the genteel tradition which in that single act she broke took its revenge by saturating her writing. Her interest lay not in the way the American captains of industry made money but in the life that they and their wives lived in spending it; not in the arid landscape of the new world they created but in the psychological nuances of the even more arid inner world in which they dwelt. Only once did she succeed in breaking this mold—in "Ethan Frome," an impassioned narrative of love and frustration, perfect of its kind, a token of what she might have achieved if she could more often have gone out of bounds.

SEVERAL IMPORTANT EDITORIAL CHANGES take effect with this issue. Joseph Wood Krutch, who has resigned from the board of editors of The Nation to take a position as professor of English literature at Columbia University, resumes his old post as dramatic critic. For four years Mr. Krutch has combined this function with his work as literary editor; he has served as dramatic critic since 1924. The literary editorship will be taken over by Margaret Marshall, who has been associated with the literary department during several of her ten years on The Nation's staff. The board of editorial associates has been discontinued at the request of its members, Heywood Broun, Alvin Johnson, and Oswald Garrison Villard. This group of experienced journalists was of great assistance in helping to institute the changes in appearance, content, and staff that marked the last two years of this journal's progress. They felt, however, that with the recent transfer of ownership the paper would be best served by the editors' retaining complete responsibility. The Nation accepts their resignation with gratitude for their many services. Heywood Broun is at present on vacation. His regular page will not appear for the next few weeks.

*

SACCO AND VANZETTI: DIED AUGUST 23, 1927.

Salute to Justice Black

THE choice of Senator Hugo L. Black for the Supreme Court vacancy is the most courageous executive appointment since President Wilson sent Louis D. Brandeis's name to the Senate. Although at present writing the nomination has not been confirmed, we nevertheless salute Mr. Justice Black and bestow on him the accolade of his title. For however much the Tories may rage, they cannot defeat a nomination which has overwhelming popular support.

In the light of the urgency with which the Senate pressed the Robinson appointment on the President, the choice of another Senator and another Southerner was brilliant. But too much, we think, has been said about the purely political maneuvering—just as there has been an overemphasis on two other factors extraneous to the quality of the nomination. One is the legal question, raised by Senators Burke, Austin, and Johnson; the second is the threat to the tradition of Senatorial courtesy in the objections to immediate confirmation. We do not, on the one hand, think much of the legalistic objections to the appointment—objections that were cheerfully waived when it was a question of appointing a conservative like Senator Robinson. Nor are we, on the other hand, dismayed by the breaking of a rule of Senatorial courtesy maintained for the past half-century. We have never cherished the thought of the Senate as the most exclusive club in the world, and every move to push a log from under this log-rolling aristocracy is all to the good.

The Tories are really fighting Senator Black because of his record. They are fighting him for the same reason that the Tories of a generation ago fought Louis D. Brandeis. In that case, as in this one, the public record of the appointee showed clearly that he could not be depended upon to be a minion of the corporations on the bench. They raised objections enough of a different character in the Brandeis case. They talked gravely of judicial temperament and sanctimoniously of ethics. They got a petition signed by seven ex-presidents of the Bar Association—a sort of Johnstown committee of the high-priced janissaries of Big Business. We shouldn't be surprised if they tried the same tactics now. But all this was and is a smoke-screen. What it seeks to conceal is that the Tories will not tolerate anyone on the Supreme Court whose first thought is for the common man. You may talk as liberally as your vocabulary will allow, but you must vote and act on the side of capitalist domination of the state.

That is just what Senator Black has not done. His Senate record shows that he is no fake liberal. During the Hoover years he stood almost alone with Senators Wagner and La Follette in his fight for adequate relief appropriations. He came to the support of the Federal Trade Commission at a time when the Hoover Administration was seeking to strip it of its economic division. In the early Roosevelt years he almost succeeded in pushing through a thirty-hour bill. He has been a consistent foe of the monopolies and opposed the NRA as strengthening the monopoly hold of Big Business. He has been the foe of the swollen public-utility interests. He has been one of the most merciless and effective probers in the Senate. His inquiries into the air-mail contracts and into the lobbying methods used to fight the Public Utility Holding Company Act made him important enemies, but they did the nation a great service. On the Senate Finance Committee he fought hard for the corporate-surplus tax. But his greatest achievement lay in his vigorous efforts, as chairman of the Senate Labor Committee, for the wage-hour bill that bears his name.

Two items mar the record, and much will be made of both. One is the support that Black received from the Ku Klux Klan when he first ran for the Senate in 1926. The other is his opposition to the current anti-lynching bill. Both are part of Senator Black's Southern background, but there is a difference between the two items. Although the Klan supported him, there is no evidence that he ever did anything for the Klan which would merit that support. His attitude on lynching is more difficult to condone, if it were not for the fact that no Southerner in Congress has taken a different stand, with the exception of Maury Maverick. Senator Black shares in this respect the limitations of his section. But the Supreme Court is a safe haven in which to clear away the barnacles gathered from a political voyage in Southern waters. We have no fears of what Justice Black's attitude will be in any case involving civil liberties, even in an appeal from the Scottsboro decisions of the courts of his own state of Alabama. A man's attitude on economic issues is the central fact about him in the modern state, and it provides the best key to his ultimate attitude on human rights. And the striking thing about Senator Black is not that he still shows traces of the South, but that given his Southern background, he should have arrived at social convictions at once so humane and so realistic.

The Tories know this. That is why they fear having a Justice Black on the Supreme Court. And in their fear they raise all sorts of false issues. Senator Black, they say, has not the background which would fit him for a judicial appointment. What do they really mean? If they mean he has not had judicial experience, then neither had Justices Brandeis, Stone (except on a military court), Sutherland, McReynolds, Butler, and Roberts before their appointment. If they mean he is not a good lawyer, then they have only to examine his record in the various Senate investigations which he headed. If they mean he is not learned enough and has not read enough (as the New York Herald Tribune's editorial and Dorothy Thompson both imply), then they are wrong: in fact, the very issue of the Herald Tribune which contained an editorial complaining of Senator Black's superficiality and lack of learning contained also a brilliant survey of his career from the paper's Washington bureau, describing him as "one of the most learned, one of the wittiest, and one of the most radical members of the Senate."

But the objection most frequently voiced against Senator Black is that he is a rasping political partisan, a consistent Roosevelt yes-man. Let it be made clear first of all that Senator Black is no one's man. He has, when he has found it necessary, fought Mr. Roosevelt—he fought him on the thirty-hour week, fought him on the NRA and its monopoly effects. He has, instead of following the President, often initiated policies which the President has followed. But his opponents might grant this and still say that his leftism, his championship of labor and the submerged third, excludes him from consideration for the judicial function. This is to take a naive view of the judicial function. There is no divine detachment, whether among judges or ordinary mortals. Every judge approaches a constitutional issue from the premises of his own views of social policy. The great judges in the history of the Court—Marshall, Taney, Field, Miller, Brandeis—have had pronounced political views when they ascended the bench. Marshall, the idol of the conservative commentators today, was the outstanding partisan of his day, the militant leader of the badly shattered Federalist forces as non-partisan as Jim Farley.

No, the objection of partisanship will not hold up. We do not ask whether a man has social views: what man worth his salt has not? What we ask is how enlightened those views are, with what integrity they are held, how much mature thought has gone into the making of them. Many opponents of President Roosevelt's plan for the reorganization of the court, while objecting to his proposed method, went with him in desiring a more liberal court. Well, the way to get a more liberal court is to appoint more liberal justices. It is to the President's credit that he has followed out the logic of this position unflinchingly. And it is to Senator Black's credit that his record so completely fulfills the same logic.

What Japan Wants

IF Japan's latest adventure in China has aroused even greater suspicion in the United States than its earlier attacks on Manchuria and Shanghai, it is because the most cynical interpretation of its aims have always proved to be accurate. In 1931 the Japanese assured the world that they had no territorial ambitions in China, and that they would withdraw as soon as peace and order had been restored. At the same time they spoke of the necessity of safeguarding Japan's "life-line" in Manchuria and finding an outlet for its surplus population.

As Japanese troops moved successively into North Manchuria, Jehol, northern Hopei, and Chahar, the true character of their ambitions became progressively more apparent. The three eastern provinces were merely a convenient stepping-stone to the riches of China proper. Manchuria is far too cold for Japanese immigrants, and it has contributed but a small proportion of the raw materials which are desired by Japanese industry. The conquest of Manchuria has brought some increase in trade, but this has been more than offset by the costs of administration and the losses incurred as a result of the competition of cheap Manchurian products in the Japanese market.

Economically, North China offers far more than Manchuria. There are important iron deposits in Chahar, Shansi, and southern Hopei, while Shansi possesses immense quantities of high-grade coal. The Yellow River valley appears to offer infinite possibilities for the growth of cotton to replace the relatively high-priced American product. Climatic conditions are much more favorable to Japanese immigration than are in those of Manchuria and Jehol.

The Japanese are known to have drawn up plans for the exploitation of this territory under the puppet Hopei-Chahar Political Council, which has ruled North China for the past two years. A railway was to have been constructed from Tientsin to Shihchiachuang, which would have provided an outlet for the coal and iron of that region. The Lunyen iron works in southern Chahar were to have been reorganized and enlarged. But Japanese capital was loath to come into this area as long as it remained even nominally under Chinese sovereignty.

It is doubtful, however, whether Japanese aggression in China can be explained solely on economic grounds. In many ways Japan had greater economic opportunities prior to 1931, when it could exploit the entire Chinese market without fear of retaliation. Raw materials could be obtained freely through the normal channels of trade, while Japanese goods enjoyed preferential customs arrangements throughout the country. True, the Chinese were gradually gaining the upper hand in straight competition in Manchuria, but the threat was a comparatively minor one. The Manchurian coup appears to have been staged primarily to give the fascist elements in Japan an opportunity to seize power. And having seized power, they have relied on external threats to preserve the patriotic fervor upon which their power depends. The economic difficulties which Japan has encountered in the past few months as a result of its declining trade balance have made a revival of war psychology seem particularly desirable.

But even more important than these factors in the minds of the Japanese military leaders who are responsible for the invasion of China is preparation for war with the Soviet Union. Since the defeat of the Japanese expedition against Suiyuan last November, it has been apparent that the strategic areas of Inner Mongolia could only be obtained if all North China were brought into subjugation. Control of Chahar and Suiyuan is the first step for a drive through Outer Mongolia with the ultimate objective of cutting the trans-Siberian railway at Lake Baikal. This gives particular significance to the battle now raging at Nankow Pass.

On the basis of past experience, the Japanese undoubtedly felt that they could obtain their main objectives without resort to war. But if China throws its entire energies into resistance, it is an open question whether Japan can possibly achieve gains consistent with the tremendous cost of the undertaking. It might be able to consolidate its position in North China, but as long as an independent China exists south of the Yellow River, Japan's position in North China will be open to exactly the same threat which it has felt in Manchuria these past few years. Yet to invade South China for the purpose of consolidating its gains in the north would be to involve itself in a protracted struggle which could only end in the economic exhaustion of both countries. And even if Japan were victorious in its military struggle with China, it is impossible to believe that the powers would stand idly by and permit the Asiatic market to be absorbed by a tiny island empire which has trampled all the laws of nations.

The Loyalist Dilemma

WHEN a country is engulfed in a struggle which is at once a social revolution, a civil war, and an international war conducted on a dozen different fronts within its own narrow boundaries, it is unlikely to be at the same time a model of democracy and political liberty. Those precious goods are the by-products of peace and security long maintained. To expect them in Spain today is to relinquish political common sense. The most that can reasonably be hoped for is an honest effort on the part of the Loyalist government to defend the basic aims of the People's Front, to protect the lives and civil rights of even its political opponents in the anti-fascist ranks, and to maintain its own authority over the parties that comprise its support. Today it is attacked from various radical angles for failure in just these respects. In weighing the justice of the charge it is necessary to consider the situation of Loyalist Spain after a year of war.

Within the year both the war itself and the nature and methods of the government waging it have fundamentally changed. At the start, the courageous operations of independent labor militias were sufficient to stand off and in many instances to quell the fascist attack. The Catalonian workers, in particular, completely cleared their country of rebels and established their own proletarian commonwealth in the midst of the general war. There and all over Loyalist Spain the war was fought and society was reorganized under the flags and according to the programs of a wide range of revolutionary orders—Anarcho-Syndicalist, Communist, Socialist, P.O.U.M. Many of them were mutually hostile but all were joined by the most profoundly fusing force in human society—fear and the need for a common resistance.

But fear is no substitute for organization; and as the bases of the struggle shifted and Franco's rebellion became merely the spearhead of a general European offensive by the fascist powers, the necessity for centralized control rapidly developed. The Loyalists could rally to their aid little outside support, although what they got—planes and technicians from Soviet Russia and the disciplined valor of the volunteer International Brigade—saved Madrid from capture and perhaps prevented the collapse of the whole Loyalist resistance. Certainly the cynical equivocation of the British government and the weak and vacillating sympathy of the French proved poor substitutes for the troops, supplies, and technical aid poured into rebel territory through the easy loopholes of "non-intervention" by Mussolini and Hitler. Loyalist Spain had to build its own army and a government with sufficient power to run a country and a war.

In a year, miracles of organization have taken place. The militias have become, by the report of every detached observer, a strong and well-trained modern army. The government has largely weeded out disloyalty and inefficiency in its own ranks and among the officers. It has attacked if not solved the problems of organizing production and supply for the fighting forces. That this has required profound inner changes goes without saying. Social control in the interest of the war has tended to supplant revolution in the interest of a new social order. In some cases this has meant that factories formerly under trade-union control have been taken over by the government, though many, especially in Catalonia, are still run by the workers. The drive to collectivize farms has been checked, and small individual enterprises, commercial as well as agricultural, are protected when they operate efficiently. In short, the tempo of socialization—especially under Anarcho-Syndicalist direction—has been decreased. This is partly due to the wartime need for coordination, discussed above. But also it results from the government's desire to hold and reassure anti-fascist elements in the middle class—small independent farmers, small business men, groups traditionally democratic but not revolutionary. And partly the change has come under pressure from the Soviet Union and from those parties in the government itself which seek to placate the democratic powers and secure from France and Britain, if not support, at least a more benevolent neutrality. The wheels of revolution, although not halted, have been slowed down and geared into the war machine. And as the result of this shift, deep social and political crevasses have opened in the Loyalist front.

A huge rent was torn by the struggle during May in Barcelona. And since those dark days a succession of incidents, most of them in Catalonia, has demonstrated the growing tendency of the government to suppress opposition, and the growing resistance of extreme revolutionary elements to centralized power and the compromise of revolutionary principles and practices. In the process prominent left leaders have been killed or arrested or have dropped out of sight without explanation. Andres Nin, leader of the P.O.U.M. in Catalonia, has disappeared and his death has been reported though not confirmed. José Escuder, P.O.U.M. official and prominent newspaper correspondent, is under arrest. And these are only two sensational cases among many reported in the Socialist and Anarchist press. Most disquieting of all, the charge has been made, not only by partisan groups but by correspondents on the spot, that the Spanish Communists are taking direct action in suppressing and exterminating opposition to the government and its policy and are becoming in fact the illegal power behind the Popular Front. A letter from Anita Brenner protesting against this growing terror appears in our correspondence columns this week.

The help extended to Loyalist Spain by the Soviet Union undoubtedly gave the Communists an upper hand in the left front and increased the growth and influence of the Spanish Communist Party itself. This fact and its implications were discussed in a recent issue of The Nation by Louis Fischer, who expressed the fear then that the party, after absorbing the Right Socialists, might develop into a political monopoly which would "threaten the democracy that exists in Spain today." He also emphasized the government's need of consolidating its power without alienating valuable proletarian support.

The change we have summarized was by and large inevitable, forced by the logic of war and the particular circumstances of the Loyalist struggle. The bitter reaction of the extreme revolutionaries was inevitable, too, and by the same token some degree of repression must be expected. But the way to meet opposition is not through terror. It seems clear that the Loyalist government has yielded too far to the temptation to substitute force for persuasion and violence for law and has permitted outrages it should have been able to prevent. We are not proposing a program of perfection to a government faced with the desperate choices offered in Spain, but a few conclusions are possible. One is that the lives and freedom of loyal revolutionary leaders must be protected and every form of revolutionary activity allowed that can be carried on without hurt to the progress of the war. A second is that the government must attend to its own tasks of discipline and repress the vigilantism of its supporters with at least the vigor it has used against its opponents on the left. These are minimum prerequisites for the continued cooperation of the revolutionary anti-fascist forces in Spain. Without that cooperation, even a victory over fascism would be an empty triumph.

Roosevelt Fights Back

BY ROBERT S. ALLEN

EXACTLY one year ago Mr. Roosevelt began the election campaign that was to return him to the White House by the greatest victory in the history of the presidency. With him he carried into office a Democratic Congress of unprecedented proportions. In a few days the first session of that Congress will come to a close. It will leave behind it a sordid record of broken promises and shattered hopes. With the single exception of the $1,500,000,000 relief appropriation, every major item of the President's legislative program has been slaughtered or mutilated beyond recognition.

The court bill that finally emerged from the wreckage of his six-judge plan is a travesty on the far-reaching reforms he sought. It is true that under the threat of the President's attack Chief Justice Hughes and Justice Roberts, performing the miraculous feat of reversing themselves in mid-air, forced the Court, by the hairline margin of a five-to-four count, to go "liberal." It is also true that under the same pressure Justice Van Devanter, one of the reactionary hatchet-men, was prevailed on to retire to his Maryland acres. But the real essence of the President's assault on the judicial oligarchy was destroyed. That oligarchy remains unchanged and unbroken.

The wage-hour bill, after being whittled down to a wraith in the Senate, was garroted in the House Rules Committee by a coalition of reactionary Southern Democrats and Republicans. The action of the committee in refusing to give the measure a rule so it could be considered by the House, where its passage was certain, was an infamous and sinister usurpation of power. Never before in the history of the House has the Rules Committee blocked a bill sought by the President and the majority party in office. After three years of heart-breaking struggle, a feeble caricature of the Wagner low-cost housing bill was finally adopted. Led by Senator Harry Byrd, millionaire orchardist of Virginia, a combination of Southern Democrats, Republicans, and renegade Western progressives, including Wheeler of Montana, Nye and Frazier of North Dakota, and Johnson of California, sabotaged the measure in the Senate by limiting construction costs to $1,000 a room. This restriction eliminates any possibility of slum clearance in the great industrial centers which need it most. In the House Banking Committee the legislation was still further aborted by a reduced appropriation. The record in agriculture is a complete blank. And the same may be said of the President's government reorganization plan.

This audacious rout of his whole program has left the President angry and embittered. Men close to him say they have never seen him so aroused. The capital abounds with reports of his ire. The story is told that when Roy Howard, head of the Scripps-Howard chain of newspapers, recently called on the President, he took his caller sharply to task for abandoning the liberalism of "old man Scripps" and going reactionary. It is related that Senator Tom Connally, long-haired bellower from Texas, and Senator "Cotton Ed" Smith, Tory chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee, ran into unexpected tongue-lashings when they hot-footed it to the White House to demand government loans after the break in the cotton market. Even the newspapermen have been caustically rebuked.

What the President is going to do about his rebuffs and mauling at the hands of the reactionaries in Congress besides bawling out the Howards, Connallys, and "Cotton Ed" Smiths is a subject in which they as well as his liberal supporters are intensely interested. In the opinion of this writer he is going to do a lot about it. He has already begun to hit back. The appointment of Senator Black to the Supreme Court vacancy was the first blow.

The hard-hitting Alabama liberal was not seriously considered for the place until the President's fury against the reactionary Southern Democrats boiled over. When the House Rules Committee completed the wreckage of his legislative program by autocratically blocking consideration of the wage-hour bill, he brushed aside his previous plan to make a middle-of-the-road appointment and turned to the one leader in the South who had gone 100 per cent down the line for him. Black's selection is an excellent one. He is comparatively young, he is a good lawyer, he is a liberal of proven courage, and he has had twelve years of exceptional experience in national affairs.

Had the Southern coterie not destroyed his legislative program and challenged his continued leadership of the Democratic Party, the President would not have named Black. But angered to fighting pitch by obstructionism and revolt, he threw the Alabama New Dealer into their faces as the first gauge of battle. The President first began seriously thinking of appointing Black after Vice-President Garner betrayed him by surrendering on the court fight. When the Southerners came within an ace of defeating the wage-hour bill and later crippled the housing measure, this impulse developed into a definite intention. The day after the housing bill crept out of the Senate a mangled wreck, a White House emissary asked Black if he would accept the Supreme Court appointment if it was given him. The answer was yes. A week later, on the night of the day that the Rules Committee turned thumbs down on the wage-hour bill, the President made up his mind. He told no one that he had done so, not even his personal secretaries. At 10 o'clock the following night he summoned Black to the White House and informed him of his decision.

What the President's next move in the struggle will be remains to be seen. Some of his militant advisers have urged him to jerk Congress back into special session this fall and demand that it enact his program. Other counsellors have cautioned patience and a more deliberate counter-attack. They favor taking advantage of the four-month interim before the next regular session by a campaign of "education" over the radio and sorties about the country. Such tactics, they contend, would enable the President to build local fires under his opponents and at the same time reinforce his own popular support. Whatever line of action the President follows, one thing is certain. The fight is on. Its consequences are incalculable, but they are sure to be far-reaching. A completely new political realignment, with Mr. Roosevelt seeking a third term at the head of a remodeled Democratic Party, is not at all improbable.

The Old Guard axemen are riding high at the moment. The President has taken a very severe beating at their hands. But their triumph is pretty much a "palace revolution." The President has not lost his popular following. Even his enemies admit that. Further, he is angry and really aroused. And when Mr. Roosevelt hates, he hates deeply and vengefully. The President never forgets an affront or injury. And the reactionary politicos know that. This accounts for their well-grounded fear of reprisals and their clamorous yapping for assurances that none will be taken against them. Big Jim Farley has soothingly promised the boys that everything will be all right; but Mr. Roosevelt, very significantly, has said nothing. Finally, there is a highly important tactical factor that is playing into the President's hands. His reactionary enemies have overreached themselves. Had they stopped with the smashing of his court plan and let the remainder of his program go through he would have been hard put to raise the cry of obstructionism. They could have claimed that he had gone too far on the court issue, and pointed to the enactment of his other measures as proof of their patriotism and loyalty. But in scuttling his entire program they have created a situation exactly similar to that which one year ago enabled him, despite the opposition of most of the newspapers of the country, the frenzied howls of the Liberty League, the millions of the Du Ponts, Raskobs, Rockefellers, Morgans, and Mellons, and the walk-outs of the Al Smiths, Jim Reeds, and other turncoats, to sweep forty-six states, to the tune of 27,000,000 votes.

The Old Guard in its berserk stupidity has put all the trump cards in the President's hands. He can annihilate it if he has the guts and intelligence to play them right.

Will France Go Syndicalist?

BY ROBERT DELL

Geneva, August 2

EVER since the "stay-in" strikes in the early summer of last year it has been asserted from time to time that France is on the verge of revolution. During the strikes the wildest stories were published in the press of various countries. There was talk of rioting, violence, and even of murder. Many of these stories were spread by French people politically on the right in order to damage the People's Front government, which had come into office on June 1, 1936. I was told last year by an American friend in Switzerland that a French count and countess staying in the same hotel had said that in the place where they lived in France a factory had been taken by storm and the owner of it had been murdered. The story turned out to be a pure invention. I was in Paris at the time of the "stay-in" strikes, and I have never seen strikes more orderly. The strikers, enthusiastic as they were, were perfectly good tempered and there was no violence of any sort. The strikes had no revolutionary aims—they were strikes to obtain better conditions of labor and nothing else—but it is quite true that the method of the "stay-in" strike might be very useful in the event of a revolutionary movement.

Now, on the other hand, conditions in France have, in my opinion, become revolutionary, and a revolutionary—or at least unconstitutional—movement is possible in the near future. It will not, if it comes, be made by the Socialist or Communist Party, but by the C.G.T. (Confédération Générale du Travail), the French trade-union federation. Last year's strikes gave an enormous impetus to the French trade-union movement. Applications for membership poured in in such numbers that the trade-union officials could not cope with them. In certain industries the trade-union membership was increased tenfold in a few weeks. The increase has gone on steadily, and the trade unions affiliated with the C.G.T. now have more than 5,000,000 members—a larger membership than in England or in any other country except Soviet Russia. The organized workers are thus about 12 per cent of the whole French population and represent with their families a much larger proportion. In 1914 the membership of the trade unions affiliated with the C.G.T. was considerably less than one million, and they were much less strongly organized than now. The C.G.T. has become the strongest force in France.

The C.G.T. is not and never has been connected with any political party, although, of course, many of its members belong to one, usually Socialist or Communist. Before the war it had an economic theory of its own, which was known as syndicalism. Syndicat is the French word for trade union. Syndicalism is fundamentally opposed to the totalitarian state, to any form of state socialism or state capitalism, and indeed to the political state itself. It is not Marxist, but derives from Proudhon, Saint-Simon, and to a certain extent from Bakunin, the great adversary of Marx. It believes in the public ownership of land and natural monopolies but holds that the labor of the community should be organized by the trade unions, not by the state or by the government. With Saint-Simon, Syndicalists wish to substitute the administration of things for the government of men and, with Proudhon, they believe that in the future the workshop will take the place of the government. They are libertarian and anti-parliamentarist.

From the first, French trade unions, unlike the English and German, were revolutionary in their character. They aimed not merely at improving the condition of the workers immediately, but also at a radical change in the whole economic system. The C.G.T. was founded in 1895, but it was not until 1906, at an annual congress held at Amiens, that by an overwhelming majority it definitely repudiated parliamentary methods, adopted the syndicalist theory, and approved of the general strike as the method of achieving the social revolution. From that date until the war there was a bitter conflict between the C.G.T. and the Socialist Party.

A sharp division of opinion about the war split both the Socialist Party and the C.G.T. in two. In 1920, at the Tours congress, the majority of the Socialists voted for affiliation with the Third International and became the Communist Party. There was a similar split in the C.G.T., leading to the formation of a second trade-union federation, called the C.G.T.U., which professed to carry on the revolutionary syndicalism of the pre-war C.G.T. but was in fact dominated by the Communist Party. The old C.G.T. became "reformist" and abandoned revolutionary methods. In 1936 the two federations were once more united under the old title, and it was this merger that paved the way for the revival of trade unionism in France.

Although a great many of the officials of the C.G.T. and of the local trade-union secretaries belong to the Communist Party, the C.G.T. has during the last twelve months been gradually returning to pre-war syndicalism. Even many former leaders of the C.G.T.U. are steadily becoming more and more Syndicalist and less and less Communist. The truth is that most of them never really were Marxists and rallied to the Communist Party because it was revolutionary and the C.G.T. had become "reformist." Léon Jouhaux, who is still general secretary of the C.G.T., as he was before the war, is once more the revolutionary Jouhaux whom I knew a quarter of a century ago.

In my opinion, syndicalism is much more suited to the French temperament than Marxist socialism or, as it is now usually called, communism. Perhaps, regarding their ultimate ideals, there is less difference between the Marxists and the Syndicalists than they think, but they differ profoundly about the methods of attaining their ideals. The French would never accept a system of state capitalism, such as at present exists in Soviet Russia, however much they might be told that it was only a transition stage. The totalitarian state in any form is detestable to Frenchmen. In any case the revival in France of anti-parliamentarism of the left and revolutionary syndicalism has become very marked recently and seems likely to have important consequences. It would not surprise me if the Socialist and Communist parties were ultimately swamped by the C.G.T.

There is at present among Socialists and Communists a movement in favor of union in a single party, which seems likely to succeed in the near future. There are practical difficulties in the way of reunion, such as the question whether the unified party should be affiliated with the Second or the Third International. Presumably it would be affiliated with the Third, but in that case it would certainly be unwilling to take orders from Moscow. Indeed, the French Communist Party shows an increasing tendency toward independence, and it may be that one of the reasons why the Communist leaders are in favor of an amalgamation of the Socialist and Communist parties is that they wish to be in a stronger position in regard to Moscow. The wholesale purge now going on in Russia has done great harm to Stalin's reputation in France, where its real motives are as little known as they are elsewhere.

An amalgamated Socialist-Communist party might be better able to come to terms with the C.G.T. than the two existing parties, but even if that be so, the amalgamation is not likely to come in time to prevent a breach with the C.G.T. The immediate cause of the great revival of revolutionary syndicalism and anti-parliamentarism is the failure of the People's Front, for it has failed and it can hardly hold together much longer. And the ultimate cause of its failure was its foreign policy, or rather the lack of any policy of its own and its subservience to a reactionary British government. Léon Blum's capitulation to the British government on August 8, 1936, on the question of Spain was deeply resented by nine-tenths of his followers, and now that the disastrous consequences of the capitulation are evident, the resentment is deeper than ever.

In the last days of July, 1936, Léon Blum had decided to give every facility to the Spanish government for obtaining war material in France. A letter that he wrote to the Spanish embassy in Paris giving full particulars of what he was prepared to do came into the hands of the Italian government, no doubt by the treachery of somebody in the Spanish embassy favorable to Franco, and was published by the Italian press some months later. Among other things Pierre Cot, the French Air Minister, had authorized the French airplane manufacturers who had contracts with the government to sell to the Spanish government all the airplanes ready for delivery to the French Army.

On August 2, 1936, the French government decided under British pressure to propose to the other governments a policy of "non-intervention" in Spain, but it was clearly indicated that Paris would not put an embargo on exports of war material to Spain unless and until all the other governments did the same. The British Foreign Office got wind of the arrangements made by Léon Blum with the Spanish government, and between August 2 and August 8 Sir George Clerk, who was then British Ambassador to Paris, called on Yvon Delbos, the French Foreign Minister, and informed him that if by reason of the delivery of French war materials to the Spanish government, France got into trouble with Germany, the British government would not regard a German attack on France as an unprovoked aggression, and the Treaty of Locarno would therefore not come into operation. This was in reality mere bluff. The British government will always go to the aid of France if that country is attacked by Germany, because it will never run the risk of allowing the French channel ports to be in German hands.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Léon Blum no doubt knew that it was bluff, but the three leading Radical ministers—Delbos, Edmond Daladier, Minister of War, and Camille Chautemps, the present Prime Minister—threatened to resign unless the French government immediately put an embargo on the export of all war material to Spain. At a ministerial council held on August 8, 1936, the matter was discussed. The Cabinet was divided on the question, but finally Blum gave way to the Radicals, and the embargo demanded by them was decided on.

Before the ministerial council was held, the C.G.T. brought strong pressure on Blum to stand firm even if the Radical ministers carried out their threat of resignation and even if it meant the break-up of the People's Front. The view of the C.G.T. was that if Blum stood firm and if the Radical ministers resigned, the Radical Party would split in two and Blum would retain a diminished majority in the Chamber of Deputies. In any case the C.G.T. held that it was better to take the risk than to betray the Spanish government under British pressure. The Communist Party at first supported the C.G.T. in this action, but backed out at the last moment for reasons of internal politics and also, perhaps, under pressure from Moscow, anxious not to risk the disruption of the People's Front. This action on the part of the Communists is resented by the C.G.T. to this day. The result was that the French government applied an embargo and stopped the export of war material to Spain while the German and Italian governments discussed the question of "non-intervention" for a month before they agreed to it and meanwhile poured into Spain war material and even troops for Franco. As everybody knows, the "non-intervention" agreement was never observed by Germany or Italy after they had signed it. This is what is so deeply resented by the French workmen.

Had Blum stuck to his original policy in regard to Spain, he could have induced the French workers to allow the government to go more slowly in the application of the forty-hour week and other social measures. As it was, he was obliged to push those measures too quickly in the hope of allaying the discontent caused by the Spanish policy of the government. The incompetence of Vincent Auriol, the Minister of Finance, did the rest, and the People's Front government succumbed to the attack of the great financial interests. The government that has succeeded it is not really a People's Front government but a coalition of right-wing Radicals and right-wing Socialists, to which the inclusion of Léon Blum, Pierre Cot, and one or two others gives a delusive People's Front appearance.

The Spanish policy was only the first of the many blunders in foreign policy made by the Blum government, thanks to its subservience to England. After a year in office, that government has left France in a worse position than she has been in for half a century. Nearly all her Eastern friends and allies have been alienated, and France has almost ceased to count as a factor in European politics. This, too, is now recognized by an increasing number of French workers. But it is the betrayal of republican Spain that rankles most, and the downfall of the Blum government really dates from that betrayal. The last straw has been the acceptance by the French government of Anthony Eden's hypocritical plan for aiding Franco. By agreeing to the recognition of belligerent rights for Franco in any circumstances and by keeping the Franco-Spanish frontier closed, the Socialist ministers have defied a resolution unanimously adopted by the national congress of the Socialist Party held in Marseilles in July, a resolution which all the Socialist ministers themselves had supported.

The consequence of all this is that a rapidly increasing number of French workmen say that they are disgusted with all the political parties and all the politicians, that there must be something demoralizing in the parliamentary system, and that the only hope is in the C.G.T. and "direct action." "We will have Chautemps out in October, by hook or by crook!" That is what one hears on every side. Léon Blum's influence, once so great, has been seriously impaired and he and his group have only a small majority on the newly elected national executive committee of the Socialist Party.

The formation by the C.G.T. of a non-parliamentary government is seriously contemplated. A government composed wholly or partly of persons not members of parliament would not in itself be unconstitutional. The French Constitution does not require ministers to be members of the Senate or the Chamber of Deputies, and although there has never yet been a French Prime Minister who was not either a senator or a deputy, there have often been other ministers who were neither. Would the President of France consent to ask Léon Jouhaux, for instance, to form a cabinet and, if he did consent, would such a cabinet obtain a majority in the Chamber of Deputies? The answer to both these questions is doubtful, but the Syndicalists say that they would do without the consent of the President and the approval of the Chamber, if necessary. That would mean something very like a revolution, for a government existing under such conditions would clearly be unconstitutional.

I do not say that this will happen, for I do not know whether it will happen or not. But I do say that it is at least possible. If it happens, the British government and the British Foreign Office will be indirectly responsible, for the ultimate cause will have been their pressure on Léon Blum and his colleagues to adopt a policy detested by nine-tenths of the supporters of the People's Front.

Vigilantism, 1937—II

BY BENJAMIN STOLBERG

BIG BUSINESS VIGILANTISM (CONTINUED)

LAST week I presented in detail the notorious Mohawk Valley Formula. It differs from all other vigilante programs in two important ways. First, it is intelligent. In fact, it is brilliant in its cynical and logical brutality. It is based on the experiences in the Remington Rand strikes of last year, from which it deduces a new technique of strike-breaking. And second, it shows big business how it can build a vigilante movement of its own. This mitigates the danger of a runaway vigilantism, organized and controlled by crackpots, adventurers, and gangsters. The Mohawk Valley Formula proposes to set up in each disturbed industrial community a citizens committee under whose amenable, respectable, and innocent auspices both the terror of the vigilante outfit and the reaction or corruption of the local authorities can be guided and exploited.

The ten scab commandments of the formula were followed with orthodox fidelity during the strike in Little Steel. And the thing worked. The strike was broken. There might have been another story to tell if the strike had been carefully prepared and called at the ripe moment. But that is speculation. What actually happened is that the scientific strategy of big business vigilantism defeated the poorly planned guerilla tactics of the Steel Workers Organizing Committee.

In former days so-called citizens committees were merely sub-committees of the local chambers of commerce and other business men's organizations. Under the Mohawk Valley Formula these citizens committees have become the local staffs of the vigilante movement. Johnstown, in view of its complete dependence on one big mill, was chosen as the ideal strike-breaking experimental station. The Johnstown Citizens Committee was actually organized between June 18 and 22, with Sidney D. Evans and other executives of Bethlehem Steel in the background. It was organized in protest against Governor Earle's declaration of martial law on June 18, when the state authorities disbanded Mayor Shields's 300 deputized vigilantes. The committee's expensive labors are being subsidized by the steel companies. This is equally true of the citizens committees and law-and-order leagues in Massillon, Canton, Youngstown, all through the Mohawk and Mahoning valleys, where Little Steel is king. The Johnstown Citizens Committee has been the model whose tactics the other centers copied, usually with more violence, as the strikes developed.

The Johnstown Citizens Committee is made up of local business men and preachers. The chairman is Francis C. Martin, a local banker. The most vociferous member is the Reverend John H. Stanton, a typical Elmer Gantry in his views on labor. His close second is the Reverend George W. Nicely. The official Führer is Lawrence W. Campbell, secretary of the local chamber of commerce. Short, fat, bald, chinless, and ex-ophthalmic, Mr. Campbell is in a constant state of frantic excitement about the national role he expects to play in the Citizens National Committee. At the height of the strike he was forever rushing about taking down the names of pickets, inciting the authorities into provocative and illegal action, calling meetings of various subcommittees of his outfit. "Yesterday I saw two girls picketing during their lunch hour. Communists. They work here in a dress shop. So I called up their boss, and ten minutes later they were fired." Little Lawrence is also a deep thinker: "America is great because of the separation of church and state. Now, the C.I.O., which is really a religious movement, is controlling the state. That's where we lose our liberties. Don't you think that's a pretty good analysis?"

But Lawrence Campbell, for all his self-importance, is not the captain of his soul. His local mentor is Mr. Douglas Campbell, who represents the John Price Jones Corporation of New York City. And the John Price Jones Corporation, which in real life is Mr. John Price Jones, is the guiding genius of the Johnstown committee.

John Price Jones is as different from Lawrence Campbell as Tom Lamont from a small-town banker. Mr. Jones was born in Latrobe, not far from Johnstown. He married a Johnstown girl and has never quite lost touch with his old home section. He is Johnstown's permanent friend in need. He is such a local patriot that he gave up his class reunion at Harvard to put the Johnstown Citizens Committee on its feet. Since his graduation from college he has made good in a big way. The John Price Jones Corporation is one of the largest publicity and money-raising firms in the country. Mr. Jones raised the money for the Salvation Army, for the Harvey Gibson Committee, which relieved New York City before the government stepped in, for Bishop Manning's Gothic elephant, for the University of Pennsylvania. He is also a partner in Thornley and Jones, Inc., of 70 Pine Street, New York City. George H. Thornley was formerly connected with N. W. Ayer and Son of Philadelphia, who do the advertising for Henry Ford. And when Mr. Thornley heard about the Johnstown Citizens Committee he exclaimed: "I know that Edsel Ford will be interested in this great movement."

Just two days after the hasty organization of the Johnstown Citizens Committee, on June 24, the committee had sufficient funds "from thousands of real Americans" to run a full-page ad in forty leading American newspapers at an estimated cost of $65,000. (In a previous article I mistakenly gave the figure as $55,000.) The ad protested against the federal and state authorities for refusing to give protection to the "back-to-work" movement, thus causing violence, chaos, and the breakdown of organized society. It was paid for almost entirely by Little Steel.

From June 24 to July 15 Johnstown was for all practical purposes under the control of the citizens committee. The Mayor and the police force were its agents. Its publicity blasts succeeded in frightening Governor Earle into lifting martial law, which he had invoked to enforce the status quo, thereby keeping the Cambria plants closed at the time. When martial law was lifted, the Governor merely left a skeleton force of the state motor police under Captain William A. Clark, whose jurisdiction was confined to the mills and their immediate vicinity. Earle of course really wanted the state police to remain impartial. But Captain Clark, an old cossack in the force for many years, simply double-crossed the Governor by acting as a stooge for Bethlehem Steel and its innocent front, the citizens committee.

On July 3 Captain Clark called in the press with a grave air. He had big news. At 3 a.m. the Pennsylvania Railroad police had arrested a George Layton, 21, a former reformatory inmate, for throwing three sticks of dynamite on the tracks of the Cambria carrier, the Conemaugh and Blacklick Railroad. Fortunately the dynamite failed to explode. The prisoner was cooperatively detained by the local, state, and Pennsylvania Railroad police. He had no lawyer. While the Captain was talking, the telephone rang and the local police informed him that Layton had implicated two railroad workers, Calvin Updyke and George Owens, who had fixed him to do the job. The Captain was pleased at this splendid police work. But immediate inquiry at the Brotherhoods of Railway Conductors and Trainmen disclosed the fact that Updyke had been a "loyal" company stooge for 35 years and Owens for 20. They had been the ringleaders in the formation of the company union. Obviously somebody had made a bad slip, and Bethlehem Steel was caught framing itself. These tactics no doubt also explain the explosion of a stick of dynamite inside the Gautier gates of the Cambria on June 15, and the dynamiting of the two water mains which feed the Cambria.

Three hours after Updyke and Owens were detained, the company whitewashed them on the ground that some bad mistake must have been made. Some thirty hours later they were released. And on July 6 Layton implicated Louis A. Pegg, the chairman of the striking trainmen on the Conemaugh and Blacklick.

The strike was petering out. And the success of the new vigilantism gave the citizens committee movement the idea of organizing itself on a national scale. The Johnstown Citizens Committee was chosen to call a national convention for July 15 in Johnstown. Lawrence Campbell claimed that thousands of letters of enthusiastic approval were pouring in, some inclosing small checks and bills. But the letter that interested me most was from Senator Copeland of New York:

> I have done my best for you. I took the matter up with Senator Bridges and some of the other Senators. I was deeply moved by your letter.

Finally on July 15 representatives of various citizens committees, law-and-order leagues, chambers of commerce, big industries from a dozen states, and a few riff-raff vigilante movements met in Johnstown to form a Citizens National Committee, dedicated to the "inalienable constitutional right to work." Dr. Gustavus W. Dyer, professor of economics at Vanderbilt University, hailed the meeting as "the rising sun for the protection of American liberties." "Thank God for Tom Girdler," shouted J. G. Lester, chairman of the Massillon Citizens Committee. "I think we ought to send him a telegram congratulating him for smoking out those Communists, John L. Lewis, Madame Perkins, and President Roosevelt." The National Labor Relations Board was attacked viciously. The gist of all the arguments was again that government had "broken down," failing to protect the worker in his right to earn a living. On July 16 another expensive full-page ad was run, again paid for largely by Little Steel. And this time the ad had a definitely provocative and sinister appeal to vigilantism.

The chairman of this newly organized Citizens National Committee is the Reverend John H. Stanton; the national secretary is Lawrence Campbell. The rest of the committee consists of obscure reactionaries, some of whom, especially those from the South, have long vigilante, anti-Semitic, Negro-hating, labor-baiting records.

The Johnstown Citizens Committee technique was applied all through the Little Steel area. The Mahoning Valley Citizens Committee, whose chairman is the Reverend Roland Luhman of Youngstown, ran three characteristic full-page ads in the Youngstown Daily Vindicator. The two leading spirits in this Youngstown vigilante outfit are Carl Ullman, president of the Dollar Savings and Trust Company, and Walter O. R. Johnson, a lawyer, who is also head of the American Legion. In the Ohio cities the citizens committees were less well organized than in Johnstown. But their terror was more intense because of the ultra-willing collaboration of Governor Davey, who used the National Guard as an open strike-breaking agency.

To sum up, the present vigilante drive is better organized, better financed, and more dangerous than any of its predecessors. It is in the initial stages of organization by big industry itself. It exploits all the local reactionaries and crackpots through citizens committees and law-and-order leagues. And it exerts pressure on the local authorities "to do their duty." I have shown how the thing works in Johnstown. In his brilliant piece of reporting in The Nation of August 7, Paul Anderson showed how they did the job in Massillon, where two workers were killed and fifteen wounded. The connection between the Chicago Memorial Day massacre and Republic Steel came out in the La Follette hearings.

FORD AND THE UNDERWORLD

Henry Ford plays in vigilantism the same independent game he has always played in industry. He has always hated "Wall Street." He still hates it. And today he is our biggest vigilante-independent. At River Rouge he has his own private underworld to terrorize the workers.

For all his genius as a garage mechanic, old Henry does not understand the world he lives in. Proud of his ignorance of history, he has never heard of Herr Thyssen of the Ruhr, who subsidized Hitler and now is on an enforced though luxurious vacation in South America. Ford brought into River Rouge the underworld gangs of Detroit and their leaders, who now control the plant. And the man who did this job is the notorious Harry Bennett.

Harry Bennett is a war product. During the war he was in the navy, where he acquired some reputation as a prize-fighter. Finally he drifted into Michigan and into Ford's. There he got into the personnel department and, being undeniably a gentleman of considerable parts, he gradually came to control it. In time he built up the Ford Service Men—with the aid of one Joseph Palma, who is now the Ford agent at Staten Island and—of all things!—the Fusion president of the borough of Richmond. The backbone of the Ford Service organization is today the Down River gang of Detroit under the leadership of one Angelo Caruso.

There are about 800 underworld characters in the Ford Service organization. They are the Storm Troops. They make no pretense at working, but are merely "keeping order" in the plant community through terror. Around this nucleus of 800 yeggs there are, however, between 8,000 and 9,000 authentic workers in the organization, a great many of them spies and stool-pigeons and a great many others who have been browbeaten into joining this industrial mafia. There are almost 90,000 workers in River Rouge, and because of this highly organized terror and spy system the fear in the plant is something indescribable. During the lunch hour men shout at the top of their voices about the baseball scores lest they be suspected of talking unionism. Every man suspected of union sympathies is immediately fired, usually under the framed-up charge of "starting a fight," in which he often gets terribly beaten up. Nor is the Ford Service terror only intramural. Workers' homes are under constant surveillance. Harry Bennett's power extends beyond Dearborn to Detroit. In certain localities in Michigan judges and other state officials cannot run for office without a petition with a specified number of signatures. It is said that Bennett conveys such petitions on the belt line, and in one afternoon the prospective candidate has all the signatures he needs.

During the first half of July the American press carried on its front pages the story of the violence precipitated by Harry Bennett's vigilante movement at River Rouge. This publicity is increasingly resented by Messrs. Sorenson and Cameron, the Ford production manager and Ford's secretary, respectively. They feel that the Ford Service organization hurts the company, and instead they want to push a disguised company union named the Ford Brotherhood, Incorporated. This fake union was organized last June by a small lawyer in Detroit named William S. McDowell, who specializes in half a dozen such incorporated unions. But the Ford executives do not know how to get rid of Harry Bennett, whose complete hold on Henry Ford was developed because of the old man's tremendous fear, even before the days of the kidnapping racket, that Edsel or one of his grandchildren might be kidnapped. Bennett developed a regular little garrison to protect the Ford family. And he got himself on Ford's personal pay roll in complete independence of the plant executives.

The fact is that the gangsters are in control of River Rouge today. And the leading authority on the Michigan vigilante movement among the newspapermen in Detroit told me that even Ford himself is afraid—fantastic as it may sound—of the gangster organization he has reared.

Except for the Ford terror, vigilantism in Michigan is less efficiently organized, though probably more widespread, than in Pennsylvania and Ohio. In Michigan, as well as in Indiana and Illinois, the vigilante movement is still largely local, disconnected, and erratic, in the hands of illiterates and loons. Their literature lacks the polish of the big advertising agency and the effectiveness of high-pressure management.

WHAT PRICE JONES?

Big business is engaged in a mighty, well-planned, slanderous, and violent campaign against the whole New Deal program. Its main attack of course is directed against the C.I.O., which represents the awakening of the American masses, and the defeat of which would mean the rout of the New Deal. The Administration has met this attack—by withdrawing. Such an attitude can lead only to an increase in vigilantism. During the next congressional recess the government should map out the legislative "must" program to fight this menace. The President should make a series of national broadcasts to build an electoral fire under the reactionary Democrats in Congress. No Vandenberg castration of the Wagner Act should be permitted. Indeed, the Wagner Act should be clarified, strengthened, and made enforceable. Unequivocal legislation prohibiting every expression of vigilantism should be promptly enacted. What's wrong with the New Deal is not the gradualness of its economic reforms but its incapacity to enforce these reforms. A democracy which fails to enforce itself is not a democracy but an involuntary prologue to fascism. As long as every American knows that eighteen strikers can be killed with impunity, while Tom Girdler defies the federal law, just so long the New Deal will not work; will indeed work less and less. And vigilantism will grow.

The other and greater anti-vigilante force is, of course, organized labor itself. The responsibility of men like John Lewis and Phil Murray is historic. Labor must be organized intelligently, strategically, quickly but not hastily. The C.I.O. cannot afford a long apprenticeship of trial and error. Major errors may be fatal. And above all, the C.I.O. must root out mercilessly every expression of political factionalism within itself. For nothing is as dangerous a foil to fascism as a mass movement of labor which permits sectarian bitterness to divide its strength.

[Mr. Stolberg's concluding article will appear in an early issue.]

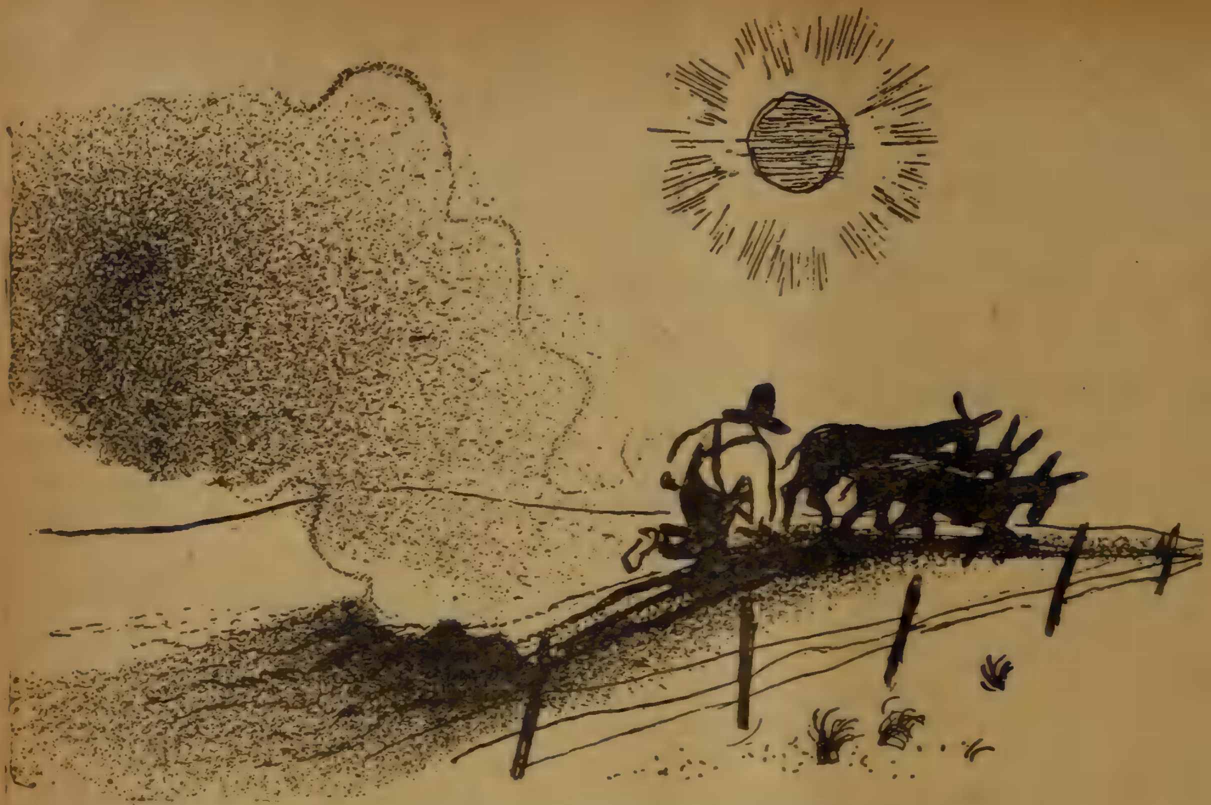
BURLI
PUBLIC



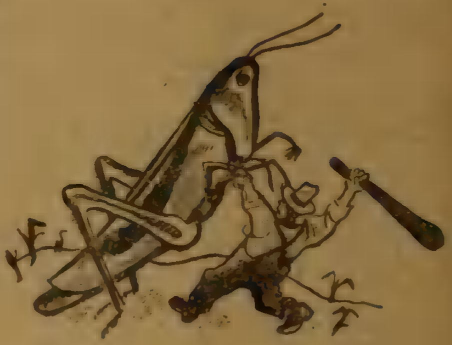
The Dust Bowl

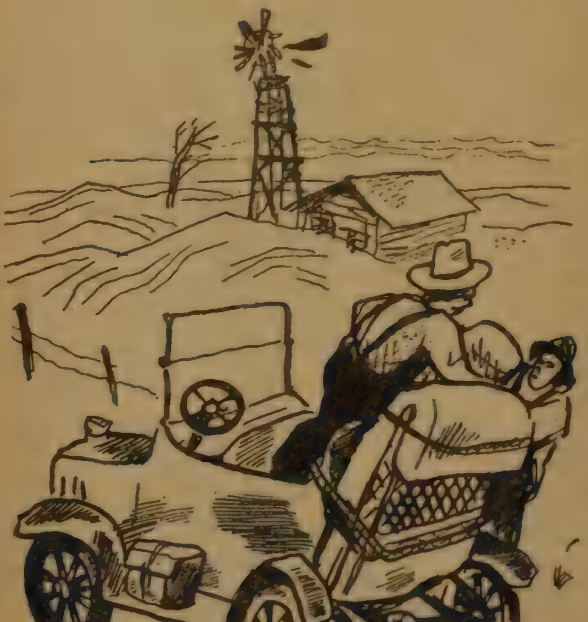
BY

WILLIAM

GROPPER

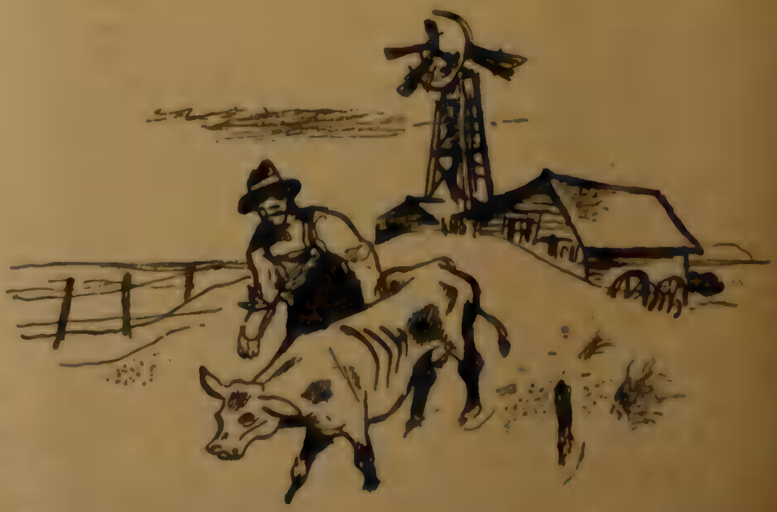
If you think it is hot where you are, try and take a trip to the Dust Bowl. The sun is always shining here, and the thermometer is always 90 degrees and up. When the breeze blows, you get a blow of nice hot dust in your nose, eyes, and throat. The landscape is simple—sky and sand for miles. At night you can get some sleep with a wet cloth over your face, or if you're prepared with a mask you can manage to get by until you get used to it. In Elkhart, Kansas, I saw a farmer plowing. No sooner did he pass with the plow than the dust blew over and covered up the earth as if nothing had happened. I asked him if he got any crops, and he said, "No." "Then why plow?" And he said, "Been doin' it fer years; it's a habit now," and went on with his plowing.





More than once on the road I've seen families packing their belongings in old Fords and leaving the old homestead. Many of them, I've been told, are migrating to California—not because they want to, but because they have been evicted.

Near Boise City, Oklahoma, I met a farmer with a dried-up cow. It was the last cow he had left, and she was ready to pass off any day. This farmer was tough; he wouldn't think of leaving the place, he was born and raised on that spot, and it was going to take more than a little dust to make him move. He got to a point where he began boasting about the dust. You gotta be a he-man to be able to take it. I later learned the fellow had T.B.



Legal Peonage in Florida

BY O. K. ARMSTRONG

A NEGRO stands before the county judge in a courthouse in western Florida. He is on trial for "jumping his account." At least that's what the prosecuting witness says he is charged with. And what is jumping an account? If we listen closely we'll find out, a constable assures us.

"Judge, this nigger left our turpentine camp and tried to run away. We caught him down by the highway, turned him over to the sheriff, and want him taught a lesson."

"Guilty or not guilty?" the judge drones the question. The crestfallen colored man stands there shuffling from one foot to the other. He crumples a battered felt hat in his hands.

"I said, guilty or not guilty?" the judge raps out sharply.

"I dunno, Jedge. I ain't done nothin'. I just was goin' back to Jacksonville to see my woman. I—"

"Did you or did you not leave the employ of the Blank Turpentine Company?"

"Yes, suh, Jedge. I quit 'em. But I ain't drawed no money sence—"

"Six months on the chain-gang!" the judge orders, swinging around in his chair and facing the court clerk.

"Yes, suh, Jedge. Thankee, suh."

And the Negro, bewildered and dejected, is escorted off to the jail. Tomorrow he will be taken out in a suit of striped clothes to begin what to many hapless Negroes has meant a sentence of death: six months on the chain-gang. Six months of back-breaking, blistering toil, with pick and shovel, working to build Florida's roads. Ten hours a day of steady work. Gang of twenty or more under strict guard. Locked in the steel cages at night, with only the respite of Sundays to look forward to.

An hour's ride north or northwest from the attractive unversity city of Gainesville lie the piney woods, fragrant source of the "naval stores" products for which Florida was noted long before the days of tourists and the real-estate boom. In these dense woods are carried on lumbering and turpentine production, a term which covers the various processes beginning with boxing the trees to let the sap run, collecting the resinous flow, distilling it into resin, turpentine, and increasingly numerous by-products, and shipping the finished commodities to Jacksonville and other ports.

A turpentine man, boss of a large still, explained the system of "holding" Negroes to employment and sentencing them to prison labor if they run away. To the suggestion that this was peonage, and that peonage is illegal, he replied: "Well, wise boy, it's being done every day in Florida. And it's legal. It's on the books. If a nigger hires out to a lumber or turpentine camp, starts work, and then runs away, they put him on the chain-gang. That's the way many of our highways are being built."

The Florida statute which legalizes peonage does not put it that way. Instead it uses the term fraud. It was passed in 1919 during the administration of Governor Sidney J. Catts, who campaigned for his office on an anti-Catholic, anti-Negro platform. This remarkable piece of legislation reads as follows:

> Section 7303: Any person in this state who shall, with intent to injure and defraud, under and by reason of a contract or promise to perform labor or service, procure or obtain money or other things of value as a credit, or as advances, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months.
>
> Section 7304: In all prosecutions for a violation of the foregoing section this failure or refusal, without just cause, to perform such labor or services or to pay for the money or other thing of value shall be prima facie evidence of the intent to injure and defraud.

The intent of the statute is clear. It makes a failure to perform a contract of labor or service prima facie—without requiring any other proof—evidence of intent to defraud. The law obviously conflicts with the Thirteenth Amendment, but it has remained on the Florida statute books for eighteen years.

The system of "recruiting" Negro labor, the commissary plan of feeding and clothing them, and the accounting practices in vogue are an important part of the picture. The recruiters are white men, representing the lumber and turpentine companies, which are notoriously the worst offenders in peonage cases. Bill Splog, let us say, is a recruiter for the Ajax Naval Stores Company, operating camps and stills in Dixie, Gulf, Taylor, and Suwannee counties. Bill drives his truck into Jacksonville and drops in at the colored restaurants and loafing places along lower Forsythe Street.

"Anybody want to work? Good wages out at the Ajax camps, boys. Who wants a job?"

"How much you pay, Mister?" a Negro asks.

"One-fifty and keep," Bill answers.

It sounds good. A dollar and a half is high wages for the turpentine and lumber camps. Bill loads his truck up with half a dozen workmen and heads west. At the camp the men are registered by the foreman. Then they are taken to the company commissary, where the system really begins. The Negro is given some clothing —perhaps a pair of shoes, overalls, and a shirt, anything to put him in debt to the company. He is also given some food, usually in cans. He is assigned to a cabin, probably with several other workmen, where they do their cooking.

These "advances" are entered upon the books of the company; and only the bookkeeper knows the prices. Numerous workmen have told me they were charged $6 for a pair of shoes that could not possibly have been worth more than $2, double prices for food, and so on. The "contract or promise to perform labor or service" has now been entered into; the victim has obtained "things of value as a credit, or as advances. . . ." Henceforth if he fails or refuses to perform such labor or service that is prima facie evidence that he intended to defraud. No proof is necessary. The judge need merely ask, "Did you or did you not leave the employment?" He may also ask whether the workman owes the commissary for advances of food and clothing, but that is a mere formality, usually dispensed with. It is taken for granted that he owes the commissary money. The purpose of the law is to bind him to his employment, and the company sees to it that he is in debt.

Despite the law which legalizes peonage and the fact that it is strictly enforced, workers continue to break it in desperate attempts to escape from intolerable working conditions in the turpentine camps. The hours are from daylight to near dark and the work is back-breaking: chopping the boxes in the trees, hauling the sap, running the hot, steaming stills, loading huge barrels of distillate from platforms to wagons or trucks. The bossmen of most of the larger camps carry revolvers strapped to their thighs, and in the offices and commissaries loaded shotguns stand ready for use "in case of emergency." Every now and then a worker "goes bad," becomes defiant, or "runs amuck." Pay day is supposed to come once a month, although laborers learn to their sorrow that pay day is often deferred a month or two "because they're working on the books." All hands gather at the office for the check-up and pay-off. One gets $5, another $4.90, still another only $1.50 for a month's work.

"That's all that's coming to you, boys, after deducting what we've advanced to you," the bossman says. "Sorry, boys. Maybe you'll make more next time."

And there the matter ends. I have talked to dozens of turpentine workmen who have drawn less than $10 in three months of hard work. In addition they get the use of a cabin, food, and work clothes, but they have no way of getting an accounting. Complaint at the commissary may result in the workman being shown the books, to prove that his advances have eaten up what he expected to get in wages. Or it may result in something much more ominous. The laborer who complains soon learns better; or if he persists he becomes a marked man.

When a turpentine worker decides he's had enough, he sneaks to the edge of camp some evening, waits for dark, and makes a dash for the highway. Most of the larger camps have armed guards patrolling the roadways day and night. The chances are about five to one he will be caught. If he is, the bossman will decide whether to warn him and force him back on the job. If he isn't needed badly in camp, he's turned over to the judge. Those county roads need working on.

In several counties, I discovered, the big turpentine companies have an understanding with the county judges and prosecuting attorneys to supply them enough Negro convict labor under this "fraud contract" law to keep the roads in repair. In one county the biggest naval stores operator is chairman of the county road system, and the county judge is his faithful lieutenant.

Taylor County, of which Perry is the county seat, contains some of the largest naval stores camps of the state, and at the time of my first investigations seemed to be furnishing more than its share of chain-gang Negroes for road work. I went to see Judge John O. Culpepper about it.

"Sure, I send 'em to the chain-gang," said the Judge. "Some judges don't pay no attention to that law, but here's one that does."

"Do you imprison them for debt?"

"No, indeed. The law plainly says it's fraud when they leave the employment, owing for advances."

"Do you give them a trial?"

"Oh, of course. But most generally they just plead guilty. I give 'em six months. That's the limit. It's helped us build our roads."

When I went to visit one of the turpentine camps in that county, where some 200 workmen were employed, an armed guard met me. Since some pretext was necessary, I told the bossman I was looking for a particular laborer to deliver a message from his relatives. I was informed by the bookkeeper that this workman was not listed. He may have been "sold," he said, with a bunch that was sent to a camp in an adjoining county a few days back. Sometimes another camp gets short-handed and "buys" the Negroes, or rather their "accounts," which amounts to the same thing as outright purchase. Another Florida law prohibits the enticing away of laborers by one employer from another, so transfer of workmen usually involves some cash.

I turned over to Governor Carlton a full report on peonage conditions in the turpentine and lumber camps as I had found them. He appointed a special commission for investigation. Agents of the United States Department of Justice began an investigation of their own, and for two years carried on a careful study of impressment of Negro workmen. Their findings in the case of one company alone, a company with camps in a dozen western Florida counties, fill a volume two inches thick. In the early summer of 1937 I checked up on results. Governor Carlton's investigating committee's report had been filed away somewhere and forgotten. No effort had been made to repeal the law, though one operator had been convicted for peonage and sentenced to fourteen months' imprisonment.

If the Florida "fraud contract" law could be repealed or declared unconstitutional, it would at least put a stop to the practice of issuing warrants for the arrest of Negroes and placing them on chain-gangs for no other reason than an alleged debt. But even then the problem of breaking up peonage would be but partially solved. Peonage is a federal offense, and the facts must come before federal authorities. Sometimes the agents of the Department of Justice work years assembling data from which to build a case, and then find themselves unable to obtain indictments from grand juries.

"Cases usually must be based upon complaints," pointed out a deputy official of the United States Court in Pensacola. "And there's the rub. Not one Negro laborer in many thousands will ever make a complaint against a white employer. Ignorance and fear seal their lips. An investigation must uncover facts that will hold together sufficiently for a grand jury indictment—almost an impossible hurdle. Then the actual trial before a jury must convince all twelve men—twelve white men—that the Negro's word is true, against the defendant white man and any witnesses that he may bring in."

A new governor was inaugurated in Florida last January. Governor Cone of Lake City is a self-made man, fearless and a hard hitter. He did not hesitate to express his opinion.

"Repeal the law? No. It's a good law. Peonage? We have no peonage in Florida. Listen here! Our colored people are the happiest folk on the earth—when the Yankees'll let them alone. As for this law, you have to have a law like that down here. If you didn't, no turpentine man could hold his workmen. Impose on them? That's all newspaper talk!"

The Mailed Fist in Greece

BY JULIAN BACH, JR.

THE Greeks have two words for it. Officially it is called Neon Kratos (the new state); but to most of the people living under it, it is simply the Mailed Fist. Supported by the King, the armed forces, some large landowners, and a dwindling number of industrialists, General Jean Metaxas, the seventy-nine-year-old dictator, is dancing on glass as he celebrates the first anniversary of his accession to power. He is a dictator without popular support and with no organized political party behind him. At the last elections Metaxas won 49,740 votes out of a total of 1,119,350, and seven seats in a chamber of 300. He manages to keep on top only through a military dictatorship whose bayonets prick and sometimes jab a population which is in secret, but at the moment ineffectual, opposition.

Since the night of August 4, 1936, when, as Prime Minister, General Metaxas declared martial law, dissolved parliamentary and constitutional government, and banned the old parties, the new dictatorship has become increasingly fascist. Metaxas—a star graduate of the Kriegsakademie in Berlin; an officer whom the former German Kaiser recommended; a "Little Moltke," as he was called, and finally, a chief of staff to the former pro-German King Constantine—now tears leaf after leaf from Hitler's notebook. "Liberty," he remarks, "is a nineteenth-century illusion."

The opposition has been systematically but unsuccessfully suppressed. Local mayors are now "selected" by the central government. Sklavaina, the Communist leader, escaped to Switzerland, but nobody yet knows what has happened to the fourteen other Communist deputies. Six hundred people were arrested during the first two days of the dictatorship, and since then an estimated 3,000 have been sent to the prison islands of the Ægean. Recently, in one day 150 Cretans were exiled to Ios—for "stealing goats." The conditions on the six islands which are used as political prisons vary. Anaphi, Hagios-Efstratos, and Sikinos are the worst; Kythnos, Milos, and Ios are better. The prisoners generally suffer from exposure and from a shortage of food and water. It is almost impossible to grow crops on the barren soil, and the food ships from Piræus arrive irregularly. Though obviously difficult to prove, there is small doubt of the atrocities charged to the police. Communists are usually given five straight doses of castor oil and have their nails ripped off.

The press has been completely hog-tied. Editors are sometimes given even the headlines to use on the government propaganda articles which they must print. Only the most favorable reports about Mussolini, Hitler, and Franco are published. In January a Yugoslavian and a Turkish journalist were expelled, and today all non-fascist correspondents stand on brittle ground. At one point an estimated 70 per cent of the mail was being opened. The censorship on outgoing mail has recently been greatly relaxed, and now only registered and suspicious-looking letters are opened, though in districts like Phaleron the mail censorship is still severe.

Some of the censorship in the arts would be amusing if it didn't reveal the appalling extent to which the regime is trying to gag public opinion. A new play, by the poet Melas, deals with the Greek war of independence, and is filled with such patriotic phrases as "the fight for freedom" and "the battle against the Turkish oppressor." These were deleted by the censor, however, on the ground that the first phrase was obviously derogatory to the best interests of an authoritarian dictatorship, and the second phrase was out of keeping with the current Greco-Turkish rapprochement. Greece's friendly relations with Yugoslavia are equally well safeguarded. An author whose recent history of the reigning family in Yugoslavia referred to one of its founders as an "illiterate swineherd" was promptly told to refer instead to that monarch's "interest in agriculture."

The University of Athens has been purged of its liberal and radical elements. Men like Professor Alexandre Svolos were immediately arrested when Metaxas took power, and fifteen undergraduates were recently arrested when they cheered a former Venizelist minister in the streets. Lectures and reading are prescribed. Marx, Freud, Darwin, and lesser lights are on the official Index.

The students have already been organized into the new National Youth Movement, which is based on an Italian model with German frills. The government, in its efforts to organize the youth of the country on a compulsory, uniformed, and quasi-military basis, is having unofficially admitted difficulties in financing the program. While this movement is quite unpopular, the government's "pan-Grecian" attempt to resurrect the old arts and dances enjoys a certain favor.

State and municipal employees are now "nationalized" into state-controlled syndicates. The two labor federations have been dissolved, and only the small rightist unions, like the Kalomiri group and the drivers' union, continue to exist, though they have had their bargaining rights taken away. The tendency is clearly toward a corporate state similar to Italy's. The trade unions, however, have never been dissolved by law, and the form of the state and the validity of the democratic Constitution still remain legally unchanged. The Metaxas regime, using the special powers of martial law, governs de jure under the old constitutional forms but de facto as a military dictatorship.

The King and the army originally sanctioned and have persistently allowed Metaxas to take these measures. The army has been greatly improved; it has also been petted, and its more liberal officers have been quietly garrisoned in distant Macedonia. Two thousand hand-picked men have been added to the police and the gendarmerie, and in Constantin Cotzias, Metaxas has found his General Göring. Cotzias, however, is probably the most unpopular man in the regime. At Corinth the people recently ripped his pictures off the propaganda posters.

Greece is following the fascist orbit on all points. Her diplomacy falls increasingly within the Rome-Berlin axis, and the most important half of her foreign trade is in German hands. Dr. Schacht and the Reichsbank hold Greece by the short hair. Whereas in 1935 Greece imported 1,996,627,000 drachmas' worth of German goods and exported 2,109,368,000 drachmas' worth to Germany, by 1936 the figures had reached the unprecedented totals of 2,674,353,000 drachmas and 2,679,399,000 drachmas, respectively. Official figures for the first half of 1937, recently published, will show a still greater rate of increase.

The Nazis have naturally followed up their economic penetration with military and cultural liaisons. In Metaxas they have found a receptive ear, since he represents that part of the upper class which sided with King Constantine and the Germans during the war and which has been anti-Venizelist, and hence anti-French and anti-English, ever since. Although the English still train the Greek Navy and are constructing its two new cruisers, Germany has about $22,000,000 of the $54,000,000 rearmament orders outright, and through General Auer the Reich trains the Greek army. Whether it is in the new Greek radio station, or in the field of railroad supplies, or consumers' goods, or even tourists and children's governesses, Nazi influence is steadily increasing. The students in the German and Italian schools publicly give King George the fascist salute. Even the French-model helmets which Greek troops formerly wore have now been replaced by new German ones, made in Greece.

While Nazi economic penetration is regarded even by some opposition leaders as an "unhappy necessity," Metaxas's attempt to make Greece a fascist state is being resisted by all the illegal opposition parties flourishing under cover. It took the police till April to discover the secret Communist printing press in Athens, and the opposition even comes up every once in a while for air. When the crowds in the back streets dispersed after the Independence Day parade a large number of raised fists were noticeable for a brief second. In Crete, where the opposition is greatest, the King and Metaxas were welcomed on their last visit only by the women. The men stayed at home—a great insult in Crete, since the women are considered inferiors. Later the mayor of Candia and the officials of another town reminded the King that Cretans will always fight for liberty. Even the ardor of the industrialists, the bankers, and the economists for a strong regime to end last year's contagion of general strikes has quite noticeably cooled. The business men find the fascist extreme as undesirable as the Communist one, and with the exception of the tobacco planters, who are selling their crop hand over fist to the Germans for high prices, industry is becoming irritated at its economic dependence on Berlin.

This general opposition, however, while numerically vast, is tactically weak, although a vague sort of common front exists between the leaders of the old parties. The Cretans are sick of what they consider the passiveness of the opposition on the mainland, and the opposition, both Cretan and Greek, lacks leadership to a disastrous degree. A popular rebellion or even active opposition is for the time being out of the question. The army is contented and loyal to the King, and hence to Metaxas. The opposition, moreover, even if it desired drastic action, fears that a civil war would give Yugoslavia and Bulgaria the opportunity they have been waiting for to occupy Salonika and Macedonia.

Meanwhile the government in Athens attempts to build a new Sparta. The dictatorship is officially justified as a necessary antidote to the 1936 "Communist menace." The government claims to have saved Greece from becoming a second Spain. Few Greeks and scarcely any observers will agree. It is true, however, that the serious general strikes at Salonika and Volo and the threatened general strike in Athens were disturbing, although it now appears that the fatal Salonika riots were purposely provoked by the police. It is true also that owing to a parliamentary stalemate, the fifteen Communist deputies in the Greek parliament held an indirect power which was quite out of proportion to the 73,000 voters whom they represented. But the need for clarification and action which the situation obviously demanded and the extreme and ruthless solution which it received are two quite different things. The Lord Byron view of Greece may be untenable—there is certainly no reason for getting sentimental over the rather violent and quite muddy democracy of modern Hellas—but the mailed fist of an ambitious politician is surely not to be chosen as an alternative.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE 1937 Williamstown Institute of Human Relations has taken for its general subject Public Opinion in a Democracy. It will specifically consider the motion picture, the press, the radio, and other agencies which shape public opinion from the point of view of their relation to ethics and religion. The purpose also is to suggest how these agencies can "promote more wholesome human relations in the United States consistent with the New World tradition of religious liberty, civil freedom, and human rights for all culture groups in our population." The institute, which will be in session from August 29 to September 3, is under the auspices of the National Conference of Jews and Christians, which, of course, includes both Catholics and Protestants among its membership. There will be some notable speakers, among them Judge Florence E. Allen, Harry A. Garfield, Roger W. Straus, Bishop McConnell, Rabbi Philip Bernstein, James M. Gillis of the Catholic World, Henry R. Luce, Arthur Krock of the New York Times, George Fort Milton, John La Farge, Norman Thomas, James N. Rosenberg, Charles P. Taft, Newton D. Baker, President James L. McConaughy of Wesleyan, Ambassador W. E. Dodd, who will speak on the Preservation of Democracy in the World Today, and Professor Carlton J. H. Hayes.

My only criticism of this unusual program is that, as was the case two years ago, there is no Negro among the speakers. Some years ago the Cincinnati Times-Star stated editorially that, after Booker Washington and Dr. du Bois, I was the outstanding American colored man, but I think the editors must have made a mistake; I cannot qualify to speak for the colored people. True, all Negroes are Protestants or Catholics, but they are a culture group in our population whose wrongs cry out to high heaven for redress. Some day I hope there will be a Negro co-chairman of the National Conference of Jews and Christians, for if there is any one field in which the white Christian churches have failed in their duty, with the partial exception perhaps of the Methodist, it is right in this sphere of the Negro. But, waiving that aspect, the program ought to produce some extraordinarily interesting debates. Heaven knows we need them, for it is precisely in human relations that the peoples of the world are making their greatest mistakes and showing their greatest weaknesses. As I have recently written elsewhere:

> When it comes to living in peace with his neighbors and adjusting himself to others of different opinion and different beliefs, the human being is as much at fault as he ever has been. He can govern all forces save himself, but he will not learn tolerance of divergent opinions, and especially of divergent religious beliefs, so we have had a recrudescence, since the World War, of wholesale killings of people whom we do not like such as we have hardly witnessed since the Middle Ages or Saint Bartholomew's Night.

Now if this seems altogether too general, and is carrying us into too deep water, there are certainly practical problems concrete and menacing enough to challenge all of us who desire to see democracy made workable and triumphant in an hour when democracy is challenged as never before. Take the question of the Jews in America. There is no doubt whatever of the rise of anti-Semitism here, deliberately stimulated from the other side of the Atlantic and eagerly seized upon by some who desire publicity or notoriety, or who are simply indulging themselves in sadism and hate. What could be better than for just and generous and really Christian-minded people to get together in such an admirable setting as that of Williamstown to thrash out these problems with complete frankness? I know the dangers of such conferences. Sometimes the managers are primarily concerned with avoiding anything like sharp differences of opinion. Two years ago at the conference there was a flare-up on the Mexican conflict between the Catholic church and the state. I am sorry that the Berkshire Eagle reports: "A repetition of that incident will not be allowed this year."

Flare-ups give life to such gatherings, sharpen people's wits, and often bring out facts which otherwise would not come to light. Of course, I don't mean that this conference should be a free-for-all fight. But these gatherings will only accomplish a fraction of the good that they should if everybody is going to be extremely careful about hurting others' feelings, going counter to others' opinions. We know that when so many people come together there cannot be anything like unanimity of opinion. If there were, no such conference would be necessary. Nothing makes me angrier than to have people come up to me and say: "I read everything you write, but I don't agree with all that you say." It is hard work for me to refrain from making my reply purely profane. (I insist that profanity can be pure.) We don't write articles or go to conferences to agree with everything that we see and hear. We seek intellectual stimulus; we want to know what other people are thinking and saying and to test thereby the correctness of our own views. Any conference which fails to have this as an objective is bound to be weak and ineffective and make no approach to a worthwhile solution of the problems that confront us. Yet those problems are so momentous, so fraught with danger to the Republic, that failure to tackle them would in itself be little short of criminal.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Matinal

BY CHARLES HUDEBURG

Begins; doors open, swing and reveal the fluent movement and the moving wheel.
Brittle weather crosses the roofs to taste of last night's furnaces precisely placed.

Moves on; with pictured memos of cigars and chocolate in the cup and in the bars:
sapid desiderations—how's the time?—
announced procurable for every dime.

But when does the first matin song begin?
This is the place and hour—open and go in:
(thirty pieces of silver make you walk).
The types fall and the bitten papers talk.

Unlocking the World's Arsenals

EUROPE IN ARMS. By Liddell Hart. Random House. $2.50.

CAPTAIN Liddell Hart is not to the Sandhurst manner born. Although he is a British officer, he never lets the prejudices of his class interfere with his judgment. Thus, in defiance of the Royal United Service Journal, which sounds as if it were edited in the Carlton Club by red-baiting stockholders of Rio Tinto, Captain Hart points out the danger of a victorious Franco to Gibraltar and Britain's position in the Mediterranean. "Strategically," he says, "the danger is so obvious that it is difficult to understand the eagerness with which some of the most avowedly patriotic sections of the British public have desired the rebels' success. Class sentiment and property sense would seem to have blinded their strategic sight." A contributor to military trade periodicals, Captain Hart nevertheless manages to avoid the style of infantry drill manuals. Some of his sentences may commence with such expressions as "rigid linear advances," "the tactical considerations of dispersed fire, etc.," but they usually end with some of those witty attaques brusques on the stupidity of the military caste. Indeed, the Hart fan will probably rejoice to find many passages in which the author does his usual act of revealing the howlers of the military hierarchy, from the debacle of Passchendaele to the note, "The man's mad," which an immortal bureaucrat in the British War Office wrote in 1912 on the file of an inventor's plans for a tank.

The author admirably restates many of the theories which he has advocated in other books, i.e., smaller and better-trained armies (the armée de métier), more machine guns for defense, more mechanized equipment (tanks) for attack, and daring experimentation to find a new surprise element capable of breaking stalemates. With these as standards, he gives a bird's-eye view of the military condition of the various great European powers. He finds that the French army has been remarkably well reorganized and rearmed in the past few years, ably adapted to the problem of defense, and the solution of the problem of attack somewhat cautiously sought in mechanized support for the infantry. (Captain Hart prefers "caterpillar cavalry" operating alone.) While he has some fair words for German army preparations, he notes the shortage of officers, the dependence on the old German idea of mass armies, and doubts whether "the German army has yet developed either the equipment or the tactics to solve the problems created by a strong and thoroughly modern defense" such as the French have. Italy, he claims, went into the Abyssinian campaign with much the same kind of mass army that retreated at Caporetto, but that the trimmings (airplanes, gas, tanks)—in which the Italians show no great strength—saved them from disaster. On Russia the author echoes most of the usual observations: surprisingly high type of officer, fine rank and file, mechanization which leads all European armies—in short, a tremendous advance over Czarist times; on the other hand, too much dependence on numbers and a weakness in their handling. It is interesting, however, to note that Captain Hart does not agree with the majority of military men who pooh-pooh the Russian development of parachute armies. He thinks that the threat which a body of parachutists (some 1,200 men equipped with light fieldpieces and machine guns can be landed from airplanes behind enemy lines within eight minutes) offers to communications and the psychological effect of the fear of a "blow in the back" might have very important results.

Captain Hart reads in the experiences of the Spanish war the lesson that defense remains stronger than attack, in spite of the fact that the latter had a good chance, because of relatively small forces operating in large areas, to show what it could do. In view of Franco's succession of attacks, he suggests that if they continue, the most likely alternative to trench-warfare stalemate will be that the scales of war might turn against the attacking side. "In that event, collapse of a cause already undermined may be accelerated by complementary attacks on the part of the side which has conserved its strength better." This reviewer finds the chapter on Spain (inserted in the book after it had gone to press) a little disappointing. It seems that a man of Captain Hart's contacts and sources of information should have been able to give an opinion on the real significance of the sinking of the España, which raised the whole airplane-versus-battleship controversy, and on the comparative value of the various national weapons —German, Italian, French, British, and Russian—which have received such sensational tests. Newspaper accounts have conflicted so much that, except for a few highlights, such as the superiority of Russian over German planes, the picture remains confused. Also it would be interesting to hear Captain Hart's speculations on a question to which he barely alludes in this chapter, namely: can a pretorian guard well equipped with all the modern weapons effectively doom a people's militia, no matter how numerous or how great its morale? The intervention of Italy and Germany on one side and the arrival of the International Brigade on the other, plus various other factors, prevented Spain from providing a clear test of a problem which has enormous bearing on the class struggle.

What prophecies does this intelligent observer make as to the course of a future world war? In a final chapter entitled Would Another War End Civilization? Hart claims that defense will prove infinitely more powerful than attack, basing his calculations on the enormous increase in machine guns in the modern army and the fact that the proportion of machine-gun-destroying agents—tanks and artillery—is much lower now than in 1918. Since staffs have not moved far from the mass army tactics of the last war, Hart looks forward to another stalemate which could only be overcome by a new and shattering surprise element. But the latter, he believes, will be doomed by the pigeonholes of the War Offices. As a consequence of mass army movements he foresees enormous congestion in communications and supply, which may be thrown into paralyzing confusion by air raids. The grande attaque may lead to nothing more than the grande farce, with an outcome more ridiculous than fatal, fading out in an atmosphere of complete futility. He concludes that another war may produce "the collapse of the attack before the collapse of civilization." This reviewer considers Captain Hart's forecast the most shrewd and plausible of any advanced by the numerous military dopesters.

FRANK C. HANIGHEN

A Recipe for Worship

THE HERO. A STUDY IN TRADITION, MYTH, AND DRAMA. By Lord Raglan. Oxford Press. $3.50.

IT is not likely that many readers will find the primary thesis of this book its most notable aspect. The author is very eager to prove that the figures and events of myth have no basis in history. Even a character like Robin Hood, for instance, would seem to dissolve under his analysis—particularly when we recall the material on The King of the Wood in Frazer's "Golden Bough," are reminded that there was a Continental story of Robert des Bois, and that "hood" is the word for "wood" in several English dialects. Even the historicity of the Trojan War is brought up for severe and drastic questioning, while the author hurls many amusing darts at the pious savants who would attest their respect for Greek enclitics by believing that there was a real prototype in history for the heroes and events celebrated in "The Iliad," despite the fact that even the stratagem of the horse appears in variation in the myths of other peoples.

When you finish you can still, if you prefer, persist in your belief that there was some actual flood to form the basis of the account in Genesis—and you may still satisfy your hankerings to seek some naturalistic account of Moses's feat in guiding his people across the Red Sea that later closed to swallow up the soldiers of Pharaoh. (You may hang on, regardless of the author's evidence indicating that such magical strewing of obstacles in the path of the enemy was the stock in trade of mythic leaders.) For as the author himself admits, it is impossible to prove absolutely that myths lack a grounding in historicity. Nevertheless he does attain a high degree of inference.

But whether you are convinced of his main thesis or not, I think you will find that, in the course of maintaining it, he turns up an enormous amount of valuable material. It is his contention that the figures and events of myth owe their origin to the ritual dramas of initiation and propitiation (rites for the installation of kings, for rain-making, fertilization, and victory in war). The origin of myth, therefore, is in drama, and in drama of a purely ceremonial sort (such as we saw in the recent coronation). He traces the role played by king-god-hero in these magic rituals for the securing of prosperity. And he holds that tradition was written backward, with these dramas providing the perspective for interpretation. In fact, he gives ample reasons to conclude that history in the annalist's sense of the term could not exist prior to literacy. The primitive lives in the "pure present," his rituals linking past, present, and future into one (as they seek scrupulously to reenact a past ceremony in the present, for future efficacy, and their past persists in their present quite as the Catholic will tell you that every day Christ is crucified—the event being not merely "historical," but continuous).

But even though, when you finish, you may still tend to feel that there was an "actual someone" who provided the polarizing principle for the accumulation of mythic details (as Mae West is now the broad basis of Mae West stories), you do feel the important point to be the way in which they were reshaped for ritual purposes. In the course of his argument the author works out a recipe of twenty-two points for the typical hero. Among these might be cited: "At birth an attempt is made to kill him"; "he is spirited away and reared by foster-parents in a far country"; "on reaching manhood he returns or goes to his future kingdom"; "after a victory over the king and/or a giant, dragon, or wild beast, he marries a princess . . . and becomes king"; he "prescribes laws, but later he loses favor . . . and is driven from the throne and city, after which he meets a mysterious death, often at the top of a hill." The author cites as examples Hercules, Perseus, Bellerophon, Dionysus, Joseph, Moses, and Siegfried; and their fidelity to the pattern is quite convincing.

We should make but one major objection to his book. Noting that the details of the hero's life are not realistic, but ritualistic, he seems to underestimate the role of the people in the development of mythic figures. The author seems to assume that, since the details of the dramatic rituals deal with kingly ceremonies rather than with everyday life, the people beheld them merely as onlookers, their participation residing mainly in the fact that they had a share in the successful outcome of the rite.

This emphasis would, I think, imply a false relationship between drama and audience. The spectator, I believe, could not have been attached to these dramas merely because they were spectacular but mistaken ways of doing what is now done by irrigation and reforestation. The dramas could retain their hold only in so far as the spectators were "glued" to them—and one is glued to a work of art only when that work is reliving for him some basic pattern of his own experience, with its appropriate "medicine." The curriculum vitae symbolized in the dramas must have paralleled their own, despite the kingly symbols. In their heroic-ritualistic translation, these experiences were, to be sure, "writ large," but the underlying processes of transition charted by the mythic hero's life must have been a replica of their own processes. Thus the author accounts for the fact that so many of the ritual dramas have a doorway or gateway as setting by attributing it to a mere technical convenience of stage presentation; but could we not rather note the relevance of this "Janus" symbol for objectifying rebirth, such changes of identity as investigators have noted in totemic initiation? From this standpoint we might hold that, despite absence of realistic, everyday detail in the rituals, they symbolized the experience of even the most lowly, though expressed "transcendentally," in "stylistic dignification" (as when Shakespeare dignified his own concerns in King Richard II and Prince Hamlet).

The author is strongly antagonistic to Euhemerus and all his modern variants. He does not believe with that genial old debunker of 300 B. C. that the gods and heroes of mythology were merely deified mortals, with their real acts amplified by the imagination. Perhaps my reservation is but another brand of Euhemerism, though with a difference. I am suggesting that, despite the absence of realistic detail in the rituals, it was not the king's life but their own lives that the onlookers were reliving—and these lives were being made acceptable, or "negotiable," by transmogrification into royal attributes. KENNETH BURKE

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRA

Day at Home

LIFE WITH MOTHER. By Clarence Day. Knopf. $2.

CLARENCE DAY has come to please the highbrows and the lowbrows alike, and it is not too difficult to see why. The highbrows have appreciated the severely honest, drily impartial way in which he has used his material, and the lowbrows have relished the material itself. Day took the measure of his parents with the same deadly thoroughness and calm that Jane Austen took the measure of her neighbors, and with a touch of the same tight, old-maidish wisdom. If his parents left him with scars, Day has obliterated them as perfectly as Jane Austen obliterated the county's snubs. His father, at once so dreadful and so funny, and, more than either, so human, is always granted the privilege of exposing himself; and so is his mother, with her petty notions, defiant determination, sympathetic impulses, and misleading Victorian helplessness.

Clarence Day could have been harsh toward his father and soft toward his mother, or he could have avoided being rancorous about the old man by being clownish. What he did, of course, was much better. Father, with his tantrums and prejudices and self-indulgences, is not even so much overtly satirized as, say, Squire Western. He is never cunningly paced toward a climax. He blows up and calms down, or holds himself in and explodes, or barks and bites, or barks and fails to bite. There is no pattern to his illogic, he has all the convincing changeability of the weather. The only thing you can feel sure about is that he will never, in any circumstances, understand what it's all about. Like most rigid reactionaries, when it comes to getting his way, Father is a prince of anarchists. There may be things that are "done" and things that aren't done, but in a pinch there are no rules to the game. You knock your opponent down, and grab.

Mother had no reasoned understanding of Father, but she knew from very early in their married life that it was hopeless to deal with him on any systematic footing. She fell back on two methods: to nag him in a well-bred way, which sometimes drove him to the wall; or, better yet, to present him with the accomplished fact when it was too late for him to oppose her, and he could only accept the situation with snorts and growls. And Mother actually triumphed oftener than Father, because she put sensible limits to her desires, and because she wanted to get things, not to do away with them. Mother never wasted her time, as Father did, trying to argue with runaway horses, or cursing the next-door neighbor whose sneezes could be heard through the wall.

However it once was, by the time Clarence Day came to describe these goings-on he had achieved a tranquillity to match their tempestuousness. He no more emphasizes what is unpleasant than what is humorous, he no more condemns than he apologizes, he no more understates than he overstates. Father's rich crustiness, Mother's buzzing emptiness, the whole of Victorian family life, the whole of middle-class social life must attract or repel by virtue of their own reality. Where Father always thrashes his arms about in anger, Clarence never even raises a finger in protest. He needn't have been an artist to be so dead pan about it all: if you can't see what's wrong with Father just by looking at Father, you'll never learn by harking to the indictments of Son.

"Life with Mother" is by no means so juicy a book as "Life with Father"—many of the episodes are so similar as to be monotonous—but the two books together have their value as social documents. Perhaps it is very serious-minded of me to insist that chronicles so full of entertainment have a sociological importance, but to me they are about the most casually terrible revelation of the intrenched bourgeois spirit that any historian could ask for. Behind the antics and the extravagances is as much bigotry and complacency and selfishness as any of our major novelists has ever scooped up; and however much of a problem grown-up Father may have been, we can't forget that Father and Mother were highly acceptable members of a correct society during two generations. Their treatment of servants, tradesmen, people beyond their world, their enmity to or ignorance of all liberal ideas are still interesting to observe. Clarence Day himself must have been a humane and gentle soul who never copied their tactics, but one is left wondering just how far he questioned the philosophy their tactics were built upon. One wonders even more in just what sense a lowbrow audience has enjoyed Father and Mother and sized them up. Certainly it must have recognized in these pages much that it had seen or heard about "at home." Have these books acted as a purge, leading people to the conclusion that they don't want Father around even when he is funny? Or have they been books to wallow in, because that's the way it was in our family, too, and Father's the image of dear old Uncle Walter, who left us $25,000 in his will? LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Three for Pastime

OH, SAY, CAN YOU SEE! By Lewis Browne. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

LENA. By Roger Vercel. Translated from the French by Warre Bradley Wells. Random House. $2.50.

MADAME FLOWERY SENTIMENT. By Albert Gervais. Translated from the French by Campbell Dixon. Covici-Friede. $2.

WE have been spoiling for a certain satire a long time—a Soviet Alice in the U. S. A.; and here it is, with Lewis Browne's usual facile originality and cleverness. From Siberia comes a young, Lindbergh-faced Ivan Krassnaumov, ichthyologist, in a pitiably absurd suit, with ninety cents, to observe research methodology at a southern California marine institute which has been privately endowed but lately abandoned by its widow-angel for an antivivisection crusade. At first he is properly bowled over; soon, however, he proceeds to ask many disconcerting questions. Before his wide eyes, a great number of things unmask themselves as cockeyed beyond eyewitness belief; hence the title—and perhaps, too, the reason why we ourselves had not seen the absurdities before. By the time Ivan has involved himself in sufficient trouble to make a diverting story and is deported, he is understandably homesick. The colloquies are much the best part of this extravaganza; here and there an image or insight seems wistful among the surface effects in which a tragic death scarcely touches the conscience. The satire weakens as the yarn over-weaves, especially in the sex adventure with the millionairess—a situation which has its irony but seems to be more lingeringly enjoyed by the author than by the hero.

"Lena" is offered as a romantic novel of War and a Woman. But never has detail more anti-romantic in feeling made up a romance. The war is that To End Wars, which, as our story opens, is in its concluding months in the Balkans; the woman is rich-natured Lena Apostolova, a surgeon in the Bulgarian army. Her lover-to-have-been, an aristocratic French officer, tells the story on the eve of a duel in which he hopes to be killed in penance for having become the carnivore that war has made of him. The situation itself, as he relates, comes about while he is detained as a wounded prisoner in Lena's care, during which interim the two swap tender interest for merciful attention. So it is a love story, with love having a chance to do little more than make a heinous fool of itself:

> One can suffer so much over a woman's dishonor only if one loves her; only if one loves her enough to kill her on the spot. That was what, for a moment, I had a mad urge to do . . .

When Lena resists him through her first confession of love, this "mad urge" is at length indulged, and the tale brought to an end. And you believe all this. In fact, the atrocities are more credible than some of the plot devices. But on the whole it is a superbly machined narration. The portrait of Lena is done in spare, ineffaceable lines, neither flattered nor discolored by the ugliness of battle.

"Madame Flowery Sentiment" is all you will expect from the title and the fragrant format: a sedative for Loti-eaters who stay at home. Chapter I is entitled An Unexpected Visit, and Chapter X, Adieux, with a last line (after many tears) which reads: "Was it possible I loved her?" The illicit love is distilled between a Parisian physician and a widowed adolescent in deepest China. So it's a travelogue too. There is mention of lice, bizarre infanticide, piles of human manure at the roadside, class oppression, and the fact that the enchanting lady for all her touching naiveties is not "the real Chinese people." The Covarrubias frontispiece is a nice thing; and the typography of both this and "Lena," done by Josephy, is pretty closely gauged to the tempo of reading intended by the respective authors.

DAVID GREENHOOD

Big City Primitive

LITTLE CHILDREN. By William Saroyan. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

PRECEDENTS in American literature might be found for the combination of hinterland naivete and postured bravado so characteristic of Saroyan's work. Hemingway, for example, has been known to employ a modern sensibility to stylize some of the more primitive forms of behavior. But Saroyan, lacking even the speed and intensity which might be attained by such a method, has done little more than to add his own sophisticated voice to the jargon of his characters. And as they blend together, the philosophy which emerges is a kind of rustic bohemianism set glibly alongside an inarticulate and awe-struck world of the backwoods.

This volume of stories about children and childish adults has fewer monosyllabic discourses on the darkness and futility of human existence than we are accustomed to expect from Mr. Saroyan; yet the entire book is overcast with the sense of drift and loneliness, with the spiritual anarchy which Saroyan himself so frequently confesses to. Moored only within the grooves of habit, these children are hardly more than reflexes of memory and desire. At home, at school, at various

Hands That Shape Modern Living

SKILLED hands that join glass and metal so that the human voice can reach millions of listeners. They first fashioned the high-power vacuum tube on a principle used today in every broadcasting station. They built the x-ray tube which has become an indispensable aid to the physician. They are the hands of craftsmen in the General Electric Research Laboratory, in Schenectady.

They are the hands that enacted much of the thrilling history of the tubes in your radio, of phototubes that outperform the human eye, of sodium lamps that make night driving safer on many American highways. Skilled and experienced, these craftsmen built the first models of many of the new devices which now play an important part in modern civilization.

Research combines the abstract genius of the mathematician, the ingenuity of the experimenter, the practical skill of the craftsman. Our whole American system is built on the co-operation of many hands and minds to translate the findings of science into an abundance of the necessities, comforts, and luxuries we all desire. More goods for more people—at less cost—is the goal of American industry. It is the goal toward which G-E research has made and is making significant progress.

G-E research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric odd jobs, they wander about reiterating the urge to satisfy some present want, which is magnified in their parched lives into a world ideal. To one boy a dollar zeppelin becomes the symbol of all his curiosities; another imagines himself to be the world's champion elevator operator; a newsboy, bent on selling a quota of papers, laughs when beaten by neighborhood toughs.

GENERAL ELECTRIC

Since Saroyan evidently believes that destiny is the pseudonym of everything that happens in the cruel world, it is only natural that the defeat of his characters should fall far short of tragedy. They do, however, carry the pathos of the underdog, and the less stereotyped stories, of which there are no more than four or five, are those which extend the range of pathos. Here the fortunes of alien peoples, cutting across the social relations of our time, bring Saroyan a little closer to the more important sources of compassion. In My Uncle and the Mexicans an itinerant Mexican worker, with a menage of thirteen, including four dogs, is hired on a ranch simply because the dignity of his labor, which he has somehow managed to retain, completely baffles the rancher. Similarly, The Only Guy in Town describes the violent efforts of an illiterate Greek to assert his personality. But even these stories are vulgarized by the almost incredible innocence of the characters who paw their way through the routines of fear and hope. Nor is this surprising, for Saroyan, like so many big city "primitives," seems to regard a highly mannered, repetitive style as a means of evading the complexities of fiction. It is hardly necessary to add that throughout the book one never loses sight of Saroyan himself, as the stories are converted, either directly or through the rumination of the characters, into a recital of the author's plaintive nihilism, delivered, as often as not, out of the corner of his mouth.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS

THE Nation ANNOUNCES . . .

Panic on the Danube

M. E. Ravage reports on his recent trip to the Balkans. In the first of a series of three articles he discusses the international situation along the Danube and the relations of the five Balkan countries to the diplomacy of the major European powers.

Senator Wheeler Comes to Judgment

Richard L. Neuberger will discuss the situation facing Senator Wheeler in Montana where Congressman Jerry O'Connell is a lively left-wing aspirant for Senator Wheeler's seat in the Senate, and where the Senator's labor constituency is up in arms against him because of his leadership in the fight against the President's court plan.

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year for $5. ☐ two years for $8. ☐ three years for $11. ☐ I enclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name________________________________

Address______________________________

Extra Postage per year; Foreign, $1; Canadian 50c

8-21-37

Man as Phylum

THE BIOLOGY OF HUMAN CONFLICT: AN ANATOMY OF BEHAVIOR, INDIVIDUAL AND SOCIAL. By Trigant Burrow. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

THE now generally acknowledged fact that the cultural crisis today is due not to the failure of physical science but to the lack of an applicable social science has encouraged a mushroom growth of foundations and institutions attempting to find one. The present volume summarizes in the words of its scientific director the recent work of one of these—the Lifwynn Foundation of New York. This foundation, to be sure, antedates the 1929 collapse by some years, but if one compares the scope and interests of this volume with Dr. Burrow's earlier efforts, the effects of the crisis on his thinking are clearly discernible. The point of focus has changed from problems chiefly psychological to problems largely sociological.

Like the many other institutions attempting to establish social science, the Lifwynn Foundation is serious, and its work must be seriously studied even if all the results and arguments are not so to be taken. The science which the foundation is trying to establish is called phylobiology. It may be defined as the study of man as a phylum in his ecological adjustments to his environment, and is based on the method of phyloanalysis. Phyloanalysis is Dr. Burrow's own modification of psychoanalytic procedure, where the analysis is concerned with the neuroses of man as phylum rather than the individual neurotic, and is for this reason conducted in groups. The book unfortunately in no place discusses the exact procedures of phyloanalysis. It is annoying to read again and again about "exact experiments" and "experiments over many years" and the like, and not have one adequately described. The theoretical background can, however, be reconstructed. It consists of a curious mixture of sound Freud, Jung's worst mysticism, Professor Adolf Meyer's high-sounding generalities, and an organismic philosophy of biology. Plus, of course, a fair number of original, and some of them keen, insights of Dr. Burrow.

The findings of the foundation are summarized as follows: "Because of the increasing extension throughout the community of a dissociative process that substitutes words for the physiological experience presumed to underlie them, man has increasingly lost touch with the hard and fast milieu of actual objects and correspondingly with the biological solidarity of his own organism." This leads to conflict between the culturally ongrafted reaction systems which are restricted to the cephalic segment and the biologically original reaction systems of the whole organism. What orthodox psychiatry calls neurosis is only the extreme manifestation of such conflicts. These conflicts are common to the modern race, so that the whole phylum is neurotic. And so the modern crisis—war, depression, insanity, criminality—arises on the basis of these conflicts. (I wonder if Dr. Burrow has carefully studied Freud's "Civilization and Its Discontents," which develops the same argument with so much greater elegance and precision.) Be that as it may, the conclusion is somewhat terrifying and I believe more than a little sound.

What Dr. Burrow plans to do about it is not at all clear. "The proprioceptive problems of man will not be adjusted through tariff revisions, higher brackets, child-guidance clinics, or Geneva parleys. Man's problem is an internal, anatomical one having to do with the organism of man in its phyletic totality." The answer, then, is not in practical politics.

It lies, rather, in phylobiology and phyloanalysis. Is this to be taken seriously, with Dr. Burrow and his colleagues the only practitioners and the rules not even laid down in the book? Won't some one of the Marxist brethren send Dr. Burrow some complimentary literature?

In large part the book reads like a poor translation from a very erudite German scientific treatise. Dr. Burrow's vocabulary is astoundingly large, and he always chooses a quarter word when dime and nickel synonyms are available. In addition he is an habitual new-word coiner and old-word redefiner. A glossary helps in this respect. About one-half of the chapters are practically unvarnished reprints of articles which first appeared in technical journals. This leads to much needless repetition. It is almost impossible to read the book consecutively; yet despite its many faults, it deserves a wide hearing because of its few positive and original contributions. I am afraid, however, that only those who must will really get through it.

J. F. BROWN

Between Castes

CHILDREN OF STRANGERS. By Lyle Saxon. Houghton Mifflin. $2.50.

BECAUSE of the charm of his writing and the real interest of his local color, the essential conventionality of Mr. Saxon's novel of life in the deep South is not immediately apparent. It deals with a special group, the "free mulatto" descendants of the Vidal brothers, who around 1760 came from France and took up a large grant of land on the Red River. By the time the story opens, in 1905, they have become very poor, "their pride . . . their land, and their few possessions" being all they have left. Little by little the land and possessions pass into the hands of white people, until they are left with pride alone—a pride which expresses itself primarily in an insistence on caste status. Accepting, though with some resentment, the social superiority of white people, they seek compensation by declaring their own social superiority to the Negroes and by practicing discrimination against the latter group even more rigorously than it is practiced against their own. Famie (short for Euphémie) Vidal is one of these mulattoes. At sixteen, though she is loved by her cousin, Numa, this gently reared, convent-schooled descendant of a proud family has an affair with a white outlaw. When the man is killed and his son is born to her, she does not lose caste with her people, because the child is, to all appearances, white. She afterwards marries Numa, but her emotional life is centered on her white child, and her existence becomes one long sacrifice to the whiteness which will give him his chance in life—away from her. Finally she is widowed; and in order to send the boy out into the world as a white man she commits the unpardonable sin of selling her share of the Vidal acres to a white planter. Her son, on the other hand, uses the entire sum to forsake her. Famie is repudiated, in consequence, by her own group, and thereafter sinks deeper and deeper into the Negro world. The story has genuine if superficial pathos. On the whole, it is told quietly, dispassionately, and with evident sincerity, and the surface life of the communities is described with loving detail. But it rarely penetrates beyond this surface and remains for this reason uncompelling. It is less a story of individuals whose individual passions and motives are convincing than of group behavior as observed by an outsider. The outsider, in this instance, has a reasonably sympathetic and civilized point of view and writes with considerable distinction.

MARTHA GRUENING

The 20th ANNIVERSARY of the
RUSSIAN REVOLUTION
In MOSCOW
WITH VISITS TO LENINGRAD, KHARKOV, KIEV.
A selective group tour under authoritative leadership.
See the Soviet Union in the festival month of November
when theatres and other activities are at their height.
Sailing October 20 in the Queen Mary;
back in New York November 23.
Inclusive rate with Third Class steamship passage and Second Class in U. S. S. R.: $389
THE OPEN ROAD
12th Floor
8 West 40th Street New York
Cooperating with Intourist

FILM

For Spain!
What "THE BIRTH OF A NATION was to America and "POTEMKIN" to the U.S.S.R.—
The First Notable Feature-Length Motion Picture Filmed in War-Torn Spain
THE SPANISH EARTH
by the distinguished Dutch director
JORIS IVENS
Commentary and narration
ERNEST HEMINGWAY
—COLLABORATORS—
Archibald MacLeish - Lillian Hellman
Starting FRIDAY Noon, Aug. 20th
55th ST. PLAYHOUSE
Just East of 7th Avenue
Phone: COlumbus 5-0425
Cont. Noon to Midnight

SCHOOL

FREE Correspondence Course in
Fundamental Economics and Social Philosophy
Write for descriptive booklet N
HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
Chartered by University of State of New York
JOHN DEWEY, Honorary President
211 West 79th St., New York City

Great Fun BUT—

A subscriber writes,

> Change my address. The magazine should begin to come here day before yesterday and not later than tomorrow or as soon thereafter as is convenient which should be at once.

Of course, we are flattered by the implication that we can change an address so quickly. To assure uninterrupted delivery, however, when changing your address won't you please give us three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new?

The Nation • 20 Vesey Street • New York City

Letters to the Editors

Calling for Protest

Dear Sirs: With the entire political life of Loyalist Spain—and the Cabinet itself—in critical deadlock over the persecution of Left Labor elements (P.O.U.M., C.N.T., F.A.I., Friends of Durutti, Caballero Socialists) being carried out under the direction of the Communist Party, which blackmails unwilling Republicans into this activity by holding over them the threat of withdrawing Soviet aid, it is time for The Nation to break its silence on this story. The facts, which are fully ascertainable and known to many people, since Spain is not yet hermetically sealed like Russia, are of international concern to all honest believers in civil liberties and human rights.

Right now there are hundreds and hundreds of prisoners in Valencia, Barcelona, Madrid, and other places, held merely for belonging to Left organizations, which is to say for not being obedient to the Communist Party. The campaign is being carried on exactly like the Moscow trials and subsequent persecutions, and is in fact part of the same drive. Many of the prisoners are arrested clandestinely, by a special Stalinist cheka which frequently acts independently of the government police and sometimes through certain sections of it which it is able to control. Many of these prisoners are being tortured in order to get from them "confessions" by which "links to the fascists" can be established, in the Moscow trial manner. When they don't confess they frequently disappear, and by now there are numerous cases of such disappearances, eventually explained by the discovery of a body on some lonely street. This is what happened to the writer Camilo Berneri, an associate of the Roselli brothers; to young Martinez, general secretary of the Revolutionary Youth of Catalonia; and to many others. Bob Smillie, grandson of the famous British mine workers' leader, was allowed to die in a Stalinist jail, being refused surgical aid for appendicitis, which killed him after two weeks of horrible suffering. Andres Nin, general secretary of the P.O.U.M., was said to be held in Madrid for many weeks, and was then reported a "fugitive from justice," which in view of his background meant that he was dead.

These facts and many others have been published in the Socialist Call of New York by Liston Oak and Sam Baron, both of whom recently returned from Spain. Fenner Brockway, general secretary of the British I.L.P., headed a delegation to Spain to inquire into the arrests and persecutions, involving as they did not only Spaniards but men and women of many other nationalities. Among them the latest reported "missing" after being "released" is the Canadian journalist Krehm. According to Brockway's report, published in the New York Times on Sunday, August 1, and borne out by the entire Spanish press except that controlled by Stalinists and Stalinist-sympathizers, nobody believes the charges of "fascist" brought against these people, except of course the Stalinists. President Companys of Catalonia and his party, the Ezquerra, the C.N.T., the F.A.I., the provincial council of Valencia, the Caballero Socialists, and many other responsible people and important organizations of Loyalist Spain have publicly protested the arrests and have stated they believe the charges to be absurd.

Brockway received from the Minister of Justice assurances that the prisoners would be given open trials, with the full guarantees of Spanish judicial procedure. Yet he reported later that instead they are being tried by secret tribunals set up under a special sedition decree passed on the day the widespread arrests began. Among the first reported being tried are five world-known Spaniards whose records are unimpeachable: Escuder, Bonnet, Andrade, Gorkin, and Rey. The decree designed to convict innocent men is unparalleled in Spanish history. It provides that even "acts of omission" and "contemplated acts" may be punished by death, whereas the only specific provision made for release is on the condition of "confession."

It is no service to the cause of human rights internationally attacked by fascism, whose defense spearhead are the forces of Loyalist Spain, to keep silent when these rights are attacked from within by fascist methods, whatever the name of the organization that sponsors and directs such persecution and whatever its sophist excuses. There is no surer way than this of breaking down the morale of a progressive people engaged in a war of defense, nor of harming their cause internationally, supported as it is by men and women to whom life without the guarantees of democracy is an intolerable prospect.

ANITA BRENNER

Brooklyn, August 6

Generals—Red and Nazi

Dear Sirs: In your issue of July 10 Mr. Villard forgets Mr. Broun's excellent advice and writes a lamentable article on the Russian executions. May I deal with two of his points? The first is his evident disbelief in the guilt of the Russian generals. Many reasons have come forward this past month to convince the most impartial "friend of the Russian experiment" that the generals were guilty, but I have space for only one.

In a recent issue of the Spectator there appeared an article by Wickham Steed bearing on this question. Mr. Steed, an ex-editor of the London Times, is recognized as one of the best-informed persons in England, and is a liberal who holds no briefs for communism. Concerning the military conspiracy he says: "At first few were disposed to accept the news at its face value. Knowledge that the executions of the Russian generals caused consternation in the higher command of the German Reichswehr has since lessened the skepticism with which the news was first received."

He goes on to ask whether such a conspiracy existed and what was its nature, and adds, "On these questions I think I can throw some light. None of the sources of my information is Russian. All tend to bear out the hypothesis that . . . a Russo-German treaty of economic and military alliance had been worked out in full detail. The conclusion of this treaty was to follow the establishment of . . . a Russian military dictatorship. . . . I know the names of the German generals who carried on the negotiations on behalf of the Reichswehr. They are those of very distinguished soldiers."

The second point I should like to deal with is the semi-explicit contention that Britain is seeking a rapprochement with Germany because of the Russian trials. This, I submit, is deliberately to overlook the pro-Hitler attitude of the Foreign Office during the last few years. British money has helped to arm Germany, and English policy determined the Anglo-German Naval Treaty before any trials ever took place. And surely no one would maintain a causal connection between the last executions and the simultaneous, Anglo-inspired visit of Premier Van Zeeland to Washington to find new loans for Nazi Germany.

RESORTS

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
ADIRONDACKS

COLORFUL
CONGENIAL
COMFORTABLE
RATE $29.50 UP
Echo Lake Tavern
WARRENSBURG, N. Y.
City Tel. VAnderbilt 3-9875

Carefree! Friendly! Informal!
LAKE CHODIKEE LODGE
* * * HIGHLAND, N. Y.

Features: * * * John Hampshire, Jr., Broadway Director as Director of Resident Theatre Group * * * Irving Davidson, Noted Humorist and Lecturer * * Director of Daily Open Air University * * * Complete adult social and athletic activities * * * Bachelors! Dividend checks are waiting for you. Phone Iven H. Gordon, Bachelor Director, for full details.

Free transportation by boat for two weeks' vacationist. Phone for details.

GALA LABOR DAY CELEBRATION
3 full days $18.50
4 full days $22.50
N. Y. C.: 1202 Kings Highway, B'klyn, ES. 5-4430

LAKE CANDLEWOOD ORCHARDS

A Quaint Pre-Revolutionary Farm 60 Miles From New York, Near Danbury, Conn. Lying in the Foothills of the Berkshires. All Land and Water Sports. A Fisherman's Haven.

Splendid Accommodations. Jewish American Cooking. Write for Reservations to: Lake Candlewood Orchards, Brookfield, Conn. R.F.D. 44.

SONYA SNOWE, MANAGER

SPEND LABOR DAY WEEK
AND THE HIGH HOLIDAYS AT CAMP CARLISLE
On Sylvan Lake
Hopewell Junction, N.Y.—65 miles from New York
SPECIAL RATES: [illegible] week—$4 per day—
$14 four-day week-end
Swimming . . Golf . . Horseback . . Field and Water Sports . . Dietary Laws Observed
Make Your Reservations Now

BERT FRIEDBERG welcomes you to a comfortable farm situated in 150 acres of beautiful country. Always pleasant companionship. Good Food. Tennis, Swimming, Riding.
HIL-BERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y.
Tel. Bert Friedberg Mahopac 2083

RIVERSIDE INN on Lake Housatonic. Swimming, boating, tennis. 1¾ hours from New York. $3.50 per day. $19 weekly. Station Derby. P. O. Seymour, Conn. Derby 598-12.

BERKSHIRE FOOTHILLS. Few guests; restful, quiet; excellent meals; swimming, fishing; modern conveniences; near Copake, Route 22; $16-18 week. GARDNER FARM, Ancramdale, Columbia County, N. Y.

LOUIS FISCHER

is the author of a new 10c booklet, "The War in Spain," which is published by The Nation. Over 15,000 copies were sold in advance of publication! In this booklet Mr. Fischer authoritatively analyzes the social and economic background of the war, discusses the progress of the fighting, predicts the outcome, and explains the international significance of the struggle. Every progressive should read it! To order send 10c to The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

RESORTS

Uncas Lodge

TENNIS
directed by Murray Pincus is a major sport of
UNCAS LODGE
UNCASVILLE, CONN.

- Fast Clay Tennis Courts
- Private Twin Lakes
- Boating — Fishing
- Handball — Ping Pong
- Saddle Horses and Golf
- Orchestra for Dancing

Plays — Activities
Directed by
JESS KIMMER
N.Y.U. Dramatic Soc.

Informal atmosphere
RATE: $24.50 per week
MANAGEMENT: DIANA and ABE BERMAN
Phone: Norwich 1858—Ring 5
New York: PResident 3-8649

The Fieldstone
on Round Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and recreation in the heart of the Ramapo Mountains, one hour from New York.

Swimming, boating, tennis, riding, golf and other sports

P. O. BOX [illegible]
MONROE, N. Y.

TELEPHONE:
MONROE 2501

A descriptive folder will be sent on your request
By Reservation Only

HUNTS-BROOK LODGE
OAKDALE, CONNECTICUT

600 acres with natural lakes and swimming pool. Offers the following camp activities: Tennis, Table tennis, Badminton, Swimming, Boating, Fishing, Riding, Handball, Dramatics, Dancing, etc.

Excellent Cuisine—Special attention given to building-up and reducing by experienced dietitian—An abundance of fresh fruits and vegetables.

RATES: $22.50 — $25.00 WEEKLY

P. O. Address:
New London, Conn.
Tel. N. L. 7226

City Address:
22 Buckingham Rd., Bklyn.
Tel. BU. 4-7400

Hillcrest Lodge among the Watchung Mts. Easy commutation via Jersey Central. Golf, tennis, handball, swimming. R.F.D. 3. Plainfield, N. J. Phone Millington 364.

KUTAY'S RIVERSIDE CAMP—CAPACITY 30. MODERN, LAND AND WATER SPORTS. JEWISH AMERICAN MEALS. REASONABLE. BUSHKILL, PA.

Landlords:—
Fall is here

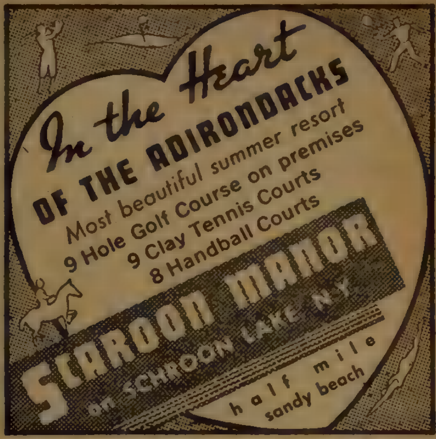
Our Readers (more than 40,000), are thinking of Apartments and Houses.

Our compactness makes their attention easy to catch.

30 words (one-half inch) $3.08
Additional lines (6 words) 62

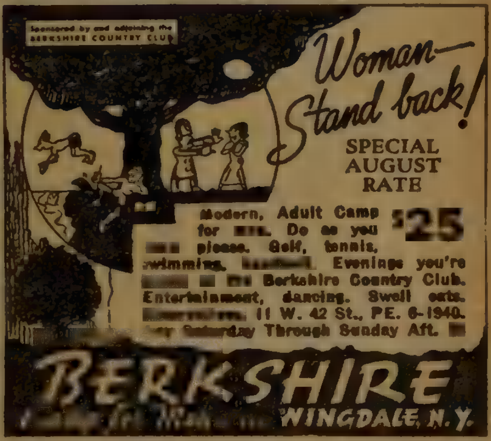
THE NATION
20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK
COrtlandt 7-3330

RESORTS



FUN FOR ALL!
All sports facilities . . . Private lake! Swimming pool! Social and theatrical program directed by JOHN FORD, N. Y. stage director of "STEEL" Reasonable rates.

COOKS FALLS LODGE
COOKS FALLS, NEW YORK
N. Y. Office—250 W. 57th St.
Phone COlumbus 5-3890
RESERVE NOW!



Sponsored by and adjoining the BERKSHIRE COUNTRY CLUB
Woman—Stand back!
BERKSHIRE
WINGDALE, N.Y.

SPECIAL AUGUST RATE
$25

Modern, Adult Camp for [illegible]. Do as you [illegible] please. Golf, tennis, swimming, [illegible]. Evenings you're [illegible] Berkshire Country Club. Entertainment, dancing. Swell eats. [illegible] 11 W. 42 St., PE. 6-1940. [illegible] Saturday Through Sunday Aft. [illegible]

STAR LAKE CAMP

In the glorious Adirondacks between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground for adults. 1800 feet elevation and right on the Lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Swimming, Canoeing, Handball, Baseball; Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Delicious wholesome meals that pep up the appetite. Rates $22.50 weekly.

New York Office: 116 Nassau St., Room 802a
BEekman 3-6345 Send for Booklet

Services will be held at this camp on the Jewish High Holidays, Sept. 5-6-7-14-15

MAKE RESERVATION NOW

VINEYARD LODGE
Ulster Park, N. Y.
"Garden spot of Ulster County"
Where peace and tranquility reign supreme. Modern hotel midst beautiful orchard, vineyards and woodland. All sports, solariums, swimming, social activities. Rates $16 up. J. Rosenthal, Kingston 3430.

BARLOW FARM
Sherman, Conn.
Modern conveniences, swimming, tennis, etc.
$20 PER WEEK
For information N. Y. MAin 4-8276, evenings

The only policy, if any, that can prevent war is not to preach Lansbury pacifism, but to rally the democracies around the Franco-Soviet pact, which is stronger today than it was six months ago, in spite of its "friends."

CARL A. MARZANI

Oxford, England, July 20.

Critical View

Dear Sirs: I have taken The Nation for more than fifty years. I have seen a better and a worse paper. I have seen the policy of The Nation change several times. To be frank, I dislike the present radical position and the unfairness exhibited by The Nation at various times.

I have in mind such articles as that on ex-President Taft, when he was appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. This was one of the finest appointments that were ever made. Mr. Taft had been Governor of the Philippines, Secretary of War, and President of the United States. He had had a fine career as Circuit Judge of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, and the lawyers of the Sixth Circuit esteemed him. All lawyers throughout the length and breadth of this nation who were familiar with his opinions regarded him highly. Mr. Taft brought to the great office to which he was appointed a personal familiarity with political events and conditions which few could have had, and an acquaintance with legal principles and a judicial experience which are rare. Yet his appointment was severely criticized by The Nation, and the subsequent course of the highest tribunal in the land made it clear beyond peradventure that the criticism was wholly unfounded. Many lawyers who read the editorial in The Nation at the time were disgusted.

I am singling out this article on account of the feeling it engendered in me at the time and because of my great dissatisfaction. Other criticisms equally unmerited have appeared in The Nation from time to time.

Yet I continued to take and read your paper, (1) because I want to have the other point of view, and (2) because although my feelings are irritated practically once a week by some article in The Nation, still I find many things in it that are worth while, well written, proper, and fair.

LESSING ROSENTHAL

Chicago, July 9

Question for Mr. Villard

Dear Sirs: In reply to Mr. Reissig's letter in the July 24 issue, Mr. Villard, evidently referring to France, England, Czecho-Slovakia, and Spain, characterizes them as being "so-called democracies." If these countries are not, in a substantial sense, democracies, then what are they? I believe Mr. Villard owes the readers of The Nation an explanation.

ANTHONY SUTICH

Palo Alto, Cal., July 28.

Marlen E. Pew

Dear Sirs: A biography of the late Marlen E. Pew, for many years one of the leading journalists of the United States, is being prepared by Dr. De Forest O'Dell, who would appreciate seeing any letters and papers dealing with Mr. Pew's life. They may be sent to Dr. O'Dell in care of Editor and Publisher, 1700 Times Building, New York City. All letters and papers will be returned to their owners.

SUSAN PEW CLOUGH

Wading River, N. Y., July 18

CONTRIBUTORS

ROBERT DELL, whose dispatches from Paris and Geneva have appeared for many years in the Manchester Guardian and The Nation, is one of the most distinguished of foreign correspondents.

O. K. ARMSTRONG, a member of the Interracial Commission, spent several weeks investigating labor conditions in more than a dozen turpentine camps in western Florida. He is the author of several books, among them "Old Massa's People."

JULIAN BACH, Jr., now assistant foreign editor of the Digest, has been a journalist in Greece and in the Balkans.

CHARLES HUDEBURG is a young poet and contributor to "Trial Balances."

FRANK C. HANIGHEN is a close student of the economic forces which motivate wars. With H. C. Engelbrecht he wrote "Merchants of Death."

KENNETH BURKE is the author of "Attitudes Toward History."

LOUIS KRONENBERG has recently translated the maxims of La Rochefoucauld.

DAVID GREENHOOD wrote with Helen Gentry "Chronology of Books and Printing."

WILLIAM PHILLIPS is an editor of the Partisan Review.

J. F. BROWN is the author of "Psychology and the Social Order."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

LANGUAGES

Language Phone Sets
Bought, sold, rented, exchanged. Language Service, 507-5th Ave. MUr. 2-4221.

POSITION WANTED

Educated young lady, capable secretary-stenographer; experienced practical nurse. No objection going out of town. Box 943 c/o The Nation.

DO YOU WANT—

A house in England—an apartment—a room—an office—a ranch—a secretary—a piano—a lecturer—a tutor—a telescope—a grandfather's clock—a bicycle.—

All of these have appeared in our Classified columns.

Call the Advertising Department, COrtlandt 7-3330 by Friday, so your advertisement may be in the next week's issue.

INSTRUCTION

IT'S FUN TO WRITE!

It's fun to write short stories, articles, novels, plays, etc.—and profitable, too, as witness the accomplishments of our students. If you have the urge to write—and want to start—you will be interested in our book CAREERS IN WRITING—absolutely FREE. CAREERS IN WRITING deals exhaustively with every phase of the writing field, and indicates the money-making opportunities in each. Send a postcard today, requesting your free copy. Write promptly!

U. S. SCHOOL OF WRITING
[illegible] West 60th St. Dept. 57 New York City

WRITER'S SERVICE

YOUR LITERARY PROBLEMS are unique, and require competent personal attention. Let me demonstrate. Inquire, ROBERT L. NEWMAN, 251 West 71st Street, New York City.

LITERARY SERVICES

Special Articles, Reviews, Theses, Speeches, prepared to specifications. Convenient Service. Authors Research Bureau, 516 Fifth Ave., New York.

MALCOLM
COWLEY
Editor of The New Republic recently returned from a two months' stay in Spain will speak on Behind the Lines
in SPAIN
GEORGE SOULE, Chairman
Wed., August 25th, 8:30 P. M.
at
NEW SCHOOL
FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH
66 West 12th Street
Adm. 50c, and first five rows $1.00
Auspices North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy and League of American Writers

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · AUGUST 28, 1937 NUMBER 9

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 209

EDITORIALS:

BOYCOTT JAPANESE GOODS! 211

CONGRESS: AN INQUEST 212

NAZI "JOURNALISM" 213

COMMITTEES OF SABOTAGE by Max Lerner 214

PANIC ON THE DANUBE by M. E. Ravage 215

WHEELER FACES THE MUSIC by Richard L. Neuberger 217

OHIO LABOR TRIES THE BALLOT by Donald M. Pond 219

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 221

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

ROBINSON: THE IRONIC DISCIPLINE by Morton Dauwen Zabel 222

"IMITATE HIM IF YOU DARE" by Louise Bogan 223

THE APOTHEOSIS OF MR. K*A*P*L*A*N by Joseph Wood Krutch 224

MENTAL ILLNESS IN AMERICA by Karl A. Menninger 225

THE CULT OF VIOLENCE by Gaetano Salvemini 225

POICTESME BACK TO THE SOIL by Maxwell Geismar 226

POEMS IN TRENCH-MORTAR TIME by Eda Lou Walton 226

DANCE: BENNINGTON FESTIVAL by Paul Love 226

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER

Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editor MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

*

Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

*

THIS IS NOT AN ELECTION YEAR, BUT WE may none the less expect the atmosphere of a national political campaign this fall. The opening guns of the campaign without an election have already been fired. In the salvos exchanged between Senator Guffey and the "ingrates" who turned against the New Deal we stand with Guffey—not because we hold gratitude to be a cardinal political virtue but because we see no reason for concealing the Democratic split, which is the result of a basic social cleavage. John L. Lewis took an ironic revenge on the New Dealers who have taunted him for not being able to maintain discipline among his union followers. The Democratic leaders, Lewis declared, must either "restore sufficient party discipline to permit government to function under their guidance" or confess that their party is bankrupt as a genuine progressive vehicle. He was discussing the sabotaging of the wage-hour bill by the House Rules Committee, but his criticism applies to the entire session of Congress. We agree with his challenge to the Democrats, but we do not draw from it the moral that the newspaper writers have drawn. Mr. Lewis does not necessarily mean that he will proceed forthwith to form a third party. He knows better than anyone else in the country that labor political action can go only as fast as trade-union organization goes. What he is doing is what Mr. Roosevelt is seeking to do—build a fire under the less progressive Democrats. The difference is that Mr. Lewis is seeking to build a fire under Mr. Roosevelt as well.

*

ANY HOPE THAT JAPAN MAY HAVE HAD OF a quick victory in China has been dissipated by the brilliant Chinese resistance at Shanghai. The crack troops of Chiang Kai-shek have not only withstood ten days of heavy bombardment from Japanese ships but have driven deep into the enemy lines in the Yangtzepoo section of the International Settlement. In contrast to the situation in 1932, when the Nineteenth Route Army fought without support from the air, Chinese planes, though comparatively few in number, have shown definite superiority over the Japanese craft. Even the navy, hitherto regarded as a negligible factor, has exhibited matchless heroism in making repeated torpedo attacks on the Japanese fleet and in blockading the Whangpoo with captured Japanese merchantmen. In North China three divisions of Chinese troops are holding off an equal number of Japanese at Nankow Pass, the gateway to Outer Mongolia, while 30,000 Nanking regulars are locked in battle with Japanese troops thirty miles south of Peiping. Though none of these battles, with the exception of that at Nankow, are of great strategic importance, they have been valuable in arousing China to the possibility of resistance. Ultimately it may be assumed that the Chinese will have to fall back both from Shanghai and from the cities of the North and rely on guerrilla tactics to wear down Japan. In a long-drawn-out struggle the Chinese would have every advantage. They would be fighting on their own territory with a vast hinterland upon which to draw, and their simple agrarian economy should suffer far less from the shocks of war than the complex, debt-ridden economy of Japan. The chief danger to China's cause is not so much the Japanese as the fascist elements at Nanking, who would sell out at the first opportunity in order to precipitate themselves into power.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

*

NO MATTER WHAT WE HEAR FROM BERLIN from now on, we shall refuse to believe that the ultimate has been reached in Nazi gall. Every time that we feel sure, in our simple way, that even Nazis can go no farther, we read some new pronouncement and once more gasp for breath. This time it is Ernst Wilhelm Bohle, chief of the National Socialist Party's foreign section, who delivers the stunning blow. Henceforth, decrees Herr Bohle, all foreign governments must accept Nazi party officials in their respective countries on the same basis as German diplomatic representatives. Instructions have already gone out to German diplomats to attend no official affairs unless invitations have also been extended to the chief of the local section of the National Socialist Party. In short, England and France and the United States must understand that Nazi agents are to receive diplomatic immunity to proceed in comfort and dignity with their espionage and propaganda. Nothing can catch us off guard now. We know with a deadly certainty that in a month or so Herr Hitler will demand a Congressional appropriation for Nazi activities in America—and after that, perhaps, representation in the Roosevelt Cabinet.

*

THE FACT THAT THE MANDATES COMMISSION of the League of Nations has approved, in principle, the attempt to solve the problem of Palestine by partition increases the probability that in the end the British plan will be adopted. Previously the Jewish Agency had authorized negotiation with the British for a partitioning of Palestine and with the Arabs for an "undivided Palestine." But negotiations with the Arabs for a bi-national state are unlikely to get very far in the highly nationalistic atmosphere which has developed in recent months, and there is as little likelihood that the British will make substantial territorial concessions to the Jews. The chance that partition will ultimately be accepted is heightened by the fact that it has been approved by a substantial majority of Zionists. While the Zionist leaders are far from satisfied with the Royal Commission's report in its present form, the majority, under the leadership of Chaim Weizmann, have decided that the possibility of establishing an independent Jewish state offsets, to a considerable degree, the unsatisfactory features of the plan. The new state will be starting under desperate handicaps, and the Jews will need all the stamina they have shown throughout their history to make a go of it.

*

THOSE WHO HAVE FOLLOWED THE EFFORTS of the hatchet gang of the Weirton Steel Company to pry the steel workers away from the C. I. O. will rejoice that the deficit appropriation for the Labor Relations Board has finally come through. The board can now continue with an adequate staff to lay bare employer terrorism wherever it appears, whether at Dearborn, Weirton, Birmingham, or Dallas. The biggest problem it has to face at present is not the gangster terrorism of the employers, however, nor sniping by Congressmen, but the crossfire of the A. F. of L. unions. The present A. F. of L. technique is illustrated by the case of the National Electric Products Company at Ambridge, Pennsylvania. A group of C. I. O. workers form a union, enroll a majority, and threaten a strike unless they are given recognition. The employer stalls them off, hastily signs a contract with a minority group claiming an A. F. of L. charter, and appears before the Labor Board with a plea that he must live up to his agreement. The A. F. of L. union backs him up by getting a court injunction ordering him to comply with the contract. The Labor Board is taking the sensible position in these disputes that when doubt exists whether a contract has a valid majority behind it, an election becomes necessary. But even elections have not succeeded in clearing up the confusion. If the C. I. O. union wins, the next step is for an A. F. of L. union in one of the crafts to declare a boycott on the products that come to them from the C. I. O. unions. This too has happened at Ambridge. It shows to what lengths reactionary unionism will go to split the ranks of labor rather than yield the spoils of office.

*

FOR THOSE WILFULLY OR UNCONSCIOUSLY misguided persons who see in the Spanish conflict solely a war of "ideologies" there is available at last an effective medicine. It is a film by Joris Ivens, and it is appropriately called "The Spanish Earth." Mr. Ivens's picture is an utterly compelling study of a people struggling to hold the land which a democratic government had after centuries wrested for them from a decayed feudal aristocracy. No cries of "propaganda" can erase the pictures of Spaniards hopefully digging irrigation ditches within earshot of the guns, of men and women eagerly carrying the doors of their houses to the front to reinforce the trenches protecting Madrid, of the calm determination of farmers and workers drilling in the villages, patiently learning the manual of arms. Rarely—and then only in the accompanying comment of Ernest Hemingway—is "The Spanish Earth" an overtly provocative film. But it has an obvious and irresistible honesty and a deep, almost tender, sympathy with the Spanish people that is vastly more impressive, more powerful, than any calculated incitement could possibly be. Ivens's camera is everywhere—in the attack on the university clinic, in the no man's land at Arganda bridge, in the ruins of the Duke of Alba's palace, and above all in the fields and on the streets of cities. And as Hemingway says, "Men cannot act before the camera in the presence of death." Friends of Spain who can do nothing else can at least send all their doubting acquaintances to see "The Spanish Earth" and can make an organized fight to have the film shown at local theaters throughout the country.

*

A NEW PENSION MOVEMENT, CONSIDERABLY less sensational and a great deal more intelligent than the Townsend plan, appears to be rising swiftly in the Northwest. It all started a few months ago when Howard Costigan, executive secretary of the Washington Commonwealth Federation, suggested over the radio that old-age-pension laws might be liberalized by the pressure of organized pension unions. Immediately Mr. Costigan's office was deluged with mail from disappointed Townsendites, anti-Townsendites, and other seekers after old-age security. The Washington State Old Age Pension Union which emerged from this pile of letters already has 10,000 members in fifty clubs scattered throughout the state. And each club has its own grievance committee prepared to dicker with legislators and state officials. The union's demands are modest and flexible, and there is every reason to suppose it will be successful in forcing a gradually increasing pension scale. Townsend hysteria has worn thin, but the demand for old-age security remains. The W. C. F. is doing a good service in keeping this sentiment from further exploitation at the hands of crackpots like Dr. Townsend and directing it into the main stream of the progressive movement.

*

THE SPIRITS OF SACCO AND VANZETTI HAVE been walking on Boston Common ten years after their execution, while politicians of the hour try desperately to keep history in its place. The incident which has split the old controversy wide open once more is the publication of the WPA guidebook to Massachusetts. It was compiled not by any chamber of commerce but by WPA workers on the Federal Writers' Project who apparently have respect for their materials. Charles F. Hurley, legionnaire and Governor of Massachusetts, had already written a handsome preface to it, sight unseen, when it was discovered that the Lawrenceville textile strike, the Boston police strike, and worst of all the execution of a shoemaker and a fish peddler in 1927 had been handled in such a way as to make the Governor exclaim with more heat than originality: "If these men don't like Massachusetts they can go back, etc., etc." The outraged Governor went on to demand that the guidebook be censored and that the men who wrote the offending sections be cut off the federal pay roll. So far Washington has not complied. Meanwhile a group of the defenders of Sacco and Vanzetti, on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of their execution, has offered to Massachusetts a bronze memorial to the two men which they ask to have "enshrined" on Boston Common. Governor Hurley has said that he has "no jurisdiction" to accept or reject such a memorial. He has not yet learned that he similarly has no jurisdiction over history. Sacco and Vanzetti are already enshrined on Boston Common. For history, like murder, will out.

*

THIS WEEK'S INSTALMENT OF ISSUES AND MEN has created in our editorial minds a mildly exhilarating confusion, comparable to the effect of many mugs of musty old ale. We are slowly emerging with the conviction that Mr. Villard considers Justice Black an admirable appointment to the Supreme Court, second in fitness to only one other candidate. We like almost all the qualities Mr. Villard attributes to his favorite, and we are glad that Justice Black—who is our favorite—shares so many of them.

Boycott Japanese Goods!

As each day brings fresh reports of the desolation and destruction wrought by Japan's invading armies in Shanghai, American public opinion is torn between a natural sympathy for China and a determination to keep out of war at all costs. Large numbers of persons, particularly in the peace organizations, are urging that the Neutrality Act be invoked even though it would operate to the advantage of Japan. Many are also urging the complete evacuation by Americans and American interests of Shanghai, Tsingtao, and the troubled areas of North China. To those unacquainted with the complexities of the Far Eastern situation the case for withdrawal is a plausible one. Our stake in China is comparatively small, and the cost of defending American interests would appear to outweigh the losses involved in wholesale evacuation. Why not, it is argued, withdraw our civilians and military guards and thus minimize the danger of war?

The Nation has no wish to defend either American of other foreign business interests in the Far East. They have probably brought more harm than benefit to the Chinese people. But under present conditions withdrawal would transfer this business not to the Chinese but to the Japanese, and would only serve the interests of the aggressor. Similarly the presence of American missionaries, of questionable value in the long run, may in the present crisis serve as a stabilizing influence in their Chinese communities. More important, American withdrawal would certainly be interpreted in both China and Japan as a complete surrender of our rights and obligations under the Nine-Power Treaty.

LIBRARY

The attitude of the State Department is reassuring on this point. Secretary Hull shows no signs of surrendering to the dictates of extreme isolationism. In his latest announcement he lets it be known that the department has been in constant consultation with "interested governments" since the outbreak of hostilities in China, and he appeals for an application in the Far East of the principles contained in his peace statement of July 16, which "embraces the principles embodied in many treaties, including the Washington Conference treaties and the Kellogg-Briand Pact of Paris." This is about as clear a stand as we can expect under present circumstances.

In theory the most effective policy for the United States to pursue might seem to be the summoning of the signatories of the Nine-Power pact to consider joint action against Japan. But practically the chances against the success of such a move are even greater than in 1931. The strong pro-Japanese element in the British government would oppose it, and both England and France are too deeply involved in the Spanish controversy to wish to take on new difficulties in the East. Only in case of the most direct interference with European interests would there be a prospect of collective action.

If the powers will not act in their own behalf, they are even less likely to support collective action on moral grounds. The failure of the League to act against Japan in 1931, against Italy in 1935, and against Germany and Italy in the Spanish crisis has induced widespread cynicism regarding the possibility of checking aggression. Each successive crisis has left the international peace mechanism weaker. This time we obviously cannot count either on the League or on national action. We must find a new technique which does not depend upon the support or a timid foreign-office bureaucracy.

Japan is peculiarly dependent on foreign trade for its existence. About one-fifth of its food, five-sixths of its oil, practically all of its rubber, aluminum, zinc, mercury, tin, nickel, and cotton must be obtained from abroad. Its iron-and-steel, machinery, and chemical industries are insufficient for the needs of modern warfare. Its gold reserve is small and its credit extremely shaky. It can obtain the necessities of war only through the export of silk, textiles, and cheap manufactured goods.

It is still possible for the millions who desire peace to bring effective pressure against Japanese aggression. All that is needed is for a substantial number of persons in this country and abroad to declare that they will not support Japan's war in China by purchasing Japanese goods. This boycott should be supplemented if possible by refusal on the part of longshoremen in all countries to handle cargoes destined for or received from Japan. Given proper leadership, it is not too late to develop a non-violent technique for resisting aggression. Governments have failed; it is time for the people to take matters into their own hands.

Congress: An Inquest

THIS has been one of the longest, most rasping, and least productive sessions in the history of Congress. Now that it is over we can say unreservedly that it would have graced the days of Harding or Coolidge. The fact that it came in the second term of a reform administration, after the biggest progressive landslide since the days of Jefferson, only serves to point the irony and to raise the question of what was wrong.

It all started hopefully enough. The President's request, for example, for an extension of his power to make reciprocal trade agreements was treated with good sense. Even his message on governmental reorganization did not stir hysteria. What bogged Congress down was, of course, the Supreme Court proposal. But that was not all. There were the sitdown strikes and the organizing campaigns in automobiles and steel. There was the growing awareness on the part of big business that Mr. Roosevelt had "only just begun to fight," and that he was planning a second New Deal. There was finally, as the result of these three factors, the Democratic Party split. Morale cracked. The session became a Pilgrim's Progress from one slough of despond to another. A deliberative body was turned into a crowd of weary, embittered, and bewildered men.

Hence the pathetically meager record of accomplishment. A wretched housing bill, torn with as many wounds as Caesar's body, and by the hands of its supposed friends; a tax-loophole bill, put through cynically without even the pretense of being read; a coal bill to replace the one outlawed by the Supreme Court; a lump-sum appropriation for relief, viciously slashed and containing a senseless and inhumane provision excluding non-citizens; an inadequate farm-tenancy measure; a shameless sugar-tariff bill; a bill, long needed but hewn down to a minimum, making procedural reforms in the lower federal courts; a bill extending the CCC; a bill repealing the District of Columbia "red rider"; a bill hitting at the consumer by allowing price-fixing by state legislation; and a routine deficiency appropriation bill. That is the positive record—most of the items minor ones and with few exceptions a travesty on what could have been accomplished.

But that doesn't really tell the story. The important part of the record is what Congress did not do. In the two fields of labor and agriculture it muffed the big legislation. It failed to pass or even consider any kind of crop-control legislation. And it failed, through the treachery of the House Rules Committee, to pass a wages-and-hours bill. It failed to enact needed legislation in the field of power. It failed to make the needed revisions in the social-security law and the neutrality law. It failed to pass an anti-lynching bill. It failed to do anything further toward securities control. And it failed, finally, to grapple with the real problem of judicial supremacy.

It would be unfair to make Congress shoulder the whole burden of these sins of omission and commission. The Administration has also been at fault. We wrote in last week's issue of its failure to write a crop-control program in time. This past week the most glaring fault was revealed by the passage of the Miller-Tydings price-fixing bill, which was signed by the President (under protest) despite the fact that it conflicts with the Administration's announced program for fighting monopoly. There can be little doubt that the Administration is at cross-purposes on such knotty problems as monopoly, and even more confused and at cross-purposes in the face of rising prices and a coming depression. While saying this emphatically, we wish to make clear at the same time that to accuse the Administration of confusion is not to absolve Congress of its responsibility for sabotage.

In the face of the record of this Congress Mr. Roosevelt's Roanoke Island speech, excellent in its emphasis on the need for genuine democracy, raises more questions than it answers. The President is justified in flaying the tories and the pretended liberals together, and showing them up as opponents of the majority principle and suppressors of the democratic impulse. The President is right in saying that what we need is democracy—and more democracy. But when we look about for the agencies of government through which the majority will is to express itself, we find—Congress. And if the past session of Congress were the test of democratic government, the friends of democracy might well tremble for its future.

As for ourselves, we go the whole way for the democratic principle. For all its mistakes and confusion, we would rather have the Congress which has just ended its session than the benevolent rule of any minority group, whether financial, military, or judicial. One trouble with Congress at present lies in certain features which defeat the democratic will. We see no reason why a Senator should be able to filibuster as long as his strength lasts and hold up necessary legislation, and we feel that the adoption of some form of cloture rule for Senate debate is long overdue. Secondly, the whole committee system under which Congress operates needs overhauling, as Max Lerner's article elsewhere in this issue indicates. A plan for shaking up the committee assignments every two years would infuse new blood into the committee work and keep reactionary minorities from dominating the work of Congress. As a further procedural reform, Congress at its next session should appropriate enough money to support an adequate staff of legislative draftsmen. The few people on the present staff are doing a heroic job, but they are pitiful Davids confronting the Goliaths of the industrial world.

But even procedural reform will not insure us against a repetition of a session like the last one. That can only be certain if the country in next year's Congressional election gives an even clearer mandate than any since 1932 that it means business in the job of building a better society. Mr. Roosevelt is "going to the country" this fall. Labor is preparing for real activity in the local and Congressional elections. Only a strong labor and progressive bloc in Congress in 1938, to swell the ranks of the "Young Turks" in the House and the "Freshmen" in the Senate, can be an adequate answer to the reactionary record of the Congress that has just gone home.

Nazi "Journalism"

TREATING foreign press correspondents as though they were accredited diplomats, subject to government recall and expulsion, has been, except in war time, peculiarly a practice of the totalitarians. It came as something of a shock, therefore, when the staid, precedent-worshiping British Home Office a short time ago requested the speedy departure of three Nazi journalists. The conclusion was as quick as it was inevitable that Herren Crome, Wrede, and van Langen had been engaged in extra-curricular activities. The Home Office was more than reticent on the subject, but now, bit by bit, the story is seeping through.

When Herr von Ribbentrop took over the London duties of the late Ambassador von Hoesch, Nazi activities in England were swiftly coordinated and greatly increased. No fewer than five major Nazi centers were established, all under the general direction of the German Embassy. One of these is located in a fashionable hotel in the Sloane Square district of London and another in Bayswater. All three newspapermen were active members of both circles; van Langen, in fact, is said to have been in charge at Bayswater. The work of these Nazi groups is threefold: supervision of German nationals, particularly refugees, with the idea of choking anti-Nazi activity through intimidation and of stimulating racial solidarity; second, espionage of a political and military nature; and, finally, the distribution of funds from Berlin for the promotion of British fascism.

A curious aspect of the matter is the question of why Britain suddenly felt called upon to act. According to the Week, a reputable English periodical, authorities knew what the Nazi agents were up to as long ago as the fall of 1935. Some of their activities were quietly blocked and others were permitted to continue because of effective pressure exerted by influential reactionaries in behalf of "Anglo-German friendship."

All of which lends support to the solution advanced by the editors of the Week, who find in the subsidies the key to the problem. Pressure for the expulsions, that outspoken journal reports, came from "a number of Lancashire cotton interests, one big manufacturer, and two bankers, who, themselves backers of fascist organizations in this country, were troubled by the increased subsidization from abroad, which threatened to undermine their hold over the organizations for which they themselves had already dipped deeply into their pockets."

The theory that the British Cabinet was merely protecting the home product may not be correct, though it is more plausible than the thought of the Chamberlain government resorting to direct action in a burst of democratic indignation. Whatever the reason for the expulsions, however, they have served a good purpose. In a vivid flash the affair has revealed how serious and extensive is the work of the Fascist International. The warning of Sloane Square and Bayswater should not be lost on anti-fascists in the United States.

Committees of Sabotage

BY MAX LERNER

Washington, August 22

CONGRESS in the closing days of the session has been a shambles of mangled bills, forgotten mandates, butchered election promises. But behind-the-scene observers of the party battle here point out that the revolt of the South is not the whole story. It is one item. A second item is the influence of the "rotten-borough" Senators. And a third item is the committee system in Congress. A "rotten borough" in twentieth-century America, as in nineteenth-century England, is a constituency which keeps the same representation although the tide of population growth has passed it by or never reached it. "Rotten-borough Senators" is a phrase which the more ardent New Dealers here are using increasingly to designate men like Wheeler of Montana, O'Mahoney of Wyoming, McCarran of Nevada, and Burke of Nebraska, and to explain their defection from the New Deal. These Senators are, by more than a coincidence, the men whom Senator Guffey read out of the party in his radio speech. And whatever one may think of the hypothesis that equates the underpopulated states with party treason, it is a fact that the Senators who have most gallantly stood by the Administration guns come from the more populous industrial states.

But it is the committee system upon which must fall the chief blame for the complete collapse of the Administration program in the closing days of the session. Given the court plan and the C. I. O. fight, of course, the Democratic split was serious enough. Numerically, however, the Roosevelt forces would still have had a majority in an actual open vote on most of the "Second New Deal" measures. Because of the committee system it was possible for minorities to kill or mangle the important measures before they could even come to a vote.

What happened to the wage-hour bill in committee is of course the most glaring and extreme instance. The bill was passed by the Senate, was reported out favorably by the House Labor Committee, and would certainly have had an overwhelming majority on the floor of the House. But to get to the floor it needed a rule from the Rules Committee. That body, which has always regarded such matters as procedural and has never in the past failed to ease along a measure favored by the majority, now proceeded to take a view on the merits of the bill itself. Of the fourteen members five reactionary Democrats joined with the four gleeful Republicans, and the measure was smothered. The House majority raised a storm, but to no avail. What effect Speaker Bankhead and Majority Leader Rayburn might have had if they had exerted themselves is not clear. Despite their protestations of virtue I could find no one who believed that they made a serious effort in behalf of the bill. The real prize for sabotage, however, should go to Boland of Pennsylvania. The "Young Turks" on the floor of the House, with Maverick and his small group as a spearhead, got up a petition for a caucus call to force the bill out of the Rules Committee. But, according to persistent reports, Boland—who is supposed to be the Democratic Party whip—told the boys that they didn't have to break their necks to attend the caucus. When the meeting was finally held, it fell a few votes short of the number needed for a caucus, although there were enough Democrats loitering in the cloakrooms.

The irony of the whole business is that the Rules Committee, which has proved so despotic a device, was originally established to rid the House of the despotism of speakers like Czar Reed. No less irony will be found in the working of the other committees. The newspapers express surprise at the fate of the major Administration measures. But look at the committee gauntlet they have had to pass. The court bill got a scathing report from the Senate Judiciary Committee—a report which by no means represented the feeling of the Senate at the time. The bill on government reorganization has been exposed in the Senate to the tender tory mercies of the Byrnes-Byrd committee. Every appropriations measure must go through the hands of the indomitable Carter Glass of Virginia; every finance and taxation measure through those of Pat Harrison of Mississippi. It is no secret that the real brains behind the housing bill in the House was young Ellenbogen of Pennsylvania, who represents a Pittsburgh labor constituency: the bill should have been the Wagner-Ellenbogen bill. But labor representatives do not get the committee assignments; and Steagall, the committee chairman, after having been first cajoled by having his name put on the bill, put it away in his pocket and called no hearings until two weeks before adjournment. The chairman of the District of Columbia Committee is the cleverest of the reactionaries, Senator King of Utah. The chairman of the important Commerce Committee is the ineffable Senator Copeland of New York.

In the Senate the party leadership picks the committees. In the House the committee on committees is the powerful Ways and Means Committee. In both cases committee members are chosen because they are conservative and safe, and chairmanship goes by seniority. Committee chairmen tend to be specialists in inertia; otherwise they could not have held their seats so long or made so few enemies. The whole committee system puts a premium on silence and mediocrity. If a younger member talks too much, he is smothered in a tenth-rate committee. That is why the "Young Turks," who did such valiant work as a rescue crew for the progressive phases of the legislative program, had to do all their work on the floor of the House.

Without understanding how the committees have sabotaged the majority will of Congress in the past session one does not get the full meaning of Mr. Roosevelt's Roanoke Island speech. Nor does one get the full bitterness of Senator Guffey's radio speech. It is generally understood here that Guffey's speech had the approval of the President. The two speeches, taken along with some other signs here, indicate that Mr. Roosevelt will almost certainly carry his case to the country this fall. He will "go to the people," secure in the belief that the Southern insurgents, the rotten-borough Senators, and the committee saboteurs do not represent the will of the people. One of his purposes will be to stir up "constituency trouble" where it will have the most effect. For that purpose a holiday trip to visit the Boettigers at Seattle, which will involve a swing through the Rocky Mountain states, would seem to be called for, but it is not a certainty. Much of the talk about it has the stamp of propaganda, for the current anti-Roosevelt campaign is concerned with pinning the label of vindictiveness on the President. But the President's own plan is to stay clear of open personal spite and leave vindictiveness to the people. He has been studying history—not only the history of the "lost colony" on Roanoke Island but that of the lost liberal, Woodrow Wilson. He is determined not to repeat any of Wilson's mistakes. Wilson, it will be remembered, went on a Western trip after his return from Europe, stumping the country for a Congress that would support him. He was promptly accused of a bent for autocracy. Roosevelt will not be so specific—and unwise—as to ask for the defeat of particular men. His will be a broad campaign conducted on "educational" lines. He takes great pride in having introduced the country to the Supreme Court. He is now likely to introduce the country to the way in which the majority will has been defeated by minority rule. His most telling arguments will be not the Supreme Court plan but the wage-hour bill and the crop-control program. There can be no doubt that he worked hard to get the wage-hour bill past the Rules Committee blockade. But there can also be no doubt that he is now licking his chops over having a savory issue handed to him by the tories. He can go to the country and point out to the farmers and the workers that both crop control and the wage-hour bill have been scuttled by tory minorities. The Roosevelt luck is still there.

How the farmers will respond depends a good deal on what happens to farm prices between now and then. How labor will respond depends a good deal on the plans of Lewis and the Non-Partisan League. But that must be left for another article.

Panic on the Danube

BY M. E. RAVAGE

IT is not solely the lone-hand policy of their Yugoslav ally that is keeping the Czechs awake nights, nor yet the threats and bullyings of Hitler's Germany. Prince Paul and his lieutenant, Stoyadinovitch, as viewed from Prague, are but symptoms—distressing weather signals of the instability, the insecurity, the disorder that afflict this volcanic region of Europe, this region and those to the west and east. Nevertheless, the Czecho-Slovak people and their statesmen carry on with astonishing equanimity. What is the good of being perturbed? The divagations of Belgrade are disquieting, to be sure, and Henlein's forty-two deputies in the Prague Parliament are scarcely reassuring. But if one is to yield to depression, there is enough in the general line-up to give one neurasthenia. Since the remilitarization of the Reich, France has been terrifyingly consistent in retreat. Stresa was the last gasp of Geneva, though the crisis began with Manchuria, and since Ethiopia the League has ceased to be. The "purge" continues in Moscow to undermine the world prestige which the Soviet Union had so recently and so painfully reconquered. The Japanese are invading China proper, and not so much as a remonstrance from anyone. After "sanctions" in East Africa, London invents "non-intervention" in Spain, and France, having swallowed the reoccupation of the Rhineland, not only submits to the fortification of the Pyrenees and the Balearic Isles but accepts the humiliation of having to sponsor the whole plan. After this, whence is help to come to a small or a weak people, however protected by treaties and alliances, if attacked by a big and powerful neighbor?

Oddly enough, both on the surface and beneath, the uneasiness is immeasurably greater in Belgrade (to say nothing of Zagreb) than in Prague. The Prince Regent and the government are all but universally unpopular. Their sudden swing into the orbit of the revisionist powers is approved by no one, least of all by the army. "The Serb army," an officer told me, "is part of the French army; it will revolt if ordered to fight on the side of Germans and Italians. The Little Entente and the alliance with France are not merely rooted in sentiment; they coincide with the very destiny, the very survival of the country. These embracings with Mussolini, these flirtations with Hitler, fly in the face of history and geography. Yugoslavia lies on the road to Bagdad; and if we stand aside when Czecho-Slovakia is assaulted, it will be our turn next. Of course, our people won't let it come to that; and our present rulers know it as well as anyone. But it is precisely the duplicity of the Stoyadinovitch foreign policy that is its worst feature. For it breeds illusions among the war powers and encourages them in their adventures."

The Yugoslavs are no less disturbed by the Regency's misrule at home than by its digressions abroad. The dictatorship of King Alexander justified itself by pretending to assure the inner unity of a divided country. Prince Paul aggravates the dictatorship in Serbia—suppression of political parties, censorship of the press, suspension of the right of assembly—but plays the liberal in Croatia. It is a subtle game designed to drive a wedge between the Zagreb and Belgrade wings of the opposition. In fact, the whole policy of Stoyadinovitch and the Regency is to play one section of the country, one creed, against the other—a dangerous game at best and disastrous in a land as divided as Yugoslavia. It is in pursuit of this idea that the government is trying to force upon a people that does not want it a concordat which, as one orthodox bishop told me, gives the Roman church greater privileges than it has in any Catholic country.

In Rumania, if the opposition chiefs are to be believed, there is civil war in the air, and the Jews live under the constant threat of wholesale massacre. The King, when I frankly imparted these rumors to him, pooh-poohed the idea, but he added significantly: "I won't deny that today or tomorrow Rumania may be the scene of very grave events. Whether we like it or not," he added, "the world is being swept by a current of nationalism. It is only comprehensible that this country should be caught in the movement." To which, remembering that there is not a drop of Rumanian blood in His Majesty's body, I could only reply: "I don't know how national these nationalisms may be. But if one may judge by Germany, Italy, and Hungary, they are not monarchical." Chief Codreanu of the Iron Guard (now called "All for the Country") has a charming metaphor for pogroms. He is not, he says, for killing off the Jews. He merely wants "the swamp dried out." The murder of Premier Duca he does not deny. He is proud that his men "executed a traitor."

Still, Codreanu may not have his way. Carol II, who, constitution or no constitution, is boss, is likely to put in his veto. Not that the King has suddenly gone philo-Semitic. He has rather become mistrustful of the Iron Guard. It is common knowledge in Rumania that the monarch and the Liberal (reactionary) Party for a long time fostered the Codreanu "movement" as a counter-influence against the leftist National Peasant Party, the only mass party in Rumania. Grown strong, and therefore finding support abroad, Codreanu bit the hand that had hitherto fed him.* The government and the monarch, for their part, seeing their fledgling escaping, took measures to clip its wings. The subventions and favors stopped abruptly. A royal youth movement has been organized which competes effectively with the Iron Guard, and the authorities "persecute" the fascists in every way.

The finances and the army, chronically disorganized, are at particularly low ebb now. Tatarescu's visit to Prague in March and the King's journey to Paris and London a fortnight ago were not unconnected with these difficulties. The Czechs, who have been equipping their ally for some time, were willing to continue to furnish arms on credit. But in view of certain dubious negotiations between Bucharest and Warsaw, Benes and Hodza required guaranties—one of them, I am told, being unopposed transit in case of war for the Russians across Bukovina, the wedge of Rumanian territory which separates the U.S.S.R. from Czecho-Slovakia. The fact that Carol, who got a cool reception in the French and British capitals, now announces that he will go to Berlin shortly and receive Göring in Bucharest makes me surmise that the monarch did not ratify his premier's commitments. But the Germans have troubles of their own. Their commercial arrangements with the Balkan countries have struck a snag, and their own rearmament program has been greatly handicapped by Britain's cornering of the raw-material supply. Hence their terms are likely to be even less acceptable than the Czechs'.

What makes the Rumanian army problem particularly acute is that, thanks to the exchange of visits between Colonel Beck and King Carol, the Russians have taken umbrage at their royal neighbor's conduct, and have resuscitated the unburied corpse of Bessarabia. The Soviets have never formally recognized the Rumanian annexation of this former Russian province, and the diplomatic correspondence on the subject must have been assuming an exacerbated tone as long ago as last May. For on the eve of Beck's arrival in Bucharest I was ingenuous enough to ask M. Antonescu, the Rumanian foreign minister, a question about Bessarabia. To my astonishment, this cultivated boyar became positively panicky and in an agitated voice cried: "For mercy's sake don't make me say anything on that subject, or I shall be forced to disclaim the whole interview."

Before leaving Rumania I should add a word about M. Titulescu. Three separate circumstances seem to have led Carol to drop his pilot, two of them personal, the third political. It appears that Beck and Titulescu could not stand the sight of each other, the Rumanian charging the Pole with being a German agent, the latter accusing the former of having sold himself to the Soviets. The consequence of their hostility was that diplomatic negotiations of great importance made no headway and ran the risk of coming to naught. The King, moreover, was, not without reason, jealous of his foreign minister. To the world Rumania meant not Carol II, but Nicholas Titulescu. It was a slight which no Hohenzollern could long endure. Lastly, I hear, the minister added insult to injury. In his absence—in Geneva, or London, or Paris—the government, with the monarch's approval, would take some action at home which would undo months of delicate diplomatic work. Whereupon Titulescu would lose his temper and shout as he might at a clerk.

The winds of disaster which are sweeping over the Danube Basin afflict not alone the three status quo states but their revisionist neighbors on the other side of the barricade as well. For the changes in the diplomatic (and military) line-up of the last few months have two sides. If Czecho-Slovakia is disquieted by Belgrade's rapprochement with Rome, Hungary is no less disturbed by

---

* I was told that the Minister of the Interior had recently declared that the Iron Guard and other civil-war parties were financed by Hitler but that documentary proof was not yet available.

Rome's new friendship with Belgrade. The desertion by Italy of the Stresa front is a subject of worry in France and among her little allies in Central Europe, but Mussolini's alliance with Hitler is giving nightmares to Vienna. When I asked Schuschnigg's right-hand man whether his Chancellor had not left most of his illusions in Rome last May, he replied briefly: "He did not have any when he left Vienna."

It would be comic—if comedy had a place in a drama involving the lives and fortunes of 100,000,000 souls—to hear the comments of leading Hungarians on the subject of the agonizing Little Entente. Mr. Tibor Eckhardt, who is not only the most enlightened and intelligent statesman I had the pleasure of interviewing anywhere in the five countries, but very likely to be the prime minister of his country after the elections this autumn, informed me triumphantly that "the Danube Valley has recovered its equilibrium, for the Little Entente is no longer united." But in the very next breath he added that Hungary, thanks to the economic commitments of Gömbös, is today a feudal outpost, a colony of Germany. And he explained: "The Germans could ruin us in a day; they could provoke the greatest social disorders among our peasantry by the simple device of stopping their pork purchases in our market. And at the same time they cannot or won't pay us when they do buy our produce. Our national bank was recently obliged to refuse payment in paper marks; our financial market was swamped with them. While paying us in their own currency, they dumped our wheat in Amsterdam below cost, so as to obtain gold for themselves, with the consequence that we could no longer sell our produce in Holland."

The Germans have Hungary in the hollow of their hand, to a greater extent than Mr. Eckhardt would admit. It was in Hungary, not in Czecho-Slovakia, that a Nazi putsch was narrowly suppressed last February. And during my sojourn, which coincided with the Miklas-Schuschnigg state visit, a special Hitler agent came down from Berlin to warn Daranyi, on pain of seeing the commercial treaty with Germany denounced, not to enter into any deal with Austria along the lines of Hodza's "enlarged Little Entente."

What I find almost comic is that after sixteen years of hope and effort to disrupt the unity of her foes, Hungary at last sees the day of salvation dawning—and then discovers that it is a false dawn, that she is in the same boat with her foes, and that in the event of shipwreck she is certain to go down with them.

All the five countries are terrified of the morrow. Whatever happens, they seem to be doomed. If Germany and Russia clash, their valley will be what is poetically called the theater of war. But is it so certain that they will clash? The Central Europeans have an interpretation of their own of what is happening in Moscow. From Prague to Bucharest everyone will tell you that bolshevism is killing its progenitors so as to bring Russia and Germany to a harmonious level. Yes, they say, Stalin "purges" and Hitler conciliates (with Ludendorff, for instance, the veteran "friend" of a Reich-Soviet alliance) and tomorrow there will be nothing ideological to keep them from joining hands—across the dead body of the Danube Valley. For when and if these two giants iron out their differences it will be the end of Central Europe.

Is there no light in all this gloom? The Danubians see two faint gleams in the distance. One is the rearmament of Great Britain, which if it continues is likely to stop Germany in her tracks. The other is the reawakening of France to her old mission.

Wheeler Faces the Music

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

OVER in the Bitter Root Mountains the North Coast Limited was stopped by a freight derail up ahead. It was impossible to read in the evening dusk as the lights dimmed in the club car, and a bunch of the men got out and strolled back along the right of way to where the brakeman stood with his lantern and torpedoes. Most of the passengers seemed to be either executives and salesmen going West on business or business and professional men who could afford to take their families to see Yellowstone Park on first-class railroad tickets. The delay was a long one and the conversation soon got around to politics. The group started talking about the great service Montana's senior Senator had done the country by leading the opposition to the Supreme Court reform plan. Apparently his deed had saved the Republic. The lean and wiry brakeman listened silently to the discussion. When the locomotive whistled shrilly and the men hurried back to the train, he spat on the roadbed and remarked:

"Well, none of that crowd votes in Montana—but, by golly, I do! And they'll never get me to vote for Wheeler again. I'm through with that guy. The Supreme Court threw out my pension, and that's enough for me. Day after day on this run I listen to those fellows from the East boosting Wheeler. I wonder what Wheeler'd say if I told him I never hear that kind of talk from the people up forward in the coaches, the people who come from Montana."

The statement of the slender brakeman on the Northern Pacific is a pretty shrewd analysis of the political situation that confronts Senator Wheeler in his own state. In the lobby of the Finlen Hotel in Butte the traveling salesmen sit and bestow encomiums on the Montana citizen who, in their opinion, has kept Roosevelt from becoming a dictator. In the lobby of the Grand Hotel, which Wheeler himself owns, it is the same story. Each day six transcontinental trains cross Montana's vast expanse of uplands and mountains. From the club cars travelers look out admiringly on the state that has sent Burton Kendall Wheeler to Washington to preserve the American form of government.

In 1940 Wheeler comes up for reelection. The Pullman-car passengers from the East will not be in Montana to vote for him, and neither will the drummers who lounge in the lobbies of the Finlen and Grand hotels. He will have to depend for support largely upon three classes of citizens, all angered by recent decisions of the Supreme Court: (1) farmers, who burned the conservative justices in effigy after the verdict on the AAA; (2) railroad men, who were deprived of their pensions by Justice Roberts's majority opinion in Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton Railroad Company, and (3) miners, who, although tunneling for copper, regarded the Guffey decision against their fellow-miners in the coal fields as a blow to governmental protection for themselves.

Montana is a state without a middle class worthy of the name. Only six of its towns have more than 10,000 inhabitants. More than three-fourths of the population live on farms or in places of less than 10,000 people. Butte is the sole community that can properly be considered a city, and it is built around the hard-boiled proletarians who mine copper in what they call "the richest hill on earth." These agrarians and workers have formed the bulk of Wheeler's backing in the past. There is no large group of shopkeepers and white-collar employees to whom he can turn for new support in the future. If he is reelected in 1940, it must be mainly with the votes of the people who were devotedly following him when he was a flaming insurgent progressive far out on the left with the elder La Follette and George W. Norris. In area Montana is the third largest state in the country, but it is thirty-ninth in population; nor is there sufficient variety in that population to enable a man to move about freely from one political corral to the other without being lassoed at the polls.

Some of Wheeler's friends and allies say he was genuinely surprised at the reaction in Montana to his militant attack on the court plan. In first opposing the President's bill Wheeler carefully distinguished his position from that of King, Burke, and other outright conservatives. He made it clear he was assailing the proposal as a liberal and as one who still believed in liberalism. And in Washington it undoubtedly appeared as if there might be quite a progressive front against the plan. Norris was cool to it at first. Borah, just reelected as a mild New Dealer, condemned it vigorously. So did Nye, Frazier, and Johnson of California. Bone was not enthusiastic over it. Among Wheeler's adherents are men who maintain that the Senator believed opposition to the court measure might be considered in the same light as the vote to override the President's veto of the bonus. He had no idea, they say, that thousands of his constituents would interpret his stand as an outright break with the New Deal.

Undoubtedly there was a difference in shading between Wheeler's condemnation of the court proposal and the attacks from men like Tydings, Vandenberg, and Copeland. But the mauves and heliotropes of the picture were not discernible to the farmers and miners of Montana. They saw only that Senator Wheeler was against the President. He was in the company of the Liberty League and the National Manufacturers' Association. Mayor Hauswirth of Butte said the Senator had gone over to the du Ponts. The Silver Bow County Labor Council assailed the Supreme Court as a galaxy of corporation lawyers. Both the A.F. of L. and the C.I.O. indorsed the President's bill. The miners in Silver Bow County, heretofore the citadel of Wheeler's strength, manifested unmistakable sympathy with the court proposal. Wheeler found himself branded a reactionary.

This is the background of what has since become a deep schism between Wheeler and the New Deal forces in Congress. The Senator's friends deprecate the rumors that he has broken with the President because he was not tendered the vice-presidential nomination in 1932, or because he was edged out by Bruce Kemmerer in the dispensing of Montana patronage. They claim that Wheeler had many better opportunities to draw his sword during Roosevelt's first administration, when the President was far less militant than now and when he flirted with the conservatives much more frequently. Many of Wheeler's old supporters insist that he attacked the court plan because he sincerely believed it was perilous to American institutions. They also say that he completely misjudged what the Montana reaction would be, that he never dreamed he would be rebuked by the miners, who had supported him so long. But once he realized what had happened, they explain, he concluded that he had already crossed the Rubicon and moved against other acts of the New Deal.

In his own state Wheeler today is, like Mohammed's coffin, suspended between heaven and earth. He is bitterly hated by the New Dealers and he is still regarded as too radical to be supported by the conservatives. One newspaper editor I spoke to went into a state of verbal ecstasy over Wheeler's leadership of the anti-court-bill forces but showered imprecations upon him in the next breath for sponsoring a measure to forbid newspaper control over radio stations. Whatever support Wheeler has won in Montana because of his recent behavior is largely of a passive variety. This is not true of the antagonism he has incurred. Miners and railroad men vigorously insist they will never vote for him again. One mine union leader carried around a clipping from the New York Times describing a speech by Wheeler before the Maryland Bar Association. "He'll be takin' dinner with the du Ponts next," the union man said. The statement that has lost Wheeler the most ground in Montana was his mawkish observation after the death of Senator Robinson that the President had better drop the court plan lest he appear to be fighting against God. This demagogic remark disgusted many of the Senator's erstwhile supporters and definitely created the impression in Montana that his opposition to the New Deal had moved out of the liberal perspective within which he had promised to confine it. The fact that the newspapers are giving him countless columns of publicity has also done him no good with his constituents. To the miners the Butte papers are synonymous with the Anaconda Copper Company, and they suspect anyone who attracts favorable journalistic attention of having A.C.C. leanings.

Roosevelt beat Landon in Montana by a margin of more than 2½ to 1. He carried Silver Bow County nearly 5 to 1. The Republicans never had a chance. If only a portion of this New Deal popularity survives until 1940, Jerry J. O'Connell may replace Wheeler in the Senate. A representative at twenty-eight, O'Connell is the youngest individual in Congress. Besides being a militant New Dealer, he is a champion of the Spanish Loyalists and a defender of the C.I.O. O'Connell also sponsored a Congressional memorial petitioning Governor Merriam of California to pardon Tom Mooney—a popular move in Montana, where year after year the miners have clamored for Mooney's freedom. O'Connell's father died from a combination of silicosis, contracted in the mines, and a wound suffered in a strike, all of which gives young O'Connell a closer bond with the miners than Wheeler ever had. There is little doubt that the chubby, bald-headed, blue-eyed Congressman is rapidly superseding Wheeler as Montana's dominant figure in liberal politics.

Another aspirant to Wheeler's office is youthful Joe Monaghan, a member of the House until last year, when he tried unsuccessfully to run for the Senate against James E. Murray, a middle-of-the-road Democrat. Monaghan dabbles in progressive politics but is far to the right of O'Connell. He was a Townsend enthusiast at the crest of the $200-pension hysteria. Indicative of the change in Wheeler's position in his home state is the fact that although Monaghan entered politics as a confirmed Wheeler adherent, when Wheeler came to Great Falls recently Monaghan challenged him to a debate on the Roosevelt court plan. Wheeler declined.

The elections of 1940 are still three years away, and Wheeler may survive. Since the death of Thomas J. Walsh he has been Montana's only political figure of national prominence and may not be easily dethroned. But Roosevelt is popular in the Rocky Mountains. The price of copper is up and Butte is a boom city again. With the exception of sparsely settled Nevada, the President polled a higher percentage in Montana than in any state outside the South. Administration support is particularly important in Montana right now. The giant Fort Peck Dam is under construction on the Missouri River, and this project involves an enormous amount of patronage. Montana is also one of the fifteen "irrigation states," in which a Senator or Representative in Administration favor generally gets credit for the reclamation projects on which depend the crops of hundreds of farms. And Wheeler is definitely beyond the pale of Administration favor.

In the final analysis, what happens to Wheeler may rest almost entirely with Chief Justice Hughes, who of late has become such an intimate of Montana's senior Senator. If Hughes holds the court on its present course, Wheeler may run the gauntlet of the 1940 campaign unscathed. But, as one mine workers' leader expressed it, if the court again starts to nullify social legislation popular with the farmers and copper miners, then Wheeler had better "find that old law shingle and dust it off right handsome."

Ohio Labor Tries the Ballot

BY DONALD M. POND

THE smug and well-fed gentlemen who sit behind the big desks in the executive offices of Akron's rubber factories and neighboring Canton's steel mills went to work in a decidedly bad humor one day last week. Those rough fellows who actually make the steel and build the tires had been at it again. And this time it gave promise of being even worse than a strike. The unions, flushed with victory in Akron and resentful after the battle against Little Steel in Canton, had had the effrontery to put men in the municipal primaries—and, worse still, these men had actually been nominated!

The bosses, perhaps, had cause for their bad tempers. It is a truism of American politics that municipal government in industrial towns, and with it such important items as control of the police and prosecution agencies, has been dominated for years by the major industries of those towns. The arrival of the New Deal in Washington did little to change their political complexion. Thus the unprecedented mayoralty nomination in Akron of Municipal Judge G. L. (Pat) Patterson, former National Labor Relations Board trial attorney, and in Canton of Darrell D. Smith, hard-hitting C.I.O. worker, may mark the beginning of a new era of labor participation in municipal affairs—an era of returning democracy in local government.

Among the commentators who seem to concur in this view is the Wall Street Journal, which on the day of the primary said that the eyes of the nation would be on Akron, where, if Patterson won, organized labor would battle organized industry in the November election. The eyes of the nation saw Patterson, former general counsel for the United Rubber Workers of America, run up a three-to-one lead over his principal opponent in the Democratic primary, an uninspired and utterly "safe" politician who had the support of the party machine until the machine saw what was going to happen.

It was no accident that such labor candidates as Patterson and Smith ran in Democratic primaries. The Roosevelt record had fired the imagination and won the admiration of much of organized labor in 1936, and it was the labor vote which gave the President his overwhelming majority in this section of Ohio. Nevertheless the convention of Labor's Non-Partisan League of Summit County (Akron), which succeeded in nominating Patterson and a complete slate of union members for the council, made it clear that it was under no illusions about the Democratic Party as such. Most of the delegates realized that if that party is to be really useful to labor and its causes it must be revitalized, must be forced to accept through the primaries labor's own candidates. (Ohio's election laws, incidentally, make it virtually impossible to elect candidates as independents.) Some of the more hopeful, however, talked about the beginnings of a genuine labor party, and it may be that they spoke more truly than they knew.

In Akron labor is in a better position to go on to victory. Canton has shown during the steel strike that it will tolerate vigilantism and will open its arms to law-and-order leagues. Akron, on the other hand, crushed such things quickly when they raised their heads in the Goodyear strike. Judge Patterson, in fact, is a good deal better than an even bet to beat the Republican incumbent, Mayor Lee D. Schroy, in the light of what labor did at the polls here in 1936. And the obliging Schroy is playing into Patterson's hands by turning out his full police force against picket lines.

It is interesting to note that Schroy resorted to such tactics in the Enterprise Manufacturing Company strike after he learned that the Democratic Governor, Martin L. Davey, would use the National Guard gladly and with a magnificent show of "impartiality" to break strikes where police could not break them and local sentiment would not. It is equally interesting to note in passing that Patterson, who, politically speaking, was just a good police judge six months ago, is now being mentioned as a labor candidate to oppose Davey in 1938. In these parts Davey is generally believed to be the Number One man on John L. Lewis's "get" list. Learning no lessons from the past, Schroy's bourbon supporters are circulating the threadbare story that Patterson's election would mean a wholesale exodus of industry from Akron. This one has been pulled so often since the rubber workers started seriously to organize in 1933 that not even the most gullible man on the street now believes it.

In Canton Mayor Seccombe, with an eye to the vigilantes, has decided that the issue is "law and order." He has even gone so far as to shut down temporarily some of Canton's gambling establishments. Labor Candidate Smith, to whose excellent discipline of the workers is attributed the fact that Canton escaped serious violence in the steel strike, asserted that nobody had more respect for law and order than he did, but added that he insisted "on law and order being maintained by the properly constituted authorities and not by prejudiced persons acting with self-assumed authority." Smith also called for "impartial law enforcement against all classes of citizens." That he referred to vigilantes, Republic Steel Corporation thugs, and the corporation's apparently illegal possession of arms was too clear to miss.

To the same sort of strategy in Akron Patterson answered that he would substitute a policy of "human understanding and common sense" in labor disputes for what he characterized as Schroy's "force and fear" policy. But for the most part his reply was implicit in the Non-Partisan League platform on which he was nominated by a convention in which C.I.O. and A.F. of L. adherents worked in complete harmony despite the efforts of some persons to stir up dissension by charging that the Non-Partisan League was the political wing of the C.I.O. and not of all organized labor. The importance of this solidarity and of the willingness of certain liberal and left-wing groups in Akron to work in harmony with the league cannot be overestimated.

The platform to which Patterson is committed starts with recognition of the fact that "the welfare of labor in Summit County is inseparable from the welfare of the community as a whole," and with a bow to the county's farmers and political independents. It calls for passage of a municipal labor-relations law patterned after the Wagner Act—to be assured by electing to the city council the Democratic-Labor candidates running with Patterson. It lays down a program of public services, including housing projects and slum clearance, both of which Akron sorely needs. A "Bill of Rights" guaranteeing freedom of speech, press, and assembly pledges the nominees to allow freedom "to strike and picket without intervention by injunction, soldiers, police, or private thugs." It also pledges them to prohibit the use of tear gas in industrial disputes and to require that all armed guards and "private detectives" be registered.

The league calls further for "representation of the common people on the board of trustees of the municipal tax-supported University of Akron." As matters stand, the board, appointed by the Mayor, is primarily a group of spokesmen for the rubber companies, and the university is efficiently supervised in the interests of something a long way from industrial democracy. Civil service, all but destroyed by Schroy in a hopelessly inefficient police department, is proposed for all city departments. In the same vein, the league promises to economize through coordinating overlapping offices in city and county, to "shift the tax burden where it belongs," and to "collect unpaid taxes from the rich tax-dodgers"—a promise which brought a quick howl of "demagogic appeal" from one of Akron's wealthier publicists.

Money will flow to beat such a program. There will be no end of dirty work at the crossroads. Already Schroy has voiced the pious fear that this may be a "dirty campaign." Reactionary Democrats will bolt to the Republican ranks despite the promises of the two county chairmen that the party will wholeheartedly support Patterson and Smith.

But labor should win in Akron—and it may win in Canton. Even if it loses, however, it will have done valuable pioneering in a field where eventual success seems assured.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

I HAVE decided upon a very important change in my life. For the first time I am going to become a candidate for a public office with a salary attached to it. There are plenty of precedents for this. Many retired newspapermen have wound up their careers in public office honorably. Of course, I could have done this before. The last time I talked with Joseph P. Tumulty he expressed his regret that I had never let Mr. Wilson appoint me to an embassy or a legation in 1912. But I have always had an old-fashioned belief that an independent journalist owed it to himself never to become beholden to any President or politician for any favor, however merited. Now I am no longer an editor or even a newspaper proprietor, so that it is quite plainly no longer a question of journalistic freedom but only of getting a nice, quiet job with a large salary attached to it for my declining years. But what job?

Now I have it. It came to me like an inspiration when I read of the career of the new associate justice of the Supreme Court, Senator Black. That is a marvelous success story—unprecedented. When before has an aspiring American leaped from a police-court bench to the Supreme Court? True, there were intervening years during which he was a soldier and a practicing attorney and a very valuable Senator, but so far as the courts are concerned the jump was as I have stated it. Well, when I discovered that, my mind was made up. I am now a full-fledged candidate for the next vacancy on the Supreme Court. I shall hire a publicity man at once and begin to line up the Senators and Congressmen I have boosted in the past and demand my quid pro quo. Articles calling public attention to the fact that my journalistic career has always been marked by a most judicial tone, especially apparent in my writings, will soon appear. Indeed, the more I think about my qualifications for the Supreme Court—the New Deal Supreme Court—the more I am impressed by my fitness.

Well, here those qualifications are: I have from the first been for the New Deal—in principle 100 per cent. Of course, I have dissented from certain phases; I am against the militaristic aspects of it, for example. But my quarrel has been chiefly with the execution of New Deal policies, the methods adopted, and the administrative and tactical errors and failures. But if I had been on the court since the birth of the New Deal, I should have stood with Justices Cardozo and Brandeis every time. Much is now being made of Justice Black's liberalism, but I can beat him there. I never had anything to do with the Ku Klux Klan except to attack it editorially. I have not opposed the anti-lynching bill but have supported it always—for years. I think no one will deny that I am much more liberal on the Negro question than any Senator from Alabama could possibly be in these days. I think my fitness to represent liberalism on the Supreme Court will hardly be questioned, even by my most vigorous opponents. As for labor, my selection would not be as popular now as it would have been a few weeks ago. Still, there too no one could doubt where my sympathies lie.

As for the Constitution, it is also well known that I favor its amendment, indeed its complete overhauling, by a constitutional convention as permitted by the Constitution. I am in this field a really respectable reformer, for I am for change by time-honored methods and not by dubious short cuts or violence. When it comes to the question of age, it is true that I am considerably older than Senator Black, but my physician tells me that I have a most unusual heart and arteries and that if I take care of myself there is no reason why I should not be as fit at eighty as Justice Brandeis or Justice Holmes at that age. And how could I better take care of my health and insure a hearty old age than by going on the court?

There remain only two considerations, my legal fitness and how I stand with F. D. R. and Jim Farley. As to the first I can surely qualify. For forty years and more I have had to my credit in the Law School of Harvard University a course in criminal law and one in constitutional law, and in the college one in international law. Evidently I must have had an inkling of what fate had in store for me when I made my brilliant record in constitutional law—I can call it brilliant, since everybody else who knew about it is dead. But if there are those who may cavil at this, let me point out that what the New Deal plainly now wants on the Supreme Court is not legal fitness but a forward-looking progressive mind attuned to the needs and popular desires of the hour. Why should we not, in dealing with the Supreme Court, follow a distinguished New Jersey precedent? Its highest court, that of Errors and Appeals, has by law two lay judges who are appointed just because they have had no legal training. Why not frankly adopt this plan for the Supreme Court and thus humanize it? You see, I have absolutely spiked the argument that I have not sufficient legal training.

As for F. D. R. and Jim Farley, it is true that I did not vote for the former either in 1932 or 1936. But, then, perhaps F. D. R. will remember in my favor that I was the first editor ever to send a reporter out with him—when he was running for his first office. As for Jim, well, I got a letter from him the other day—signed in green ink, by gosh—praising one of my articles, so I must be O.K. with him. Now just remember the slogan, please: Villard for the Supreme Court, the Liberal who Never Yields.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

BOOKS and the ARTS

ROBINSON: THE IRONIC DISCIPLINE

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

ROBINSON'S poems,* newly and now finally collected, make as little compromise with a reviewer's convenience as the successive long poems of his lifetime did; as little, in fact, as he himself made with the tastes and fashions, vogues and causes that excited the forty years of his literary career. There is little to say about them that has not already been said and accepted, but they prompt, by their unity, sinew, and unaccommodating authority of mode and point of view, a number of necessary reflections on ourselves—the tastes we favor, the styles we demand, and the results we have esteemed in poets during a period whose instability Robinson emphasized by his steady purpose and isolation. There is too little in his work of "growth" or variety to make him a creative force like Yeats or Pound; too little invention to make him a discoverer like Eliot or Auden; too little journalistic tact to give him the popular following of Sandburg or Millay; only a small part of the proverbial Americanism that endears Frost; and of course none of the spasmodic brilliance and sentiment that divide him, as by a polar distance, from the expert sleights and trade tricks of the average talents who outbid him in esteem. What he lost by these defects is obvious. It appears in the low vitality of his language, the reluctant energy of his style, the monotony and repetition of his effects, his shortcomings in focus, contrast, and decision. What he gained is equally apparent. It applies not only to his work as an aesthetic achievement, but to the personality of his mind and to its place in an age.

If he missed the age's heat and intensity, he also missed its abuses; he remained scrupulously aloof from literary politics and their corrupting demands. If he missed the warmth and pressure of living causes, he valued the skeptical detachment that had rescued him from one confused century by applying its corrective to another. The vitality of his language is low because probably, in the philosophical sense, his mind's was, but it was strong in endurance, and that sobriety provided him with one of his surest strategies—the strategy of self-possession and perspective, of patient analysis, of sustained thought; and when he chose to release his full poetic power it arrived with the force of a bold intellectual stroke, with the impact of complete reserves, of verbal intensity, of stored and loaded emphasis. While he will never be read as a poet who seized his truth out of fire and violence, or as an inventor who revolutionized taste and method as some of his symbolist and realist contemporaries did, he will be remembered for the way in which he teamed passion with judgment, sympathy with prudence, and a tough American loyalty with contempt for the abuses that were defiling the American heritage and giving it over to a brutal materialism that not only worsted the fine hopes of his pragmatic grandfathers but drove him personally, by sheer spiritual revulsion, away from the shows and vulgarities of the affluent age around him.

It was reserves like these that piloted Robinson through half a century of dramatic and stupefying circumstances in American life—the somber epilogue to the Civil War, the pillage and wealth that followed it, the prowess of the later war, the follies of prosperity and prohibition, and the collapse that finally came. Contrary to common belief, Robinson wrote about all these matters. The age is in his work. He did not confine himself to the Maine natives who were his personae, or to romantic figures from the Arthurian and Renaissance past. The past was always there with its opportunities of vantage; the Maine village was ready to supply its simplifying speech and innocence. But Robinson observed steadily the crises around him and judged what he saw, even when he sacrificed timely appeal or fashionable mannerism in expressing it. He was probably the only member of his American generation who knew what it meant for a poet to confront as bewildering a world as the one that opened its opportunities at the end of the nineteenth century. Stephen Crane's talent was slight and inhibited by irony; Moody's was confused and inflated by traditional influences; Stickney's alone had a subtle sensibility to support its intelligence, and it alone had what Robinson never fully enjoyed—a background of rich aesthetic sympathies and a stimulating contact with French poets—but early death cut short its fulfilment. These men were all temperamental empiricists. Robinson was the only one among them who knew how to sustain that realism by analysis, skepticism, and the long-tested endurance of intellectual honesty and passion. His poems are burdened by all the limitations that made it easy to believe in those years that great poetry would never again be written. He alone seems to have realized that those limitations themselves implied the spirit of an age and demanded a classic embodiment, and he proved to be the one American of his generation who had the humanitarian and the poetic perceptions to make his version of them the classic one.

The present collection is printed without distinction and it does not deserve the designation "complete." It lacks fragments like Fortunatus and Modred, and it does not include the two plays, "Van Zorn" and "The Porcupine." It serves present purposes, however, and supplemented by Charles Beecher Hogan's recent "Bibliography" (Yale University Press) will stand until a full and definitive edition is some day printed in a style worthy of Robinson's achievement. It also renews the opportunity to scan some of the problems and qualities of Robinson's art. Certain of these have received sufficient emphasis: the character types, the habits of the Maine mind, the psychological superiority of the Arthurian re-creations, the obliquity of vision, the irony of tone, the insistent paradox, and the ruminative evasions. What remains to be determined is the contribution Robinson made to the resources of poetry itself, especially to the kinds in which he specialized. Working in established forms—dramatic monologue and dialogue, descriptive and reflective lyric, narrative, commentary, and elegy—he took as his chief problem the rescue of these from sentimental and rhetorical decadence through a realism at once psychological and verbal, coupled with a subtlety commensurate with the modern critical sensibility. His experiments can only be suggested here.

---

* The Collected Poems of Edwin Arlington Robinson. The Macmillan Company. $3.

In style his chief importance appears to lie in what he did to correct the excesses of symbolism and romantic allegory; to bring the intellect back to poetry, shorn of its ponderous and derivative philosophical machinery; and to make subtle and precise distinctions of inference and judgment acceptable among poets. This was an important service, and to emphasize it is to show how mistaken was his friend Moody's ambition, and how instinctively wise was Robinson's. Another corrective element in his work shows in his resistance to the prophetic aims of Whitman. His native strain of pragmatic skepticism was the source of this aversion, but it was as truly prompted by his tragic sense of the folly inherent in the prophetic arrogance of his age and in the "concept of infinity" upon which Americans battened—and by his conviction of the violent results to which such incendiarism would lead. It is not for nothing that defeat and disgrace daunt his conquerors and men of action, while madmen, quietists, and hermits alone appear to have worked out a salvation for themselves. A third element of importance in Robinson's narratives involves his dramatic method and brings him into conjunction with the developments in fiction during his lifetime, with its tendency away from naturalistic documentation and its approach to the abstraction of motive and idea. I believe that the special cast of Robinson's plots and conflicts has not been accurately defined. When it is, a much more intelligent estimate of his style and dramatic properties will be possible, his relation to the experiments of James, Meredith, and Conrad will be apparent, and his contribution to modern dramatic invention will be impressive. These matters deserve attention as much as the ironic humor of his characters, the rich effects of lyric beauty of which he was capable, and the isolated superiority of his role in modern poetry. It is a superiority both honorable and enviable, but it should not be exaggerated to the extent of dividing him too roughly either from the events amid which he lived or from the aesthetic activities and reforms in which he played a far more conspicuous part than is commonly supposed.

BOOKS

"Imitate Him if You Dare"

JONATHAN SWIFT. By Bertram Newman. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

BIOGRAPHERS of Swift, from his own day to the present, have been all sorts of people: scholars, noble lords, adventuresses, and men of letters. Their subject's scorn, had he lighted on a few of their productions, can be imagined. "Adversaries and friends, apologists and detractors, serious witnesses as well as fantastic liars" have had their turn at dissecting the complex man who all his life was the sworn enemy of sentiment and cant. In the last ten years we have been presented with Swift the complete egoist, by Rossi and Hone; Swift, an inverted Sir James Barrie, by Aldous Huxley; and Swift the rather mythical Irish patriot, by Yeats. Scholarship and a more equable and better-natured general approach are now, according to all indications, about to have their day in dealing with Swift's "mystery."

The present biography is written by a professional biographer "fascinated" by his material. Mr. Newman is by no means, however, one of the romantic critics, execrated by Pons, who seek in Swift only a brilliant series of antitheses (lumière et ténèbres . . . bassesse et héroïsme . . .). His respect for Swift is profound, and he even tenders him pity and affection, emotions kept from the author of the fourth book of "Gulliver," and the lover of Stella and Vanessa, by many. He is particularly good on Swift's short, complicated success as a party pleader in London; his later career as the embittered but "smart Dean" of St. Patrick's (who took a practical stand for Ireland against England, and dealt with the poor of his parish in a sensible fashion); his championship of Irish politics ("The Drapier Letters"); his preoccupation with "trifles," after the death of Stella; and his final senility ("not madness"). The diagnosis, made fifty years ago, of Swift's malady as Ménière's disease is here confirmed. And Newman brings out, with much skill, both the native qualities of Swift's mind and the coloring it took over from its age.

Recent discussions have shed a more clinical and detached light over the chronicle of Swift's relations with Stella, Vanessa, and, earlier, Varina (Miss Waring). "It was his trade to deal in mysteries," Bolingbroke said of Swift, and "to live by stealth" was a self-confessed axiom of Swift's life. That it was also a symptom of his spirit's sickness is now becoming increasingly clear. The old explanations of impotence and concealed syphilis are giving place to a more simple and credible explanation drawn from the known facts concerning his psychological reactions from young manhood on. His nature, fundamentally characterized by sincerity, affection, and ambition, was baffled by his defective use of emotion. He wrote, after his mother's death: "I have now lost my last barrier between me and death." But he lived, for most of his life, behind another barrier, this time between him and complete adult life: his neurotic dependence on Stella. He tortured, with the alternate coldness and coyness of the man who will not take upon himself love's responsibilities, the one woman with whom he shared adult passion (and that Vanessa drew him at least into the borders of this normal region her letters to him, and his to her, prove). Every generation produces men whose abhorrence of marriage, for purely psychological reasons, is as complete as Swift's. A man of Swift's intensity and intellectual caliber naturally lifts the type to a heroic level and occasions more tragedy than usual.

Swift childishly lacked magnanimity in his hatreds, tended toward avarice and obsessional order, and was thoroughly obsessed by a double attitude (repulsion and fascination) toward filth. But the extraordinary fact that faces us is this: that in spite of his warped, incomplete, and, in some senses, degraded emotional side, he nevertheless presents to us the figure of a whole man, who expended himself nobly and completely. For he was capable of humor and generosity, as well as of hatred and inhumanly bitter rage. If we have any doubts concerning the quality of his heart or mind, we have only to go to his superb prose style. There, as Johnson admitted, "he always understands himself, and his reader always understands him."

A writer who breeds controversy and multiple biographies often suffers the disservice of not being read. Mr. Newman's well-tempered and well-written book should send the reader back to Swift's works and, when it appears, to the definitive edition of his fine but neglected poems. And a glance at Yeats's translation of "the greatest epitaph in history" has its tonic effect.

LOUISE BOGAN

The Apotheosis of Mr. K*a*p*l*a*n

THE EDUCATION OF H*Y*M*A*N K*A*P*L*A*N. By Leonard Q. Ross. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

I HOPE it is not really necessary to explain that Hyman Kaplan is that member of a beginner's class in English for Adults whose exploits have been described in the pages of the New Yorker. It was not so very many months ago that he first burst upon a world until then fortunate in not knowing how much it was missing, but he has already become an established institution, and there must be thousands who weekly open their copies of the journal which irregularly chronicles his doings with that dreadful kind of anticipation which is afraid to hope lest disappointment should prove too much to bear. Either the glad cry, "Mr. Kaplan is here again," rings out or, as happens more often than not, the world seems empty, this brave o'erhanging firmament no more than a pestilential congregation of vapors.

Of his creator I know nothing, but I call him a creator rather than a historian because I am confident—whatever rumors to the contrary may be circulating—that H*y*m*a*n K*a*p*l*a*n is essentially a creation; that nothing so rounded and complete and self-consistent exists in the realm of nature. Perhaps he had an original. Perhaps Nature, after her usual fashion, sketched him roughly out. But it is equally true and as little significant that a Sir John Falstaff once lived or that a man once spent some years alone on the island of Juan Fernandez.

Mr. Kaplan's intellectual and spiritual greatness is many-sided yet integrated. Of course the most obvious aspect of his genius is the sheer daring and the imaginative grandeur of his errors in English. What other mind could hold with confidence that the plural of "table" is "furniture" or that the adjective "good" is compared: "Good, batter, high-class"? But Mr. Kaplan is much more than merely a man whose ignorance of our language is a creative opportunity. His is a complex character, frightening in its imperturbable solidity. The vague but perpetual smile, the dreadfully ingenious logic, the self-satisfaction which can congratulate itself upon the magnitude of his errors when errors have to be admitted, the benevolence which yields to God-like scorn only when his supremacy is challenged—all these are not only present and consistent but form a whole which sprang into such complete existence when he was first introduced to the public that subsequent instalments of his history have only served to unfold fully what was implicit and inevitable. Indeed, I doubt if it would be possible to explain without recourse to the theories of the Gestalt psychology just why each of his characteristics is dependent upon each of the others and at the same time adds to it in such a way as to force upon one the conclusion that here (as in all great personalities) the whole is something more than the sum of the parts and that a uniqueness is emergent.

Even from the examples given above it must be evident that, at their best, Mr. Kaplan's errors are not mere errors. He is grasping an idea and he is pursuing a logic certainly outside of and perhaps above the mere conventions of language. Who can deny that several tables are "furniture"; and if, in the language which he is accustomed to hear, "high-class" expresses the highest degree of approval, why is it not for him the superlative of "good"—especially in an age which, having in general succumbed to the conception of "frames of reference," is inconsistently attempting to maintain an absolutist theory of language. It is all this which makes Mr. Kaplan so redoubtable an adversary of the patient teacher, Mr. Parkhill. What if Mr. Kaplan, enraptured by Shakespeare and in a state of tragic elevation, is so carried away as to translate "a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing" into "a tale told by an ijiot, full of funny sounds and phooy"? He had the idea without a doubt. And who can say that the language he used was not, for him, more simple, sensuous, and passionate than the imperfectly comprehended idiom of Shakespeare?

But to return to the question of the sources of Kaplan, of the extent to which he is art rather than nature. I hazard the guess that the creator is really a teacher of English to foreigners and that some of Mr. Kaplan's sallies (perhaps in less perfect form) were actually made by a man of flesh and blood. But I suspect that the perfect whole is more the product of the author's fears, of his nightmares, perhaps, than it is of his observations; that Mr. Kaplan is one of those terrible figures which teachers conjure up, the essence of all that is at once unteachable and unbeatable. Myself when young was more than once haunted in sleep by visions of a classroom rebellion on a scale that few teachers have ever seen realized. Mr. Ross, I suspect, has never had, in real life, more than fleeting glimpses of the Mr. Kaplan who might conceivably some day arise if all that is mysterious and perverse in the minds of those with whom we cannot communicate should be embodied in one bland monster.

The fact that the New Yorker sketches (but slightly if at all modified) have now appeared in book form may mean that the saga has reached its end, and one hardly knows what to say. It would be a pity to see Mr. Kaplan decline like the Falstaff of the "Merry Wives." But it is also hard to imagine a world without him. I at least shall feel, not that he has ceased to exist, but that through some calamity I have ceased to hear of the stupendous yet justifiable blunders which he is somewhere still making in obedience to the laws of his being. Mr. Kaplan is hieratic. His mistakes belong to the ages and were made forever because they were never made at all. A malapropism is at its feeblest a mere error, and at its best merely a sort of bull. For me at least all really profound and imaginative misuses of language will henceforth be kaplanisms of a more or less accomplished sort.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Mental Illness in America

THE MENTALLY ILL IN AMERICA. By Albert Deutsch. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

THIS scholarly yet very readable account of the care and treatment of the mentally ill in America since colonial times is welcome after the highly subjective memoirs by recent writers on the subject. In addition to a description of treatment methods and the attitude of physicians and the public toward the mentally sick, it has only one thing else in common with the more "popular" studies in this genre. It carries throughout a certain melioristic or humanitarian tone which can best be expressed in such terms as this: The people do not understand the mentally sick, and since the well must care for the sick this failure increases suffering and delays recovery. Deutsch makes it clear that this ignorance has decreased enormously in the past one hundred and fifty years; and it is significant that, with a single exception, none of the latest accounts of mental illness has endeavored to set forth any horrors of confinement in psychiatric hospitals, but the advantages and benefits. This is in sharp contrast with the epoch-making book of Clifford Beers and other earlier books, and corresponds to the enormous development in the technique, provisions, and attitudes of psychiatric hospitals today over those of thirty, fifty, and a hundred years ago.

Deutsch goes into some detail regarding the mistreatment of the mentally ill in earlier times, and traces the various trends in personalities connected with the metamorphosis into the modern psychiatric hospital. It is rather amusing to recall in this connection that the recommendation that state hospitals raise the wage scale so that a better type of attendant could be attracted to this work was made one hundred and thirty-four years ago (1803) by Benjamin Rush and has been repeated many times since. He also gives appropriate consideration to the personalities, the social trends, and the legal enactments which determined the theories at the various stages in psychiatric development.

The book is well written, well documented, accurate in detail, and avoids the fault of being too long. In the reviewer's opinion, the work of Sigmund Freud and Ernest Southard has been rather slighted in favor of more emphasis upon one or two other psychiatrists less representative. The work of the legal committee of the American Psychiatric Association is quoted without credit or reference, and the work of Lawson Lowrey and David Levy in developing child-guidance clinics is not mentioned. A more fundamental objection is that although in the earlier chapters the importance of private psychiatric hospitals in the development of psychiatry in America is made very clear, they seem to have disappeared from the author's vision in the later chapters, which are concerned entirely with state hospitals. The research work now being carried on by some of the private institutions which he so lauds in the earlier chapters is not mentioned. This tendency to assume that psychiatric treatment is synonymous with state-hospital treatment is a popular fallacy, and it is regrettable that Deutsch should have allowed himself to fall into it.

KARL A. MENNINGER

The Cult of Violence

FORCE OR REASON: ISSUES OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY. By Hans Kohn. Harvard University Press. $1.50.

THE nineteenth century was dominated by faith in man and reason. It was the right of every man to think for himself and act as his own lawgiver. To be sure, there was no lack in the nineteenth century of philosophies which reminded man that there are still existent within him powerful irrational forces; but rationalism was predominant. Today the cult of reason is challenged by the cult of violence. The darker forces within the human soul have come to be exalted as factors important in the making of history. Reason is reviled, and the technical discoveries of reason are employed for diabolical purposes. Professor Kohn's book cogently describes the conflict between force and reason which dislocates present-day society, its origins in European intellectual history, and its probable implications. He remains, however, an optimist and is unwilling to believe that the breakdown of our civilization is possible. Yet a great civilization—that of the Roman world—broke down during the third century; and there is no certainty that our civilization will not succumb to the onslaughts of new barbarians. I do not say that the believers in reason are fighting a lost battle. I do say that neither the victory of reason nor the victory of force can be taken for granted. The outcome will depend on the stubbornness of the fighters and on unpredictable events over which the human will has no control. And there is no need to believe in victory either in order to start the fight or to persevere in it.

GAETANO SALVEMINI

For those who keep abreast of world affairs

Europe in Arms By Liddell Hart

When war comes, who will win? . . The world's leading military expert and commentator here tells in detail how each European power is rearming, and speculates authoritatively on the probable nature of the next war. With a special final chapter on the military lessons of the Spanish Civil War. $2.50

The Life and Death of a Spanish Town

by Elliot Paul. America's new non-fiction best-seller. The profoundly moving story of the people of Santa Eulalia, who wanted only peace . . . and what happened to them when the Blackshirts came. $2.50.

RANDOM HOUSE, N Y

Poictesme Back to the Soil

THE SONG OF THE WORLD. By Jean Giono. Translated by Henri Fluchère and Geoffrey Myers. The Viking Press. $2.50.

WITH a certain sound of trumpets we are told that Mr. Giono is "one of the giants of modern French letters." It develops that Mr. Giono is a giant who is extremely weary of modern French letters. "The present time disgusts me, even to describe. It is sufficient merely to endure it." The human race, he adds in a distinctive phrase, has been plunged into a horrible mediocrity by "civilization, philosophers, public speakers, and gossips." Mr. Giono has therefore set out to write a story of adventure in which there is to be nothing timely, of those healthy and clean primitive people who alone know the world's joy and sorrow, and in an altogether new setting: new mountains, a new river—"a country, forest, snow, and men all new."

I do not object to this. If by now Rousseau's wooded trail has become a sort of boulevard, the journey is still legitimate—though perhaps the briefer the parting manifesto, the better. It is unfortunate, however, that Mr. Giono's desire for everything all new should lead only to an incongruous mixture of the old. "The Song of the World" is in reality a highly sophisticated symbolic romance grafted on to the simple saga of the earth. It is a superstructure of cultured fantasy on a base of primal nature. It is rather as if Mr. Cabell were to write a "Growth of the Soil"; it is Poictesme gone earthy.

Between these two regions Mr. Giono's characters waver. Gina, the daughter of formidable Maudru and the occasion of much bloodshed, fire, and death, is simply a replica of many other lovely, acrid, and unhappy literary ladies; she is in fact too reminiscent of the Trojan Helen. Clara, Mr. Giono's blind heroine of the fields, is nevertheless well versed in the technics of civilized romance; she obeys the formalities dutifully. Antonio, Mr. Giono's superman of action, catches pike with his hands, screams like an animal in the joy of health and virility, engages in combat with congers, is a great lover, and participates in other strenuous activities with an appalling ease, yet he is capable of refined, even extreme, sensibilities.

When Mr. Giono is dealing with his setting, however, he attains a power and a reality never felt in his chief characters. In his descriptions of the mountains and forests of the Rebeillard country, of the river as it comes from the mountain gorges, in the scenes dealing with animal life, Mr. Giono's writing is marked with less artifice, more genuine sympathy and contact with his material, and a more convincingly robust feeling for the earth's fertility. One seldom meets, indeed, so many foxes, ducks, pheasant-hens, bitches, eagles, hazel-grouse, owls, stallions, and bulls within the pages of an ordinary novel. When Mr. Giono talks of childbirth all nature seems in labor; when Mr. Giono talks of sickness it is in terms of plague. Yet this fecundity and extravagance are not unsuited to the naturalist, and it is these descriptions and the portraits of countryside characters and customs—tavern scenes, the glittering, snow-bound village days, the rejoicing and ceremonial games of the village people in spring, the tanners, drovers, and grave-diggers—which give the book a lyricism and an interest of regional atmosphere despite the action.

An ability to create atmosphere, however, while it is a necessary part of a writer's equipment, does not make a great novelist. "The Song of the World" is more interesting as an evidence of both Mr. Giono's talent and his deficiencies than for its intrinsic value. Mr. Giono should not allow himself to be misled by the epithets of "elemental," "primitive," "pagan," and "epic" which seem to be thick in the air around him; he should fasten his present powers to the novelist's familiar task of creating characters for his atmosphere, rather than to the contrivance of more adventure stories all new.

MAXWELL GEISMAR

Poems in Trench-Mortar Time

AND SPAIN SINGS. . . . Edited by M. J. Benardete and Rolfe Humphries. Vanguard Press. $1.

THESE ballads and poems of the Spanish revolution are traditional folk poetry, written to be sung in the trenches. Fifty American poets have adapted them, and even in English, which cannot, it appears, quite convey the rhyme and swing of the Spanish forms, they are very interesting. The theme is, of course, patriotic faith in the Loyalist cause. The subject matter ranges from sentimental ditties of olive groves and a peaceful life destroyed to rousing songs of hatred of the fascists; and some are very bawdy lampoons about the kind of fellows fascists really are. Several have to do with the death of one of Spain's finest modern poets, Federico Garcia Lorca, executed by the fascists in 1936.

In general, and without having seen the originals, but with some knowledge of Spanish poetry, I should say that Rolfe Humphries's several translations are the best in the book. Other poets, including Edna Millay, George Dillon, Muriel Rukeyser, Genevieve Taggard, and William Carlos Williams, have done admirable work in adapting the verse to English. If there is no very great poetry here (and there is none of very high technical skill) there is certainly the resounding song of a people, the expression of a country charged with folk fighting for their existence. The translators had to English whatever manuscript was given them, and naturally some got better material than did others. Most of these poems evidently have appeared only in popular magazines in Spain. The material was made available in this country through the efforts of the League of American Writers and the sister-organization in Spain.

EDA LOU WALTON

DANCE

Bennington Festival

IN four brief summers Bennington, Vermont, has become an American center nationally known. The Bennington College School of the Dance, with which we are here concerned, in its festival of August 12 to 14 assembled an audience from Ohio, Utah, California, and intermediate points, and will send out 160 new students and teachers this season as far west as Hawaii. From the factional quarrels with the ballet Martha Hill of New York University and Bennington College and Mary Jo Shelly of the University of Chicago have taken all the pieces that constituted the modern dance and welded them into a perceptual unity. In this process, beginning in 1934, they have made possible the creation of new dancers, new choreographers, new major works, and

INSTRUCTION

IT'S FUN TO WRITE!

It's fun to write short stories, articles, [illegible] plays, etc.—and profitable, too, [illegible] witness the [illegible]plishments of [illegible] students. If [illegible] have the urge to write—and want to start—you will be [illegible] in our book CAREERS IN WRITING—absolutely FREE. CAREERS IN WRITING deals exhaustively with every phase of the writing field, and indicates the money-making opportunities in each. Send a postcard today, requesting your free copy. Write promptly!

U. S. SCHOOL OF WRITING
[illegible] West 60th St. Dept. 57 New York City

WRITERS SERVICE

DOES YOUR WRITING SUCCEED as it should? Intelligent, sincere students consider my help invaluable. ROBERT L. NEWMAN, 251 West 71st Street, New York City.

LANGUAGES

Language Phone Sets
Bought, sold, rented, exchanged. Language Service, 507-5th Ave. MUr. 2-4221.

SYMPHONIC RECORDS

MUSIC LOVERS 100,000 of the finest records in the world on sale at 50c and 75c per record (value $1.50 and $2). The Symphonies, Chamber Music, Operas, etc., of Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart,, Wagner, etc. Mail Orders. Catalog. The Gramophone Shop, Inc., 18 E. 48th St., New York.

THE WAR IN SPAIN

As a result of his observations at the Spanish front Louis Fischer has written a 56-page booklet, none of which has ever appeared in print before, analyzing the social and economic background of the war, discussing the progress of the fighting to date, and explaining the international significance of the struggle. The booklet is published by The Nation at 10c a copy.

Every progressive should read it! To order, send your dime to The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

Coming back to TOWN?

If you subscribe to The Nation and expect to move soon, please give us three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new. We ask this to assure uninterrupted delivery of copies to you.

Write to The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

RESORTS

Uncas Lodge

Plays — Activities
Directed by
JESS KIMMER
N.Y.U. Dramatic Soc.

TENNIS
directed by Murray Pincus
[illegible] major sport of
UNCAS LODGE
UNCASVILLE, CONN.

- Fast Clay Tennis Courts
- Private Twin Lakes
- Boating — Fishing
- Handball — Ping Pong
- Orchestra for Dancing

Informal atmosphere

RATE: $24.50 per week
Labor Day Week-end, $5 Per Day
MANAGEMENT: DIANA and ABE BERMAN
Phone: Norwich 1858—Ring 5
New York: PResident 3-8649

5 DAYS!
LABOR DAY WEEK-END
Friday noon to Tuesday noon!
Sports, fun, entertainment, masque ball, banquet.
18.75

COOKS FALLS LODGE
COOKS FALLS, NEW YORK
N. Y. Office—250 W. 57th St.
Phone COlumbus 5-3690
RESERVE NOW!

• • • • • • • • • • • •

SHUSTIN'S LOCUST MANOR

unexcelled cuisine—complete social and [illegible] activities—tennis—handball—two acre swimming pool—dance orchestra—entertainment—golf—etc.

Phone or Write
R.F.D. Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 1198-3012

• • • • • • • • • • • •

SPEND LABOR DAY WEEK
AND THE HIGH HOLIDAYS AT CAMP CARLISLE
On Sylvan Lake
Hopewell Junction, N.Y.—65 miles from New York
SPECIAL RATES: $20 [illegible] week—$4 [illegible] day—
$14 four-day week-end
Swimming . . Golf . . Horseback . . Field and Water Sports . . Dietary Laws Observed
Make Your Reservations Now

DENTAL INSTRUCTION

Dentist and associate staff will conduct a limited class for intensive training as dental technicians (mechanical dentists). Box 945, c/o The Nation. State age, education, occupation.

TUTORING

Full time day tutoring. Grammar school grades. Five boys. Individual attention. Assured progress. Hot lunches. Outdoor exercise. Home delivery. Jerome Silverstein, 118 Riverside Drive.

POSITION WANTED

PH.D. psychology; man, 29; 6 years experience two state universities, teachers college; desires opportunity to TEACH in liberal institution; marked interest social field, measurement. Box 944, c/o The Nation

COUNTRY BOARD WANTED

Young man, writer, seeking year-round home, quiet farm within 200 miles N. Y., as paying guest with congenial middle age couple. Box 946, c/o The Nation.

RESORTS

In the Heart
OF THE ADIRONDACKS
Most beautiful summer resort
9 Hole Golf Course on premises
9 Clay Tennis Courts
8 Handball Courts
SCAROON MANOR
on SCHROON LAKE N.Y. half mile
sandy beach

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG
N. Y.

COLORFUL
CONGENIAL
COMFORTABLE
RATE $27.50 UP
Echo Lake Tavern
WARRENSBURG, N. Y.
City Tel. VAnderbilt 3-9875

The Fieldstone on Round Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and recreation in the heart of the Ramapo Mountains, one hour from New York.

Swimming, boating, tennis, riding, golf [illegible] other sports

P. O. BOX 297
MONROE, N. Y.

TELEPHONE:
MONROE 2501

A descriptive folder will be [illegible] at your request
By Reservation Only

HUNTS-BROOK LODGE
OAKDALE, CONNECTICUT

600 acres with natural lakes and swimming pool. Offers the following camp activities: Tennis, Table tennis, Badminton, Swimming, Boating, Fishing, Riding, Handball, Dramatics, Dancing, etc.

Excellent Cuisine—Special attention given to building-up and reducing by experienced dietitian—An abundance of fresh fruits and vegetables.

RATES: $22.50 — $25.00 WEEKLY

P. O. Address:
New London, Conn.
Tel. N. L. 7226

City Address:
22 Buckingham Rd., Bklyn.
Tel. BU. 4-7400

Carefree! Friendly! Informal!
LAKE CHODIKEE LODGE
• • • HIGHLAND, N. Y.

Features: * * * John Hampshire, Jr., Broadway Director as Director of Resident Theatre Group * * * Irving Davidson, Noted Humorist and Lecturer as Director of Daily Open Air University * * * Complete [illegible] [illegible] and athletic activities * * * [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] are waiting for you. Phone Iven H. Gordon, Bachelor Director, for full details.
Free transportation by boat for [illegible] weeks' vacationist. [illegible] for details.

GALA LABOR DAY CELEBRATION
[illegible] full days $18.50
4 full days $22.50
N. Y. C.: 1202 Kings Highway, B'klyn, ES. 5-4330

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL
37 MINUTES TIMES SQUARE
MAKE THIS YOUR SUMMER HOME
Recreational Facilities, Solarium Singles $8 up
SHeepshead [illegible]

new audiences for what was once a maligned and upstart art.

Four dancers who were and still are the most important in America were chosen to head the teaching staff. They are Martha Graham, Doris Humphrey, Hanya Holm, and Charles Weidman. In 1935 the Theater Workshop was added to the general program, and in 1936 a department of choreography and one in music for the dance. For the first time this season fellowships were granted to three promising young dancers, whose time was free from the restrictions of teaching and whose sole purpose was the creation of new compositions, using members of the student body and employing all the facilities available in the theater. Music was written for these works and costumes designed within the six-week period. The first three dancers so chosen were Anna Sokolow, Esther Junger, and José Limon.

The festival opened with a joint performance by the Fellows. Esther Junger presented a marriage ceremonial called Festive Rites (Mamorsky) with José Limon and group. Both she and Mr. Limon danced brilliantly, moving with grave gaiety through a composition that was built with the utmost clarity and simplicity. Even without recalling that this was Miss Junger's first attempt at group composition, it was an achievement of first rank. José Limon's Danza de la Muerte (Clark and Lloyd), composed of two sarabands separated by three solos, was inspired by the present conflict in Spain. The sarabands (for the dead and for the living) and the third solo, Ave, were particularly effective, containing many beautiful passages of restrained movement that colored the contrasting moods of acceptance and defiance. Anna Sokolow depicted the absolutes decreed by a dictatorship in her Façade—Esposizione Italiana (North). The group, decadent in costume and movement, formed a moving tableau, full of biting comment and dissolute madness. Against this façade Miss Sokolow passed as a somber figure of annunciation. Motion was reduced to a minimum, yet she was able to dominate the entire dance magnificently by the sheer force of her personality.

Hanya Holm's presentation of the Workshop production, Trend, on the following two nights concluded the festival. This was Miss Holm's first concert appearance in the East and was received with thunderous applause. The theme here was of large dimensions, picturing "the progress of man's survival when the usages of living have lost their meaning and he has fallen into routine patterns of conformity." The work as a whole was somewhat incomplete, lacking the definitive period to the beginning Resurgence, but there was no lack of breath-taking passages of movement. Of the several sections, Episodes was the most integrated and cruelly biting.

When further tightened and integrated it should be able to sustain the excitement it arouses only in sections now. Miss Holm made excellent use of the platforms and steps, and gave a breathing quality to the stage space by her expert shuttling of line-units within the group: individual against group, two against three, four against four, in a continual forming and dissolving. It established Miss Holm as a choreographer on the high plane she has occupied as a teacher. The music was by Wallingford Riegger, except for the last section, which used Varese's Ionization, which was almost too overpowering for the size of the auditorium.

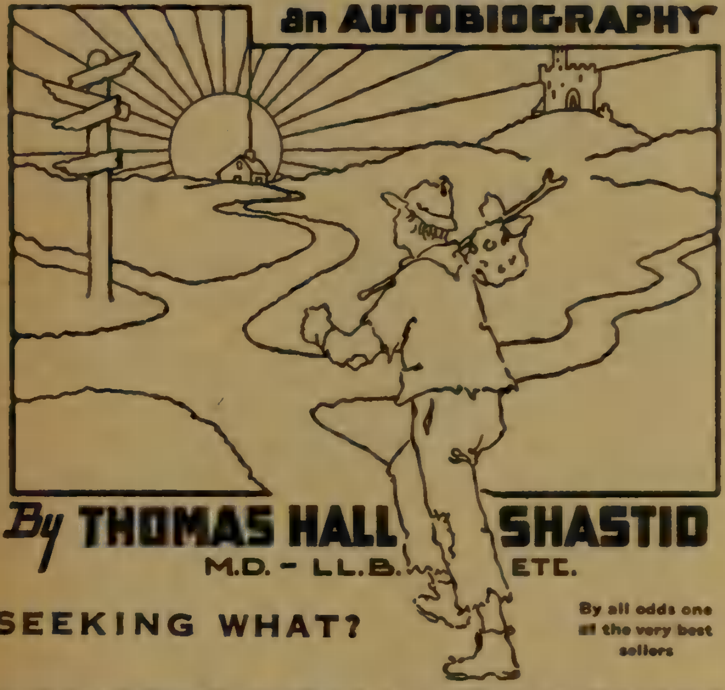
Both concerts are a brilliant finale to the four years. They push the modern dance many years ahead of where it might have been without Bennington, acquaint one with three more than promising new choreographers, and leave one with the hope that other Fellows may be afforded this testing ground.

PAUL LOVE

BOOKS

TRAMPING TO FAILURE

an AUTOBIOGRAPHY



By THOMAS HALL SHASTID
M.D. - LL.B. ETC.

SEEKING WHAT?

By all odds one [illegible] the very best sellers

An old-time physician, all round student [illegible] universities, peace-worker and novelist takes the reader on an entrancing tour through the [illegible] of his questing life.

The innermost phases of medical practice shown without the slightest reserve.

A strangely human story—one crowded with incident, absurdity, wit and humor, wildly enthusiastic scholarship, heroism, picturesque extravagances, and—like almost all true autobiographies—inevitable and final defeat—though, often, defeat which some might call success.

RATTLING GOOD FUN!

Price, postpaid, $4.00. On Strathmore All-Rag Permanent Paper, $6.00.

GEORGE WAHR Publisher and Bookseller [illegible] the University [illegible] Michigan . . . ANN ARBOR, MICHIGAN

All Books of All Publishers, Domestic and Foreign, [illegible] Favorable Prices

TRAVEL

See the SOVIET UNION ON PARADE
at the celebration of its 20TH ANNIVERSARY

Join Our Special Trips
30 days—all inclusive $240
40 days—all inclusive $275
Third Class on Atlantic

For details and folders apply
COMPASS TRAVEL BUREAU
55 WEST 42nd St., N. Y. C. LOng. 5-3070

U.S.S.R. 20TH ANNIVERSARY
NOVEMBER 7th CELEBRATION

See SOVIET RUSSIA—this year of all years—a memorable tour under the experienced guidance of J. N. Golos, manager of World Tourists, Inc. Visiting London, Copenhagen, Helsingfors, Leningrad, Moscow, Kharkov, Yalta, Odessa, Kiev and Paris.

$280 UP

WORLD TOURISTS, INC. 175 5th AVE., N. Y. C.
AL 4-6656

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 4, 1937 NUMBER 10

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 229

EDITORIALS:

CAN JAPAN BE STOPPED? 231
THE U. A. W. MAKES HISTORY 232
SMOOTH-BOY MELLON 232
SCUTTLING THE WPA 233
A THIRD PARTY FOR 1940? by Max Lerner 234
MADRID'S FOREIGN DEFENDERS by Louis Fischer 235
THE NEW DEAL IN MEXICO by L. O. Prendergast 237
A. F. OF L. VERSUS SEATTLE LABOR by Cole Stevens 239
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 241

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

ESCAPE TO THE PRESENT INDICATIVE by Franz Höllering 242
CORRUPTION'S POET by Joseph Wood Krutch 243
BELLY-BUMPS, BIBLE-CLASS, ETC. by George Genzmer 243
YOU READ AS YOU PLEASE by Philip Rahv 244
OVERCROWDED JAPAN by Miriam S. Farley 245
A WREATH FOR LAWRENCE by William Gilmore 246
FILMS: THE NOVELIST AS HERO by Mark Van Doren 246
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 247

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER

Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editor MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

*

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

*

THE HORROR OF THE UNDECLARED WAR IN the Far East comes close to the centers of power when a British ambassador is nearly killed in a wanton machine-gun attack by Japanese aviators. A protest is inevitable, and the words of outraged authority may unintentionally voice the rights of voiceless millions. After reciting the facts of the attack on the British official car and the wounding of Sir Hughe Knatchbull-Hugessen, the British note to the Japanese government "requests the fullest measure of redress." It then goes on to establish the legal grounds for its protest, asserting "it is one of the oldest and best-established rules of international law that direct or deliberate attacks on noncombatants are absolutely prohibited, whether inside or outside the area in which hostilities are taking place. . . . The foreign, even the diplomatic, status of the occupants [of the car] is also irrelevant. The real issue is that they were noncombatants." And so it is. And so were the thousands of Chinese civilians living in working-class quarters, without arms, outside the area of battle, who are now dead under the rain of Japanese bombs and shells. If the British government's sharp words could check the mass illegality of the Japanese attack they would serve a great purpose. But we have little hope that they will do more than wring from unwilling officials in Tokyo a grudging apology for a single unfortunate incident.

*

THE BOMBS DROPPED BY CHINESE AIRPLANES on the American liner President Hoover are in a somewhat different category, though, to be sure, it is no less painful to be hit by an unintended bomb than by one launched in malice. The Chinese have anticipated the State Department's protest, moreover, with a prompt and full apology and an offer of redress. This, of course, does not dispose of the matter except diplomatically. But the incident is not to be confused with the "direct and deliberate attacks" on civilians discussed in the British note. If it proves anything, it is the extreme unwisdom of allowing foreign passenger liners to go into waters infested with fighting ships and planes. The decision of the American government henceforth to evacuate refugees in naval vessels should prevent future similar accidents. And meanwhile it is to be hoped that the Chinese aviators will have learned to distinguish the funnel marks of American passenger liners.

The NATION, Published weekly at 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered [illegible] second-class matter December 18, 18[illegible] at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879.

NO PEACE PACTS HAVE BEEN MADE BY THE President with his reactionary foes, not even in the speeches of Jim Farley, which once more breathe fire. Every sign points to an unflinching firmness of policy on Mr. Roosevelt's part. His recent utterances have been notable for two things. One is that they bring out more and more openly the alliance between big finance and the corporation lawyers. The second is that they stand squarely for the principle of majority rule as against minorities in and out of the government who are trying to obstruct the processes of social change. They show, moreover, a complete confidence in the final verdict that the majority will return when it has a chance. We have little doubt that Mr. Roosevelt is justified in his confidence so far as the issue lies between the New Deal and its enemies. Even on the question of court reform we believe that the people would approve the message that accompanied the President's signature to the act revising the procedure of the lower federal courts—if the inadequacies of the act as judicial reform could really be brought home to them. To explain that issue and the other major issues of the wage-hour bill, the crop-control program, and the power-resources program should be the President's task when he makes his trip to the Pacific Coast. We take it that this trip is now definitely planned, since the Boettigers' own Post-Intelligencer has announced that the President will visit Seattle. But a swing around the country should be only a preface to a special session of Congress in which the above measures, along with an anti-lynching bill and a revision of the neutrality laws, must be discussed. We suspect that the members of Congress will return to Washington feeling a bit chastened by contact with their constituents.

*

MUNICIPAL POLITICS IS NOT THE SIMPLE thing it used to be. Once a mayoralty campaign was a question of which candidate had the strongest machine or which gave the greatest promise of decent local government. But the present race to capture New York's City Hall shows the antiquated nature of such a notion. What started as a choice between an honest and progressive local administration under LaGuardia and a revival of Tammany corruption is now a whirlpool of national issues, international doctrines, and worldwide prejudices. LaGuardia would like nothing better than a straightforward knock-down battle with Tammany; Jim Farley's candidate, Jeremiah T. Mahoney, is bent on forcing another test of the national New Deal; and the presence of Senator Copeland has succeeded in making the fight another skirmish in the far-flung war between fascists and Communists. The New York Nazis have official instructions to vote for Copeland, and local Communists have equally explicit orders to vote for LaGuardia. On the whole, we agree with LaGuardia in viewing the issue primarily as one of good government, but we can readily see how this issue mirrors the broader movements of the world at large. For good local government today inevitably implies the willingness and the intelligence to deal sympathetically with labor. This is of the utmost importance, since a reactionary city regime could use its police force to smash picket lines, break up opposition party meetings, and in general bring physical destruction to any radical or militant trade-union movement. The lines drawn in New York, in short, are the same as the lines drawn in every other city of the United States and, for that matter, throughout the world.

*

EVERY FALL THE NAZIS HOLD A PARTY congress at Nürnberg. It is the biggest show of the year in Germany, and Nazi spellbinders annually outdo each other in tirades against democracy, contempt for religious freedom, and rampant incitement to further persecution of the Jews—all against a background of military pageantry and racial mysticism. Now all this should be strictly the business of the Nazis, and it would be if the German government had the slightest sense of propriety. But it hasn't, and every September it invites the diplomatic corps at Berlin to come to Nürnberg and hear their countries and their beliefs lampooned and denounced. So far the ambassadors of the United States, Great Britain, and France have sensibly found it inconvenient to be present to receive the insults of the Nazis in person. But Sir Neville Henderson, Britain's recently appointed ambassador to Berlin, finds this state of things embarrassing. Consequently he has, with the true British gift for compromise, worked out a formula. Instead of receiving official government invitations, the envoys of the three great democracies, through Sir Neville's intervention, will henceforth be asked to hear the new Meistersingers of Nürnberg as personal guests of the Führer. This craven and wholly unnecessary concession to Nazi arrogance has the sanction of the American State Department, and Prentiss Gilbert, our chargé d'affaires at Berlin, has been instructed to attend. Secretary Hull should be told bluntly by as many organizations and individuals as possible that the United States has official relations with the German government, not with the Nazi party. Our envoys have no business lending the indorsement of American citizens to the annual Nürnberg hysteria.

*

DESPITE THE LOSS OF SANTANDER AND THE immediate threat to Asturias, the Spanish government made progress during the past week on the military front. The offensive at Saragossa overshadows in importance any drive yet made by the Loyalists. Capture of Saragossa, which is now by no means impossible, would not only give the government control of one of the most important industrial cities of the country but probably lead to the elimination of the Teruel salient and the reopening of a direct line of communication between Barcelona and Madrid. The drive is the first important offensive on the Aragon front since the beginning of the war, and indicates that the problem of cooperation between the Valencia government and the Anarchist militia from Barcelona has at least been partially solved. On the international front the foolish pretense of non-intervention moved on to crude farce. All Italy celebrated the capture of Santander by the legions of Il Duce, while the head of the non-intervention fleet solemnly announced that in nearly six months of operation "no European neutral's vessels had been detected carrying arms to Spain." The one diplomatic gleam of hope lay in Britain's strong protest against the bombing of its ships by rebel pirates.

*

NEWSPAPER READERS WERE STARTLED LAST week by headlines announcing an impending strike of the Railway Brotherhoods. The swiftness and efficiency with which mediation got under way attest the excellence of the machinery of the National Railway Mediation Board. Though the act that created the board fortunately does not demand compulsory mediation, it has become customary in the railway industry for the carriers to maintain the status quo while mediation efforts are being made. For all practical purposes a sixty-day interval elapses between the breaking out of strike trouble and an actual walkout. In the present case the task of the board is unusually difficult. Eighteen of the brotherhoods have already won an agreement providing for a straight five-cent-an-hour increase in wages, but negotiations between the five remaining brotherhoods and the carriers have broken down. These brotherhoods, which represent the operating crews, are holding out for a percentage increase in wages. The interesting thing about this development is the increasing difference it reveals within the ranks of the traditional "aristocrats" of labor. The brotherhoods which have accepted straight wage increases have acted to bridge the gap in the wage differentials between skilled and unskilled workers. The brotherhoods seeking percentage increases still cling to their aristocracy.

*

IN THE HEAVEN OF SALES PROMOTION THE sign on the portals should read "Old Gold." The recent picture-puzzle "contest" must have fulfilled the most fantastic dreams of advertising and publicity men. The P. Lorillard Company, whose Old Gold cigarettes were lagging behind the other standard brands in sales last year, hit on the idea of setting people to solving picture puzzles, and offered $200,000 in the form of prizes. Five million people responded to what became one of the major national hysterias of our day. You couldn't go to a C. I. O. meeting, a Liberty League rally, a drinking party, or a church picnic, without stumbling over people busily engaged trying to put meaning into ninety pictured inanities. The cream of the jest is that 54,000 got a perfect score. There followed two further elimination contests, with the hysteria increasing. Still 8,100 were left, with perfect scores and seeking new worlds to conquer. Finally the judges awarded the thousand prizes, ranging from $100,000 to $10, on the basis of accompanying letters which described the blessings of the contest. Thus what had begun as a challenge to skill, capable of being rated mathematically, ended as a test of literary finesse and hypocrisy. The final winners, we noticed, had a beautiful geographical, sex, and class distribution. Now Old Gold is launching another "BIGGER AND BETTER CARTOON CONTEST." This time there is no pretense of testing your ingenuity. All you have to do is to praise Old Golds in a twelve-word essay. The reign of literature is unchallenged.

Can Japan Be Stopped?

SIX years ago when Japan invaded Manchuria the proper course of action for the United States and the League powers seemed self-evident. Here was a real test of the peace machinery which the world had so laboriously constructed in the post-war years. If the war system was to be replaced by a system of law, the time had arrived for applying the legal penalties for aggression which had been decided upon. The nations talked of collective action but actually they failed to take even the most elementary protective measures.

Today we are reaping the harvest of the procrastination and timidity of that period. We are faced with a threat vastly more serious than that of 1931. But largely as a result of our earlier failure popular faith in the instruments of collective security has almost reached the vanishing-point. With the breakdown of the peace machinery we are plunged once more into a world in which force is unquestionably law. Public opinion throughout the world is still overwhelmingly for peace, but the peace sentiment is either unchanneled or organized in confused and conflicting groups. In this country particularly the peace movement stands in great danger of being captured by those who in the long run are among the greatest enemies of peace, isolationists who would abandon all effort to create an international law and who think only of the immediate—not the ultimate—safety of the United States.

Under the circumstances it is extraordinarily difficult to propose a positive policy for the United States government. To invoke the Neutrality Act would be, as we have said before, of incalculable advantage to Japan and make us partner to the rape of China. Withdrawal of American interests in China would be equivalent to signing those interests over to Japan. As for collective action to check Japan, how can it be invoked or applied? What type of collective measures can we expect Great Britain, France, and the United States to adopt in the present crisis?

It cannot be denied that the Japanese invasion of China and the threatened blockade of Chinese ports offer a direct threat to the economic interests of all the Western powers. The forces which called into being the Nine-Power Pact are just as strong today as on the day it was signed. And the ironic fact remains that the conflict in imperialistic interests has saved China from extinction several times in the past. If it can do so again, there is every reason to invoke the Nine-Power treaty, to summon the signatories of that pact in a new conference to consider joint policy in the Pacific. The United States is obviously the only country in a position to take the initiative in this direction.

What could such a conference do? We can assume that no nation, either individually or in concert with others, would wish to wage war against Japan in defense of China's territorial integrity or of the powers' imperialistic interests. Nor is it likely that any nation would approve another experiment in economic sanctions. A boycott of Japan will have to be left to individuals and labor organizations. But there is a real possibility that if the powers were brought together they would agree in insisting on the treaty rights to trade with China, both now, when no war has been declared, and in the event of a Japanese victory. Such a decision could be enforced collectively without danger of provoking an international war. It would be possible for the powers to go even farther. Granted that they are anxious to safeguard their stake in China, they have every reason for desiring to support Nanking as against Japan. Sanctions are out of the question, primarily because of the opposition of vested interests. But no such opposition would develop to an agreement for collective economic assistance to China which would be just as effective as the refusal of aid to Japan. The recent loans arranged by H. H. Kung are a step in this direction. Such assistance would have the advantage of influencing Japan without provoking a fanatical reaction such as might be expected from the application of sanctions. Any action of this sort, to be effective, should include the Soviet Union in addition to the signatories of the Nine-Power treaty. Russia's action in signing a non-aggression pact with China just at this moment was a useful move. If all the democratic powers would undertake similar action, along with concrete economic assistance, there would be real possibility that Japan's illegal aspirations on the continent of Asia might be checked without general war.

U.A.W. Makes History

THE most startling fact about the United Automobile Workers of America is that in a single year it has developed from an untried union of 30,000 into a seasoned fighting organization of 400,000 members and in the process piled up some 400 contracts. The great sitdown strike and the victories won in the hitherto wide-open-shop spaces of the automobile industry are matters of burning pride as well as economic satisfaction to thousands of workers who had never before joined forces with their fellows or dared even to complain to the boss about the speed-up. No wonder the union's convention in Milwaukee turned at intervals into a vast celebration of past gains and in one of its most exuberant demonstrations voted unanimously to raise a special war chest of $400,000 for the campaign to organize the industry's last [illegible] the Ford empire. The sense of power runs high along the automobile belt. At the same time the convention served to bring into high relief the achievements of the Committee of Industrial Organization and its impact upon every phase of our political and industrial life.

The United Automobile Workers' union is one of the C. I. O.'s lustiest protegees. For that reason it is not surprising that the internal disputes which were aired at the convention should have provided the principal "news angle" for the nation's press as well as for the nation's employers. To the great disappointment of both, the convention did not split. Instead, its two main factions achieved a genuine compromise, with the help of John L. Lewis and other C. I. O. leaders, and the terms of the compromise seem to guarantee that while the inner struggle will probably continue, it will not hamper the effectiveness of the union in its main drive toward complete organization of the automobile industry.

The struggle for power was waged on the issue of centralization of authority. The "progressive" group, headed by Homer Martin, demanded a greater concentration of authority in the hands of the president in the interest of union discipline, citing as its principal argument the need for preventing the wildcat sitdowns which have served to weaken the union's case with employers. The "unity" group favored more rather than less local autonomy and opposed the move for concentrating authority in the president's office. A struggle for power is never pretty; neither side is ever simon pure in its motives and each drives the other into extreme positions, while personalities inevitably play a large part and tend to obscure the real issues.

In the case of the U. A. W. the net results of the fight and of the compromise appear to be good. Given the structure of the automobile industry and of industrial unionism, the union must obviously have a strong central authority and leadership; but this authority must not be achieved at the price of democracy or free expression, and a lively opposition, in so far as it truly represents divergent rank-and-file opinion, is the best guard against abuses of power. At Milwaukee the Martin leadership was upheld—with the undoubted approval of the membership. In the light of the past year's record this was inevitable and desirable. His powers were in some measure increased; at the same time the opposition maintained its representation on the executive board and will continue to have a voice in union councils, where it is in a position to challenge any abuse of presidential authority.

Smooth-Boy Mellon

ANDREW MELLON'S name never had the symbolic value in the minds of Americans that the name of John D. Rockefeller had. It was partly that his huge banking and industrial interests radiated out of Pittsburgh rather than New York; partly that, for a man of his immense power, he worked quietly and kept in the background. He never became, as did Rockefeller or Morgan, the symbol for ruthless business methods or the immense power of finance capital. And yet the curious thing is that his life and fortune embodied the essence of both.

The Mellon empire was as large and far-flung as any. The Mellon fortune, at a moderate estimate, was two billion. The corporate assets that the Mellons controlled in their ventures ran well over ten billion. The Mellon interests were scattered through oil, aluminum, coal, railroads, coke, gas, construction, steel, lumber, real estate, and banking. At a thousand different points in the daily life of the common man Mellon levied tribute upon him for the necessities of living, merely because—like the earlier robber barons—Mellon had seized and occupied the strategic points in the flow of commodities. Whole communities flourished or withered as the Mellon banks extended or withdrew their support.

All this was done with an almost feline quietness. For Mellon was one of the smooth boys of industry and finance. He was low-voiced, smooth, fastidious. He collected old paintings and seemed to belong with them. The fact is that as capitalism advances, it sloughs off its primitives and effects its purposes through more polished and more subtle specimens.

Mellon was one of these. It was his good genius that led him to turn from business to politics in Harding's era of normalcy. In their drastic reaction to the synthetic nobility of a crusading war, the people were even willing to accept one of the two or three richest and most powerful men in America as Secretary of the Treasury. Once in the limelight Mellon basked in it. The myth grew up that he was a financial statesman, and the man who had been given the Cabinet post because he was a "fat cat" for the Republican campaign chest was hailed as "the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton."

We can now use Mellon to measure the distance we have traveled in our political life since then. For the atmosphere in which such a man as Secretary of the Treasury could brazenly prepare a measure repealing the excess-profits tax, drastically reducing the surplus tax, and loading the common people with an increased burden of indirect taxes was the same atmosphere in which a cheap and crooked lawyer could be chosen as Attorney General and run the affairs of the nation through a gang. Daugherty and Mellon did not like each other, and there was a gulf between them in their personalities. But for our society as a whole their basic difference was only one of scale. One represented the corrupt racketeering of petty trade and the parasite professions; the other represented the formally honest racketeering of big business, ready to use his political office to intrench its power.

Mellon is dead, but his fortune lives on. His 100 per cent monopoly aluminum trust also lives on. The best tribute we could pay his memory would be not only to proceed vigorously by court action to break the Mellon hold on aluminum, but to proceed just as vigorously to change the economic set-up under which such a career is possible.

Scuttling the WPA

FROM mid-June to mid-August approximately 335,000 persons were removed from the rolls of the WPA in order to keep within the $1,500,000,000 appropriation for the current fiscal year. In all, WPA rolls have been reduced by approximately $1,500,000 persons in the past eighteen months. What has happened to these people? Have they, as Mr. Hopkins suggests, been mainly absorbed in industry? Have they been turned over to local relief and private charity? Or have they simply been allowed to shift for themselves? The answer is, of course, unknown as far as large numbers are concerned. But fairly complete information is available regarding the latest discharges in some of the larger cities.

In New York 23,684 of the 25,000 WPA workers who were dismissed between June 30 and August 10 applied for home relief. More than three-fifths of these—14,623—were immediately placed on the relief rolls, while 3,959 applications were rejected. The cases of the remaining 5,102 were still in the process of investigation at the last report. In Illinois the state relief commission reports an increase in the relief load between June and August of 12,213 cases, whereas the normal seasonal trend called for a decline of 7,000 to 14,000 cases. This would seem to account for the greater part of the 30,000 taken from the state WPA rolls during this period. In Cleveland and Columbus, Ohio, according to the United States Conference of Mayors, 75 per cent of the laid-off workers had applied for home relief. In Toledo the proportion was 62 per cent and in Indianapolis 60 per cent.

From the standpoint of the WPA employee, the shift to home relief may not always be undesirable. In the larger cities relief grants for big families often exceed WPA wages. But except in a comparatively few states local relief standards are notoriously low, and it may be assumed that an overwhelming majority of the discharged men have suffered a serious lowering of living standards. The fact that the proportion obtaining relief in the less populous centers is not so great as in the cities is probably due not so much to the greater opportunities for employment in the smaller towns as to their less adequate relief appropriations.

The scuttling of the WPA is the less understandable in view of the reports issued recently showing the magnificent work which it achieved during its heyday. It is impossible here even to list the work done in New York City in improving parks and playgrounds, demolishing old-law tenements, extending public libraries, expanding vocational-education programs, and establishing mosquito control and other sanitation projects. The work of the arts projects stands as one of the most brilliant achievements in the field of popular education in the history of the United States. Can there be any logic or sense in abolishing the jobs of men engaged in useful undertakings and supporting them in idleness?

Responsibility for this deplorable situation rests largely with the President. When a group of "job marchers" demanded last week that dropped workers who have been unable to obtain work in private industry be reinstated in the WPA, the President replied that it was not within his power to comply with the request. It was the President, however, who set the figure for relief requirements at $1,500,000,000, over the protests of the liberals in Congress. And even now he can, as he has done before, use up the money at his disposal and go to Congress with a request for more. There is no reason why hundreds of thousands of former WPA employees, to say nothing of the country at large, should be forced to suffer for the Administration's bad mathematics.

A Third Party for 1940?

BY MAX LERNER

Washington, August 29

DON'T be deceived into thinking that a third party is just around the corner. Like third-term talk, third-party talk is about one-quarter based on probabilities, one-quarter irresistible speculation, and the remaining half propaganda.

What has given some plausibility to the talk is the fact—and it is a fact—that there is a widening rift between the President and Lewis. Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Lewis don't happen to hit it off. They are too much alike in personality, and too divergent in background and experience. Each expects to dominate his world, but each brings different premises and purposes to support his mastery. But do not make the mistake of giving too great an emphasis to this personal incompatibility. Both men are adept at using their friendships and hatreds instrumentally. Remember that Mr. Lewis's ablest lieutenants today are the men who once fought him bitterly, and that Mr. Roosevelt is fighting today the men from whose select ranks he came.

The question of whether there will be a third party in 1940 depends mainly on Roosevelt's fate in the Democratic split and the success of the C. I. O. in its struggle on two fronts—with big business and the A. F. of L. If Roosevelt salvages the major part of his forces and loses only the tory diehards, the Democrats will be able to push forward with a third New Deal, and the talk of another party will become for the time being academic. If, on the other hand, Roosevelt is badly beaten in his own struggle and (conceivably) joins his fortunes with progressive labor, the new party will be bound to face a conservative Democratic-Republican coalition, and we shall have the same two-party system under different labels. If the internal Democratic fight results in more or less of a draw, labor will face the choice of swarming into the Democratic Party and renewing the struggle, or launching a party of its own.

For the C. I. O. leaders are primarily realists. They are hard-headed, pragmatic men, brought up not in the academies but the trade unions, rarely given to wishful thinking. They are not men who will play the gull to anyone. They are bold men and tenacious of their purpose. But they are also supple and flexible men, who will not continue to pursue a purpose unless there is a chance of its yielding to them. Take them one by one—Lewis, Hillman, Dubinsky, Murray, Brophy, Oliver, Pressman—and you will find them men of very diverse personalities. But there is one thing on which they are all agreed, and that is that political action can go no faster or farther than economic action. They understand that every successful party in American history has followed the lines of economic power. And being primarily trade unionists, they aim to use political power not as an end in itself but as a means first for strengthening trade unionism and the submerged economic groups and eventually for building a social system whose outlines are still a bit fuzzy in their minds.

I set all this down not in praise or dispraise but merely because it is relevant to third-party talk. All that there is of a third party today is Labor's Non-Partisan League, and that is built squarely on the economic strength of labor. The C. I. O. leaders are proud of the league. Born in the last election, it has grown to be a lusty and likable youngster. That half of its forty-eight state organizations exist chiefly on paper should be credited to George L. Berry, head of the Pressmen's Union, who was made president of the league on its formation largely to keep the A. F. of L. in line. The sort of man he is may best be seen by his record in the NRA, where he made a lot of noise and accomplished nothing, and his recent record in the Senate, where he has accomplished exactly the same amount without opening his mouth once to answer the attacks on labor. As long as Berry was head of the league, it remained a paper construct. Now that he has been forced out, E. L. Oliver is acting head as executive vice-president. Oliver has energized many of the state chairmen and committees into building a mass membership and lobbying effectively for state and national legislation. The model state leagues are New York, where the American Labor Party is the state branch of the league, and Pennsylvania, where the league has helped push through a tolerably good legislative program. New England, where the C. I. O. has not been very successful, is quiet, although there are stirrings in Connecticut. Michigan and Ohio, on the other hand, since they are centers of successful drives in automobiles and steel, have active leagues. The main points of concentration this summer for organizing active state leagues will be in Minnesota, the Dakotas, and Wisconsin.

This year will find a large number of league candidates in the various active states running for mayor, city councilman, sheriff, police judge, justice of the peace. None of these offices are the Presidency, but they are of enormous importance in labor's struggle to organize. It was the experience of strikers with the petty local officials that led to labor's participation in the election at Akron, Ohio. From Akron the Ohio movement caught fire and spread to Canton, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Massillon. The league is taking part in the mayoralty fights in Pittsburgh and Detroit. In New York City Mayor LaGuardia is running on a Labor Party ticket.

And so the list goes. The items are minor but indicative. They are only beginnings, and the big problems still have to be faced. Can labor rely on progressives in the regular parties, or should it make sure by running separate candidates? The tendency now is to use an independent ticket only as a last resort. Can the league survive as the split within labor widens? This is a very serious matter, considering the fact that of forty-eight state chairmen, some twenty-eight are still in the A. F. of L., and the state committees are even more heavily weighted in that direction.

But on the two major obstacles that a labor party must somehow hurdle I have not yet touched. One is the problem of wooing the middle class. The other is the problem of getting, or at least neutralizing, the farm vote. The C. I. O. leaders are perfectly aware of the problem of the middle class, economically in a no man's land, ridden with fears, an easy prey to big-business propaganda. But the tendency of some is to drive ahead with labor organization, depending on the middle class to follow in the wake of a strong labor movement. The tendency of others is to be more cautious of middle-class and regional sensibilities. In the textile organization drive, for example, there are 112 organizers in the Southern area. Of these not one is a Communist, not one is a Jew, and a hundred are native Southerners. My guess is that the latter trend is growing.

The place of the farmers in a labor party is, outwardly at least, a paradox. Any labor party would have to plan to win the vast food-producing area that the farmers represent and its electoral votes. Lewis himself has lived and done organizing work in Iowa, Illinois, Ohio. He knows the farmer's mentality and knows how important it is for labor to reach it. Yet very little has been done in that direction. There are some here who feel that the C. I. O. made a grave mistake by moving last month into the organization of farm laborers without attempting at the same time the organization of farmers. A farm conference was held recently at Ames, Iowa. It was presided over by one of the editors of the powerful Des Moines Register-Tribune. It was attended by county agents, members of the reactionary Farm Bureau, local business men, members of the National Manufacturers' Association. In itself the meeting amounted to little, but it is a harbinger of what groups may be led to common action when the farmers grow thoroughly frightened at the inroads of organizers among farm labor. It represents a sort of Johnstown formula for the rural areas.

This need not be, of course, the direction for American farmers. There are forces among them which, if intelligently used, could put the large majority of working farmers on the progressive side and bring them eventually into a labor coalition. Even Henry Wallace, who leans heavily on the Farmers' Union, is aware of these potentialities. There is reason to believe that Wallace, with his eye on 1940, is steering his course according to his estimate of how successfully the farmers can be reorganized along progressive lines. Any labor party that leaves that possibility out of account will find itself islanded in the big cities and the industrial areas. Labor will increasingly in the next three years turn to militant political action. But that action will take the form of a third party only if labor is ready in terms of economic power, and only as a last resort in carrying out its policy of rewarding labor's friends and punishing its enemies.

Madrid's Foreign Defenders

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame Cal.

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Valencia, August 15

A SPANISH government representative who attended King George VI's coronation outlined to Foreign Minister Eden Valencia's plan for ending the civil war. A truce was to be declared. All foreign troops and volunteers serving on both sides would then be immediately withdrawn from Spain. During the truce no battle lines would be shifted. Non-Spaniards having been eliminated, Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, and the Soviet Union were to devise a scheme, which the Spanish government pledged itself in advance to accept, whereby the will of the Spanish nation regarding its political and social future might be authoritatively ascertained.

Since the departure of outsiders is the only key to an early peace in Spain, the official data on the government's International Brigade are of interest. Volunteers from abroad commenced trickling into government territory in September, 1936. From that time to this, 23,000 of them, in round figures, have joined the Loyalist ranks. They first fought at the front in November and have since been continuously involved in the hottest combats of the war. The names of 2,500 dead and missing are known, but the authorities believe that the total number of casualties is nearer 4,000. In addition, from 12,000 to 15,000 men have been disabled by wounds or illness at the front. At present 2,000 are lying in hospitals. A further 1,000 are unfit for duty in the trenches, 4,800 have been repatriated on account of sickness or incapacitation or as political undesirables, and 2,500 are still in training or engaged in permanent staff work.

In July, 1937, approximately 7,600 foreign volunteers were stationed at the various Loyalist fronts. They served in brigades whose composition was no longer overwhelmingly foreign. At first the government's international force consisted of foreigners only. It was soon discovered that the discipline and morale of the Spanish troops benefited greatly by contact with the foreigners, and late last year the international column was reorganized so that each brigade included three battalions of foreigners to two of Spaniards. This policy of mixing has now been carried a step farther: foreigners and Spaniards fight together in the same companies and battalions. In no army unit do the foreigners any longer constitute a majority; often they are merely a small kernel. One division, for instance, embraces 1,200 foreigners and 4,000 Spaniards, and in the Eighty-sixth Brigade there are 280 foreigners as against 2,200 Spaniards.

The government's 23,000 foreign volunteers entered Spain over a period of ten months, and usually only a few weeks elapsed between their arrival in Spain and their appearance at the front. The first International Brigade reached the Madrid front in the beginning of November 1,900 strong; the second, in the same month, 1,550 strong. Four weeks later their total strength was 1,800. It is safe to say, therefore, that the number of foreigners in the Loyalist army never exceeded 15,000 on any given day. Of these, no more than 8,000 or 9,000 were ever at the front at the same time.

The Loyalist foreign volunteers played their biggest role in November, 1936, when they saved Madrid. Their services to the government cause were considerable for several months thereafter. Since the spring of 1937, however, the discipline and equipment of the Spanish army have so improved, and its size has increased so rapidly that the significance of the foreign volunteers has been much reduced. They are still used as stiffening, however, and their officers are a valuable asset. The International Brigade is a daily reminder of the importance of events in Spain to the cause of democracy and the struggle against world fascism. The presence of the volunteers tells the Spaniards that the Loyalists are fighting not merely to repel a foreign fascist invasion and to rid Spain of her feudal backwardness; they are fighting to destroy a blight which threatens other countries as well, and which, if it overran Spain, would endanger world peace.

The Spaniards profoundly appreciate the lofty idealism that moves each foreign volunteer to leave his peaceful home and precipitate himself into a situation which he knows has already resulted in the death or crippling of a large proportion of his comrades. There could have been no compulsion except an inner one and there will be no reward except an immaterial one. That the volunteers almost invariably had to steal out of their own countries over the obstructions erected by their governments, and that they would, to boot, face difficulties in returning, added to the nobility of their act. The unselfishness of the foreigners and the gratitude of the Spaniards have cemented a brotherhood which is firm and inspiring. For many, a truce requiring them to leave Spain would be tragic. They have so identified themselves with the nation for which they are ready to give their lives that they want to stay and work in it. Several hundred of the International Brigade have married Spanish women, and a large number of others have signified their wish to acquire Spanish citizenship. The relationship between the foreigners and Spaniards is excellent. In recent weeks the Americans in the training camp at Tarazona de la Mancha have helped the peasants to gather in their crops, and foreign soldiers in reserve positions near the fronts have likewise lent a hand.

Men so dedicated to a noble cause can only feel disgust and heartache when they think of the official hostility manifested toward them in their homelands. An American at Tarazona said to me, "Will we have to creep back into the United States like criminals?" I should have liked to reply, "No, you will be received like heroes," for these volunteers deserve no less. There can be no doubt that they are behaving much more in the tradition of America than the bureaucrats who tried to prevent their enlistment.

In the last three months Frenchmen, who formerly constituted the bulk of the International Brigade, have ceased to come altogether. The vast majority of fresh recruits hail from the United States and Latin America. The other day I traveled 275 kilometers in a bouncing baby Fiat car from Valencia to Tarazona, where a battalion of North Americans is undergoing training. There, in the center of the dry Castilian plateau, the accents of Mississippi, the Bronx, New England, Philadelphia, Chicago, and West Coast wharfs mingled with the Spanish of the folks round about, who had learned to love the newcomers. Robert Merriman, once a lecturer in the University of California, was in command. "A year ago this afternoon," I thought, "I played tennis with Merriman on the Petrovka." He left Moscow in December and by virtue of his R. O. T. C. experience soon became chief officer of the first Lincoln battalion. On February 27, during the famous and decisive Jarama battle for the Valencia road, when the fate of Madrid hung in the balance, he led a charge against the enemy lines which encountered the withering fire of fascist machine-guns. Merriman fell with a bullet hole through his right arm. Marion, his wife, got the news the next day and rushed by plane from Moscow to Valencia. She found her husband in a base hospital, his arm in a plaster-of-paris cast. On that arm now glow the three red stripes of a Spanish army captain, and Merriman is preparing to take a new American battalion up to the front.

Merriman belongs to no political party. The majority of the battalion are Communists, but a few belong to the Socialist Party and some are non-partisan. Brian of Germantown said to me, "My father was a Democrat and my mother a Republican who would listen to nothing else. I have no political affiliations. I came to do my duty as a good American." Sam Romer, a Socialist, has been elected by the men of his section as political commissar, and Joe Lash, another Socialist, is a much-liked figure. Inter-party squabbles disappear in the proximity of fascist bombs and bullets.

I found part of the battalion at the rifle range. Many of the men had handled weapons before, and they hit the target frequently. Such volunteers, I was told, were preferred, but it was the consensus that a month's training sufficed to convert even the greenest recruit into a fine soldier. This applied especially to mechanically minded Americans.

The men were firing from rifles and one light machine-gun. I asked what kind of machine-gun it was. The reply was "Mexican," but the characters on the gun were Russian. "Mexican" is a formula, and the word is never pronounced without a wink. I prefer my facts straight.

A section of the battalion was learning signaling in the pine woods outside the village. Another practiced digging trenches. After the evening meal Merriman rushed away to lead a class in map-making and map-reading, some men went to study Spanish, a third group spent an evening hour listening to a lecture on Spanish history, and in the barracks the volunteers gathered in circles to discuss the civil war and its implications and events at home.

Their questions put me to shame. They asked about conditions in America, especially about the C. I. O. and the strikes. When I gave them some news they told me what had happened subsequently, and soon I was a grateful listener. They wanted additional magazines and newspapers. Pressed for more material demands, they admitted that they lacked soap, sun glasses, pocket flashlights, and coffee. American cigarettes were finally reaching them in sufficient quantities.

The Americans at Tarazona lived in large private homes which had been adapted to their needs. They felt very comfortable and what they missed they introduced themselves. Thus the barracks of one company had a home-made shower bath, and I saw some amateur bricklayers making windows in the thick Spanish walls so that foreign fresh-air fiends might be satisfied. Windows and doors were closed with gauze to keep out flies, and flypaper lay about in too many places. Each man had his own bed. Cleanliness of rooms and person was the Americans' first law. Their health, in a new climate and under new conditions, was excellent. Life in a good summer camp could hardly be as pleasant. And here, in addition, the men enjoy the tremendous exhilaration of self-sacrifice. The consciousness that they are serving a great purpose creates a unique atmosphere. To be sure, some volunteers get drunk and some are problems. This is no assembly of angels. Yet their politics have molded their character. A caustic Englishman who signed himself W. C. C. wrote a Critique of My American Comrades in Pasaremos, the wall newspaper of the George Washington battalion. He said: "They have absolutely no class or racial prejudices. The Negro is as much loved or detested by his comrades, according to mood, as the purest of whites. Politically, I find my American comrades very advanced. At times, I think, inclined to talk at too great a length without very much to show in concrete results. Childishly fatuous, some of them. Occasionally they ignore realities or appear to do so. But though a group may have their heads in the clouds, usually there is one American who brings them back to earth. . . . Great lovers of meetings . . . immeasurably fond of 'points of order'. . . of a high intellectual order . . . quick to resent cruelty in any shape or form . . . they possess many faults, most of which spring from an inherent crudeness or virility." Not bad.

The New Deal in Mexico

BY L. O. PRENDERGAST

Mexico City, August 25

FOR nearly three years the Cárdenas government has been making a great stir, not only in Mexico but in the world at large. A long series of dramatic measures and bold decisions has kept the social and economic pots almost constantly at the boiling point, in a ferment paralleling, in Mexican terms, the experience of Roosevelt's New Deal. The government has nationalized the railroads. It has adopted an expropriation law which gives it unlimited powers over private property in the interest of the public good. It has distributed the lands of the Laguna cotton kings and is about to do the same with the henequen plantations of the Yucatan peninsula. It has greatly encouraged labor and helped it in its struggle with the foreign oil, mining, and light-and-power companies. It has, in short, been admirably progressive, basing itself on the widest popular support and honestly laboring to secure some measure of social justice for Mexico's submerged nine-tenths.

Despite the progress that has been made, recent developments here reveal several conspicuous flies in the ointment. On August 1 some 50,000 organized workers marched through the streets of Mexico City in a grim protest against the high cost of living. Real wages are far below the level of three years ago, and the capitalist class as a whole, which, like its counterpart in the United States, has been desperately fighting the government at every step, is today actually better off than it was under the beneficent tutelage of its departed hero, ex-President Plutarco Elías Calles. It is all very confusing, especially to those who are reluctant to give up their quaint notion that Mexico is a land of socialist construction and who arrive here expecting to find another Moscow.

The truth of the matter is that Mexico has just embarked on the long voyage of capitalist development and is at the moment enjoying its first deceptive capitalist boom. Being primarily a country of raw materials, Mexico has benefited greatly from the revived demand for minerals and oil stimulated by the war scare and the world armaments race. Thirty-five-dollar gold and the silver-purchase policy of the United States have helped the movement along. Depreciation of the currency has done wonders for the export trade: exports have risen more than 75 per cent from their low point in 1932. Domestic production and commerce have likewise enormously increased, as has new capital investment; a building boom has contributed to the steadily augmenting economic activity in Mexico City and to some extent in the provinces. Bank deposits, credits, surpluses, and profits all stand at new highs. Add to these factors the many public works being carried out by the government, a widespread orgy of speculation, and the influx of tourists who spend money, and you have a bonanza which is piling up unprecedented profits in spite of the crocodile tears of conservatives over the agrarian reforms and the "rapacity" of the labor unions.

All this, however, does not quite account for the really extraordinary rise in prices, particularly of essential foodstuffs, in the past few months, a rise which long ago completely wiped out the wage gains won by the strikes of the last three years. It would be impossible here to analyze fully the basic causes, but chiefly they are to be found in the general crisis of Mexican agriculture, in the primitive and inadequate system of agricultural credit, and in the insufficient means of communication between agricultural and urban centers. These conditions have given a great strategic advantage to the slick speculator who can place himself in the neck of the distributive bottle. There is an astonishing spread between what the small farmer receives for his product and the price the ultimate consumer pays for it in the city market. The rural districts are habitually drained dry by the village money-lenders, acaparadores, as they are called, who corner local production through advances on crops, store the produce in warehouses or their own backyards, and wait for a rise. The easy bank credit available to speculators—although at interest rates that would make an American business man's blood run cold—has made Mexico a chiselers' paradise.

From June to July the following price rises were registered in Mexico City: charcoal, used almost universally as a cooking fuel, jumped from 7 to 12 centavos a kilogram; rice, from 24 to 32 centavos the kilo; frijoles (beans), from 20 to 36 centavos; sugar, from 29 to 34; pork lard, from 1 peso to 1.60; tomatoes, from 15 to 30 centavos; salt, from 8 to 12; milk, from 22 to 30 centavos the liter; and corn, the principal food of 85 per cent of the population, from 16 to 19 centavos. These quotations are reported by a labor newspaper and in some instances are considerably higher than the official figures for the same period, the discrepancy being due to the fact that they were gathered by workers making daily rounds from store to store. If they lack scientific accuracy, they reveal not only the extreme variations of the upward tendency but also the tactics of the average shopkeeper. The list might be indefinitely extended. Moreover, these recent rises come on top of previous increases of from 25 to 40 per cent during the past six or eight months. Still further increases have occurred in most of the products mentioned since the middle of July.

It is obvious that a wage level which has risen at the most generous estimate some 25 per cent since 1933 is by now hopelessly inadequate, if in fact it was ever really adequate. Official and unofficial investigations into the cost of living in Mexico City during 1934 and 1935 demonstrated that the amount necessary to maintain minimum standards of health and decency was then four pesos a day. Nevertheless, the legal minimum wage was fixed at two pesos for the Federal District and has remained stationary since then. The law passed a year and a half ago making payment for the seventh day of the week obligatory on all employers would have helped had it not been immediately seized upon as a pretext for additional price increases. The result, of course, has been a steadily deteriorating living standard throughout the country, affecting not only the workers and peasants but the middle class as well, and a discontent and unrest which are assuming alarming proportions. It was not without justification that Lombardo Toledano, general secretary of the C. T. M. (Confederation of Mexican Workers), told the capitalist class in Sunday's demonstration that it was playing with fire.

In an effort to deal with the situation the government recently passed a law authorizing "associations of producers for the distribution and sale of their products," which in the hullabaloo raised by the simultaneous announcement of the nationalization of the railroads has gone virtually unnoticed. This law provides for the voluntary organization of all farm producers, under government supervision, into non-profit marketing societies, made up of local, state, and national bodies, which will fix prices, establish production quotas, regulate importation and exportation, and control markets. The ostensible aim is to eliminate middlemen, speculators, and acaparadores from the distributive process, assure the producer a fair return on his product by suppressing unfair competition, and protect the consumer by fixing prices in strict accord with observed demand, supply, and production costs.

Does all this stir vague recollections of the NRA codes? Except that government intervention is here more marked, there is sufficient similarity. As in so much of Mexico's revolutionary legislation, however, the high purposes of the new law's brief preamble are none too firmly echoed in the articles themselves, which allow a perilous latitude of interpretation to the functionaries intrusted with their fulfilment. There is nothing to suggest that the powerful monopolies which now have a stranglehold on Mexican agriculture will suffer unduly under the new regulations. On the contrary, it is more likely that like the NRA codes the law will operate to deliver into their hands, nicely trussed up and gagged, the hundreds of thousands of tiny producers who have no political pull, no money for the subornation of official favors, and no resources by which to escape the tentacles of the "voluntary" organization they will be required to join. And to insure their coming in, the law contains an innocent-looking little joker in the form of government subsidies to the projected societies.

It is plain, of course, that this measure can have no immediate effect on the prevailing price structure. Its "regulation"—that is, the supplementary legislation which will contain the precepts for its functioning—is still to be drawn up and published, and the societies it contemplates can hardly be organized in much less than a year. What it is more apt to do is to freeze the price level at a point determined by the largest monopolist producers of each crop. The existing chaos, it is true, may be reduced to some kind of order, but it is hard to see how the consumer will benefit.

In spite of laws, agitation, protests, administrative threats, and police measures, prices stubbornly refuse to come down. In fact they will in all probability continue to mount until they are brought crashing down by the only sure method capitalism knows of reducing prices—a major economic crisis, which is painful but effective. Until then labor's only hope of overtaking the elusive full dinner pail would seem to lie in aggressive strike action. The measures proposed to the government by the C. T. M.—rigid control of credit, suppression of speculation, and importation of cereals—can alleviate but are powerless to cure the disease completely.

From all of which an interesting historical deduction may be drawn. Mexican capitalism is growing up and is preparing to celebrate its majority by indulging in the curious luxury of its first autonomous, strictly home-grown economic crisis. The Mexican people may feel that this is a disproportionately high price to pay for a purely theoretical demonstration of national progress, but unfortunately capitalism is like that. The labor movement had better begin to realize that a socialist paradise is never going to be legislated in by a capitalist government, even one that professes socialist ideals and is as generally well-intentioned, progressive, and sympathetic toward the plight of the working classes as is the Cárdenas administration.

Any discussion of the situation would be incomplete if its political implications were not indicated. Even capitalists are at last becoming aware that crises are inevitable under their system, and it obviously suits their purposes better if leftist governments can be made to bear the onus. Nothing would be so admirably calculated to discredit the policies and actions of the present administration as their culmination in a serious economic disaster. I am not suggesting that Mexico's capitalists are deliberately conspiring to bring about a depression, but there is plenty of evidence to show that part, at least, of the recent precipitous price rise has been artificially provoked with the purpose of inciting popular resentment and discontent, which the middle-class fascist groups are demagogically attempting to exploit.

The only form of popular organization that might check the reactionary offensive would be the long-heralded but still non-existent people's front. In spite of the dangers attendant on the projected inclusion of the National Revolutionary Party, the government's official political machine, in the popular front, there is no question that such a front would enormously improve the position of workers and peasants. And it would represent a decisive barrier to the growing inroads of fascist propaganda and sentiment.

A. F. of L. Versus Seattle Labor

BY COLE STEVENS

LESS spectacular than the struggle in automobiles or steel but almost equally important to labor's future is the life-and-death battle between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. now raging in the Pacific Northwest. Seattle and other Pacific Coast cities seem to be a testing ground for the most vicious attacks yet made by the federation leadership upon progressive unionism and the C. I. O.

Pushed out in front by William Green and the A. F. of L. executive council is Dave Beck, regional vice-president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. Beck is an ambitious, rotund little man with an unusual talent for employing strong-arm methods with telling effect. He has built up an empire of about 10,000 teamsters in the region around Seattle alone, where his power is most concentrated. Since the death of Mike Casey of the San Francisco teamsters, Beck's sway has been extended over the entire Pacific Coast. He keeps his boys in line in most places by getting them good wages and by running their meetings with an iron hand. Dissenting motions are ruled out of order, and if the dissenter persists, violent retribution from the "beef squad" follows.

Beck has proved his worth to his masters by turning the Seattle Central Labor Council, a year ago a progressive body, into a rubber stamp for his policies. His unions, and also the building-trades unions and others dominated by him, have their instructions to send their delegates to every council meeting to vote with the leaders—or else. On at least two occasions opposition delegates have been badly beaten up at the Labor Temple by gangsters wearing teamster-union buttons and brass knuckles. The "goon squad," as it is commonly termed, consists of at least twenty picked thugs and ex-convicts who belong to the teamsters' union and are always on hand for such jobs.

The Washington State Federation of Labor is in similar straits. At its July convention this year more than half of the delegates were from teamster or building-trades unions, and they were carefully instructed to attend all meetings and to vote with their floor leaders. They passed resolutions condemning the C. I. O. and calling for a Congressional investigation of the "communism" in its ranks, declared the strike of the American Newspaper Guild against the Seattle Star illegal, and called upon "all civic, patriotic, fraternal, business, and community groups" to support their action. And they rejected proposed resolutions that favored affiliation with the Washington Commonwealth Federation, support of the steel strike, a ban on shipments of war materials to Spain, the calling of a rank-and-file convention of A. F. of L. and C. I. O. members to bring about labor unity, and support for the President's Supreme Court plan.

After a series of losing battles against labor the Seattle Chamber of Commerce recently made an about-face and adopted a peace policy of dealing with the "right people." The chamber is now Beck's closest ally, and he has served it well—particularly by organizing the employers themselves to keep prices up. Through his unions the prices of laundry and dry cleaning, ice, beer, automobile supplies, and even used cars are now uniformly controlled, to the detriment of the consumer. And he has been of inestimable value to the chamber by fighting all militant, democratic unionism, even to the extent of fostering dual unions organized in opposition to the Workers' Alliance and the Newspaper Guild. In this sort of activity Beck is merely reflecting the national trend of the A. F. of L. toward company unionism. He says quite frankly that the primary policy of his union is to organize employers, since that is most effective.

This strange alliance of "labor" leaders and the Chamber of Commerce is also in control of Seattle politics. Mayor John F. Dore was elected in March, 1936, with the united support of all labor. For a year he was all labor's mayor, but for the past few months he has apparently been taking orders from Beck. He is now trying to save himself politically by campaigning for re-election on an "anti-C. I. O." platform designed to rally business and middle-class support. "I am glad the teamsters' union is running Seattle," he said recently. "It has the brains, the money, and the power."

Beck has fought a guerrilla war against progressive unionism for years. He smashed the brewery workers' union and fought the warehousemen by sending his teamsters in to replace them, and he is now making war on the Newspaper Guild. For two years the district circulation managers of the Seattle Star, whose job is to supervise the route carriers, tried to get the teamsters to come in and organize them, since they carried bundles of papers in their cars at that time. Instead of organizing the supervisors, the teamsters took over all hauling of papers. Several district managers were laid off, and the nineteen who were left—no longer teamsters by any stretch of the imagination—applied for membership in the Newspaper Guild. Here they found democratic unionism, and their minimum wages, moreover, rose from $18 to $35 a week.

Then out of a clear sky, on July 1, the teamsters' union notified the Star management that it had been granted jurisdiction over the supervisors' jobs too, and that henceforth only teamsters could fill the nineteen posts. By way of a preliminary threat they refused to haul papers for several hours on the following day. The district managers were called together by the Star circulation manager to hear the ultimatum presented by one of Beck's lieutenants. But they were not impressed. All nineteen voted to stay in the Guild. The next day they were told that nineteen teamsters were being put into their jobs, and that they could expect two weeks' pay from that date.

The Guild immediately took a strike vote, and sixty-five out of eighty office employees walked out. Charges were filed with the National Labor Relations Board, which issued a complaint against the Star, and for four days the plant was closed down. The teamsters were ready to go through the picket line to haul papers, but the typographical union, for a while at least, refused to follow suit.

Following events, as brought out in the Labor Board hearing, showed clearly the alignment of forces against the Guild. A meeting was called which was attended by several of the Star management, Beck and two other A. F. of L. officials, and E. B. Fish, labor-relations expert of the Chamber of Commerce. This strange group adjourned to the office of Mayor Dore, who shortly afterward issued a statement to the press offering to have his police break up the Guild picket line, stop the distribution of literature, and rope off the street whenever the management should request. With this promise of official interference in its behalf, the paper started up with a skeleton crew. The management repudiated two plans for settlement drawn up by its own attorneys and tentatively approved by the Guild. It demanded that the A. F. of L. and not the Labor Relations Board be given the right to decide the question of jurisdiction in spite of the fact that the Guild was already in the C. I. O. Now the Star is refusing to take the guildsmen back except as individuals; the union is locked out.

Mayor Dore is staking everything on Beck. He told a committee of progressive unionists on August 14, "We'll be generous and let you keep a couple of pickets outside the Star plant. The Star doesn't mind them. . . . But if you try to mass-picket the Star, there'll be trouble and the police will disperse you. Anyone who resists will go to jail. Anyone who resists too much will go to the hospital or to the morgue." He has made good his threat with repeated wholesale arrests of peaceful pickets.

Beck's tactics have alienated many important unions, and the revolt is growing. The Federation of Woodworkers, 120,000 strong, voted at its July convention to join the C. I. O. as a full-fledged industrial union. The Pacific Coast longshoremen, except for one local in Tacoma, have also joined the C. I. O., and other maritime unions are expected to follow as soon as the rank and file have a chance to express their preference. In a number of cities powerful C. I. O. labor councils have been formed, and in Seattle a progressive "labor unity council" of both C. I. O. and A. F. of L. unions has been set up to fight for unity and democracy in the labor movement.

Given time, labor will clean its own house. The progressive unions are launching a widespread campaign of publicity to explain what "Beckism" means to labor and to the public, and to remove the stigma which newspaper propaganda has attached to the C. I. O. In the end Beck and other lieutenants of the employers will be defeated, and only then will the American labor movement attain its full strength and dignity.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

SOMEONE once asked Rudyard Kipling: "What do you find to do in the country?" "Everything," he replied, "except the time to do it." This is now my stock reply to those who say to me at my farm: "How wonderful to work here! No interruptions, few telephone calls, rare visitors, unbroken hours for literary labors. No wonder you prefer this to the city." On its face the statement appears valid and correct. It is neither. It's a delusion, for all nature here is in a conspiracy to keep me from working. True, there are few telephone calls, comparatively few visitors, only one mail a day, and the family ménage is some distance away, easy to walk down to and something of a climb back on a hot day. It would seem as if Douglas were in his castle with the portcullis down and the bridge up.

But Kipling was right. There is no time to do a fraction of what is to be done, of what was planned for the summer days before the spring hegira from the city. There lie piles upon piles of newspapers from cities from Shanghai to Czecho-Slovakia. At best they have only been run through hastily. Here in the corner is an office bag full of reports and pamphlets and many reprints of articles with "compliments of the author" stamped upon them—much valuable material. I have a large writing table upon which some long-gone family served their repasts. What confusion, what disorder! The folder marked "Letters requiring answer" is always full; if it does not grow much fatter, that is because so many unanswered letters are scattered around. And as for books, they and the most important magazines have driven me to one corner of the table, where I have about twenty-four by thirty inches left on which to write. How accusingly those volumes lie there, some with generous dedications by authors, others accompanied by letters from the publishers asking for "just a few words to encourage this very deserving author." "Your Child Faces War"; "Proletarian Journey"; "England Expects Every American to Do His Duty"; "Tramping to Failure"; "These Low Grounds"; the last issue of Foreign Affairs. These and many others are mute witnesses to the fallacy that there is time in the country to do everything one should. They bother me, for I am not one of those easily to leave things undone, or to let letters lie unanswered without remorse.

Time seldom hangs so heavily in the country that by three o'clock in the afternoon you can go and lie on the terrace with conscience completely at ease because of 2,500 more words done for the book that nobody will buy—lie on the terrace and watch the clouds drift by and the light change on the shores of the pool while the plover family, that has lately come to visit, parades about and then stands still ankle deep in the water to catch the unsuspecting bugs. No, a treat like that happens not every day but once in a fortnight. I haven't been in my hemlock grove twice this season, and the cedar field where I laid some young trees low last year has not known my ax this summer. And oh, those hard sweats and lost pounds I was to have rejoiced in! Not once have I even had a sun bath in my privy woods, where one can be as bare as one pleases.

No, it really is all a magnificent conspiracy of nature. She will lure one outdoors and force herself upon one however big the job in hand. Well, let's try once more. Breakfast at eight, outdoors, and then to work early. But one must start the farmer on his tasks for the day and stress the immediate things and say good morning to the horses, the dogs, and the calf, and there certainly is time to make one more attempt to bag that water-snake that haunts the pool. Then on the way up to the workshop there are those plum trees to examine; the fruit must be ready to pick. And how about those early apples on the other side of the road which the farmer always forgets? Nine-fifteen already? Impossible. Well here goes—to pick up the threads of that chapter.

Then in comes the secretary. We pass the time of day—there is some village gossip we must swap. I dictate some letters. Then a rap on the door. "May I show you a rubber doormat made out of old automobile tires; only $1.85 and it will last forever?" Peace again—no, here comes the mail. One must glance through the letters and deal with the most urgent. And what do the Herald Tribune and the Times report from Shanghai? Eleven-thirty? Well, let's go to it again. Twelve-fifteen: the farmer knocks. "I am sorry to tell you that the harrow broke; I'll have to go at once to the blacksmith." And then a call from outdoors: "Do come out and see these marvelous clouds; there is a grand thunderstorm coming fast. And don't forget lunch will be ready in fifteen minutes." Next you try to salve your conscience in the afternoon. No hope. Visitors, telephone calls from New York, letters that must go, and one must stop at four o'clock; there's the horse to be ridden—you haven't been on him for three days. After all, one must exercise, and one can work all the evening. Delusion again. One cannot work after dinner until the sunset clouds have been watched, until the last bit of red and gold has faded out. Suddenly panic seizes you—why, it's Tuesday and that confounded Issues and Men will be due tomorrow. In you go and have at it. No, the thing to do is to go back to the city. There one can work; there there's nothing to do outdoors—there is no outdoors.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Escape to the Present Indicative

ESCAPE TO THE PRESENT. By Johannes Steel. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

OF late years there have been a number of fictionalized biographies. Mr. Steel has reversed the process. His "Escape to the Present" reads like fiction in the guise of autobiography. No wonder that in this difficult new genre the author has not yet worked out an effective technique.

The auto-hero is a young German. His father is a high army officer and a close friend of Ballin and Rathenau. His mother is English. His paternal grandfather had kidnapped his wife from a northern Viking isle. Eugenically speaking, the author is conceived in a Hitler dream. He matures in the confused post-war years. He manages to keep his impoverished though noble family going by speculating at the black bourse of a little Rhenish town, and when Dr. Schacht stops the inflation he finds himself with a fortune of 50,000 gold marks. What does he do with it? Of course he becomes a Socialist organizer.

"After some months" he builds up a considerable following among the students at the University of Berlin, and his organization achieves "national importance." He begins reading Marx with the help of Klara, "one of the most remarkable women of post-war Germany." When after six months of mutual Marxism our hero still speaks of their beautiful platonic friendship, Klara brings him to his senses by hitting him over the head with a bottle of wine.

The Social Democratic Party finally rewards the extremely young but successful organizer with a seat in the Prussian Diet. But he is kicked out within twenty-four hours—quite illegally—because he will not stand for the bad manners of the party whip. Whereupon, rather illogically, he becomes a member of the "German Industrial Service," and begins to sell second-hand armaments and to engage in industrial spying all over the world.

At his first post in Warsaw the inevitable beautiful girl spy in the contre-espionage prepares a melodramatic trap, from which he finally escapes, revolver in hand. He goes to Constantinople, Alexandria, Jerusalem, Bagdad. In the desert he is rescued from certain death by a sheik. In the sheik's entourage our hero encounters a French girl, whom the sheik has kidnapped for ulterior purposes. Our hero, of course, rescues the girl—which "proves that once in a while life duplicates the patterns of even the most sensational fiction."

From Bagdad our hero returns to Berlin and there is ordered to read all about Abyssinia, which task enables him to include in his autobiographical romance an article he wrote on Abyssinia some ten years later. Otherwise his study might have been wasted, for he is stopped on his way to Addis Ababa and ordered to Tokyo. There he reorganizes the German spy ring, bribes a Swedish competitor with $70,000, and is in every way a howling success. But now the small voice of conscience begins to worry the former member of the Prussian Diet. Full of doubts he returns to Berlin. This time he gets himself a cleaner government job and proceeds to South America, where his task is merely to conduct "a preliminary survey for a concentrated program of German economic penetration." This trip takes him to Brazil, Argentine, Uruguay, Chile, Peru, Colombia, Ecuador, Venezuela, Mexico, and Cuba. "It took a year and was one of the pleasantest journeys I ever made because there was little to be done."

From Cuba it is only a stone's throw to Washington, D. C., and to New York, where he receives a letter from his father informing him of Hitler's growing strength at home. Whereupon he cables his resignation to the Papen government and takes the next boat home—"ready to do whatever I could to stop the fascist onslaught." At home he tries in vain to activize the Communist Party. "From a friend" he has learned what nobody else knew—the army would not fight the workers. A Communist Reichstag member speeds to Moscow to bring the good news to Stalin. But Joe will not listen and history is forced to take the wrong turn. The subsequent fate of Germany we all know.

One day our hero meets Dr. Schacht—in a post office where "the great man was licking stamps." We are not informed where, when, or how Schacht and Steel become intimates; we are told, however, that the none too social international banker turned to him and said: "Come in tonight around ten o'clock." Our hero is somewhat astonished, for "I had given Schacht to understand on frequent occasions that I considered him a traitor to the democratic cause." But he accepts the invitation. At Schacht's he meets for the first time Dr. Rosenberg, the great Slavic pan-German mythologist, who immediately offers him a post in the foreign division of the National Socialist Party.

> In a rather loud voice I asked him what, in view of my political record, gave him the nerve to make such an offer. He answered drily, "This is no matter of convictions, of likes and dislikes. We need men of your type who are well connected abroad. We can guarantee them careers. Many Socialists are coming over to us."

And then Rosenberg adds confidentially: "What do you think I am in this business for? Because I believe in it? Nonsense. Because I have a future with it." At this point Schacht joins the conversation. "Better do as Dr. Rosenberg tells you or you will be out of luck in a few days. If you consider his proposal, you may be undersecretary of state in the foreign office inside of five years."

Naturally this leads to the arrest of our hero and to his solitary confinement in a lonely villa somewhere in Wannsee, exactly where he does not know. He escapes in the brown shirt of his guard, whom he overpowers with an iron poker. He flees to Paris. From there he sends his parents a winning lottery ticket—for Schacht had of course confiscated his bank account.

In the second part of his book the author deals with his hero's refugee years in England and in America. The more nearly he manages to "escape to the present" the less fictional the autobiography sounds, and the less exciting. He gives only a superficial account of his doings. The tragic psychological struggles of the political refugee to adjust himself to American life are not even touched upon.

From a literary point of view Mr. Steel's performance may be dismissed as plain trash. But as a document of a German political refugee it must be exposed. The very publication of this volume—with the implication that it pictures the career of a prominent anti-Nazi—reflects on thousands of serious and useful refugees who represent the best of German culture. There is only one virtue in Mr. Steel's autobiography. He has finally and completely disposed of his kind of hero.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

FRANZ HOLLERING

Corruption's Poet

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF JOHN WEBSTER. Edited by F. L. Lucas. Oxford University Press. Four Volumes. $10.50.

THE name of John Webster attached to certain seventeenth-century plays is almost nothing except a name. He is mentioned in some satiric lines by a gentleman of Lincoln's Inn and in complimentary verses prefixed to his plays, but of the various Websters who turn up elsewhere in contemporary documents it is not certain which, if any, is the playwright. Not even the date of his birth or death is known, and this, by the way, should be remembered by those who think our relatively extensive knowledge of Shakespeare significantly scanty. Apparently Webster attracted no great attention as a dramatist in his own day; he was forgotten during the eighteenth century; and it remained for Lamb and Swinburne to elevate him to the position of a major writer. Even now only two of his plays, "The White Devil" and "The Duchess of Malfi," are often read or ever admired, and many refuse to consider even them as more than examples of the extravagant and decadent violence into which Jacobean drama fell. His work as a whole has never been previously edited since scholarship achieved its present knowledge of his age, and it is not likely that these four volumes with their elaborate paraphernalia of notes will soon be replaced.

Mr. Lucas boasts that his research into the allusions and double meanings of Webster's dialogue has disposed forever of the belief that his plays are "pure," for learning can show that the author of "The Duchess of Malfi" was no less fond of indecent innuendo than was the author of "Romeo and Juliet." Of more general interest is the critical introduction in which Mr. Lucas considers the problem most likely to present itself to any reader not willing either to surrender himself to Swinburne's rhapsodies or to join with William Archer in considering Webster as a type of the bad playwright. How can we reconcile the sinister power of the first half of "The Duchess of Malfi" with the steady piling up of horrors until the things becomes grotesque if not actually laughable? To me it has always seemed that the scene in which the Duchess feels her way toward a declaration of love is one of the most powerful and at the same time one of the most restrained in dramatic literature. It is the reverse of flowery; there is no trace left of the Elizabethan joy; but there is an almost overwhelmingly powerful sense of the dramatic contrast between one honest thing and a whole corrupt civilization. The man who wrote that scene must have been a man of fine perceptions and a man whose sense of despair was deeply spiritual. To me, at least, it proves far more than could be proved by a dozen trick lines like the famous exclamation, "Cover her face: mine eyes dazzle: she died young"; and whatever the explanation of the collapse of the play, it cannot be that Webster was a mere journeyman purveyor of what his public wanted.

Mr. Lucas has several partial solutions for the problem. The least satisfactory seems to me his attempt to suggest that the contrast between Webster at his most moving and Webster at his most mechanical is not so very much greater than that between the most inspired and the most conventional parts of other Elizabethan and Jacobean writers, including Shakespeare. More convincing is his elaboration of a contention which Professor Stoll has made familiar here—namely, that Webster's contemporaries were far less concerned that either we or seventeenth-century audiences in France with consistency of any sort, that they took a play, scene at a time, for the poetry or the fun or the excitement which that scene supplied without very much caring that they were sometimes expected to forget what had gone before. In this connection he quotes a passage dug up by A. B. Walkley from a Frenchman's account of a voyage to England later in the seventeenth century. Speaking of the English play the author says, "They do not mind if it is a potpourri because, so they say, they pay attention to it only one part after the other without bothering about the whole" (my translation).

At least one thing may be said, and that one thing is important if one is to appreciate properly either the Jacobean drama or the literature of many other periods remote from ours. Certain faults in Webster do not imply what similar faults would imply in a contemporary writer. Of a dramatist today we might reasonably say that any man who could write scenes as crudely violent as some of Webster's was obviously a man of blunt sensibilities. It is, indeed, impossible to conceive of a modern who could combine such coarseness with any refinement at all. But certain things are compatible with one another in one age without being compatible in a different one, and the fact is as strikingly true when one considers characters as it is when one considers talents. Elizabethans could do things which no contemporaries of our own could reconcile just as they could write things all of which no man since their day could find room for in one world, much less in one play. Webster, in other words, does not have to stand or fall as any whole we can conceive. He can be a stupendous playwright and a silly one within one play. There is little point in arguing that the last act of "The Duchess of Malfi" must be good if it was written by the man who wrote the scene between the Duchess and her lover. But there is, if possible, even less point in trying to argue that if that last act is as grotesque as it seems to us, then we must be deluding ourselves when we find others almost dazzling.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Belly-Bumps, Bible-Class, etc.

A DICTIONARY OF AMERICAN ENGLISH ON HISTORICAL PRINCIPLES. PART II, BAGGAGE-SMASHER-BLOOD. Edited by Sir William Craigie and James R. Hulbert. University of Chicago Press. $4. Twenty Parts. $75.

THE second fascicle of the "Dictionary of American English" begins quite fortuitously with the term baggage-smasher and stops with blood. In between it traverses such empire-making words as bakery, bald, balky, ballot, ball-park, Baltimore oriole, bamboo, banana, band-wagon, banjo, bank-barn, barbecue, barb wire, bargain-counter, barkentine, Barn-burner, barn-owl, bar-tender, baseball, basswood, bath-tub, bean soup, bear-trap, beat, beaver, beef cattle, begin, belly-bumps, Bible-class, bison, blizzard, and many hundreds more, including seventeen pages devoted to black and its compounds. These are all words of American make, or have been adapted to new uses in this country, or have had a career of special note in America. About all of them the editors have something, and often a good deal, to say, and they manage to say most of it by the skilful selection and arrangement of thousands of quotations. These quotations, presented not only in numbers but with an expanse of context seldom possible in such works, besides admirably serving their purely lexical purpose, are frequently informing, suggestive, amusing, or otherwise of interest for their own sake, so that the completed dictionary might be read as a huge "Anatomy of America" constructed on genuine Burtonian principles of hundreds of thousands of apt quotations. I doubt, however, whether the editors themselves have ever entertained such an intention, even in the most subsidiary form. Their procedure is rigorously objective; unlike such lexicographers as Wyld and Weekley, they allow themselves no humor, no irony, no personal flavor, but no other dictionary-maker or committee of dictionary-makers has produced a book so continuously readable.

A second glance at my sample list of words in this section will show that the dictionary, or this part of it anyway, is largely a dictionary of nouns, of the names of places, animals, plants, commodities, tools, and activities that were once new or unfamiliar to the experience of Englishmen. Almost as remarkable is the multitude of compound words, novel combinations of old concepts. How far the process has gone may be seen in the word beaver. It is an Indo-European word of the greatest antiquity, has always been part of the English vocabulary, and must have come to America with the first explorers and traders. But in the New World it went to work in earnest. In American use it has had two entirely new meanings —a beaver skin, and an amount equivalent to a beaver pelt— and has developed forty-six compounds. Moreover, phrases such as "to work like a beaver" are common and were once natural in American speech, and finally eighteenth-century Americans coined the word beaveret to designate the imitation beaver fur used by hatters. Scholars used to be of the opinion that an emigrant language ceased to change and became, in relation to its parent dialect, distinctly archaic. American English does have certain archaic features, but what the "Dictionary of American English" chiefly exhibits are its powers of adaptation and growth.

Admirable as the plan and execution of the dictionary are in general, there are a few details of editorial policy that ought to be reconsidered. The editors have decided to deal only exceptionally with pronunciation and etymology, on the ground that "the great majority of the words included [in the dictionary] are of such a nature that their normal pronunciation is familiar to every educated person, and special comment is required only in rare instances," and that "for a large proportion of the words also the ultimate etymology has only a remote interest." These reasons are not entirely convincing, and one may suspect that the editors are making a virtue of a necessity imposed upon them by time, space, and money. It should be possible, however, to indicate the pronunciation of Spanish, Indian, and other loan words, which are certainly not known to every educated person, even if he happens to be an American and not a foreigner. Etymologies, too, where they are desirable, should be given in full, instead of with the laconic brevity of a desk dictionary. Still more disappointing is the treatment of many explanations and definitions of words. The principle that a dictionary's concern is with words and not with the things that the words represent is unassailable, but words and things cannot be cleanly severed—dictionary and encyclopedia necessarily occupy a space of common ground. Especially in a dictionary that professes to deal fully with "every word denoting something which has a real connection with the development of the country and the history of its people," one reasonably expects to find short, untechnical descriptions of the things designated by substantives. But unfortunately, in a noticeably large number of instances, one must turn from the "Dictionary of American English" to the "Oxford," the "Shorter Oxford," or one of the American dictionaries for this kind of information. Without encroaching on the province of the encyclopedia, the "Dictionary of American English" could increase its convenience and usefulness by extending slightly the scope of its explanations and definitions.

GEORGE GENZMER

You Read as You Please

ONE LIFE, ONE KOPECK. By Walter Duranty. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

WE ARE all more or less at the mercy of the foreign correspondents, but their novels, at least, we can read as we please. Here is Mr. Duranty, famous as a reporter of the Russian scene, writing a novel about Russia, and the result is something that might just as well have been produced in one of Hollywood's scenario establishments. Except for its sympathy with the revolutionaries, the book is pitifully dependent on the formulas that every moviegoer knows by heart. Ivan, the protagonist of the story, is a poor peasant boy who rushes headlong into a career of changing the world—yet throughout he remains the changeless character of pulp fiction. After a cycle of experiences in Siberia, the World War, the revolution and the civil war, he rises to head a detachment of guerrilla fighters, but all the time, of course, he is consumed with love for an aristocratic lady of White Guard allegiance, who appears miraculously at every turning-point in his life to involve him in a head-on collision of carnal desire with bolshevik duty. But this lady is only his major passion; the truth is that all the girls love Ivan, but Ivan loves the revolution best. This preference, however, by no means prevents the author from indulging in descriptions of amorous encounters of a kind that are out of date even in drugstore thrillers. And the type of prowess manifested by Ivan in his role as sexual and revolutionary superman soon makes us suspect that Ivan Petrovich is merely a pseudonym and that actually our hero is a fearfully inhibited young Englishman who in an exotic environment runs amuck.

The novel contains a good deal of elementary information concerning the Russian Revolution, and the section dealing with the Siberian guerrilla warfare achieves a vigorous reportorial pace. In its portrait of bolshevism, however, it goes in for romantic legends. Ivan's party mentors, for example, are the familiar stencil figures we have come to know so well in conventional Soviet fiction, where they are presented as characters with steel-cable nerves whose rectitude is as automatic as their political wisdom. Moreover, the author seems astonishingly naive in his approach to revolutionary doctrines and revolutionary education. He has his hero, exiled to Siberia at the age of sixteen for striking a policeman during a disturbance in a brothel, pounce on "Das Kapital," read it through, and undergo an instantaneous conversion to communism. It is the first revolutionary work he had ever read, and internal evidence shows the young man to be quite devoid of intellectual interests. This is really a joke on Karl Marx, and to have it happen one must either have a very low opinion of the magnum opus of the labor movement or else consider it altogether beyond human understanding.

PHILIP RAHV

Overcrowded Japan

POPULATION PRESSURE AND ECONOMIC LIFE IN JAPAN. By Ryoichi Ishii. London: P. S. King and Son. 12s. 6d.

SOME publicists use the excuse of population pressure to whitewash everything that Japan has done or may do—on the theory, "Don't scold Johnny for sticking pins in the baby, remember he has a weak heart." Such apologists have tended to alienate rather than to attract the sympathies of the Western world. This is [illegible] pity, for the Japanese nation deserves sympathy if ever a nation did—the more so when, struggling to escape from an economic impasse, it blindly follows misguided leaders up a rocky road along which no safety lies.

Dr. Ishii, in gratifying contrast, writes with the modulated accents of the conscientious scholar, and they carry conviction. The first full-length study of Japanese population by a Japanese writer to appear in English, his book makes full use of Japanese sources as well as the techniques developed by Japanese and Western students of population. From his scholarly, sane, and balanced account three points emerge which no student of international social movements can afford to disregard: (1) Japan does have [illegible] serious problem of overpopulation; (2) the problem, as his title emphasizes, is closely bound up with the entire trend of Japanese economic life since the Meiji restoration; (3) the solution, such as it is, must be sought first and foremost within Japan itself.

In a country where only 15 per cent of the land is arable and nearly half of the population support themselves by agriculture, Japan's population density is somewhat greater than that of the state of New York. Now about 70,000,000, the population is growing at the rate of nearly [illegible] million a year. To be sure, this process is not expected to go on indefinitely. If the death rate is falling, so is the refined birth rate; and the practices of later marriage and birth control, already in evidence, may be expected to gain headway in an increasingly urbanized civilization. For the next twenty or thirty years, however, the outlook is distinctly gloomy. Japan has at present an unusually large proportion of minor children. No possible adjustment of the birth rate can prevent these children from growing up, looking for jobs, marrying, and having offspring. Experts agree, therefore, that by 1960 Japan's population will reach 80,000,000 or 90,000,000, and that for the next twenty-five years or so about half a million persons annually will be added to the working population. Can Japan provide each year half a million new jobs? This, says Dr. Ishii, "is the real test of Japan's social and economic system—a test which the nation cannot attempt to evade." Jobs, not food, are the crux of the problem, Dr. Ishii emphasizes.

Little hope may be placed in the absorption of any more workers in agriculture; indeed, counsels of efficiency would dictate fewer men and more machines. As for emigration, Dr. Ishii wastes little time in criticizing the exclusionist policies of the white nations, not even our own inexcusably tactless exclusion act. Even if emigration were unrestricted, it would offer, in his view, no permanent solution. The way out, if there is one, lies rather in further development of industry and foreign trade. Japan's deficiency in natural resources, he believes, is not necessarily an insurmountable handicap, in view of "modern transportation facilities and the influence that Japan enjoys in East Asia." A graver problem is presented by the fact that industrial development presupposes technological changes permitting larger output with fewer

Major
FREDERIC
LORD

FRIDAY
EVE., 8 P. M.
SEPT.
10

Tickets—25c, 50c, and $1 (reserved)

NOTED AMERICAN AVIATOR
Recently returned from Spain where he brought down thirteen Fascist planes.

GENERAL VICTOR A. YAKHONTOFF
Author "The Chinese Soviets," etc.

MILDRED LORD
Wife of noted American aviator. Will speak of her experiences in Spain.

GEORGE PERSHING
Well known lecturer, author, traveller. Nephew of Gen. John J. Pershing.

and other prominent speakers

TOWN HALL 123 West 43rd Street (Bet. 6th Ave. & B way)

Tickets available at:—

Workers Bookshop
50 East 13th St.

Rand School Book Shop
7 [illegible] 15th St.

and NORTH AMERICAN COMMITTEE TO AID SPANISH DEMOCRACY,
381 Fourth Avenue, Tel.: MUrray Hill 4-5301

A TRIUMPH! 3RD AND FINAL WEEK!

"The most powerful and moving documentary film ever screened . . . a motion picture of compelling artistry!" —Herald Tribune

"Eloquent . . . admirable . . . Hemingway's narrative [illegible] superb . . . the film is a violent outcry against fascism!" —N. Y. Times

"A beautiful piece of work . . . fine, sensitive and meaningful . . . altogether an extraordinary achievement!" —Post

JORIS IVENS' magnificent screen drama

The SPANISH EARTH

COMMENTARY AND NARRATION BY ERNEST HEMINGWAY

Music by Marc Blitzstein and Virgil Thompson

55th ST. PLAYHOUSE
Just East of 7th Avenue
CO 5-0425 (25c to 1 p.m.)
Cont. 11 a.m. to Midnite

The 20th ANNIVERSARY of the RUSSIAN REVOLUTION in MOSCOW

WITH VISITS TO LENINGRAD, KHARKOV, KIEV.
A selective group tour under authoritative leadership.
See the Soviet Union in the festival month of November when theatres and other activities are at their height.
Sailing October 20 in the Queen Mary; back in New York November 23.

Inclusive [illegible] with Third Class steamship passage and Second [illegible] in U. S. S. R.: $389

THE OPEN ROAD
12th Floor
8 West 40th Street New York
Cooperating with Intourist

workers. Though Japan has at present no large visible army of unemployed, feudal elements in her social structure, such as family solidarity and paternalism, tend to conceal the real situation.

In order to achieve the desired objective of relieving population pressure, Dr. Ishii believes that the development of industry and foreign trade will have to be carefully planned. "Promotion of international cooperation for freedom of trade and for access to certain essential natural resources" must be the keynote of external policy; while, internally, emphasis must be laid upon institutional reforms, including land reform and labor legislation. Dr. Ishii's book would have been more valuable if he had devoted more space to his constructive suggestions. But his work will have been amply justified if it serves only to document the single thesis: "In a country such as Japan, where the natural resources are limited and the population density is high, special attention must be accorded to the creation of a well-balanced and more or less equitable distribution of the national wealth."

MIRIAM S. FARLEY

A Wreath for Lawrence

T. E. LAWRENCE. By His Friends. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $4.

THIS latest book on T. E. Lawrence is a collection of reminiscences compiled by his brother in a volume of 538 pages. Of the previous accounts of Lawrence none are revealing enough of the man. Yet because Lawrence remained to the end an enigma, unpredictable even to his friends, the accounts of him rarely fall into trite and conventional eulogy. Liddell Hart is chiefly concerned with the military tactics involved in the "Revolt." Charles Edmonds's "T. E. Lawrence" is a recital in adventure. Robert Graves contributes an intelligent biography, but again refuses to probe into Lawrence's personality beyond a certain point. The present volume fills, or almost fills, a lack in Lawrence literature. I say "almost" because, although Lawrence had a great number of friends, each saw only that side of him which he chose to reveal. There is probably no one living who knew him well enough to reveal him in the round.

It was Lawrence's expressed intention to exclude his more intimate feelings from "The Seven Pillars of Wisdom," in the hope that it would thereby gain stature as a work of art. Yet the type of hero which he represents is the very type whose personal feelings matter very considerably; and once his story, largely through the efforts of Lowell Thomas, was made available to the public an interest in his personality was inevitable. In all he did he revealed himself intensely an individual—not, as most successful generals and governors, merely a man doing his commissioned best in the service of a system.

The present work, naturally enough, resolves into a hunt for personal motives, an attempt on the part of numerous people to explain the "mystery" of Lawrence from the inside. As such, it is unusual both for the articulateness of most of the contributors and their wide variety as individuals; but even so many hands do not make a finished picture. The effect is that of a puzzle in which, at the end, many pieces are left over. In a world which seems to be given over to the sweeping categories of the psychologist, the politician, or the scientist, Lawrence still remains, it would seem, inviolable.

WILLIAM GILMORE

FILMS

The Novelist as Hero

IT IS a question whether any artist can be the hero of a first-rate narrative. For his characteristic activity is not in itself dramatic, or even visible. He gives substance to everything except himself, and in proportion as he does this well he remains an unknowable person dwelling somewhere back in the mistlands of creation. His labors are performed entirely in his head; or if his hand is engaged, the spectacle of its movements is to any outsider either dull or incomprehensible. There might be a certain excitement in watching Tolstoy scratch off the last sentence of "War and Peace," but the really heroic drudgery of writing such a book eight times would, merely as spectacle, be intolerable and meaningless; and any attempt to dramatize Tolstoy's mind as he conceived and executed the work would inevitably give us something inferior to the work itself. Stories about artists must be content to deal with externals—gestures which do not express the whole man.

"The Life of Emile Zola" (Warner Brothers) is no exception, in spite of the fact that Zola's career had its picturesque aspects and in spite of the interest which attaches to the Dreyfus case. But to make a story out of the career it has been necessary to assign gestures to Zola (Paul Muni) that are either false or irrelevant—grimaces at the writing desk, pauses while the ceiling is scanned for inspiration, self-conscious preachments to his friends about the truthfulness of his vision—and in general to diminish the man's force by taming it to a purpose. Mr. Muni's Zola is so far from the sprawling genius of the books as to be of all things a fussy and somewhat schoolmasterly reformer. The result is not uninteresting; indeed it is often rather fine, and Mr. Muni has done with clear skill what he has done. The unphotographable truth, however, was more impressive.

The Dreyfus case is naturally the climax of the film, and Joseph Schildkraut's acting as the unfortunate captain has a great deal to do with the success of its second half. So has the acting, and the casting, of the other parties to the case; the intrigues of the generals and the travesty of the trial are terribly convincing. But another circumstance has weakened this portion of the film. Rightly or wrongly the direction has seen fit to suppress the anti-Semitic theme; one would scarcely know that Dreyfus had been a Jew, and one certainly never learns that the case, at least until Hitler, was the high-water mark in European history of agitation over the race. The Dreyfus of the film is merely an individual victim of injustice, and Zola's contribution is to a discussion much narrower than that which actually raged during a decade of near-revolution in France. So that once again the film dwindles its material—saving enough of it, nevertheless, to provide in Dreyfus's humiliation and reinstatement the two most moving moments of the whole, and indeed two moments that rise above most such things on the screen.

For that matter "The Life of Emile Zola" is, considering the many good things in it, a worthy film. But it is not among the best, and in the nature of things it could not be. Zola's characteristic deeds were his books, and a series of books is not a story; or if it is, it has already been told and can only lose by paraphrase.

MARK VAN DOREN

RECORDS

MOZART'S Violin Sonatas K 378 and 454 (Victor: five records, $10) are, for me, matters of great interest and pleasure, both of which are diminished by Heifetz's playing. And to know what it is that I dislike in the musical style of Heifetz's playing, you need only listen to Emanuel Bay, who plays the piano with him: listen to the continuous, though sensitive, line that Bay draws with a melody, then to the way Heifetz breaks it up with little swells. The melody issues from the piano with all its distinction and elegance; from the violin it issues affected, sentimentalized, vulgarized.

On the other hand, Brahms's Piano Quartet Opus 26 (Victor: four records, $8) is a work that interests and pleases me very little: I am aware of craft and cerebration even in passages that are beautiful and moving ("So many preparations and circumlocutions," Tchaikovsky complained, "for something which ought to come and charm us at once"). But the spontaneity, vitality, and fire that are not in the music are in the marvelous performance of Rudolf Serkin and members of the Adolf Busch String Quartet. Serkin's playing is particularly fine, and Busch's tone has a warmth that it has often lacked. Recording is excellent.

The spontaneity, vitality, and fire that are absent from Brahms's quartet are also present, with marvelous richness of substance, in Dvorak's Slavonic Dances. Victor issued a first series a year ago, and has issued a second now (five ten-inch records, $5.50). They are superbly performed by the Czech Philharmonic under Talich, and excellently recorded; and the combination of music and performance makes this, for me, the outstanding set of Victor's July list.

Most of Musicraft's antiquarian research I have not found very rewarding; but the Sonata for violin and figured bass of Purcell, on a single record ($1.50), has two slow movements which I find extraordinarily beautiful. Nor are they by any means exceptional: there is more where this sonata came from; and Musicraft can do no better than to let us have it. Mr. Trenkel's violin throbs a bit too much; aside from that the performance, with figured bass played by Ernst Victor Wolff (harpischord) and S. Hunkins ('cello), is excellent. Another Musicraft release is a delightful String Quartet of Dittersdorf, excellently performed by the Perole String Quartet (two records, $3).

Among the Brunswick-Polydor chamber-music releases is Verdi's String Quartet, which has some lovely and charming pages. The Prisca Quartet plays the first three movements well enough, but fails to achieve the lightness and spirit that should be in the last movement. Recording is good (four ten-inch records, $4.50). The same group's performance of Beethoven's Quartet Opus 59 No. 2 is vastly inferior to that of the Budapest Quartet on Victor; there is therefore no reason to endure the frequent breaks involved in the six ten-inch records ($6).

On Columbia singles (each $1.50) are a performance of the little Boccherini 'Cello Sonata No. 6 by Maurice Maréchal, and a performance of some of Tchaikovsky's charming music for the ballet "The Sleeping Beauty" (used by the Monte Carlo Ballet in "Aurora's Wedding") by the Paris Symphony under Szyfer—both good, and both well recorded.

B. H. HAGGIN

RESORTS

THE PRESSES in BUSHKILL, PA.
THE IDEAL SUMMER RESORT
ROSH HASHANAH and LABOR DAY—
A double holiday you ought to spend at
The Press's Bushkill View Camp
Telephone or write at once
Tel. Bushkill 9011 Box 145 Bushkill, Penn.

BARLOW FARM
Sherman, Conn.
Modern conveniences, swimming, tennis, etc.
$20 PER WEEK
For Information N. Y. MAin 4-8276, evenings

Enjoy week-ends and vacation, at modern farm resort. Rest, recuperate in exhilarating air of Ramapo foothills. All sports, lake, excellent food, 20 miles from city. $1.20 round trip. Rates after Labor Day, $3 per day and $18 per week. "Marteromo," Pearl River, N. Y. Tel. 973.

FURNISHED ROOM

Beautiful large southern room. Separate entrance, small, private family. Close to 7th and 8th Ave. subways. Evenings, CHel. 3-7670.

ROOM AND CARE

Semi-invalid lady wishes room and some care in house or apartment with graduate nurse where no mental cases are taken and which is not Jewish. Bet. 40th and 80th Sts., East Side. Write Box 947, care of The Nation.

STUDENT WANTED

Hospital Clinical Laboratory will accept one student for year of intensive work in clinical laboratory procedures. State age, education, occupation. Box No. 948, c/o The Nation.

TUTORING

Full time day tutoring. Grammar school grades. Five boys. Individual attention. Assured progress. Hot lunches. Outdoor exercise. Home delivery. Jerome Silverstein, 118 Riverside Drive.

INSTRUCTION

IT'S FUN TO WRITE!

It's fun to write short stories, articles, novels, plays, etc.—and profitable, too, as witness the accomplishments of our students. If you have the [illegible] write—and want to start—you will be interested in our book CAREERS IN WRITING—absolutely FREE. CAREERS IN WRITING deals exhaustively with every phase of the writing field, and indicates the money-making opportunities in each. Send a postcard today, requesting your free copy. Write promptly!

U. S. SCHOOL OF WRITING
20 West 60th St. Dept. 57 New York City

SYMPHONIC RECORDS

MUSIC LOVERS 100,000 of the finest records in the world on sale at 50c and 75c per record (value $1.50 and $2). The Symphonies, Chamber Music, Operas, etc., of Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart., Wagner, etc. Mail Orders. Catalog. The Gramophone Shop, Inc., 18 E. 48th St., New York.

FOR SALE

FOR PARENTS ONLY

We have built several beautifully complete modern homes on Lounsbury Road, Croton-on-Hudson, especially for families whose children will attend the Hessian Hills School. Only two of these homes are still available.

These homes are situated on the slope of a wooded hill overlooking the magnificent Hudson . . . near the School and the Croton shopping center, with 50-minute express train service to Grand Central Station.

They have 6 rooms, 2 baths and all modern conveniences. Each house has nearly an acre of ground fully landscaped. Owners will share the privilege of a large private lake.

By paying as little as $81 per month, including all costs, principal, interest, insurance and taxes, you can buy one of these homes. This is less than the rent for a comparable house.

For each family we will pay the tuition of one child for one year at the Hessian Hills School.

For details of this most unusual offer, inquire of WESTMANTON REALTY CORP.

55 Fifth Avenue, New York
ALgonquin 4-5730 or Croton 777

WRITERS SERVICE

DOES YOUR WRITING SUCCEED as it should? Intelligent, sincere students consider my help invaluable. ROBERT L. NEWMAN, 251 West 71st Street, New York City.

LANGUAGES

Language Phone Sets
Bought, sold, rented, exchanged. Language Service, 507-5th Ave. MUr. 2-4221.

LITERARY SERVICES

Special Articles, Reviews, Theses, Speeches, prepared to specifications. Convenient Service. Authors Research Bureau, 516 Fifth Ave., New York

MAGAZINE

Do You Know that vital information for which you are looking to determine how to vote in the coming elections will be in the

SEPTEMBER ISSUE OF

State of Affairs

(10c a copy)

which will contain Tammany's and Copeland's record, votes of your assemblyman, alderman and boro-president, what happened to labor legislation at Albany, how housing will affect the elections, etc.

Subscribe to this valuable Monthly Digest of New York City and State Politics and Legislation.

$1 A YEAR

CIVIC RESEARCH BUREAU,
Room 438, 799 Broadway, New York City
Enclosed please find $1 for subscription to STATE OF AFFAIRS for one year.
Name ....
Address ....
City.................... State..........

Letters to the Editors

Protest and Correction

Dear Sirs: In your issue of August 14 Mr. Benjamin Stolberg, in his article entitled Vigilantism, 1937, offers a list of groups which he elects to class as vigilante or fascist organizations. His inclusion among these fascist groups of the Ohio League for Constitutional Rights evidences a gross disregard of facts or a crude indifference to them.

Two and a half years ago this league was conceived by a small group of courageous liberals who felt grave concern for those very trends in anti-democratic opinion which Mr. Stolberg is writing about. The leader was the late Walter J. Shepard, then dean of the Arts College at the Ohio State University, president of the American Political Science Association, nationally recognized as author and educator, and one of the truest exponents of militant liberalism in the country. Ultimately the chairmanship was taken by a distinguished leader of the Ohio bar, former Supreme Court Justice Robert N. Wilkin of New Philadelphia, a man whose devotion to democratic idealism and whose abhorrence of fascist-mindedness is recognized and respected all over the state.

In the short period of its existence the Ohio League for Constitutional Rights has, among other activities, twice investigated unlawful arrests by Columbus police—each time of alleged Communists—and been instrumental in procuring the reversal of a teachers'-tenure case, and the reversal of two arbitrary rulings by the Division of Censorship on banned motion pictures—"The Amateur Fire Brigade" and "A Greater Promise." It investigated the so-called "sitdown strike" in the Governor's office by members of the Workers' Alliance and, after interviewing personally several of the strikers, concluded and publicly stated that the protesters were lawfully ejected, and that while there were instances of excessive violence, the force used was on the whole not abusive. It publicly protested against the unlawful exclusion of a C. I. O. organizer from the city of Lancaster this June and has made an analysis of the violations of civil rights at Massillon as revealed by testimony in a case now pending.

Contrary to Mr. Stolberg's irresponsible inferences the league is an organization which is the very antithesis of vigilantism. Can it be that fascist-baiters, even as red-baiters, have lost the capacity or the will to recognize an aggressive liberalism that is neither left nor right?

ROBERT E. MATTHEWS, Secretary
Columbus, Ohio, August 21

Dear Sirs: Mr. Jack Day, field secretary of the Ohio League for Constitutional Rights, came to see me to object to my mention of his organization in the same breath with various vigilante groups in my Nation article. I have also received several letters from other officers of the league.

Mr. Day was easily able to show that I had been mistaken. We were also able to trace just how the mistake had been made. And now it gives me real pleasure to apologize in making this correction. Far from being a vigilante outfit, the league is an authentic civil-liberties organization, intent on doing exactly what it professes, although unfortunately both its professions and its deeds have at times been so extremely cautious and ultra-conservative as to annoy some of its more progressive friends in Ohio.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG
New York, August 25

Are Writers Dumb?

Dear Sirs: I wish to disagree heartily with every opinion expressed in the review of "Little Children" published in The Nation of August 21. I have no doubt the author of the review knows what he's talking about, and a lot more besides which he isn't bandying around at the present time; but for my part I can't make head or tail of it. Every bit of it reads like something that means something, and if I didn't know better and if it wasn't about a book I've written, I'd say the reviewer had something there.

For several years now, as a hobby and as a means of not losing my mind, I have been trying to understand my writing by comparing what I know about it with what intelligent critics know about it, and I don't seem to be getting anywhere. If the critics can understand what I have written well enough to be able to write so wisely of it, why can't I understand what they write about what I've written, which they understand so well? Don't they know how to write, or what? Or are writers just naturally dumb and people who oughtn't to write? Or is writing unnecessary, except writing about writing? Or should critics write the stuff itself, which so far writers, through some miscalculation somewhere, have written? Or what? Like Sherwood Anderson, I want to know. Please print this letter and let's all engage in an old-fashioned controversy and may the best side win. WILLIAM SAROYAN
New York, August 19

Broun Was Right

Dear Sirs: Mr. Broun wrote in The Nation of July 10: "If . . . anybody can imagine the Scripps-Howard chain being wrong, then . . . when that legendary day comes, Memphis, Tennessee, will be out of luck. Only one version will be served to it." I wonder if he knew how very pertinent his remarks were.

When the court fight began, the professionally liberal Memphis Press-Scimitar, in which Mr. Broun's column had long appeared regularly, held its editorial peace while its columnists (Clapper, Johnson, and Broun) wrote glowingly of the President's attempt to unpack the court. But when the Press-Scimitar felt that public opinion was drifting definitely away from Roosevelt, and when Clapper and Johnson turned to pleading with the President to abandon his plan, the paper, in front-page editorials, began to scream as loudly as Mr. McCormick. And Mr. Broun's column ceased to appear regularly. Indeed, it has not appeared in the Press-Scimitar more than a dozen times in the past three months—and on these occasions it was on everything but politics. Mr. Broun need wait no longer for his legendary day. His wise and righteous employers have already proved his point.

DALE MULLEN
Oxford, Miss., August 15

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 11, 1937 NUMBER 11

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 249
EDITORIALS:
THE ATTACK ON THE LABOR BOARD 252
ANTI-BRITISH HYSTERIA 253
HOUSING AND MR. ICKES 254
TAMMANY'S LAST STAND by Max Lerner 255
TOWARD A BIGGER LITTLE ENTENTE by M. E. Ravage 258
DETROIT'S LABOR SLATE by Joel Seidman 260
WHAT CHANCE HAS CHINA? by Maxwell S. Stewart 262
REVOLUTION IN THE DEEP SOUTH by Dero A. Saunders 264
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 267
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
A GOOD DOCTOR'S STORY by William Carlos Williams 268
NORTH OF THE 60TH PARALLEL by W. H. Hobbs 268
EUROPE'S WARS by Rose M. Stein 269
MANN AND SUPERMAN by Harry Levin 270
FANTASIA ON THE LEFT by Sidney Hook 270
CRESSIDA OF TROY by Mark Van Doren 271
F.W.P. HOMEWORK by Horace Gregory 272
SHORTER NOTICES 273
FILMS: A DEDICATED INTELLECT by Ben Belitt 274
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 274

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER

Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editor MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

✶

JOHN L. LEWIS'S RADIO REPORT ON THE state of the C. I. O. was an impressive document, both in the hearing and the reading. Its claim of an enrolment of almost three and three-quarter million marks the C. I. O. as the leading labor federation in the country. Its appeal for the cooperation of the working farmers places it squarely in the main stream of the American tradition. Its indictment of the violence that employers have used in their attempts to fight the C. I. O. is in no sense extreme, and despite instances of labor violence it places the emphasis where it belongs. Its bitter commentary on the police massacres in the steel strike and on the failure of the federal authorities to take any action or utter any protest is completely justified. It is only when Mr. Lewis turns to Mr. Roosevelt and the question of his neutrality in the struggle for labor organization that he chooses his ground badly. We feel that Mr. Lewis's real count against the President should not be that he has chosen to remain neutral in the labor struggle. The real count against him is that, through fear of middle-class hysteria, he failed to enforce rigidly the federal statutes under which the government should have proceeded against the steel companies and their arsenals. Real neutrality would have meant law enforcement; and, in the steel strike at least, that is what labor did not get. We do not regard the President's Labor Day message as an adequate answer. Nevertheless, despite the exchange of artillery fire between Mr. Lewis and the President, a genuine break between the Administration and the C. I. O. is unlikely for some time. Each needs the other too badly. And each knows it.

✶

THE SOVIET UNION'S NOTE TO ITALY FLATLY charging the Fascist government with responsibility for the recent submarine attacks on neutral shipping in the Mediterranean has injected a sadly needed note of realism into the discussions of "piracy." There has never been the slightest doubt about who the pirates really were. The Spanish rebels do not possess any submarines capable of waging the type of undersea warfare which has been carried on against Spanish-government and neutral ships in recent weeks. Germany has been playing too cautious a game with England to risk being involved in such a campaign. Italy, on the other hand, has cast off all pretense of non-intervention since the capture of Santander. While England would have preferred to avoid disclosing such ugly facts as the identity of the pirates, thirteen months of blind-man's-bluff diplomacy in the Spanish situation have shown its utter ineffectiveness in checking fascist aggression. Facing the threat of an illegal Japanese blockade of neutral shipping in the Pacific, the democratic powers must find a technique for collective action against irresponsible attacks on world shipping. This cannot be done by ignoring their source or pretending that they are wholly unrelated to basic fascist strategy. If we are to judge by past experience, the piracy will cease only if the democratic countries serve notice that their combined navies will protect neutral shipping wherever and whenever it is attacked.

*

WE GREET WITH MINGLED SATISFACTION and regret W. R. Hearst's withdrawal of his proposed $35,500,000 bond issues, and the action of the SEC in letting him get away with it. It is good to know that Hearst bonds will not at present be offered to the public, but unfortunate that no test could be made of the specific charges contained in numerous protests filed with the commission. Under the present interpretation of the law the commission doubtless felt that it had no choice other than to permit the withdrawal. It remembered that an attempt last year to keep a broker by the name of Jones from withdrawing after the commission had smelled fraud was severely rebuked by the Supreme Court in a six-to-three decision. The six said such action would be an infringement of liberty comparable to the oppression of the Stuarts. The three, speaking through Justice Cardozo, answered quite aptly: "To permit an offending registrant to stifle an inquiry by precipitate retreat on the eve of his exposure is to give immunity to guilt, to encourage falsehood and evasion, to invite the cunning and unscrupulous to gamble with detection. If withdrawal without leave may check investigation before securities have been issued, it may do so thereafter. . . . The statute and its sanctions become the sport of clever knaves." The last sentence makes us think the learned judge may have had some prescience. Well, the commission undoubtedly felt it had to follow what was constitutional law. Let it be noted, what was constitutional law. It would be interesting to find out what is constitutional law on this subject, given a court that has since suffered a change of heart as well as a change of personnel.

*

THE OUTCOME OF THE STUTTGART CONGRESS of Germans Living Abroad provides an object lesson in how to keep Nazis within the bounds of reason. The convention proceeded on the well-tried Hitler theory that if you ask for a foot you may get an inch, but if you reach out for a mile you can get it while your opponent recovers his breath. Ernst Wilhelm Bohle, of the Foreign Office, ordered all Germans living abroad to organize to combat "old liberal ideas"; plans were announced to add three "cultural attachés" to each of Germany's foreign embassies; and, to top it off, Foreign Minister von Neurath as much as dared foreign governments to interfere with Nazi propagandists. England has been all too lenient with the aberrations of Berlin statesmen, but this was too much. The London Times condemned the whole program of the congress, and the press was told officially that the British government stood behind "every word" of the Times editorial. And the Yorkshire Post, mouthpiece of Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden, rhetorically inquired: "Could any impertinence be more naive?" As a result, von Neurath's Diplomatische Korrespondenz hastened to assure the world that the Stuttgart speeches were not intended to be provocative, the cultural-attaché notion was dropped completely, and Herr Goebbels himself wound up the conclave with a soft crunching of sour grapes. "There is no need for us to send special officials to London, Paris, or Washington," he concluded. "Members of the National Socialist Party abroad are the leaven of Germanism in the world." All this would be heartening if there were any sign that our own Secretary of State had profited by the demonstration. On the contrary he insists, over the protest of his own ambassador to Germany, on permitting an envoy to appear at the Nazi Party congress now in session at Nürnberg, thereby giving that eight-day tirade against democracy the official recognition of the American government.

*

GRIM TALES FROM THE DEEP SOUTH KEEP popping up with an alarmingly increasing frequency. In Dallas, Texas, a minor reign of terror has been going on for the past eight or nine weeks, replete with kidnappings, blackjackings, and the traditional tar and feathers. In every instance—there have been twelve so far—the victim was an active labor organizer. George Baer, vice-president of the United Hat, Cap, and Millinery Workers' Union was attacked on a downtown street, kidnapped, and severely beaten. Another gang pounced on Herbert Harris and George Lambert, Socialist Party organizers, stole the film "Millions of Us," which they had been exhibiting, destroyed $700 worth of sound and motion-picture equipment, and carried their victims off for a tar-and-feather party on the banks of the Trinity River. Behind the terror is said to be the Dallas Open Shop Association, working hand in glove with the Dallas plant of the Ford Motor Company. Even more ominous than the source of this gangsterism is the sufferance, if not the connivance, of the Dallas police. So quickly did they announce that they had "no clues and are dropping the case," that Governor Allred, much to his credit, sent state rangers into the city to protect labor leaders and suppress mob violence. In New Orleans Henry Hermes, secretary of the Socialist Party local, was arrested for "attempting to incite a riot by distributing slanderous literature attacking our state and city government." He was held incomunicado for thirteen hours, only to be released on bond and practically delivered into the waiting arms of thugs who beat him unmercifully. A few weeks ago Michigan witnessed the creation of the first statewide Civil Rights Federation. Citizens of Texas and Louisiana can best combat vigilantism by following suit.

IF THE SPANISH GOVERNMENT HAD SOUGHT to create a case against the Catholic hierarchy in Spain it could not have done better than to issue the pastoral letter recently prepared by the Spanish prelates now in fascist territory. In order to understand the letter it must be realized that it was addressed not to world opinion but to Catholic opinion, particularly in Europe, which has been increasingly critical of the role of Spanish Catholicism in the revolt. The European Catholic press has been disturbed by the undeniable evidence of terrorism on the part of the rebels and by the fact that the Catholic church in Spain was closely linked with the chief enemy of the church in Europe—the Nazis. The document itself is replete with quotations from the Catholic press protesting against the excesses which the so-called defenders of the church have committed. In the fanatical zeal with which the rebel prelates rush to the defense of the Franco regime is the most convincing evidence possible of the political commitments of the Spanish hierarchy. The moderate republican government of pre-revolutionary Spain is denounced with unholy vehemence, and considerable space is given to defending the use of violence in seeking to uproot this "Communist" regime. The outworn argument that the military struck just in time to head off a Communist revolution is repeated without an iota of evidence to support the contention. Incidentally, the document is dated July 1, which raises the interesting question of why it should now be published with a Vatican City date line, giving the wholly unjustified impression that the Vatican has recognized Franco. No such step has been taken, and if this internal squabble may be regarded as evidence, there is little likelihood that it will be taken.

*

THE BASIS OF THE WIDESPREAD RUMORS OF racketeering among the Spanish relief organizations was revealed by the State Department's figures on the amount of relief actually sent to Spain by the various agencies and the supplementary figures issued by the agencies themselves. It appears that all the groups have commendable records except the American Committee for Spanish Relief, a pro-rebel organization headed by Ogden H. Hammond, former ambassador to Spain. This organization, which was launched with a great splurge at a Madison Square Garden mass-meeting, is shown to have sent not a penny to Spain out of the $30,753 which it collected for war sufferers, and to have swallowed more than $25,000 in "expenses." In contrast, the North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy and the Confederated Spanish Societies to Aid Spain, which have shipped $633,147 worth of foodstuffs, clothing, and medical supplies, have spent only $84,586 for publicity and administration, or 13 cents out of every dollar collected. The Medical Bureau to Aid Spanish Democracy has taken in $165,120 and shipped $119,353 worth of supplies to Spain at a cost of only $26,871—about 14 cents on the dollar. It is not without pride that we note that no group excelled the record established by The Nation's Food Ship, which—because of volunteer help—was able to dispatch supplies worth $25,550 at a total cost of only 3 cents on the dollar. On the basis of this accomplishment we challenge comparison with the American Red Cross.

*

MANY HEIRS APPARENT WILL DOUBTLESS BE mentioned for the Roosevelt succession between now and 1940. It is a fascinating game, because you can name anyone you wish, and who is able to refute you? Albert Warner of the New York Herald Tribune wrote a sensational story last week asserting that Mr. Roosevelt, in conversation with intimate friends, had put Senator Robert M. La Follette at the head of the list. To be sure, La Follette's nomination would enrage the Southerners and throw conservatives into a paralysis. To be sure, also, he is not a Democrat. And to be sure, finally, if Mr. Roosevelt has as much control over the convention in 1940 as he had over Congress in 1937, his efforts in a man's behalf might prove something less than an asset. Despite these objections, however, the rumor is not without a certain plausibility. We remember a similar story that Stanley High wrote for the Saturday Evening Post naming Wallace as the heir, and other stories naming Murphy, Earle, and McNutt. All such talk is idle except as a preliminary way of testing sentiment for a candidate. We hereby announce that our sentiment has been tested, and that of all the gentlemen so far named—including the President, for a third term—we lean toward La Follette. He comes closest to having progressive social views, a realistic feeling for the means to be used in accomplishing them, a sense of balance in politics, a militant background, and deep roots in the movements both for workers' rights and for farmers' security. We can think of no one who would make a better candidate for a farmer-labor party, or whatever its equivalent is likely to be in 1940.

*

TOM GIRDLER MADE A POINT OF TELLING the world that he would not sign a union contract because if he did the next demand would probably be for a check-off of union dues. This concern for the pockets of his workers makes particularly interesting a device recently introduced in Republic Steel's Canton, Ohio, plant. Each "loyal" worker—particularly those induced by the strong arm of the state militia to leave the picket line and return to work—has been handed a card reading as follows: "I hereby subscribe $.... to help defray legal fees and expenses incurred by reason of employees' petition to Common Pleas Court for restraining order and injunction against the C. I. O. with respect to their unlawful interference with our right to go to and from our work. Date........ Signed................." The company's name does not appear on the card, nor does that of any other organization. But the employees are given to understand that they are expected to sign the cards; and the amounts they pledge are deducted from their pay—in other words, collected by means of a check-off. Girdler will smash unionism even if his workers have to shell out good money to do it.

BROUN'S PAGE, WE ANNOUNCE WITH REGRET, will no longer appear in The Nation. Mr. Broun has neither resigned nor been dropped; he has merely moved. His reasons are his own and have not been vouchsafed even to us; but from occasional comments it seems safe to assume that they were substantially expressed in his article of last April 17 in which he attacked The Nation for pursuing a policy of "fair play" which permitted the use of its pages for criticisms of the President's Supreme Court plan such as had been contributed by Oswald Garrison Villard and Maurice Wertheim. In that article Mr. Broun rather cryptically invited The Nation to dispense with his services. We firmly declined the invitation. We liked Mr. Broun and his page, and we claimed for ourselves and our other regular contributors only the right we unquestioningly gave to him—free expression of opinion. The irony of Mr. Broun's disapproval was that he and we saw eye to eye on the court proposal—as well as on most other major issues; we differed from him only in believing that it merited debate and that the opposition had a right to be heard. This attitude continued to distress Mr. Broun. He contributed his page with increasing reluctance and irregularity; and now he has left us. We wish him well, but we shall watch his future progress with some misgivings; we suspect that the spirit of fair play may search him out and plague him in the pages of the New Republic as well.

The Attack on the Labor Board

MORE important than any of the speeches and statements about labor that were made over the Labor Day week-end by Mr. Lewis, Mr. Roosevelt, and Mr. Green is the controversy over a decision of the National Labor Relations Board. The case involved is that of the National Electric Products Corporation, which we discussed editorially two weeks ago while it was pending. The decision has called down upon the board the wrath of the employers, the A. F. of L., and the press, whose darlings both have become. There have been attacks on the board before this, notably by Senator Nye and Representative Rankin; there have been rumblings of discontent from the A. F. of L.; there has been a sustained campaign by big business and its press for the "revision"—that is, scrapping—of the Labor Relations Act: but the National Electric Products case has evidently been chosen as the strategic ground for the fusion of all these forces and the battle with the board.

What makes the case so strategic is that it subjects the Labor Board to the withering cross-fire of the war between the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. If one examines the case only hastily and superficially, it seems to present such a tangle of confusion as to justify the bewilderment of the newspaper writers and commentators. The tangle lies in the fact that not only are two unions involved in this case—and both of them "outside" unions—but also two governmental agencies—the Labor Board and the Federal District Court in Pennsylvania.

The sequence of events is somewhat as follows: The company, which manufactures electrical wire, cables, and other electrical products, and which employs about 1,500 men in its plant at Ambridge, Pennsylvania, had up to May of this year refused to recognize any outside union. During April and May a C. I. O. union conducted an intensive organizing campaign among the workers and claimed to have a majority. On May 20 and for a week thereafter it made several attempts to get the management to meet with the union for collective bargaining. The attempts failed. Meanwhile, however, an A. F. of L. union had approached the management and succeeded in holding conferences with it. A hurried organizing campaign took place in the factory, and on May 28 the company signed a closed-shop agreement with the A. F. of L. union. The C. I. O. union called a strike and shut the plant effectively. Late in June the plant was reopened pending a settlement of the case by the Labor Board. But late in July the A. F. of L. union, not content to await the decision of the board, asked the Federal District Court to compel the company to live up to its closed-shop agreement. The district judge complied and issued a decree calling for specific performance of the contract. On August 30 the Labor Board, after holding hearings, handed down a decision declaring the A. F. of L. agreement invalid because of the conditions under which it was obtained, stating that the decree of the District Court did not apply in a case where the Labor Board had been given exclusive jurisdiction by Congress, and ordering an election to determine which union was to be the legal bargaining agency.

The case is complex but by no means insoluble. The board, to our mind, has handled it with admirable fairness and shown skill in untangling its various strands. As far as the public is concerned, there are three basic questions that need answering. When each of two outside unions claims to be the bargaining unit, should the fact that one has already obtained a closed-shop agreement from the company change the usual procedure of ordering an election? Does the board have the power to examine the circumstances under which such a union has obtained a closed-shop agreement? What happens when the board's decision clashes with the decision of a federal district judge?

To see how clearly and adequately the board has answered these three questions one must read its full opinion. The board is not at all concerned with whether the company likes or dislikes a union. Its only concern is that the company should not translate its likes or dislikes into overt acts of persuasion or coercion. That is why the board did not let the fact that the A. F. of L. had already obtained a closed-shop agreement prevent it from examining the validity of this agreement under the Labor Act. It would have had to do the same if the union in question had been a C. I. O. union or a company union. In examining the validity of this agreement, the board had to find the answers to two questions. Was there actual persuasion or coercion by the company in inducing employees to join one union rather than another? Did the company ever have any evidence that the A. F. of L. union spoke for a majority of the workers?

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

The board's thirty-five-page opinion is packed with factual information in answer to both these questions. Those facts leave no doubt that there was collusion between the company and the A. F. of L. union to get around the Labor Relations Act. The company showed no interest in the A. F. of L. until the C. I. O. organizers claimed a majority, offered to show proof that they had it, and asked for a conference. Then the company officials conferred with the A. F. of L. representatives, while refusing to see any C. I. O. men. In talking with the A. F. of L. men they never once asked for evidence that the A. F. of L. union had a majority. They simply "believed" them. Here is an excerpt from the testimony of I. A. Bennett, the company's vice-president:

> Q. And you didn't think it was necessary to ask them to show any proof of that fact?
>
> A. They couldn't show me proof.
>
> Q. They couldn't show you proof?
>
> A. No.

As for the enlistment of membership in the A. F. of L. union, there was unchallenged testimony from one worker after another showing that the organizing was done on company time, that the company foremen took a hand in it, that the workers were told by the foremen and the superintendent that unless they joined the A. F. of L. union the company would lose business and they would lose their work, and that the notices for a union organizing meeting were run off on a company press, on company time, and with the knowledge of the company.

What further acts of persuasion and coercion one could ask an employer to undertake it is difficult to imagine. There remains, however, the question of the clash between the federal court and the Labor Board. On this too the case is clear. The Wagner Act creating the board gave it exclusive jurisdiction and power over unfair labor practices. Its orders, once handed down, were to be subject to review only by the Circuit Court of Appeals and ultimately only by the United States Supreme Court. The board does not claim to be the final judicial authority. As an administrative board its function is to interpret the Labor Act and settle conflicting claims under it. Like those of other administrative boards, its functions are quasi-judicial; in so far as it deals with judicial matters its findings are expressly made subject to review by the Circuit Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court.

A final word about the social logic of the attack on the Labor Board. The A. F. of L. has launched an intensive campaign to undercut the organizing activities of the C. I. O. The fact is that it does not have anything like the mass response and the mass support among the industrial workers that the C. I. O. has. Its technique has therefore increasingly become that of collusion with employers, who prefer the lesser evil of the A. F. of L. to the greater evil of the C. I. O. The present case is a beautiful instance of how this collusion operates. And the great sin of the Labor Board, in the eyes of William Green, Dan Tracy, the business interests, their lawyers, and their journalistic supporters, is that the board, by pursuing strictly its judicial and administrative duties, has upset their apple-cart.

Anti-British Hysteria

IN the past few weeks there has suddenly arisen in certain circles a suspicion of British foreign policy which is almost hysterical in intensity. It is epitomized in the catchy title of Quincy Howe's new book, "England Expects Every American to Do His Duty," but its intensity requires a more fundamental explanation than is to be found in his pages. A certain amount of anti-British feeling has existed in the United States from the Revolution down to modern times, as was evidenced, for example, by Mayor Thompson's antics in Chicago. The Nye investigation increased the suspicion, already existing, that England inveigled America into the World War to save its imperial interests. But even at the height of the Nye committee's activities, feeling against England did not approach its present strength.

The weakness of British foreign policy during the past few years has undoubtedly contributed to anti-British sentiment. While it may seem inconsistent that Americans, whose own country has been the chief offender in undermining the mechanism for collective security, should berate England for its failure to support collective action against Japan in 1931 and its vacillation on oil sanctions in 1935, this is precisely what has occurred. Americans are firm believers in the collective system as long as the United States is not involved. Similarly, Britain's failure to support democracy in Spain has created a very bad impression in this country although the application to Spain of our neutrality law has aided the rebels precisely as has England's non-intervention policy. Distrust of British policy was increased, moreover, by the stupidity and callousness with which the Cabinet handled the abdication and marriage of Edward. And the American public has taken even less kindly to the aloof Chamberlain than to the moral Baldwin. There is a widespread feeling, which the new Prime Minister has done little to alleviate, that the present British government may ultimately land on the side of Hitler.

To what degree these specific items in British policy account for the present antagonism toward England is hard to say. Quincy Howe gives very little space in his book to a detailed analysis of England's shortcomings and a great deal to the vague assertion that the British Empire is consciously looking to the United States to pull its chestnuts out of the fire. This interpretation of British policy is being freely applied to the Far Eastern crisis. Opponents of collective action are saying either that it is useless for the United States to consider taking action in the Orient, since Britain will not cooperate, or that this country should be wary of positive measures because Britain is only trying to use us to prop up its own interests in the East.

Nothing could be more unfortunate than that this distrust should serve to prevent cooperation between the two countries when the closest unity of action is essential. It is probably true that Great Britain would like to see the United States assume the leadership in any measures that are taken to curb Japanese aggression. But it is equally obvious that the United States would be only too gratified to see England bear the onus of action against Japan. Essentially, the interests of the two countries—economic, political, and social—are identical as far as China is concerned. The fact that a measure which served to check Japanese aggression would also be of assistance to Britain is by no means a convincing reason for refusing to cooperate in support of the Nine-Power Pact—which is very largely an American document.

Housing and Mr. Ickes

SECRETARY of the Interior Ickes, in a letter to the editors published elsewhere in this issue, takes us to task for saying that to place the federal low-rental housing program under the control of his department "would seem to assure, in view of the department's record in recent years, that no houses will be built for many months to come." The Nation admires Mr. Ickes's unquestioned honesty, his good intentions, and—even if we are the victims—his trenchant phrasing. But we still maintain that the record of his housing performance has been a public scandal.

He was appointed head of the Public Works Administration in July, 1933, with $123,000,000 at his disposal for slum clearance and public housing. Soon afterward he announced that the federal government would undertake housing projects only "where no properly constituted housing authority exists," and that local agencies would "be utilized to the fullest extent possible in the acquisition of sites, design, construction, and operation of projects." In line with that policy he wired Mayor LaGuardia in January, 1934, that $25,000,000 was earmarked for use by a New York City Housing Authority in constructing an initial project. In a month the New York City Housing Authority, with an unquestionably competent personnel, was organized and ready to do business. Similar authorities in other cities were hopefully set up.

But instead of following this sound policy Mr. Ickes suddenly reversed himself. Everything, it developed, had to be done not only through but by the PWA. Soon even the smallest detail of housing business in the PWA office became enmeshed in a tangle of checks and counter-checks that tied the whole program into knots. Mr. Ickes leaned over backward so far to keep his skirts clean that forward motion was all but impossible. Local authorities were scarcely even consulted. A number of them resigned or faded away because they had nothing to do. In New York a semblance of consultation remained, but only when it was found that the New York powers of condemnation had to be used to acquire property. A succession of heads of the PWA Housing Division testified to the administrative confusion: Kohn, Hackett, Clas, and now Gray. With these constant changes in personnel, numerous reorganizations of the Housing Division, earmarkings, allocations, allotments, and budgeting of funds for housing purposes, years elapsed before any construction even got under way. And in other cities PWA direction was if possible even less effective.

Caught in this morass of centralized bureaucracy, Mr. Ickes found he could not move fast enough to spend the funds available. He lost most of the $450,000,000 earmarked by Congress in April, 1935, when it was found the WPA could use the money more effectively for work relief of various sorts. But worse than the delays have been the costs of centralized authority. Building prices went up 25 per cent while PWA was going through the complex motions of the housing take-off. Because of its ignorance of local conditions and its needlessly elaborate specifications, contractors jacked up their estimates 10 to 20 per cent when bids were finally called for.

As a result a public housing program that might have given us an additional billion dollars' worth of low-rent housing in four years has succeeded in producing only about one-quarter of that amount. Not until this summer did the first low-rental project of any size open its doors in New York City—four years after Mr. Ickes's telegram to the Mayor; and that project was built not by the local authority as Mr. Ickes promised but by PWA itself. So it has been with all the other projects. Faltering and cumbersome administration has allowed only $134,000,000 of public housing money to pass through the PWA bottleneck so far; for fifty-one projects in thirty-eight cities—all built directly by the PWA. Administration and construction costs, of course, have risen to heights almost as scandalous as if they had been the result of graft instead of an over-exacting and jealous conscience.

So much for the past. The Wagner-Steagall bill, considerably mangled in the process of its passage, has now become law through the President's signature. Mr. Ickes has had his way. The new federal Housing Authority will be in his department, but under the direction of a housing administrator appointed by the President. As a result of excessive PWA spending, rigid limits—$1,250 a room in larger cities—have been placed on construction costs. The financial provisions will probably allow for only $500,000,000 worth of housing in the next three years. Slum clearance is too closely related to new construction, and the requirements for local financial contributions may slow up or even prevent some projects. The best part of the act is its denial of any direct federal power over the construction or operation of projects; local self-government in housing is now compulsory by law. And to Mr. Ickes's credit be it said that he advocated this policy himself at the hearings on the bill. At the very least a permanent housing program is now assured—one which with all its defects is sound in principle. For Mr. Ickes the act is a challenge which we hope he will eagerly and aggressively accept.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Tammany's Last Stand

BY MAX LERNER

THE political game is dirty and exciting wherever it is played. In America it is a national passion, but in New York City it affects the very fabric of living. New York has contributed three items to American culture: Wall Street, Broadway, and Tammany Hall. Wall Street has been under a shadow since 1929; Broadway has become a suburb of Hollywood; and now every sign points to the passing of Tammany Hall and the collapse of the most powerful urban political structure in history. There is a smell of decay in the air, and you can already hear the crash of falling timber.

Tammany, like every urban political machine, has always been a vast feudal structure, with its hierarchy of leadership linked by subinfeudation and homage. Always it has presented a monolithic mass to its enemies—a mass rotten and corrupt but at least unified in its corruption. This Tammany is now a house divided. In a political machine, where you must hold your mass following by loyalty rather than intelligence, disunion is fatal. For it confronts the rank and file with a choice; to choose you must think, and once the submarginal mind of the party hack starts to work, he is lost.

What has happened to change the shape of things for Tammany? Most people would answer: the sequence of scandals during the last decade and the lack of leadership in handling the shock of them. It is true that Charles Murphy's successors have been puny men, incredible blunderers, bewildered before the onrush of events. But the scandals, ending in the flight of Jimmy Walker in 1932, the fiasco of O'Brien and McKee, the victory of LaGuardia and the Fusion movement in 1933, are by no means a novelty in Tammany's history. Tammany has a theory for such obscure matters as waves of reform and the fall and rise of public wrath. Once every generation, says this Tammany theory of history, a sort of eruption takes place, but it's a good thing it does. It gives Tammany a breathing-spell; it lets the reform mayor do the dirty work of increasing taxes, cutting expenses, replenishing the treasury. Then Tammany sweeps back again, ready for the fatted calf.

But this time the Tammany law of history is obviously not going to work, and Tammany men are bewildered. In their dull, primitive way they personalize their plight and blame it on particular devils—on Roosevelt, on Farley, on LaGuardia. Actually they are being defeated by the drift of our economic life.

Manhattan, the stronghold of the Hall, no longer occupies its old place of dominance over the other four boroughs of Greater New York. In 1920 it had 40 per cent of the registered voters; today it has only 25 per cent. In the interval industry and population have been shifting—to Brooklyn, which is now larger than Manhattan; to the Bronx, which is slightly smaller. And while the old Tammany is still in control of Manhattan, the New Deal Tammany—the Flynn-Farley-Kelly outfit—is in control of the other four boroughs.

To understand how they gained this control one must remember that a fully developed capitalism must get rid of its cruder Tammany Halls. For one thing, they are incompetent to handle the problems of depression subsistence, which have become chronic with capitalism. For another, they are too expensive, and the heavy burdens they add to taxation are no longer compensated by the franchise favors which the corrupt city machines gave the corporations in the earlier days. The depression made Walker's and O'Brien's efforts at government wholly pathetic. Municipal bonds fell in value, and the alliance between Tammany and the downtown bankers was loosened. The old ham-sandwich methods of buying votes, moreover, were futile in the face of widespread desolation. Only federal funds could deal with hunger, and the WPA, rigidly administered from Washington, made the precinct and district leaders seem archaic. In the deepest sense it is the depression that has delivered the knockout blow to Tammany, and it is permanent depression as a phase of capitalism that is likely to keep it knocked out.

Under such conditions a city machine that is on the outs with the national administration cannot last. It has been Tammany's big mistake not to see that truth. The two-cent Tammany leader, living in an atmosphere of the most primitive social consciousness, with a vision bounded by the clubhouse and the parish church, regards the New Deal as a transient whim or a passing trick of fate, and the C. I. O. as the contrivance of Communists. He lives, like the émigrés, in the constant hope of counter-revolution, and like them he thinks it can be accomplished by the old methods. His slightly brighter brothers may, however, see the need for adapting the old dominance to new conditions. Hence the split in Tammany, and the ruinous primary contest between the diehards running Copeland and the New Deal bosses running Mahoney.

The leaders backing Copeland are the Sullivan-Marinelli crowd. Ever since Murphy's death the Tammany leaders have been like a group of Chinese war lords, concerned only with plunder and personal suzerainty. Sullivan is perhaps the weakest leader Tammany has ever had. Technically his business is real estate; actually he is a race-track hanger-on. A lower East Side district like Sullivan's generally costs something like $25,000 to $30,000 a year to run. Some of it is made up through levies and "socials"; where the rest comes from is part of the dark forest of politics. Sullivan's own hold on his district is precarious; rumors are that he is in danger of losing it to Aaron Neiberg, a big Hungarian undertaker on Ludlow Street. As for Marinelli, who controls Sullivan, he has a sort of animal cunning within a limited mentality. Their present course in supporting Copeland is clearly suicidal, at least as far as the Democratic primaries are concerned; for Copeland stands not the slightest chance outside Manhattan. Behind Copeland, who has entered both Republican and Democratic primaries, is a combination of Smith-Raskob-Hearst Liberty Leaguers which embraces both parties with an inclusive hug. Money is pouring in freely from these sluices for the Copeland candidacies in both primaries. It was this golden flow that kept the Sullivan-Marinelli crowd from withdrawing Copeland when Grover Whalen withdrew in favor of Mahoney.

The best that can be said for Candidate Copeland is that he is a good soldier. When Senator Wagner refused to run, Copeland stepped dutifully into the breach. His qualifications were obvious. He had once been Mayor of Ann Arbor, Michigan; he was a doctor who had built up a large personal following by his health columns in the Hearst press; he was considered a great vote-getter, having been elected to the Senate three times; he was a bitter opponent of the New Deal. Dr. Copeland has worked hard on his career, and, as Senators go, he does not lack intelligence. He might have been a good doctor if he had not become a quack Senator. What he lacks is moral fiber. His whole political career has revealed in him a cunning in serving his masters, the vested interests of business and politics, combined with an abject lack of self-respect. His clinging to Hearst, his tenderness toward the patent-medicine interests in his food-and-drug bill and his paid broadcasts on a Fleischmann's Yeast program at the very time the bill was being considered, his glossing over of the shipowners' guilt in his committee report on the Morro Castle disaster, his attempt to put through a "fink book" system for the maritime workers; his demagogic attacks on Rosevelt and the labor movement—these give some notion of the man's stature. His only mass support is likely to come from the clubhouse and the swastika—from the Manhattan Irish and the Yorkville and Queens Germans. He is the natural candidate of the Germans, not only because of LaGuardia's anti-Nazism and Mahoney's stand on the Berlin Olympics, but because Copeland's own anti-labor views and his promises to use police repression in strikes endear him to the Nazis. Fritz Kuhn came out openly in support of him, and Copeland's mistake was to wait a week before repudiating the support. The report is that he is slow at mathematics.

Candidate Jeremiah T. Mahoney is decidedly the more refined type of Tammany leader. He has, at least, a personal appeal of a sort—a big, craggy, impressive human specimen, in excellent physical shape, with a pleasant smile and a decisive manner of speaking. A law partner of Senator Wagner, he caught by contagion a trace of the Senator's liberalism, but only a trace. As President of the A. A. U. in 1935 he led the movement for non-participation in the German Olympics. He lost the fight to Avery Brundage, but the fiasco of the games restored him to the presidency this year. Yet no sooner was he elected than he appointed Brundage, the Naziphile, chairman of the crucial foreign-relations committee. So completely does the politician in him dominate the liberal.

Mahoney's most vendible quality as a mayoralty candidate now is his reputed appeal to the Jewish vote because of his Olympic stand—an appeal that he underlined at the beginning of his campaign by addressing a Jewish audience in Yiddish. But his most enduring quality as a politician is a knowledge of what the traffic will bear in machine politics. It is unlikely that he would ever lend himself to the more brazen corruptions of the Walker regime; yet it is he and Flynn who must be held responsible for the stupid handing of a juicy political plum to Jimmy Walker two weeks ago. The truth is that while it campaigns under a New Deal banner, the Farley-Flynn New York machine is one of the more unlovely aspects of the Administration. Mahoney himself, a child of Tammany to the bone—in fact, much more so than the Tammany candidate, Copeland—has been cast by the ironic logic of events in the role of an anti-Tammany crusader, and the part just doesn't fit him.

LaGuardia is by all odds the outstanding personality in the history of the New York mayoralty. A mercurial and omnivorous mind, an uncontrolled temper, a brilliance as speaker and administrator, an incredible flow of energy, a genius for making the everyday dramatic and for turning the resulting drama to the uses of every day—these are some of his qualities and possessions. He has packed four or five careers into one. And always he has been an insurgent in ideas and a political polygamist in his party relations. A child of the many-tongued East Side, he has acquired and discarded party labels as easily as he has mastered languages. He has been Republican, La Follette Socialist, Republican again, Fusion, and Labor.

His 1933 election had a curious effect on the two parties which voted him into power. The Republican Party in the city is as much a machine as Tammany, only it has had exclusively lean years and is therefore all the hungrier. The clubhouse boys licked their chops when LaGuardia came to power. They saw in him a reform mayor who had gone through the ordeal by fire in practical politics. When they found that he really meant to refuse them jobs, they were stunned; and when, adding insult to injury, he called them a bunch of "clubhouse loafers," their anguish had no bounds.

There are at least four attitudes toward him now among the Republicans. One is that of the silk-stocking Park Avenue group, who hate him as they hate Roosevelt. The less obsessed members of the group, like Ogden Mills, have a special variant of this attitude. LaGuardia, says Mills, promised him in 1933 in return for Republican support that he would keep out of the national political picture; and Mills feels he has broken his promise. The second group is the clubhouse gang, led by Crews of Brooklyn, Ashmead of Queens, and Knewitz of the Bronx. Their hope and their disappointment are alike purely predatory. In the third group are the practical politicians like Simpson of Manhattan. Simpson has played a shrewd game. He held off from too early a commitment on LaGuardia in order not to alienate his followers, and then he stole a march on the Mayor and presented him with the fait accompli of a list of Republican names—McGoldrick, Morris, Isaacs—in addition to his own. It was a bold stroke and it worked. Simpson's aim is to put in the Republican column the best vote-getter in the city; to prevent the return of Tammany while the Republicans are building their strength; to use the Labor Party as a corrosive for eating away Tammany's mass base; and, not least, to get safe men elected to the state Constitutional Convention, which will have great importance for the future of New York politics. Then there is a fourth and final Republican group which supports LaGuardia squarely in the name of good city government. These are the progressive Republicans typified by Samuel Seabury and William Chadbourne. They are a curious lot: some are business men or rentiers; others are lawyers, torn between civic nobility and corporation fees, clinging finally to good government.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Cal.

If you consider that the left wing of LaGuardia's support in 1933 was the City Fusion Party, and that today it is the American Labor Party—and, more negligibly, the Communists—you get a way of appraising the new base of progressive political action in New York. The City Fusion Party was never a real party. It did yeoman's work in electing LaGuardia in 1933, but it was never more than a mechanism whereby independent Democrats, progressive Republicans, stray Socialists, and mugwumps of all kinds could rally to his support. As soon as the election was over, it began to disintegrate, and it is not unfair to say that it is now scarcely more than an emblem on the voting machine. If LaGuardia had to rely today on the kind of support that elected him in 1933, he would be wise to dust off his lawyer's shingle. That is what happened to Seth Low and John P. Mitchell. But it is not going to happen to LaGuardia.

Why? The answer is generally given in terms of racial groups: he has the support of the Jews, Italians, Negroes, etc. That answer, despite its supposed realism, is to me superficial. Why does he have the support of these groups? If you could get the Jewish vote by consigning Hitler to the Chamber of Horrors, or the Negro vote by appointing a Negro magistrate or making speeches in Negro churches, politics would be a sweet and lovely pursuit. I am not saying these things are unimportant, but their importance is imbedded in a larger context. That context is the achievement of a social program by the city administration, the creation of a progressive climate of opinion throughout the city, and the confident welding of labor into a disciplined and mobile mass political organization. That is what separates 1937 from 1933; that is what distinguishes LaGuardia from Mitchell and breaks the taboo on the return of reform administrations; that is, finally, what gives LaGuardia a vote of over 60 per cent in the New York Post straw poll.

LaGuardia is primarily the candidate of the American Labor Party. His place on the city Fusion column is a residue, and any place he may get on the Republican column will be an accident. But his connection with labor is integral. His great strength will lie in the industrial boroughs—Brooklyn and the Bronx; in Manhattan, although labor is still under Tammany dominance, the Labor Party is beginning to break through. His weakness will be where labor is weakest—in Queens and Richmond.

It is not that militant labor has any illusions about LaGuardia. Under stress he would use, and has used, repression in labor disputes. He has handled the relief problem and relief delegations with an intolerant assurance. He is as capable of red-baiting, given the right provocation, as the next man. And yet, once phrased, these objections have a strangely academic sound. Labor has no desire, in a period of intense organization, to be merely a protest group. It is following the policy of effective political action—of getting as much and as good housing, schooling, sanitation, wages, and working conditions as it can get. It wants to pick its direction and move forward as fast as the objective conditions will allow.

I go along with this position, but I am aware of the dangers implicit in it. The habit of opportunism and compromise is not an easy one to shake off, even when the chance for decisive social transformation really arrives. And the case of Tom Dewey raises the question of where labor will set the limits of its support. Dewey knows little about labor. He made his reputation by exposing rackets, among them labor rackets. He performed a necessary surgical operation, but many honest labor people feel he was unnecessarily hard on the patient. The Labor Party's decisive support of Dewey's candidacy for district attorney was strategically wise: it served notice to the world that only honest and militant unionists were wanted in the party. And yet as far as Dewey himself is concerned, his vision of labor is thus far bounded by his experience with the racketeering unions. He is young and may learn—and again he may not. That is a gamble the Labor Party is taking.

There is one final danger. Labor is not entering into politics in any goo-goo spirit of reform. It wants results in social terms; it knows also how to act in realistic terms. I have talked with reporters in New York who have been following Tammany for years, and they tell me that the labor people do not suffer from comparison in tough-mindedness with Tammany. In fact, there is an inverted sentimentality in Tammany—the sentimentality of sticking to an underworld code—which labor lacks completely. Its leaders should make skilful politicians: they have been educated in the task of bargaining over concrete issues with tough-minded employers. The trade union, moreover, furnishes a superb cadre for political organization. The experience of getting out the Roosevelt trade-union vote in Chicago and New York last year showed how easily a shop chairman or business agent could be turned into something approaching a district leader. One of the lessons of the municipal campaigns will be the superiority of the trade union as a party base over the Tammany type of geographical organization.

One need scarcely point out how dangerous are these nettles from which labor must pluck the flower of strength. Labor will succeed in ousting Tammany. But in the process it must use enormous self-discipline. Labor wants no more Tammanies, not even labor Tammanies.

Toward a Bigger Little Entente

BY M. E. RAVAGE

Prague, August 15

NOTHING so well illustrates the new disorder in the Danube valley as the present status of the kingless kingdom of Hungary. For the better part of two decades this aggrieved and pugnacious remnant of the Hapsburg empire has been bullied and held down by its encircling neighbors. Today these same heirs of the Dual Monarchy's Magyar crownlands, or at any rate two of them, waft smiles and discreet kisses over the frontier at the hereditary foe. In theory, to be sure, Budapest remains what it has been all along for the capitals of the Little Entente—the potential disturber of things as they are. In practice, Belgrade and Prague have for some time been engaged in the keenest rivalry for Magyar favor, while Bucharest has been sitting uneasily on the fence, observing the contest with a watchful eye and ready to tumble to the side of the winner. The issue, unless I am much mistaken, is one of those that will determine whether Europe is to be restored to tranquillity or to speed on toward disaster.

The most Occidental nation of the three, the Czechs are politically an intelligent and adroit people. But their realism in the present confusion derives as much from necessity as from native wit. Heirs of a highly industrialized economy, surrounded by enemies or doubtful friends, menaced from within and without by the new "dynamic" Germanism, they have been perforce the first in the Danube basin to perceive that unless some semblance of unity be restored to the region, all its peoples alike are doomed to economic ruin and political annihilation. Hence Mr. Hodza's plan for "a widened Little Entente," which—comprising in addition to the existing group Hungary, Austria, and Bulgaria—would recreate the vanished imperium of the Hapsburgs. The Premier of Czecho-Slovakia is too much alive to the mistrusts and suspicions which for ages have divided Central Europeans to be over-sanguine. For the present, he tells me, he is thinking of nothing more ambitious than a kind of Zollverein among the six countries. That would perhaps not solve all the problems, but it would suffice as a beginning. By promoting their prosperity, it would render the little states less exposed to the intrigues of their colonizing neighbors, and thus contribute to the maintenance of peace. Some sort of political consolidation might follow later. The project might eventually even be extended to Poland and to the countries north of it, thus giving birth to a veritable Central European confederation.

For this conception to materialize even in its initial phase much will depend on the good-will and the realistic good sense of the men who govern in Budapest, as well as in London and Paris. The Czechs are disposed in the common interest to make serious concessions, including territorial ones, to Hungary. In return they ask but one thing—that the question of Magyar rearmament, which Prague is prepared to concede in principle, be determined by the civilized method of negotiation by all the interested parties instead of in the unilateral surprise fashion made familiar to us of late by the Wilhelmstrasse. From my conversations with Tibor Eckhardt I carried away the clear impression that the leader of the Peasant Party—who, should the Budapest Parliament vote the proposed revival of the secret ballot, may well head the next government of Hungary—is not unfavorable to the Prague overtures. A keenly intelligent man, he has long since left behind him his fascist beginnings and is profoundly disquieted by the progress toward disaster which his country, tied economically to Germany and politically to Italy, has been making. Mr. Hodza, fresh from his Coronation visits to London and Paris, spoke to me in optimistic tones. The French, he says, have all along been favorable to close cooperation, political as well as economic, among the little states of Central Europe; the great stumbling-block has been the passive indifference of the British. Now London has at last awakened to its vital interests in the Danube basin and is ready to do its share toward preventing the region from falling a prey to the intrigues of Rome and Berlin —at least to the extent of not insisting, in its commercial relations with these states, upon most-favored-nation treatment. Ex-Chancellor Renner of Austria confirmed this view of the British position by quoting to me from an English statesman's speech this perspicacious sentence: "We have learned from unpleasant recent experience that the Suez Canal can only be defended from the Danube."

All this notwithstanding, there are reasons for suspecting that the Prague project will encounter many a snag in its path. To look for approval from the neighboring great powers one would have to be exceptionally naive. Moscow, I daresay, will make no difficulties. The Soviet Union may be ruled by a dictatorship, but it is not a land-hungry power, and should rather welcome a barrier between itself and the Reich more solid than the existing patchquilt. The power which little more than a decade ago was aiming at the world revolution is now exerting every muscle to keep the apple-cart upright. But Hitler? The Nazis have proclaimed openly that it is their mission to keep the world in disorder. Determined to effect a redistribution of wealth, not between classes but between nations, they are ready to set the earth aflame to gain their ends. Not for nothing have they labored to bring down Geneva—the only semblance of authority among states. Can Hitler's Germany be expected to give its blessing to a scheme that bars its way to the East? It is significant that the Hungarian minister, General Räder, on returning from Berlin recently, tried to stampede his government into denouncing, unilaterally and on the spot, the military clauses of the Treaty of Trianon; it took all of Mr. Daranyi's energy and authority to prevent the coup. I mentioned in my previous article the warning sent down to Budapest by a special emissary of the Führer against any commitments to the Prague idea. And Göring, I learn, recently declared that the Reich asked nothing positive of Austria, but that the return of Otto—that is, the least step toward reconsolidation in the Danube area—would bring war.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

That Italy does not find the scheme quite to its taste is equally evident and no more mysterious. Count Ciano, too, when accompanying the King to Budapest, urged the Hungarians to have done with their enforced disarmament. Mussolini knows quite as well as the English statesman that the Suez Canal—that is, British control of the Mediterranean—can only be defended, or challenged, from the Danube—and from the Tagus. He knows, in other words, what his predecessors—Giolitti, for instance—discovered before him: that to fulfil its destiny in mare nostrum Italy must make sure of having in its rear no solid hostile land mass. The dissolution of the Dual Monarchy into its component atoms partly met that indispensable condition. Therefore we may rest assured that the Duce will leave no stone unturned to wreck every attempt, whatever the pretext and whatever the form, to unify the Danube basin. And this, in passing, casts a revealing light upon the origin, viewed from the banks of the Tiber, of the Rome-Berlin axis. Austria-Hungary gone, there remained the vastly more solid and formidable mass of Hitler's Germany. There was scarcely any hope of its dismemberment in the visible future. Poincaré's efforts to that end had proved worse than futile. The only alternative was to neutralize the Reich by alliance.

My personal opinion is that the Italo-Yugoslav treaty of last March had in Rome's eyes the very same purpose. It goes without saying that the published text does not reveal half of what it contains. But it is clear enough from the behavior of Belgrade that Mussolini sought and obtained something more than a triumph of prestige, and that the end in view was to detach Yugoslavia not so much from the old Little Entente as from the new widened one that was in the making. One had but to see the face of Mr. Krofta, the Czech Foreign Minister, as I did, on the morrow of that startling event, to perceive that something more serious than the semi-anachronistic league against the Magyars was at stake. Coming as it did on top of a series of other disquieting happenings, it was scarcely reassuring. Last November, after Mussolini's Milan blast about the Hungarian frontiers, Prague and Bucharest duly lodged an energetic protest; Belgrade held its peace. Shortly thereafter, I learn, Stoyadinovich, in receiving a delegation of the Magyar minority in Yugoslavia, addressed them in these astonishing terms: "Hungary has overlooked the first principle of strategy—the contraction of front. Why does it persist in fighting for revision on three separate sectors?" In July, a few weeks after my return, a Yugoslav journalist for the semi-official Vreme was granted an interview by the Hungarian Minister for Foreign Affairs, the first time this has occurred since the war. M. de Kanya, it is even said in authoritative circles, is soon to pay an official visit to Belgrade.

I have not seen Mr. Stoyadinovich, let alone the Prince Regent Paul. The present rulers of Yugoslavia, it would seem, are ill at ease these days with the French press; and I was the accredited representative of a Paris daily. At a banquet on the day of my arrival the Havas correspondent was ready to bet me the costliest bottle of wine that the Premier would not give me an interview; he himself, he explained, had been waiting for one for three months. Subsequently friends and colleagues of the head of the government assured me that they would arrange a meeting; they could see no reason, they said, why he should not receive me. Apparently Mr. Stoyadinovich did, for he remains one of the rare personages of the five countries with whom I have not spoken.

I have none the less obtained a glimpse of his point of view from numerous conversations with his understudies, which I shall briefly summarize; and then I shall endeavor to convey what, by hints, innuendoes, and pregnant silences, they let you guess. They begin by protesting that they are not deserting their old friends. Why, the Little Entente and the alliance with France are the very keystones of Yugoslavia's unalterable foreign policy. (A few days later I was to hear the identical formula from Carol II and M. Antonescu.) The rapprochement with Italy? Well, to begin with, it is nothing of the sort. it is scarcely more than a modus vivendi. Italy, one should keep in mind, is Yugoslavia's best customer. Oh, the pact of "eternal friendship" with Sofia. It is not in contravention of the Balkan Entente; the Bulgars are the kin of the Serbs and Croats; what more natural than that Belgrade should try to draw closer to them? In short, the Stoyadinovich government is endeavoring—as responsible statesmen should—to secure the frontiers of the country by eliminating friction between it and its neighbors. If Prague and Bucharest are not doing likewise, they are neglecting their opportunities and their duty. But aren't they? Rumania has come to an understanding with its neighbor Poland, hasn't it? That does not violate the Little Entente pact. That document does not forbid the three allies from living on good-neighbor terms with other countries. Quite the contrary: everything that relaxes the tension serves the common interest. And, when it comes to that, what about Czecho-Slovakia? Has it not made a deal with the Soviets—a veritable treaty of alliance this time, and with a state, observe, whose frontiers nowhere touch its own? And France itself? Hasn't France signed a pact with Moscow? Has not M. Laval done the very thing—ironed out the roughnesses with Italy, or tried to—which in certain circles is held against Yugoslavia?

It is at this point that the innuendoes, hints, and silences begin. Yugoslavia, because the largest single item of its foreign trade consists of exchanges with Italy, suffered more from "sanctions"—which it took seriously—than any other state. And then what did England and France do? They let the little powers down. France is so far away, so immersed in internal complexities—political, financial, social—that its small allies must look to themselves. If this sounds like a faint echo out of Berlin, what follows has a stronger, more unmistakable timbre. France has not only done little to help China, Ethiopia, and Spain; it is apparently incapable of taking a firm stand in its own defense. When Berlin denounced the military clauses of the Treaty of Versailles the interested powers staged the futile comedy at Stresa. And then came worse. When, on March 7, 1936, the Reich reoccupied the Rhineland, in defiance of treaties, France did nothing at all. In these circumstances are the little powers to be blamed for standing guard over their own security?

But where the Germans have been most efficient in propaganda against the Little Entente and against France is in exploiting the pacts, both of the Czechs and the French, with the U. S. S. R. I say "exploiting," not creating. The suspicions and repugnances existed already, in Rumania as well in Yugoslavia; Berlin had but to turn them to account. One would have thought, no doubt, that after Moscow's liquidation of the world revolution, after the Soviet Union had gone sensible and democratic and made alliances with bourgeois powers and joined the League of Nations, the Nazi attempt to revive the cordon sanitaire of Clemenceau's days would have been laughed out of court by the toughest of diehards. Not at all! The word passed around by the local Communist parties that Moscow was still Moscow, that the Third International had merely gone into a tactical slumber, to reawaken presently more resplendent, or terrifying, than ever, seems to have been taken for gospel not only by the credulous and hopeful proletariat but also by the credulous and panic-stricken masters of this earth.

If the "democracies" of the West, trembling before a bogy of their own creation, are ready—in China, in Ethiopia, in Spain—to put class prejudice before preponderant national interest, are the pessimists to be blamed for whispering around that were Czecho-Slovakia to be attacked by Germany tomorrow, its allies, through fear of undermining Hitler's credit and precipitating world revolution, would do nothing more than they did in 1931, or 1935, or 1936-37?

Tibor Eckhardt is, I have said, well disposed toward the Hodza plan for the consolidation of Central Europe. He may continue to think as he does now and to act accordingly when if he becomes head of a Hungarian government. But his ally, Count Bethlen, after assuring me that in foreign policy he and Eckhardt see eye to eye, made no secret of his skepticism and hostility toward the scheme. "Austria, I know, is for it," he told me, "because like Czecho-Slovakia it is menaced by Germany. But we are living on the best of terms with the Reich." This after the misfire of the putsch in Hungary last February and the economic colonization of the country by Berlin! And while Mr. Daranyi, thanks to the progressive industrialization of his country, is managing to detach himself gradually from the Magyar feudal barons, the irreconcilable protagonists of "revisionism," he must still reckon with them.

In the general gloom there is one ray of light. The Hodza scheme may yet see the day if the rumors current throughout the Danube basin are well founded. They are to the effect that if England and France were to make certain material and face-saving concessions, Mussolini would be delighted to jump off the Rome-Berlin axis and return to the Stresa front. That axis, it seems, has been creaking badly for some time. As I write, news dispatches come to confirm the persistent prophecies heard around Vienna and elsewhere. Were this to happen, the Little Entente would suddenly get new blood into its veins. But if the rumors prove false, we may expect all the adventures and all the disasters.

Detroit's Labor Slate

BY JOEL SEIDMAN

"AND I propose the name of Maurice Sugar for our slate!" There is an outburst of applause, the loudest of the evening. Another speaker has the floor. "A Negro should also be on our ticket," he says. Again there is widespread applause.

It was an enthusiastic audience that heard these nominations in June and received reports from committees on platform, candidates, and ways and means. For a labor political movement is in the process of formation in Detroit. The three to four hundred delegates to the Political Action Committee were mostly young men from the newly organized automobile plants, among whom sat older and more experienced representatives of the craft unions of the A.F. of L.

Since then the picture has changed somewhat, and for the worse. That the A.F. of L. and the C.I.O., despite their bitter enmity elsewhere, could cooperate in political action in Detroit was indeed remarkable. In July, following the lead of the Building Trades Council, the A.F. of L. central labor body withdrew from the joint political movement. Now the A. F. of L. is backing a rival candidate for mayor. To further complicate matters, Frank X. Martel, the local A. F. of L. head, is Michigan chairman of Labor's Non-Partisan League, to which the anti-unionists look for support of their slate.

In this proletarian, union-conscious city labor has a real chance to nominate its candidates in the non-partisan primary to be held on October 5, and to put them in office in the final election on November 2. Indeed, the United Automobile Workers alone may achieve some political success. Already that vigorous union has 200,000 members in Detroit, with 100,000 auto workers yet to be enrolled. In a city with a population of 1,700,000, 300,000 auto workers and their families are easily a majority.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

Patrick H. O'Brien, a liberal Democratic lawyer with a good labor record, is the labor candidate for mayor. O'Brien worked in the copper mines for several years, then taught school, and finally practiced law. Elected to the bench in 1911, he won attention by dissolving an injunction that had been issued against striking copper miners. The injunction forbade picketing, and O'Brien dissolved it on the ground that the constitutional rights of the miners had been impaired. He hopes to obtain the support of the local Democratic Party, or a part of it, in addition to that of the C.I.O.

The seventeen-point platform that has been drawn up and tentatively adopted is a progressive one. Perhaps the most sweeping plank proposes that public utilities be municipally owned, as the street railways have been since 1922. Other planks provide for labor representation on all commissions, the forty-hour week for city employees, advancement on a seniority basis, and hours and wages for city workers similar to those prevailing for the same classifications in private business. The police are to be used to protect the people, not to evict or intimidate them or to break strikes. An adequate welfare budget is to be established, and overcrowding in classrooms eliminated. Health facilities are to be expanded, and free medical service is to be provided to those unable to pay. Sweatshop conditions are to be abolished.

Lower taxation for the low wage-earner is promised, together with increased and enforced taxation of the wealthy. This is of particular importance in a state that since 1933 has had a 3 per cent sales tax, even upon food. On the issue of housing, which is vital just now in Detroit, the platform pledges an adequate program, to include the abolition of city slums and the establishment of a municipal housing project.

The automobile workers have already learned that friends of labor are not always to be trusted after they attain political office, even when they hail from labor's ranks. The union members learned this last March, when they staged their great protest demonstration in Cadillac Square, in the heart of Detroit. When they asked for a permit to demonstrate there, every member of the Detroit Common Council voted in the negative, including Robert G. Ewald, president of the bricklayers' union, who had been elected two years before with the backing of the Detroit and Wayne County Federation of Labor. Not until the auto workers announced that they would demonstrate in Cadillac Square, permit or no permit, did the city councilmen vote grudging assent.

Ewald, for this and similar reasons, is not precisely popular among the auto workers. The district council of the United Automobile Workers, with Ewald in mind, voted not to support any member of the present council for reelection. When the Building Trades Council withdrew its support from the joint slate it indorsed Ewald for reelection, and the A. F. of L. has since indorsed him also.

Interestingly enough, it was Ewald who defeated Sugar in the 1935 race. Detroit municipal elections are non-partisan, with the highest nine candidates for the Common Council being elected. Ewald was ninth two years ago with 69,000 votes, and Sugar was tenth with 55,000. As attorney for the United Automobile Workers and many other labor groups, Sugar has figured prominently in labor struggles in Detroit and won the support of large groups of workers. It is significant that Sugar was opposed by all three Detroit dailies, while Ewald had the support of them all. Only 167,000 of the half-million registered voters of the city voted in 1935, which shows what the auto workers' union could accomplish politically if it could get its 200,000 Detroit members to go to the polls.

The Detroit dailies have already attacked the labor slate, and they will certainly fight it with all the bitterness they can command. The most liberal of the three, at least by reputation, is the Detroit News, though it is difficult to discern this liberalism when anything closer to Detroit than a foreign war is involved. The News pretends to be friendly to labor, but wears a pained expression whenever labor seeks to assert its rights. Its editors hailed the withdrawal of the building tradesmen from the labor slate as "glad news for all who prize this city's non-partisan form of government." The gains made under the non-partisan charter will be secure, said the News, "only as long as Detroiters choose their city government primarily as Detroiters, and not as members of any group or clique." It is charming, in this sophisticated age, to find that a great paper can be so naive.

In attacks upon the labor slate the pace has thus far been set by a local business publication with the peculiar name of the Saturday Night. "The next Mayor of Detroit," says that eminent publication, "will either be a radical with a Moscow odor in his whiskers or a man with enough native pride to battle for a return to decency." Thus to label the eminently respectable Judge O'Brien is slightly amusing; I have seen the Judge, and I can assert that he wears no whiskers, and that neither Stalin nor Trotsky would recognize a disciple in him. But the Saturday Night has no sense of humor, and every epithet that may cost a vote will be hurled at labor's candidates in this campaign. Nor does the Saturday Night forget the councilmanic candidates; one of them, it asserts, is supposed to advocate "white wives for buck Negroes."

The automobile workers have had an interesting experience with political action. Last year they supported the effort to form a farmer-labor party in both the city and the state. The district council and many of the locals of the U.A.W.A. were affiliated with the Farmer-Labor Party, as were a number of the craft locals of the A. F. of L. The Detroit and Wayne County Federation of Labor, however, remained aloof. The support of the auto union was not then nearly as important as it is today, for the great growth in membership has occurred in the meantime. The 1936 convention of the U.A.W.A., it is interesting to note, instructed the national office and the local unions to give the strongest possible support to the formation of national, state, and local farmer-labor parties.

Most of the thousands of automobile unionists who are providing the mass base of this interesting political effort had never been in any labor organization until a few months ago. It was they who helped to shatter the General Motors anti-union stronghold. Many of them followed the Coughlin banners but a short time ago. Raw and untrained, they may be marshaled into a genuine workers' political movement or swept off their feet by some silver-tongued fascist demagogue. That is what gives labor's new-born political venture in Detroit its real significance, and that is why this fall's municipal campaign in the capital of the auto empire will command attention.

What Chance Has China?

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

MORE than two months have passed since the first outbreak of hostilities between Chinese and Japanese troops at Lukouchiao, southwest of Peiping. During that period the Japanese have occupied virtually the whole of northern Hopei and a large section of Shanghai. Although considerably outnumbered, they have taken the offensive on practically all fronts. Yet this offensive has not moved anything like as rapidly as planned. The confident boast of two weeks ago that the Chinese would soon be "annihilated" in the Shanghai area has been far from justified.

A careful survey of the military developments of this undeclared war shows that despite serious handicaps the Chinese are doing extraordinarily well. In the Shanghai area 80,000 Japanese troops—nearly twice the number that were finally assembled in 1932—have yet to regain the territory which they won at that time and have suffered extremely heavy losses. Under the bombardment of naval guns the Chinese have conducted an orderly withdrawal from the most exposed positions, but they have not allowed themselves to be outflanked or crushed, as they were in 1932. Their blocking of the Whangpoo by sinking Japanese ships was one of the dramatic feats in the history of modern warfare.

The great Japanese offensive of September 6-7 appears to have bogged down without any appreciable gain in territory. Chinese aviators, despite abominable marksmanship, have helped to prevent the landing of 20,000 sorely needed Japanese regulars. While it is inconceivable that the Chinese can hold on indefinitely in the Shanghai area, their brilliant defense against a foe far superior in equipment has done much to boost Chinese morale and destroy the myth of Japanese invincibility.

In North China the Chinese did not acquit themselves so creditably in the early days of the conflict. Although Peiping was probably untenable, the failure of Chiang Kai-shek to give immediate support to the Twenty-ninth Route Army caused the city to be sold far too cheaply. The Chinese had a heaven-sent opportunity to counterattack at the end of July, when the bulk of the Japanese army was held up in Manchuria by serious floods, but they failed to take advantage of the situation.

In recent weeks they have done much better. Their intrepid defense of Nankow Pass, though ultimately frustrated by a Japanese flanking movement, held up a large Japanese army for a fortnight and took a heavy toll in lives and equipment. During the last few weeks numerous bands of Chinese irregulars have appeared in the western hills near Peiping, ambushing Japanese, harassing lines of communication, and destroying war material. These bands have at times occupied villages within twenty miles of Peiping, and all efforts of the Japanese to dislodge them have proved singularly unsuccessful. The Chinese are still holding their own north of Paotingfu, the capital of Hopei, on the Peiping-Hankow railway, and are only a few miles south of Tientsin along the railway to Nanking. Heavy rains which have mired the Japanese motorized equipment have aided the Chinese throughout the entire region.

The loss of Kalgan undoubtedly represents China's most serious defeat, since it blocks the main road to Soviet Russia by way of Outer Mangolia. Reports from this area have been very fragmentary, but apparently Japan has not yet obtained control of the whole of Nankow Pass. This means that the Japanese at Kalgan have no direct means of communication with their base and, weakened by the revolt of their Manchurian mercenaries, may yet find themselves in difficulties.

In a struggle between massed armies China sooner or later is bound to be smashed. Although Chiang Kai-shek has several divisions of troops that man for man are equal or superior to any the Japanese can put in the field, he has not the artillery, tanks, or air force to hold out indefinitely against Japan's highly mechanized forces. His planes have shown up reasonably well compared with those of the Japanese, but they are outnumbered three or four to one. The Chinese armies have held their own at Shanghai because they had sense enough to withdraw when faced by overwhelming force. In the north a few thousand soldiers operating as guerrilla bands in the western hills and the Chinese plain-clothes men who penetrated into Tientsin in the early days of the conflict appear to have given the Japanese more trouble than the massed troops at Macheng or Paotingfu. Japanese mop-ping-up operations in the conquered areas around Shanghai have also been seriously hampered by plain-clothes men and snipers. China is a huge country, and the farther the Japanese extend their lines the more vulnerable they will become in guerrilla warfare.

Perhaps the most successful exponents of guerrilla tactics in recent years have been the Chinese Communists. For nearly ten years a small red army, never numbering more than 200,000 men, conducted a hide-and-seek warfare over most of the provinces of China. At the end of the period the Chinese soviets not only were stronger numerically than at the beginning but had succeeded in indoctrinating the peasantry of a great part of China with their beliefs. If the Chinese red army had had to depend solely on its own numbers, it would have been exterminated many years ago. But the Communists early developed a technique of organizing the peasant population behind their lines, a strategy which proved of invaluable assistance. The peasants not only assisted in transport and other services which ordinarily fall upon the regular troops but very often appeared behind the Nanking lines attacking communications and destroying military supplies. They acted as snipers and often participated in mass maneuvers to mislead the enemy regarding the location of the army's real strength.

Although the fact is not generally known, a peasant army of some 150,000 men already exists in Manchuria, under centralized command, and has been conducting warfare along these lines. During the past year these forces have repeatedly swooped down on isolated Japanese posts, cut railways, destroyed bridges, and otherwise hampered communications. They have been particularly effective when the kaoliang stands high in the fields; in those seasons the Japanese have done well to hold the main towns and keep the railways operating.

If China is to conduct a successful struggle against Japan, Chiang Kai-shek will have to tear a leaf from the Communists' notebook and organize the peasantry for resistance. As yet, though there have been fragmentary reports of peasant activity, particularly between Tungchow and Tientsin in the early days of the conflict, Chiang does not appear to have encouraged these tactics. Nor has he made any attempt to use the veterans of the red army, who are generally recognized as the most effective troops in China.

The ability of China to wage guerrilla warfare until the complex and weakened Japanese economic system breaks down under the strain of attempting to maintain an army of 500,000 to 1,000,000 men on Chinese soil depends on a variety of considerations, chiefly that of morale. It has not been so many years since all that a foreign power had to do to intimidate China was to stage a show of force. The Japanese have used these tactics many times in recent years with fair success. But on this occasion mass attacks and relentless bombing of defenseless cities have brought, not a weakening in Chinese morale, but a mounting determination to fight to the finish. For the first time in history the Chinese people as a whole are thoroughly aroused to the danger which threatens them. Nanking is assured of popular support as long as it continues to fight. Despite Chiang Kai-shek's previous waverings, there is reason to believe that he will carry on the contest till the end. The Japanese have made it clear that they will insist on his elimination before any compromise can be reached. And with Chinese public opinion in its present temper, he has no choice but to fight.

It is true that there is a strong fascist clique at Nanking that would sell out to Japan rather than see China come under Soviet influence. It is also true that Chiang has retained his German and Italian advisers in the face of the open sympathy which their home governments have shown toward Japan. But open support for compromise with Japan is impossible in China today. The real desires of the fascist organizations cannot be revealed until the Chinese public begins to tire of the conflict.

By that time it is likely that Japan's political and economic structure will also be showing signs of strain. For the moment an overwhelming majority of the population is undoubtedly behind the government in its invasion of China. The average Japanese has been told so frequently that his army is carrying the light of civilization and peace to China that he accepts the statement without question. He is convinced that Japanese arms are unconquerable and believes that victory, in some vague way, will mean prosperity for Japan. Events have shown that the liberal reaction of which so much was heard a few months ago was exaggerated. As was the case in 1931, the militarists have been able to use the conflict with China to destroy whatever strength Japanese liberalism may have possessed.

But it is axiomatic that public enthusiasm for an overseas war can only be maintained by victories and an ample food supply. Presumably the army propaganda bureau can furnish the triumphs, but food is likely to become a serious problem if the conflict is long protracted. While, owing to an extraordinarily good harvest this summer, no acute shortage may be expected for at least a year, production is bound to fall in another year with a large portion of the available man-power in the army. More immediately serious is the threat of financial and industrial disorganization. The Japanese national debt has reached the point where further borrowing can only result in inflation and a precipitous rise in prices. In trade circles it is reported that the normal Japanese exports of novelties for the Christmas season will be cut at least in half as a result of the inability of factories to obtain raw materials. While the disorganization of the consumer-goods industries will be offset for a time at least by the intense activity of the munitions plants, these too are bound to be ultimately affected by a shortage of raw materials. The breakdown of the exporting industries is bound, in turn, to create a further shortage of essential materials. Apart from coal, not a single one of the basic commodities which constitute the sinews of war can be obtained within the borders of Japan. Although the country doubtless has laid in heavy stocks, it is almost wholly dependent on imports for scrap iron, iron ore, cotton, oil, nickel, and all the alloys necessary for steel making. International sanctions or a strong private boycott would greatly hasten the inevitable breakdown of Japan's war machine.

China does not begin to have the financial and industrial resources which Japan possesses, but neither is its economy so sensitive to the catastrophic effect of war. From 85 to 90 per cent of China's population is directly dependent on agriculture; the actual industrial population is insignificant. Owing to the almost complete absence of transport facilities, each province and to a large extent each village is virtually self-sufficient. The destruction of Shanghai will have no effect on the living standards of the peasants in the interior provinces. Half the country could be laid waste without seriously influencing the economic structure of the other half.

It must be admitted, however, that China's ability to carry on a protracted struggle with Japan will depend on material assistance from abroad. Although it has a number of armories in which small arms and munitions are manufactured, some of the largest are in areas that are likely to fall quickly under Japanese control. Even guerrilla warfare requires rifles and ammunition, if not machine-guns and hand grenades. Airplanes are indispensable, and the gasoline and oil to operate them can only come from foreign countries.

The non-aggression pact recently signed between China and the Soviet Union suggests that the political difficulties between these two countries have been settled sufficiently to permit Russia to furnish some of the needed supplies. But the extent to which Russia can aid is drastically limited by geographic barriers. Although the two countries are contiguous for many thousands of miles, there is only one well-established caravan route through which a large amount of supplies could be shipped by motor lorry—that from Urga to Kalgan. With this road blocked, more circuitous routes must be used across Mongolia or through Sinkiang, and it is doubtful whether any of these can be developed for regular truck transportation. No obstacle exists, however, to the dispatch of aircraft, and it is highly possible that the recent report that seventy-two Soviet planes had arrived in northern Shensi is accurate.

The success of H. H. Kung, Chinese Minister of Finance, in obtaining credits in the United States and most of the democratic countries of Europe suggests that the democracies may give general economic support to China as an offset to the growth of world fascism. There has been no indication thus far, however, that these credits will be made available for the munitions which are desperately needed. Nor is it entirely clear that the Western powers intend to enforce their legal right to trade with China as long as Japan does not declare war. But the interests of the powers lie definitely in this direction; only an ultimate Chinese victory will preserve the Open Door. Given the aid to which it is entitled, China may yet startle the world by turning back the tide of Japanese aggression.

Revolution in the Deep South

BY DERO A. SAUNDERS

THE last few months have seen the unfurling of storm signals again in the cotton belt. In somewhat worried headlines the financial pages note the ominous tone of government and private crop estimates which indicate that the Paradox of Plenty, 1937 style, is about to arrive in the shape of another bumper cotton crop. Forty Senators have signed a plea to the President to call a special farm session of Congress this fall, and a resolution was passed before adjournment which guaranteed that farm legislation would receive first consideration at the opening of the regular session in January. With one eye cocked on the Supreme Court the ghost of the AAA is showing signs of revival.

During the later part of March spot cotton was over 15 cents a pound in New Orleans. Since then progressive declines have brought it below 10 cents. If this were all, it would be enough: it would represent a loss in Southern purchasing power of over $400,000,000. But it is not a temporary fluctuation; it represents the initial stages of the death of old-style American cotton culture.

For mechanization, and all that it signifies, is already a fact in the cotton country. Quietly and unobtrusively the South has been for several years going through an agrarian revolution which the future may regard as the most important fact of this decade. No aspect of American life will escape its impact. And, especially, the already rickety social structure of the old South is in for a complete overhauling.

Cotton growing, like all agriculture, may be either extensive or intensive. The vast acres of Texas and Oklahoma are generally given over to extensive farming. Yields per acre are low and the area planted is large. Mechanization is no new thing for these sections; they have long employed tractors and developed cultivating and harvesting machinery suitable for giant fields and low yields. Their gins are equipped to handle cotton in all conditions and with large amounts of foreign matter. Generally speaking, the yield from such extensive farming is varied only by increasing or decreasing the acreage; conditions do not encourage the heavy use of fertilizer or other methods of growing two bales where one grew before.

Such sections, naturally, have escaped somewhat the effects of recent changes; but not so the states of the deep South—the black belt and the deltas of the Mississippi and its tributaries. In the states of Tennessee, Arkansas, Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and Mississippi is some of the richest land in the world. Despite the fact that cotton has been grown in some fields of this area without rotation or fertilizer for nearly a century, it is still perhaps the most fertile land on earth. In this section the effects of the new production methods have been and will be most marked, not only because machine agriculture pays enormous dividends in such favorable surroundings, but because the traditional social structure of the region, long insensitive to change, will not fit the march of technology without fundamental alteration.

Many things have prevented the growth of agricultural technology in the deep South. It was a land of cheap labor kept cheap; even the most ordinary mechanical improvements might prove more expensive than hand labor. Its small farmers and large planters were bound by tradition, the former from lack of education, the latter from the instinctive realization that their rickety perch atop the poverty-stricken Southern hierarchy would be shaken by new production methods. Both were content in periods of high prices, and neither group was able, in a credit-poor section, to improve techniques when low prices or depression pointed imperatively that way.

The long-delayed impetus toward machine farming first came, strangely enough, from the AAA. What temporary reduction of the cotton crop the AAA achieved soon resulted—by the nature of its upside-down logic—in the exact opposite. The poorest acres were invariably left fallow, while more intensive cultivation was practiced on those remaining. Farm machinery, indispensable to cheap but intensive farming, could be and was purchased by AAA subsidies.

No details on the extent of machine farming in the deep South are available, but existing figures and personal observation reveal its growth. The wholesale value of farm equipment sold nationally in 1936 was nearly half a billion dollars, only slightly less than in 1928. With the two greatest machine-using sections of the nation, the Texas-Oklahoma cotton belt and the Middle Western wheat belt, both suffering under intense droughts and correspondingly impoverished, a disproportionately large amount of this new farm equipment must have reached the deep South. Numerous large plantations in the Mississippi Delta have dispensed with work animals completely in the last four years and now use tractors, gang plows, and multi-row planters and cultivators. Small hardware merchants find their farm-implement sales becoming an increasingly important business item, and even the smallest Southern hamlet has today its farm-equipment dealer. Since agricultural machinery is commonly durable, each year's production tends to be a cumulative addition to the already existing quantity rather than a replacement.

The amazing increase of yield per acre in the above-mentioned states attests to the mechanization of the South. The average production during the three years 1934-36, the big years of mechanization thus far, was nearly 240 pounds per acre—an increase of about 25 per cent over the 1923-32 average. In Mississippi, which contains more rich delta land and produces much more cotton than any other state of the six, the average per acre in 1934-36 was more than 30 per cent higher than in 1923-32, and in the favorable 1936 growing season reached the amazing total of 305 pounds per acre, or 60 per cent more than the average 1923-32 output.

The general trend of the national cotton crop in the last few years has given final warning of the impending catastrophe. Despite AAA and subsequent acreage-reduction schemes the 1934 crop of about 9,500,00 bales rose to 10,500,000 in 1935 and 12,500,000 in 1936. Only the "blessed" interference of a devastating drought last year prevented another crushing surplus. Texas and Oklahoma ordinarily produce more cotton than any other three states; both of them, particularly Oklahoma, were visited in 1936 by severe droughts which cut their production to 105 pounds per acre, 27 per cent below their 1923-32 average. A recent unofficial estimate of the 1937 crop was about 16,600,000 bales, which will make it one of the largest crops since 1900.

Though unusual, such yields have occurred in the past without dire results. Today, however, the situation is different: within the past ten years the United States has lost a substantial part of its world cotton market. For decades the United States was the predominant cotton-growing nation of the world. It customarily produced about 60 per cent of the entire world crop, exporting during 1924-29 an average of about 8,300,000 bales a year. The onslaught of the world depression did not destroy the world market for cotton, but it took that market from the United States. That the loss is not merely temporary is indicated by both production and export data. In the years 1934-36 the United States produced only 40 per cent of the world crop as against the customary 60 per cent. Exports during those same years averaged about 6,200,000 bales, more than two million bales less than the 1924-29 average. In short, America was bereft of the foreign cotton markets at the same time that technological advance unfolded new production possibilities.

American tariff policy, of course, was in a large measure responsible for this loss of foreign cotton markets. (Cotton is by far the most important American export, larger than any other two export categories, and much larger than all other agricultural exports combined.) Tariffs, however, are but one aspect of the international struggle which is the distinguishing mark of our age. The belligerent nationalisms of today seek economic autarchy as a guaranty against the day of military reckoning; thus England pushes Egyptian and Indian cotton, Italy booms Ethiopia as a potential source of supply, and every nation attempts to purchase its cotton from colonial or subject sources. The economic idiocy of this course has long been recognized, but few examples are so clear as the AAA subsidizing the destruction of cotton in the United States while Britain subsidizes its production in Egypt.

The social aspect of the contemporary agrarian revolution in the South is of foremost importance. The old share-cropper system is thoroughly incompatible with new production methods. The crumbling of the institution of share-cropping has already become an impressive fact in the sections where mechanization has made its greatest strides. It is only logical, of course, that the breakdown of share-cropping should have received its first impetus from the AAA. Despite its many technical limitations share-cropping did possess certain advantages in certain situations. The planter and tenant, by and large, entered into a comparatively stable relationship, which ordinarily did not change during the growing and harvesting seasons. The planter was assured of his labor, and always felt a certain interest in keeping that labor alive. He was assured, by long experience, of a certain yield, subject only to the general vicissitudes of weather. The AAA, by putting parity money in his pocket, reducing his acreage and, proportionately, his need for labor, and pegging the price of his cotton, changed this situation almost overnight; the planter no longer was interested in assuming either the risks or obligations which small-scale tenant production necessitates. Numerous share-croppers were evicted outright, while many others were transformed in status to day laborers. Mechanization, of course, speeded this process along. The tenant family that farms a few acres on shares cannot be absorbed into large-scale agriculture, for the very theory of share-cropping is the splitting of a large tract into small units farmed separately. The share-cropper became the day laborer; and the day laborer is the rising economic category on the horizon of the deep South today.

The evaluation of the social desirability of this change in the Southern economic structure is for the future. On its debit side may be placed the destruction of the paternal obligation which the landlord sometimes felt toward his tenant. Long accustomed to dependence on a single planter, the new day laborer finds himself on the lowest rung on the agricultural ladder. Nevertheless, the appearance of a large class of agricultural day laborers in the South creates possibilities, as yet unrealized, for substantial improvement in the general welfare and standard of living. Whatever the moral value of the old paternalism, it always failed in the acid test of providing any defensible general standard of living. The real failures of share-cropping were both social and technical in character: on the social side it prevented any operation of the processes of the labor market; on the technical side it tended to hinder general Southern progress by weighing agriculture down with an outmoded economic organization.

The question of putting both planter and agricultural worker into the labor market is of prime importance. The general stability of tenure under the share-cropping system—at least a year—offered little opportunity for the best landlords to select the best tenants, or vice-versa. All too often the tenant's share of the crop was merely nominal, being "credited to account." The day laborer is in a different position. He is paid in cash by the day, without the abuses common to petty usury; he may select his landlord, comparing the offers of several. He has every incentive to improve his knowledge of farming technique, and he is in an infinitely better position to bargain collectively.

Any discussion of the social effects of mechanization in the cotton country naturally brings up the question of the mechanical cotton picker, much publicized as the Damoclean sword hanging over the share-cropper's head. The social effects of such a machine may be considerable, although they will nowhere approximate the ominous headlines conceived by ill-informed writers. There are perhaps a score of mechanical cotton pickers in America today, and all of them are in a comparatively crude state of development. At least 10,000 machines, each picking steadily at the highest rate ever achieved in one day by any mechanical picker, would be required to harvest as much as 10 per cent of this year's crop. Great though its possibilities may be, for the next decade and perhaps longer its importance will be overshadowed by the technical improvements already available.

If the rise of the agricultural day laborer is potentially a forward step, the circumstances in which it occurs seem rather grim. The Southern laborer today does not face a long period of prosperity in which his economic betterment can be achieved with comparative ease. The world market for American cotton is declining, rayon is making steady progress, and the very mechanization which created him creates the threat of a crushing surplus. Since this problem becomes steadily more urgent, it may be well to consider the two general lines that a solution might take. The first is the international approach, through the world-wide reduction of tariff barriers and the restoration of world trade. Whatever the ultimate desirability of this course, the cautious steps involved will be too slow to save the South from the immediately threatening surplus—nor will a renewal of world trade necessarily restore our cotton markets abroad. The other approach is the economic rebuilding of the South, with cotton culture partially superseded by diversified agriculture and intelligent industrialization. Cotton has always been wrung out of the South, so to speak, as an economic tribute. Those millions of bales of cotton every year signify the economic neglect of the South's own needs: clothing the world, it has not yet clothed and fed and housed itself. Such a rebuilding, of course, would present substantial difficulties: it would necessitate wide departures from private enterprise and as a problem in planning would tax all the resources that we have ever gathered through TVA or similar experience. It would also necessitate the complete scrapping of the present Administration's attempt to make small homesteaders out of the landless millions of the South; without some form of producers' cooperative, they cannot compete with mechanized agriculture.

Either approach to the solution of our perennial cotton problem, now coming to a head, will be difficult; the real danger, however, lies in the probability that nothing at all will be done. In such a case we shall have further surpluses and further frantic attempts to destroy our wealth. Even more ominous, if a cotton surplus coincides with the coming of a major war, no counsels of prudence or restraint will prevent the South from attempting to get rid of that surplus to belligerents. It may well be that the dizzy spiral of economic entanglement in a new world war will be begun by the cotton South.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

WILL there ever be a time again when it will be proper to start a third party in the United States? I am moved to this query by the complete volte-face made by Common Sense, which until now has steadfastly advocated a farmer-labor party with the slogan "Production for Use." Today it suddenly discovers, a year in advance of the next Congressional election and three years before the next Presidential campaign, that the thing to do is stand by, not the good old Democratic Party, but the new-born Democratic organization headed by Franklin Roosevelt. This, it declares, "has been gradually becoming all that the third-party forces, the Farmer-Laborites and the progressives, could hope for—and their increasingly close identification with it indicates that they know its real significance. It can assure labor far more than labor could hope for in a party of its own. If it marches in closed ranks with these natural allies the danger of a fascist movement arising will remain remote." Common Sense admits that the New Deal has not come out against the profit system itself as has the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota, but maintains that "its actual accomplishment and potentialities are no less radical. And the more the progressive and labor forces work in it the more its direction will be set definitely to the left." It also asserts that the fight over the Supreme Court has cleared the air, and it welcomes the cleavage within the Democratic Party. It foresees a new alignment of conservatives and liberals in separate political parties if the present trend continues until 1940.

Well, similar arguments have postponed the organizing of that third party ever since 1924, when Senator La Follette made his remarkable run and polled nearly five million votes, with little or no money and an organization that was created overnight. With his death that movement ended. In 1928 we were told that the thing to do was to wait until 1932. That year also turned out to be not propitious, but since then we have heard a great deal of talk about the absolute necessity of a Labor Party coming into being in 1940 to solidify the advances gained under Franklin Roosevelt. Now once more progressives are called upon to stay in the party fold. Frankly, it seems to me shortsighted reasoning. In the first place it is building one's hopes upon a politician, and a politician who is in addition a Roosevelt; and that means something very uncertain. The resemblance between Theodore and Franklin is much greater than most people realize. In 1912 Theodore denounced the Republican Party as an alliance of thieves and crooked capitalists and said that it ought to be smashed for good and all. I am not in the least exaggerating the violence of his language and can give the exact quotations if anybody wants them. Four years later he was back in the party of the thieves and crooked capitalists. No one can foretell just where Franklin Roosevelt will stand in the next three years, particularly if the Republicans should make great gains in next year's elections. In the most brilliant analysis of the President and his future that I have seen anywhere, Stanley High in the current Harper's wonders whether Roosevelt's faith in his ability to prove that the most critical and pressing problems can be worked out inside the structure of capitalism and democracy would survive a major defeat. There are still other questions that may be raised about him.

For one thing the President is steadily undermining democracy by encouraging the growth of militarism in the United States. Wherever you find large armies and navies, there you find enemies of democracy. Beyond that, the politician in him may make him yield to the Southern reactionaries in his party. I am afraid that the power of those Southern bourbons is underestimated by my friends the editors of Common Sense. There is no evidence that so practical a politician as Mr. Roosevelt will carry the New Deal to the point where he will alienate all the Southern leaders. Yet if he were heading straight for the radical changes we need in our national life he would have to repel them more and more, if not break with them altogether. As I have repeatedly pointed out, the Robinsons and Harrisons and other Southern politicians who have been standing for the New Deal have hardly done so out of any genuine conviction of the necessity of radical reforms—the abolition of economic privilege or the redistribution of wealth. They have opposed the anti-lynching bill and the wages-and-hours bill, and they may be counted on to stand fast if at any time there should be a real attempt, let us say, to unionize the South, to give some measure of justice to the Negro, or to end the horrors of the share-cropper system. Nor has Mr. Roosevelt yet shown any real readiness to cut loose from the corrupt Democratic machines in some of our largest cities.

So I, for one, am not prepared to accept the position of Common Sense. I do not propose to assume in 1937, three years prior to 1940, that we no longer need a third political party. Too many times I have seen promising political movements wrecked by faith in some "good man," and seen that good man go bad or pass from the scene and leave the political parties just as they were before his advent. I regret that my production-for-use friends are today so willing to climb on the Roosevelt band-wagon. Three years from now they may thoroughly regret it too.

BOOKS and the ARTS

A Good Doctor's Story

THE CITADEL. By A. J. Cronin. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

THERE'S no sensible way that I can discover to review this book. It badly needs writing; at the same time the material is well worth our attention—a crowded story clumsily but sincerely told, even passionately convincing at times.

This is Dr. A. J. Cronin's latest, his fourth, novel in the last seven years, and in the opinion of the publishers the finest he has yet written. It has to do with the rise and transfiguration of a young Scottish physician—of considerable genius—come fresh from St. Andrews to the drabbest of Welsh mining towns to make his debut in the world. From thence, through sheer ability and drive, though ably assisted by his little wife, Christine, he goes with rapid strides to London and the top of his profession. Not without receiving many bruises from the world. His name is Manson and "Man's son" seems to be the implication. London rather seduces Dr. Manson for a while so that he comes to an impasse: either he must go ahead—whither?—or return to his old scientific idealism. That's the story, the Citadel to be taken. Dr. Cronin's qualities as a writer leave him little choice.

It's a somewhat old-fashioned morality using the medical profession as its stage, a scathing criticism of the state of medicine in England today, of conditions no different from those prevalent elsewhere in the world, or perhaps even a trifle better there than in most other places. The book ought to make good reading for the self-righteous, who will thereby forget what slippery blackguards they are themselves.

The principal interest of the book, the picture Dr. Cronin gives of this English world of medicine—and what goes on in it—is convincingly real, though at two pivotal moments he leaves us high and dry wondering what precisely the diagnosis can have been to come so pat to his plot. In the main the medical part of the book is first-rate and will prove, I think, even to the general reader its chief attraction. Were Dr. Cronin as advanced a writer as his views in this book make him to be a physician, perhaps the book as it stands would never have existed, which would have been a pity. But as a writer he wasn't up to that.

I am reminded of another physician who might have done better by the material. He lives up the line from my suburb and has what the people call "fits," so much so that his old mother often drives about with him protectively on his calls. These fits consist in moments of passion when he is constrained by superhuman laws to seduce any woman who comes within his radius of action at the moment. And he has been doing it for years—as several batches of children by various young women testify. He remains for all that a bachelor and enjoys membership in a local church, the Chamber of Commerce, the Rotary Club, etc. Poor fellow! Such a brilliant mind. Most unfortunate. Now there would be the proper salty touch somehow lacking here.

I am incited to these animadversions by the legend in gilt letters across the book's attractive jacket, for which, by the way, Dr. Cronin is in no way to be held responsible: "A great novel about a doctor by a doctor who is a great novelist." No, it isn't a great novel, not in the sense that Norman Douglas or Ford Madox Ford would speak of a great novel. But it's a good novel, though it is often ironical to speak of a "good novel" today.

What Dr. Cronin doesn't see is that, as Ezra Pound would say, it's money and its misappropriation and artificial scarcity that are at the back of our troubles, and that unless you see the thing through to its source you can see nothing. Cronin of course has an inkling of that. But though the medical profession no more needs to be shown up in this matter than the Cabinet (ex-Harrow) profession or the plumbing profession, the writing profession, in my humble opinion, has not in the present case been much illuminated.

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS

North of the 60th Parallel

"40,000 AGAINST THE ARCTIC." By H. P. Smolka. William Morrow and Company. $3.50.

HERE is a fascinating account of a great transformation which has been taking place in the last few years—the evolution of an Arctic empire in Siberian regions which have long been regarded as suitable only for penal settlements. Startling in the rapidity of its development, this pioneering venture has been made possible by the coordination of ultra-modern inventions with the scientific planning of a totalitarian state.

Mr. Smolka's book presents a narrative of the Siberian journey of a British journalist with command of the Russian language, but it has all the fascination of a novel, and it contains geographic and other scientific data which are to be found only in related books printed in Russian. It has been the radio, the airplane, and the ice-breaker, working together, which have opened within the space of a few years the long-sought-for "Northeast passage" as a commercial transportation route along the bleak Siberian coast. The region affected—all of it north of the 60th parallel of latitude and north of the line of the Trans-Siberian Railway—is one-third the size of Asia and twenty-five times that of France. Though rich in resources, it has hitherto lacked two vitally essential elements—colonists and transportation. The Soviets call it the "America of the future."

Up to recently only nine small vessels had, under great hazards, effected the Northeast passage. The open water to be found during the brief summer is usually in separated areas which vary with each season. Today the route is traversed by a dozen vessels annually, and many more ships operate within the two sections which are separated by the difficult coast of the long Taimyr peninsula. Ice-breakers are stationed at the more difficult points along the route, and there are many airplane stations. When in difficulty a vessel sends out a radio call for a plane; in an hour or two the plane arrives, scouts ahead for open passages, and then drops to the ship by parachute a map with the possible route indicated.

Connecting this northern transportation route with the Trans-Siberian Railway along the southern border of the empire, the navigable Yenisei River flows due north from Krasnoyarsk to Dickson Island. Situated near the Arctic circle is the new polar capital of Igarka with a population of 12,000 in the winter time and 20,000 in the summer. From this city fleets of vessels go out to Murmansk, a port north of Leningrad which is always open, and thence many of them to Great Britain. Krasnayarsk, where the Trans-Siberian Railway crosses the Yenisei River, is today quite a modern city with many skyscrapers.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

The early removal of the two great handicaps to the development of this territory is now promised. The main staple articles of export have been lumber, fish, and furs. Exportation of the first of these has been curtailed by the long and difficult transportation and by the fact that coal for the vessels had to be brought in from the outside. Coal, however, has been discovered at Norilsk, which is not far from the Yenisei and is now being connected with it by railway. Similarly, it has been necessary to import salt for preservation of the fish. Now, however, great salt deposits have been discovered at Nordvyk on the Siberian coast, and 150,000 tons of it will be mined in 1938.

Maps and numerous photographs are included in the book to furnish proof of most of its statements. It is significant that the Arctic pathfinders are upheld by a vision of the future. Their talk is of regular air connection across the Arctic to America, and Dr. Schmidt's pioneer transarctic flights give earnest of such traffic. The pilots who are making these flights have already won their spurs in the Siberian coastal service. W. H. HOBBS

Europe's Wars

WAR MADNESS. By Stephen and Joan Raushenbush. Washington, D. C.: National Home Library Foundation. 25 cents.

BEWARE OF EUROPE'S WARS. By Alfred M. Bingham. With a Preface by John Dos Passos. Common Sense Magazine. 10 cents.

WHEN the Senate Committee Investigating the Munitions Industry began to map out its work in the summer of 1934, it decided upon two principal objectives: a maximum amount of national publicity for its findings with a view to familiarizing a large section of the population with the facts as they came to light; and the passage of legislation to rectify such evils as might be found to exist. Progress toward the latter goal has been very meager, a fact for which the committee cannot be blamed, for it tried valiantly to get the necessary laws passed and met with continued opposition. The only significant piece of legislation enacted—as a direct result, no doubt, of the committee's work—is the Neutrality Act, which as it now stands on the statute books is a far cry from what the committee recommended in the beginning, and which is being attacked with considerable justification both by those who are for and those who are against isolation.

In the matter of publicity, the results have been more encouraging. Indeed, the actual amount received has exceeded the committee's most extravagant expectations. There is some question, however, whether the evils revealed have impressed themselves upon the public mind sufficiently to stimulate effective action for their abolition. The Raushenbushes, who were closely connected with the committee and who base their very interesting little book largely upon its findings, are in effect testing the public, challenging "those who want this country to stay out of foreign wars" to do something about it. Lest their readers might have overlooked or forgotten certain details, they devote approximately half of their space to a summary of the atrocities of which the munitions makers are guilty. Of necessity, it is a sketchy summary, for the facts filled twenty-odd volumes of testimony, but it gives the reader a striking picture of callousness, corruption, collusion, and plain, calculated murder for profit. This should suffice to stir deep resentment against war and the conditions which make for war; and the authors move on to eight concrete proposals for keeping the United States out of war.

The first four proposals are partially, and in modified form, included in the present Neutrality Act, the book having gone to press before that law was passed. The first is adherence to the "cash and carry" principle. It is contended that this will not necessarily favor nations having big navies provided sales are limited to peace-time or "normal" proportions, and that it will prevent in our own country the development of a war boom, which is a sure forerunner of war. The second is to forbid Americans to travel in belligerent ships, and to treat as warships armed merchant vessels of belligerents. Thirdly, despite the acknowledged difficulties of such an effort, the authors would attempt to limit drastically war profits. They would do so by means of effective legislation and not by pretended moves in that direction, such as the misleading and very dangerous Sheppard-Hill bill introduced in the last Congress. Fourthly, they strongly urge support of the Ludlow amendment requiring a nation-wide referendum on any war save one of actual invasion, and they urge as well a referendum, without an amendment, to determine the nation's sentiment on drafting men for service overseas.

Chief consideration is given to a proposal that the government produce "most of its combat munitions." There can be no objection to the principle, they point out, because "the power of the nation to provide for its national defense is absolute." Advantages to be gained from such a move are these: it would prevent the growth of militarism, which is now working toward an alliance between munitions makers and the army and navy; military secrets would not be divulged as readily as they are now; the government would save money through lower production costs and would remove the vested interest which munitions manufacturers now have in war; and, finally, the disgraceful practice of bribing foreign government officials would be ended.

No doubt any one of the proposals could be, with comparatively little effort, shot full of holes. Indeed, one could find in the authors' own analysis of the powerful economic and political forces which cause wars grounds for condemning this list as purely palliative in character, doomed to failure since our economic order is what it is. Such a disposition of these honest and sincere proposals would be a grave mistake. War is dangerously near, and any suggestion for postponing the fatal day is worth considering. The price of the book should make possible its wide distribution. It will be a pity if peace groups do not undertake to distribute it in large quantities. It should, especially, be made available to workers, who may be encouraged by it to take effective action against war.

Another plea for American isolation is advanced in Alfred Bingham's pamphlet, "Beware of Europe's Wars." This is a passionate and hysterical summation of arguments why the United States should stay out of European squabbles. It would seem that ample defense of this thesis is possible without resorting, as Mr. Bingham does, to half-truths about the similarity between the Hitler and Stalin regimes which seek to prove that neither side is worth fighting for. Particularly disconcerting is his callous and largely inaccurate account of what is happening in Spain. The pamphlet is worth owning, however, because of its first four pages, which contain a preface by John Dos Passos contrasting the current American with the European scene. It Is written in Dos Passos's masterly fashion, and presents some very keen and interesting observations. ROSE M. STEIN

Mann and Superman

FREUD, GOETHE, WAGNER. By Thomas Mann. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

AT FIRST glance these three essays, set down in different moods for various purposes, seem to have found their way fortuitously into the present volume. But those who heard them delivered this spring at the New School for Social Research or those who are interested in the context of Thomas Mann's thought will perceive a relevance and a symmetry in his choice of subjects. Each of the figures occupies a strategic point in the civilization of which Mann himself is the dispossessed heir. If Goethe was the prophet of modern German culture crying in the wilderness, Wagner became the stage-manager who provided atmosphere for its triumphs, and Freud is the diagnostician who sits at its bedside. Mann, with his knack of discerning human archetypes for historical situations, can scarcely be unaware of the symbolic force of his own position.

In his threefold role of German, writer, and exile, he is anxious to salvage as much tradition as possible, to seek precedents for cosmopolitanism instead of nationalism, rationalism rather than obscurantism, liberal enlightenment as against fascist propaganda. Freud, as a notorious exponent of Kulturbolshewismus, is on his side from the start. To make such a case for Goethe requires certain sacrifices—preferring the second part of Faust to the first, Wertherism to Götzism, the complacencies of Weimar to the ardors of Strassburg. Wagner can only be saved by drastic redefinition, so a distinction is set up between folk art and national art. Wagnerian music-drama, since it is not provincially but professionally Teutonic, is qualified to represent Germany in the concourse of nations, along with the work of Dürer and Luther, Bach and Kant.

But these studies are more intimately connected by the Leitmotiv of self-consciousness. It was Goethe who taught writers to convert everything they touched into autobiography. His life, with its carefully marked periods and its succession of mistresses that schoolboys are compelled to memorize, has become the standard of a literary career; "the imitatio Goethe . . . can still shape and mythically mold the life of an artist." To turn from Goethe to Wagner is to proceed from egoism to paranoia. Superficially his art bears a closer relation to the world at large, but actually it distorts and transmogrifies it by trying to comprehend the whole thing. Freud again, as an explorer of the self, needs no justification, yet Mann has etherealized the Freudian metaphysic by emphasizing the projection of the ego upon phenomena at the expense of the impact of events upon consciousness.

From these masters of the self-conscious, then, Mann has inherited not only his psychological technique, but also his peculiar realization of the destiny of the artist. Others, by posing thir own dilemmas, have sharpened his awareness of the problem—Nietzsche and voluntaristic philosophy, Ibsen and the naturalistic drama, Dostoevski and the Russian novel. Tonio Kröger, like his creator the son of a German father and a Latin mother, spends his life oscillating between two worlds, the bourgeois and the bohemian; as for the society which produced him, he can neither live with it nor without it. For Mann, at least, this impasse is now over, and he is free in limbo to be as idealistic and eclectic and narcissistic as he likes. By shedding environment factors his psychology, which always made more of symbols than of reflexes, verges into mythology.

T. S. Eliot, in his review of "Ulysses," welcomed myth as an element that would bring richness and pattern to the modern novel. With Mann, "The Magic Mountain" bridged the gap between realism and allegory. In his Novellen he has Chekov's faculty for evoking the portentous by the trivial, as when the specter of fascism is conjured up by the improvised performance of a hunchbacked hypnotist in a little Italian watering-place. The Joseph trilogy comes as a final effort to abandon the particular for the typical, the immediate for the universal. Though it seems a brilliant exercise of the historical imagination, it cannot avoid certain odors of the museum; its scenes are all dioramas and its characters miracles of the taxidermist's art.

This later mythological approach, heavily explicit and bewilderingly mystical by turns, is observable in "Freud, Goethe, Wagner." Mann is a little too prone to see cosmic correspondences—for example, to trace Zola's Nana to the Babylonian Ishtar. His critical vocabulary remains indisputably German, so fuzzy that it would take Occam's razor to shave it clean. And his attitude toward his subjects is ultimately uncritical; he is concerned with messages, not methods; he seeks inspiration, not example. To parallel this outlook among familiar critics, we should have to turn to the hero-worshipers, to Emerson and Carlyle. Yet hero-worship is a test as well as a tribute, and Thomas Mann's own stature does not suffer in the company of the famous men whom he chooses to praise. HARRY LEVIN

Fantasia on the Left

THE CONQUEST OF POWER. LIBERALISM, ANARCHISM, SYNDICALISM, SOCIALISM, FASCISM, AND COMMUNISM. By Albert Weisbord. Covici-Friede. Two Volumes. $7.50.

AS I read this huge book, an old story familiar on both sides of the Atlantic came to my mind time and again. The wife of a governor pays a surprise visit to a state asylum. She is shown over the grounds by a guide who discourses quite intelligently about the conditions of the inmates. When she compliments him on his courtesy and knowledge, rare virtues among the officials of the region, she is surprised to learn that he himself is an inmate. He tells her a plausible and heartrending story about being railroaded to the institution by a faithless wife in league with an unscrupulous physician. In high moral indignation she promises to go directly to the governor to secure his release forthwith. As she turns to leave, the guide suddenly boots her in the rear, raises a reproving finger, and exclaims in rising inflection, "Don't forget to tell the governor!"

I picked up this book with large expectations. There is no systematic and comprehensive account in English of the movements it sets out to treat. The author has been active in labor organizations. He has been disillusioned with the opportunistic leadership of the Communist Party. Here, then, one was sure to find some fresh insights into the theory and practice of social doctrines, not by a pedant or ivory-tower academician but by an individual who had had first-hand experience with the class struggle in the raw. Alas! Save for the point at which it is hair-raising, the book is utterly pedestrian. It does not even approach the mediocre level of the much-abused doctoral dissertation. It is based largely upon secondary and tertiary sources—and some poor ones, at that. The author's familiarity is, in the main, limited to works available in English translation. Many of these he seems to have opened at random. In the preface Mr. Weisbord tells us he first conceived this work as a political primer. But although he now offers it as "a standard treatise," it has nothing in common with a standard treatise except length and price. The reader will search in vain for a straightforward presentation in their own terms of the social philosophies to which the book is presumably devoted. Mr. Weisbord is so eager to expose theories he disagrees with that he cannot take the time to expound them. No genuine analysis is given; the criticisms take the form of elaborate non-sequiturs.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

All these, however, are the usual faults of leaders of lost sects who write their apologia pro vita sua in the guise of standard treatises. But Weisbord's distinction is the number of kicks he administers to the governor's wife. I give a few illustrations. First is his discovery that John Dewey has changed his liberalism in the direction of fascism. Proof? A sentence from Dewey's "Liberalism and Social Action," in which he says, according to Weisbord, "Liberty in the concrete signifies release from past oppressive forces." That Weisbord misquotes Dewey—probably unintentionally—is relatively unimportant. (What Dewey actually says is: "Liberty in the concrete signifies a release from particular evils.") The boot in the rear comes in Weisbord's comment which immediately follows the sentence quoted from Dewey: "Is it not clear that liberalism is now preparing itself to be the midwife to American organized and fascistic capitalism?"

This pales into insignificance compared to the variety of American communism which Weisbord offers as a substitute for Dewey's American liberalism. "Lynching is something for every American Communist to understand and not to scold. It has its roots in the democratic traditions of the country. It is the action of the mass itself which takes the law directly in its own hands. It shows a contempt for the regular legal process. It is something in which millions of Southerners and Westerners have taken part. . . . Communists must point out not that the process of vengeance or of direct action of the masses in the streets has been incorrect, but that the lynching has generally been in the wrong direction."

Everything after this must sound anticlimactic. But as evidence that such comments are not unrepresentative, I cite other examples. Polemicizing against those who have criticized the dogma of inevitability in the Marxian tradition because it tends to make human activity both unintelligent and unintelligible, Weisbord counters with the observation: "If instrumentalists say that the dictatorship of the proletariat is not inevitable, it is because they conceive that fascism may come, and they trim their sails in advance in order to meet it." It is not only critical intellectuals who play into the hands of fascism; any labor leader or radical who demands jobs for workers, according to Weisbord, is guilty of the same thing. "The Communist is in fact negating his own principles when he demands any jobs under capitalism, since all work under the present system can tend only to weaken the proletariat and strengthen the bourgeoisie and, with it, the capitalist state." Indeed, Weisbord does not hesitate to charge all revolutionary organizations in the United States with aiding the Department of Justice. "That [they] have not been averse to having the police register their members and sympathizers can be seen from the fact that they register no protest to the demands of the United States postal authorities for the names and addresses of all the subscribers of their papers, in order to obtain the second-class mailing privileges."

This has its pathetic as well as its humorous side. But Mr. Weisbord's state of mind is not without its social significance. He was formerly one of the leaders of the American Communist Party and ideologically is still living in what is technically called "third-period communism," i.e., the period of Communist sectarianism gone mad. His views can be matched by other choice selections from the history of the American Communist movement. The startling thing about it is that this and similar wisdom has been hatched by what its devotees call "scientific socialism." The larger issues which Mr. Weisbord's case raises are: What in so-called scientific socialism, as understood by orthodox Marxism, produces such attitudes and thought processes? What qualities of political leadership can we expect in practice if it is based upon theories of this type? What kind of institutional safeguards can be devised to protect the masses from saviors who regard themselves as the Voice of History when by some strange quirk of events power either falls into their hands or is thrust upon them? It is only in relation to such questions that Mr. Weisbord's thought merits discussion.

SIDNEY HOOK

Cressida of Troy

A TROJAN ENDING. By Laura Riding. Random House. $2.50.

THE importance of Troy to Miss Riding, and consequently the reason for this novel, cannot be stated in a few words. Miss Riding herself has written a great many words without making the matter too clear, though she has kept it in a strange way interesting. Few novels have been more personal in the sense of being saturated with a theme for which there appears to be no language available, and in the sense also of driving the reader constantly to wonder what the special meaning of the story is to the author. In her preface Miss Riding remarks that if she had been surer of her knowledge she would have written a poem about Troy. Leaving aside the fact that the best of all poems would have been her competitor, she was doubtless wise to do as she did. But it was not her knowledge of which she was unsure. It was herself; or rather it was the thing she wished her novel to say. Homer was so sure of himself that he expressed himself perfectly; the "Iliad" as a whole, that is, is what he had to say. "A Trojan Ending" is no such whole, though it has many brilliant parts; something is still unsaid. To use a phrase which one of Miss Riding's critical books has made current, it is a modernist poem: as close to us as the air we walk in, and as difficult to see.

At no time is the thesis of the novel—for, to be a little gross, it has a thesis—necessarily true. Miss Riding's conviction that the world of Troy was like our world remains for all its intensity an isolated conviction, and quite possibly nonsense. The Trojans and we alone have been mature; "ready to be alive"; "happy." We count our miseries, of course, and even our agonies, as Priam's people counted theirs; but like Priam's people, and particularly Cressida, we are blessed with "the certainty that what we now live has the essential taste of life—that is what life verily tastes like." No other age in what Miss Riding contemptuously calls history ever got anywhere near such certainty. "The rest—the slow, adolescent interval—was elaborately insincere." It is obvious that this means much to Miss Riding, for whom Troy is a symbol of whatever in humanity is most precious. But it is equally obvious that a reader who comes to her without an identical symbol will not be compelled to believe her, and will not even discover what it is that is so precious. "The journey back to Troy," says Miss Riding, "is a journey through a dream." Through her dream, that is; and as in all dreams the connections are missing.

The heroine is Cressida, around whom, both at Troy and in the Greek camp, an endless conversation collects itself. Miss Riding's people must talk a great deal because they must talk for her. She is never dramatic, for the simple reason that the story has no existence outside of her dream. And Cressida for all her intelligence is something of a prig because Miss Riding is so consciously using her to make the point that cannot quite be made—the point about Troy's perfection and about its utter, its unaccented awareness of the truth concerning itself. Troy's danger, indeed, is that it will languish in its grace and fade noiselessly out of being. "The Trojans," mused Helen, "had a gentle power of growing tired—which was their sanity. Yes, the Greeks were insane. The Greeks had a greed for destiny. They did not live." Troy has learned how to be bored beautifully, how to know everything without growing ugly from the knowledge. Yet therein for Cressida lies the threat of its extinction. "Could it be that the very trueness of Troy has weakened the Trojan appetite for life?" It could be; and that is why Cressida goes over to the Greek camp during the truce—to bring back an infection of falseness for life's sake. It is also why she deserts Troilus for Diomedes. For "Troy itself would not remember, it would lie buried under this enchantment, unwakable because it had never gone to sleep; nor would the Greeks remember Troy. . . . She would go to Diomedes; with him she could remember Troy. . . . Let it be shame; the shame, called after her, would be a means of memory. . . . More and more different from its earlier guises would grow the world. But Troy would remain Troy in the depths of the mirror of self-resemblance, the haunting unification of what had been with what was to be."

All this is arbitrary, both as history and as morals; we do not know what Miss Riding means, either as to Troy or as to ourselves. At its center, therefore, the book is vague. But its surface is frequently very fine. The conversation is brainy, the mythology is unconventional, the wrenching of legend (usually to avoid drama) is ingenious, and the summaries of certain characters (notably Pandarus and Thersites) are witty beyond the power of most living novelists. So that if the whole is still one of Miss Riding's secrets, many of the parts await our active pleasure.

MARK VAN DOREN

F. W. P. Homework

AMERICAN STUFF: An Anthology of Prose and Verse by Members of the Federal Writers' Project, with Sixteen Prints by the Federal Art Project. The Viking Press. $3.

THE immediate work of the Federal Writers' Project, as Henry P. Alsberg tactfully explains in his foreword, was to write, assemble, and edit guidebooks of the different localities in which the project was organized. Some of the more able and fortunate among the hundreds employed contributed the better portion of their work in leisure time to theatrical agents on Broadway or to editors of magazines, newspapers, and publishing houses. The present miscellany contains writing that fell between the two possibilities; it could neither be used in the publications of the Writers' Project nor be sold elsewhere.

The character of the prose in "American Stuff" seems curiously outmoded, as though journalistic realism had already exhausted its vitality in the work of Theodore Dreiser, Sinclair Lewis, and James T. Farrell. Much of it is repetitious and therefore dull, using the clichés of what Mr. Alsberg calls "the American here-and-now." It should be remembered here and now, as well as always, that the superficial devices of dialect and the "true-life" confessional are seldom valuable, and the material from which they stem is of historical use only if arranged and edited by such brilliant technicians in social criticism as Helen and Robert Lynd.

Many of the short stories and semi-autobiographical sketches in this collection are inept examples of a style that has been called acceptable by popular magazines. This fact, rather than the subject matter characteristic of a depression period, makes them rather heavy reading. The best things in the book are Nathan Asch's "Heart's Desire," Leon Dorais's "Mama, the Man Is Standing There," and two legends, "The Legend of Sharon" and "Lookin' fer Three Fools," reported by Francis R. Cole and Luther Clark, respectively. In these four pieces there is an obvious effort, though one not uniformly successful, to penetrate the surfaces of human consciousness and to give meaning to its expression. In the latter legend one sees clearly enough the rich material out of which Erskine Caldwell created his short stories and novels; and here again it waits for the creative imagination to give it form and meaning.

The verse in this collection has of course the same limitations as its prose; the few exceptions are in the work of Vincent McHugh, A. T. Rosen, and Lionel Abel, and in the remarkable Negro spiritual, the twenty-first recorded by the South Carolina Project Workers of Effingham. Again, something of the same blight of gloomy and uninspired repetition falls upon the work of the sixteen graphic artists whose prints illustrate this book. But in justice to the artists it should be said that all achieve a level of competence that is only sporadically attained by the fifty or more writers. There is of course no mystery behind this general improvement; because of the vast amount of work done under the direction of the various art projects throughout the country, it was easier to exercise editorial discrimination, and it should also be remembered that those who were unemployed, in this field, received technical training.

In all fairness it must be said that the present volume does not pretend to definitiveness in its selection, nor does it represent the total achievement of its better-known contributors. It must be regarded as a first step toward recognizing the responsibility of a civilization to its writers. The principle which actuated the Federal Writers' Project is sound and clear; even in the fragments of work contributed by John A. Lomax, who is the National Folklore Adviser, one direction of its usefulness is clearly visible. The other direction is already established by the forthcoming publication of the project's guidebooks. But the production of a creative literature involves aesthetic and cultural problems that cannot be solved within a short time period by any federal administration. It is to be hoped that permanent federal employment agencies will be established after existing projects have been completed. Those who cannot live by their writing alone should be given every opportunity for further research in American folklore or to find means of employment other than hack work.

HORACE GREGORY

Shorter Notices

A. E. HOUSMAN: A SKETCH. Together with a List of His Writings and Indexes to His Classical Papers. By A. S. F. Gow. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

ALTHOUGH this sketch of Housman has to do chiefly with the poet's scholarly work, one gleans from it a number of facts about Housman's character. He was a perfectionist, always in a state of anxiety about the absolute accuracy of any work published. He achieved little fame as a student at the university, and in consequence for ten years afterward remained a clerk in the Patent Office. He began at this time his scholarly writings, as a result of which he was granted the chair in Latin first at University College and then, in 1910, at Cambridge. A harsh and witty critic of his fellow-scholars' performances, he made many enemies. His one ambition was to leave behind him a name, and as Gow says, this was always in conflict "not only with his mistrust of any human judgment and with the doubt whether there would be any long posterity for classical studies, but more fundamentally with his view of life as a 'long fool's errand to the grave.'" Housman's was a solitary life; one lifelong friendship with a fellow-clerk and student, Jackson, is the only intimate companionship we know of his enjoying. And since Jackson lived all his mature years in India, this did not continue save in feeling. Precise, completely punctual, impersonal always in the classroom, Housman was nevertheless welcome with students who knew the "Shropshire Lad."

EDA LOU WALTON

RUN AROUND. By Benjamin Appel. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Benjamin Appel sets his story in New York's West Side and exposes particularly the political shifts and opportunism of clubhouse bosses. Danny Englander's need of a job gets him involved as a flunkey vote-snatcher for one of the party machines. The confusion, the degradation of spirit, the rebellion and apathy which hundreds of men like Danny Englander endure in the slender hope of finding a job are an appalling comment on the "American dream" of life, liberty, and happiness. Mr. Appel reproduces the present scene with knowledge and force. The implications of the struggle between capital and labor, and the specific effects of the W.P.A. upon the spirit of men who are clamoring for the right to live like human beings are disturbingly presented. The vernacular and the tempo of the writing are as contemporary as today's newspaper.

STANLEY YOUNG

WORDS: ENGLISH ROOTS AND HOW THEY GROW. By Margaret S. Ernst. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.20.

In theory the whole art of the teacher may be reduced to knowledge of (1) her pupil, (2) her subject, (3) how to coordinate the two, but the practical difficulty of coordinating youngsters of junior-high-school age or younger with the bewildering and tedious irregularities of English orthography cannot always be overcome with the use of the ordinary spelling book. Mrs. Ernst, expert in the methods of the progressive educator, believes that children will learn to spell if they become interested in words as fragments of cultural history. Understanding of children and enthusiasm for her subject radiate from the pages of her well-devised little book. From it no healthy child could escape learning not only to spell but to take an active interest in his use of words.

GEORGE GENZMER

A New Book by Thomas Mann
Freud, Goethe, Wagner
There have been hundreds of requests for the publication of the lectures Dr. Mann delivered in New York in April. Here they are in greatly extended form. $2.00
ALFRED · A · KNOPF · N · Y ·

→ STARTING FRIDAY, SEPT. 10, AT NOON ←
JEAN RENOIR'S superb picturization of
The LOWER DEPTHS
(NA DNIE) from the play by MAXIM GORKI
Awarded the French Critics' Prize as the "BEST FILM OF THE YEAR"
ADDED: "HEART OF SPAIN"—Authentic Revelations!
55th ST. PLAYHOUSE Just East of 7th Avenue CO. 5-0425 (Cont. to Mid.)

U.S.S.R. 20TH ANNIVERSARY
NOVEMBER 7th CELEBRATION
See SOVIET RUSSIA—this year of all years—a memorable tour under the experienced guidance of J. N. Golos, manager of World Tourists, Inc. Visiting London, Copenhagen, Helsingfors, Leningrad, Moscow, Kharkov, Yalta, Odessa, Kiev and Paris.
$280 UP
WORLD TOURISTS, INC. 175 5th AVE., N. Y. C. AL 4-6656

INTRODUCTORY OFFER — 13 issues of the Manchester Guardian Weekly for $1

To form sound judgments on the crucial events in Europe and China, you require complete unbiased news from abroad and candid interpretations prepared by the best minds in England.

For more than a century, The Manchester Guardian has been recognized as Europe's leading liberal paper. It presents to well-informed English speaking people who live outside of England the complete news of public affairs plus interpretation from the critical, liberal point of view. As the weekly edition of the Manchester Guardian Daily, it offers, too, the most interesting of the special articles which have appeared in the Daily on a great variety of events—political, historical, economic, religious, literary, dramatic and scientific.

In actual square inches devoted to editorial matter, each issue measures the equivalent of 66 pages of the ordinary American news weekly.

Hundreds of Nation readers find The Manchester Guardian Weekly indispensable. We think that you will, too, if you take advantage of our offer of thirteen weeks for one dollar—less than 8c a copy including postage from Manchester, England, to your home.

Mail the order form at once!

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY,
224 West 42nd Street,
New York City.
I enclose a dollar for your 13 weeks' trial offer of THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY.
9-11-37

FILMS

A Dedicated Intellect

A SPECIALTY in good standing among Soviet scenarists has been the parable of conversion, in which irreconcilables (gipsies, mujiks, intellectuals) submit, at long length and after many and varied ordeals, to the communal discipline. "Baltic Deputy" (Amkino) might easily have repeated the stereotype but acquires stature of its own precisely because it begins where such products leave off. It must be added that history is in a large measure responsible for clearing the smoke of battle from the camera lenses here. The film makes use of authentic incidents in the life of the Russian scientist Klement Timiriazev, who in his seventy-fifth year so completely earned the admiration of the rank and file by his support of Bolshevist revolt that he was elected delegate to the Leningrad Soviet by the Baltic sailors.

Full responsibility for the picture's peculiar impressiveness and charm devolves upon Nikolai Cherkassov in the role of the militant old scientist, who studiously deflects the crotchets assigned to him, time and again, by the scenarist, and with extraordinary tact understates his way to a portrait that is hearty, homely, and rooted in informed tenderness. He has been compelled, in general, to set into motion situations devoid of palpable excitements: he enters the lecture-room and is denounced by his pupils; a young disciple hurls at his feet the manuscript of a tract upon which they have labored together for many years, and he kneels to retrieve it page by page; he gives a birthday party which is attended only by a drunken porter who mumbles an obsequious greeting, pockets a pourboire, and stumbles downstairs; he is plied with the awed attentions of a Baltic sailor (excellently played in blunt, Chapayev fashion), whose capital aside "He was the friend of Newton" deserves mention here as an instance of comradely tribute. In every case Cherkassov, working hand in hand with the camera, manages to translate the gist of a situation into a shrug of the shoulder or a birdlike jerk of the head, and at one and the same time invites and repels a sentimental effect in a way that disarms censure completely Thus, he is able to accompany his wife in a duet played to the empty chairs and deserted dinner table in a darkened drawing-room, when it has become plain that the party guests will not arrive. Tension builds and hangs in the balance, until, springing suddenly toward an electric switch, he floods the room with light and archly disinfects the mood with a melody in march time.

Credit for such moments must unquestionably be shared with the directors, Alexander Zarkhi and Josef Heifetz, who keep the camera moving with easy plasticity and only occasionally digress to underscore the moral of the piece in unduly propagandic boldface. The closing scenes, wherein Cherkassov's moving address to the Leningrad Soviet is tiresomely marred by marching masses, letters from Lenin, farewells, and heroic statuary, are particularly unfortunate. Even here, however, the directors are to be thanked for rejecting a possible deathbed session with the ailing hero, and concluding by the happiest device possible—with a receding long shot of a bent figure stooped over his books on the summit of a small stepladder, flicking the pages intently, and turning a dedicated intellect outward.

BEN BELITT

RECORDS

THE harpsichord sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti vary of course, but the best of them are among the most delightful and lovely music ever written; and some of the best, along with some that are less interesting, have been recorded for Columbia by Yella Pessl (six ten-inch records, $6). This is not the first set of its kind: a volume of recording by Wanda Landowska was issued by subscription some time ago. But it is the first set released for general distribution, and thirteen of the fourteen sonatas are, we are told, recorded for the first time. Not having heard the Landowska records I cannot make comparative judgments, but can only say that Miss Pessl's performances have the dexterity, clarity, color, and spirit that the music calls for, and are well recorded.

No. 595 in Köchel's catalogue of Mozart's works is the wonderful Piano Concerto in B flat recorded by Schnabel; and we would therefore expect the String Quartet K 590 also to be wonderful. But one cannot go by numbers and dates with Mozart; the quality of the work depends on whether it was just a job or whether heart and inspiration were in it. They were in the Piano Concerto K 271 that I discussed a few weeks ago; they were obviously—to everyone but the blurb-writer for Columbia's set—not in the perfunctory and feeble Quartet K 590. The performance by the Stradivarius String Quartet and the recording are both good (three twelve-inch records, $5).

What the music of three and four centuries ago would mean to us if we could hear it as it sounded in the performances of its own time we cannot know; we can know only the effect on us of the altered sound of performances today; and this effect varies. Some old music—works of Byrd, Victoria, Purcell—I have found moving, exciting, beautiful at first hearing, but not Palestrina's Missa Brevis as recorded by the Madrigal Singers under the direction of Lehman Engel (Columbia: three twelve-inch records, $5). Repetition, study may reveal more; and those who study may find Mr. Engel's accompanying notes inadequate. If, for example, one wants the listener to appreciate Palestrina's musical treatment of the words, it is not enough merely to refer to an example or two; one must do what Mr. Engel does not do: direct the listener to the places on the records where the actual sound of the treatment of certain words can be heard. That, at least, if one sets out to do an educational job, and this work, which is so far removed from most people's musical experience, is one that calls for an educational job.

On two records, one twelve-inch and one ten-inch ($1.50 and $1), Columbia has issued Gieseking's performance, wrought with his usual incredible perfection, of Debussy's "Children's Corner." It has relisted the record ($1) of several strange Rumanian folk dances played in his unfailing superb style by Szigeti, with Bartok at the piano. Also, it has issued a fine new recording of Gaubert's excellent performance of Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" with the Paris Conservatory Orchestra (two records, $3); and has done the same for Beecham's richly colored performance of Delius's "Summer Night on a River" with the London Philharmonic (one record, $1). On another single ($1.50) "With Verdure Clad," from Haydn's "Creation," and Bishop's charming setting of Shakespeare's "Should He Upbraid" are sung beautifully by Dora Labette.

B. H. HAGGIN

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame Cal.

Letters to the Editors

Mr. Ickes Suspects

Dear Sirs: Last evening I read a self-serving and therefore necessarily highly laudatory advertisement by and of The Nation. It ran: "They [its readers] find that The Nation accepts the challenge of the intelligent minority to disclose the facts behind the news and to interpret them authoritatively from the progressive point of view." This sounded better than fine. Indeed, it gave me quite a glow, because I am one of the readers of The Nation myself and I was momentarily happy in this bold admission that you "disclose the facts behind the news" and "interpret them authoritatively from the progressive point of view."

Whereupon I opened a recent issue in full confidence that I was about to have some first-class, authoritative interpretation of the facts behind the news—only to read another attack on the Housing Division of the Public Works Administration. The Logan amendment, said you—authoritatively and from the progressive point of view interpreting the facts behind the news — which places the housing administration under the Wagner bill in the Department of the Interior, "would seem to assure, in view of the department's record in recent years, that no houses will be built for many months to come."

It has been the policy of The Nation for two or three years not only to belittle but to misrepresent the facts with reference to what has been accomplished under PWA. I have invited an investigation on your part. I really would like you to know the facts, but you don't seem to want to know them. It appears to be a cherished habit of a "liberal" editor not to mess up with common, mundane facts. The rarefied air of Mt. Olympus seems to supply a medium through which one can see such facts as happen to suit one's purpose.

I haven't any doubt that the editors of The Nation could have done a much better job if they had undertaken the task of inaugurating a housing program. And yet I doubt whether even such gifted persons could have made a success of housing if they had accepted the facts and followed the advice that seem to be influential with them in determining their editorial policy toward housing.

I don't want to think the editors of The Nation are merely voicing the prejudices of that small and futile group in New York which PWA made the mistake of relying upon in its housing program at the beginning—a mistake the cost of which we have been paying ever since. And yet I suspect that clever and wise as they are, the editors of The Nation choose to be misled on housing by two small but persistent groups: first, those who were given carte blanche with respect to housing by PWA until a catastrophic failure threatened and resignations and separations were necessary in order to save anything of the program; and, second, those whose chief interest in the Wagner housing bill was in creating an administrative jungle that would provide jobs for them even if it was cumbersome, ineffective, and costly.

In short, I strongly suspect that the editorial in the recent issue of The Nation expresses the disappointment of those who have lost jobs as well as of those who hoped for jobs.

HAROLD L. ICKES

Washington, August 21

Catholic Layman on Spain

Dear Sirs: It seems to me that the position of the average American Catholic toward the Spanish civil war has been to a large extent misrepresented to the American public by the press, both liberal and conservative. Letters to the editors of The Nation have displayed an appalling lack of understanding of the Catholic layman's viewpoint. In a country as traditionally Roman Catholic as Spain we have witnessed a transition from a love of the church and all things of religion to a stinging hate as all-embracing as was the original love. This profound change has occurred particularly among the workers. Why? Does it seem plausible, as some of our church's hierarchy would have us believe, that the big, bad Russian "reds" have overnight so completely overthrown the ancestral religion of ages past? We, the American laity, think not. Rather we are inclined to believe that the smug indifference of the state-supported clergy to the exploitation of the workers of Spain has led to this mass antipathy to the church. And the same is true in Mexico.

Despite efforts to arouse the American Catholic to an enthusiastic support of the rebel cause, he has remained as a whole unconvinced. We find it difficult to believe that Hitler is honestly the "Defender of the Faith" in his support of General Franco. He carries the swastika instead of the true cross. In accord with millions of other American Catholics I cannot in conscience find a semblance of justice in the rebel cause!

FRANCIS KANE FENDT

West Philadelphia, Pa., September 2

How to Make Girdler Sign

Dear Sirs: Tom Girdler says that no law compels him to sign a union-recognition acknowledgment. If he refers solely to the Wagner Act his accuracy is questionable, but when he includes all laws he is definitely wrong; he completely overlooks Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Rulings under this law stipulate three conditions that must be present before the commission may order a trade practice stopped: the practice must be one used in interstate commerce; the practice must be unfair to competitors; the public must be interested in having the practice cease. All three are present in the case of Tom Girdler.

As the first condition, decisions in the Wagner Act cases clearly make the labor practices of recalcitrant companies matters of interstate commerce. Concerning unfairness to competitors, it is plain, even construing the Wagner Act narrowly, that collective bargaining through union representatives is an employee's right, and that those steel companies which have recognized this by signing are following the ethical practice. Those employers who prevent effective collective bargaining by not signing will be able to pay lower wages or work their men longer hours than their signed-up competitors; hence they can keep their cost of production lower and either undersell their competitors or make more profit. The only recourse of the firm that has signed up is to refuse to renew a union agreement when it expires or to break it immediately. According to the opinion of Supreme Court Justice Stone in Federal Trade Commission vs. Keppel and Brothers, "A method of competition which casts upon one's competitors the burden of the loss of business unless they will descend to a practice which they are under a powerful moral compulsion not to adopt, even though it is not criminal, was thought to involve the kinds of unfairness at which the statute [the Trade Commission Act] was aimed.

The third condition laid down by the commission is hardly to be questioned in the case of Republic Steel. The public certainly has an interest in preventing the murder, bloodshed, pay-roll loss, and other evils resulting from the strikes which have been the consequence of Girdler's obstinate refusal to sign.

As for the contention that it is unconstitutional for courts to order people to affix their signatures to documents, it is sufficient to call attention to the age-old practice of equity courts by which people are compelled to sign grants of property to others equitably entitled to it. In the interest of the public, in the interest of the steel workers, and out of fairness to those steel companies which have signed, the Federal Trade Commission should act. The law requires Tom Girdler to sign.

CHARLES N. HOFFMAN

Washington, August 15

Where Credit Is Due

Dear Sirs: Miss Eda Lou Walton, reviewing "And Spain Sings" in the August 28 issue of The Nation, has been more than generous to me, but she has correspondingly tended to slight the part played by my colleague. M. J. Benardete laid all the groundwork of this book; he procured the original material from the files of El Mono Azul (not from several popular magazines, as Miss Walton indicates), and his literal and rhythmical English prose statement of 90 per cent of the text formed the basis on which the American adapters worked. Moreover, Mr. Benardete's introduction to the book should by no means escape the notice of the careful reviewer.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Belvidere, N. J., September 1

"Epius" Emerges

Dear Sirs: In my recent travels through the Far West my attention has been attracted to the new "Epius" movement. This movement, led by Arthur W. Watwood of Winner, South Dakota, has for its motto, "End Poverty in the United States," and "Epius" clubs are being formed by the People's Democratic League, of which Watwood, former Democratic candidate for Congressman, is president.

The "Epius" program goes farther than did Upton Sinclair's "Epic" platform. It advocates public ownership of banks and utilities, a moratorium on farm mortgages, monthly old-age pensions of at least $50, maternity and disability insurance, and direct election of Supreme Court judges. Watwood and several other speakers have been conducting a whirlwind tour of South Dakota, speaking in almost every town and city. The papers give "Epius" considerable space and take it seriously. I heard Watwood speak several times. He is a man of force, evidently very sincere, and well informed in economics.

It looks as if something has been started in South Dakota that may parallel the old Nonpartisan League in strength. Watwood, while counting on the support of most of his liberal Democratic colleagues, will evidently be backed in his fight by many progressive Republicans, as well as the old veterans of the Nonpartisan League and the Socialist Party.

THEODORE A. JOHNSON

Pensacola, Fla., August 9

CONTRIBUTORS

M. E. RAVAGE, The Nation's regular correspondent in France, recently returned to Paris after an intensive first-hand study of Central Europe and the Balkans.

MAXWELL STEWART lived in China for six years and has closely followed the course of Sino-Japanese relations.

JOEL SEIDMAN is on leave from Brookwood Labor College to work with the Education Department of the United Automobile Workers of America.

DERO A. SAUNDERS, a Southerner and a student of Southern problems, has worked as apprentice machinist for the Rust Cotton Picker Company.

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS is a practicing physician as well as a distinguished poet and novelist.

W. H. HOBBS, author of a biography of Peary, has led his own expedition to Greenland.

ROSE M. STEIN is the author of "M-Day," a study of war-mobilization plans in America.

HARRY LEVIN is a member of the Society of Fellows at Harvard University.

SIDNEY HOOK, chairman of the Department of Philosophy of New York University, is the author of several books on Marxist theory.

HORACE GREGORY will soon publish a study of the traditions behind modern literature entitled "Makers and Ancestors."

STATEMENT OF THE OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT, CIRCULATION, ETC., REQUIRED BY THE ACTS OF CONGRESS OF AUGUST 24, 1912, AND MARCH 3, 1933.

Of The Nation, published weekly at New York, N. Y., for September 11, 1937.

STATE OF NEW YORK }
COUNTY OF NEW YORK } ss.:

Before me, a Notary Public in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Hugo Van Arx, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the business manager of The Nation, and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management (and if a daily paper, the circulation), etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of March 3, 1933, embodied in Section 537, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse side of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business manager are: Publisher, The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.; Editors, Freda Kirchwey, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.; Max Lerner, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.; Business Manager, Hugo Van Arx, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

2. That the owner is: (If owned by a corporation, its name and address must be stated and also immediately thereunder the names and addresses of stockholder owning or holding one per cent or more of total amount of stock. If not owned by a corporation, the names and addresses of the individual owners must be given. If owned by a firm, company, or other unincorporated concern, its name and address, as well as those of each individual member must be given.) The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.; Freda Kirchwey, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: (If there are none, so state.) None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

5. That the average number of copies of each issue of this publication sold or distributed, through the mails or otherwise, to paid subscribers during the twelve months preceding the date shown above is. (This information is required from daily publications only.)

HUGO VAN ARX
Business Manager

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 11th day of September, 1937. TERESITA GRANT.

(My commission expires March 30, 1939.)
(Seal)

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 60 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 18, 1937 NUMBER 12

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 277
EDITORIAL:
WAR—EAST AND WEST 279
PIRATES AND BRITISH POLICY by Louis Fischer 282
NEUTRALITY—A DANGEROUS MYTH by Geoffrey Stone 283
THE AGGRESSIVE GOOD NEIGHBOR by G. Arbaiza 285
D. A. R. IN THE SCHOOLROOM by M. B. Schnapper 288
SWISS DEMOCRACY IN RETREAT by Peter Brown 290
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 292
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
THE LIFE AND DEATH OF GARCIA LORCA by Rolfe Humphries 293
A SECOND-EMPIRE JOURNAL by Morton Dauwen Zabel 294
THE LATEST SHUDDER by Mary McCarthy 296
A "COMIC CONSCIENCE" by Martha Gruening 296
BEHIND TOMORROW'S HEADLINES by Lewis Gannett 298
AN ANTI-SLAVERY SAINT by Oswald Garrison Villard 299
SPOON RIVER AGAIN by Mason Wade 300
MUSIC: SALZBURG, 1937 by B. H. Haggin 301
DRAMA: 1776 AND ALL THAT by Joseph Wood Krutch 303

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER
Literary Editor Associate Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

THIS WEEK THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION reaches the 150th year of its existence. It is old and tough. It merits respect because it has served well the purposes for which it was written. But it merits no reverential awe; it is neither symbol nor fetish; on the contrary, it is a political instrument to be used or changed according to the requirements of the society which employs it. It needs to be changed today to insure that the wishes of the majority of the people expressed through Congress may make themselves effective; to insure that the financial and industrial forces at large in the modern world may be brought under social control. Specifically, the Constitution must be changed to end the unrestricted power of the Supreme Court to veto legislation. This change will be fought by important interests and influential groups of citizens, the same for the most part that fought the President's legislative program for court reform.

THESE GROUPS HAVE BEEN WITH US ALWAYS. They dominated the framing of the Constitution; they voted for its ratification. Their identity and interests were defined once and for all by Charles A. Beard in his historic essay on "The Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States." We quote from Dr. Beard's conclusion:

> The movement for the Constitution of the United States was originated and carried through principally by four groups of personalty interests which had been adversely affected under the Articles of Confederation: money, public securities, manufactures, and trade and shipping.
>
> The first firm steps toward the formation of the Constitution were taken by a small and active group of men immediately interested through their personal possessions in the outcome of their labors. . . .
>
> The propertyless masses under the prevailing suffrage qualifications were excluded at the outset from participation (through representatives) in the work of framing the Constitution.
>
> The members of the Philadelphia conventions which drafted the Constitution were, with a few exceptions, immediately, directly, and personally interested in, and derived economic advantages from, the establishment of the new system.
>
> The Constitution was essentially an economic document based upon the concept that the fundamental > private rights of property are anterior to government and morally beyond the reach of popular majorities.

That concept is still dominant in the minds of those who believe the Constitution to be beyond criticism or change. If it is to be made into an instrument for the protection of the rights and interests of the generalty, rather than of "personalty," the change must be brought about through the will of those whose will has been overruled in the name of the Constitution.

*

THE CHARGES MADE AGAINST JUSTICE BLACK by the Post-Gazette of Pittsburgh are serious. They are, in brief, that Justice Black joined the Ku Klux Klan in 1923, that he resigned in 1925 just before a campaign for the Democratic nomination for United States Senator in order to be able to deny that he was a member, but that this resignation was never acted upon formally and that after a successful campaign he accepted a life-membership card. These charges directly controvert the impression given out by Black's supporters, and hence presumably by Black himself, at the time of his appointment to the court that he had accepted Ku Klux Klan support—along with labor backing—but had never actually been a member of an organization whose primary principle is "white supremacy." Membership in the Klan, under any circumstances and for any reason, is not to be lightly dismissed when a Supreme Court justiceship or any other public office is involved. At the same time Justice Black's record for the past ten years in Congress has been so consistently liberal and even radical that The Nation whole-heartedly supported his nomination in spite of the rumors of an earlier political flirtation with the Klan. We shall continue to defend Justice Black on the basis of his record unless it can be proved beyond doubt that he has consciously maintained his connection, if it ever existed, with the Klan. We shall do so all the more vigorously because the present attack comes from the same general source from which has come the hysterical and reactionary opposition to the President's court plan and to every other attempt to curb the industrial and financial oligarchy. But in justice to his friends Justice Black himself must now explain fully his alleged connection with the Klan.

*

WHILE THE LOSS OF MACHANG AND THE retreat from Shanghai represent definite setbacks for China, the events of the past week afford no reason for serious discouragement. It has been apparent for several weeks that the Chinese could put up more effective resistance if they would withdraw beyond the range of the Japanese naval guns. The withdrawal also ends the danger that the Chinese troops in the Yangtzepoo section might be cut off and destroyed, a danger that has existed since the early days of struggle in the Shanghai area. The loss of Machang, thirty miles south of Tientsin, may be taken as another indication of the difficulty of holding out against mass Japanese attacks, but its effect was more than offset, from a strategic point of view, by the success of the guerrilla forces operating in the Western Hills, outside of Peiping, in cutting off and destroying a detachment of 4,000 Japanese troops which had been sent against them. None of these developments approach in significance, however, the final settlement of the long struggle between Nanking and the Chinese Communists. For this not only brings 200,000 veterans of the Chinese red army into the struggle on a front where their guerrilla tactics are likely to show up to the best advantage but provides full assurance that there will be no compromise with Japan.

*

THE TREASURY'S ACTION IN LIBERATING $300,000,000 of its "sterilized" gold as an offset to the recent stock-market collapse is significant chiefly for the use of a new device in monetary management. Since there was no actual shortage in money or credit, the move cannot be expected to affect prices or stimulate business activity. It does, however, indicate that the Administration intends to leave no stone unturned in its efforts to find a method of moderating the business cycle. In the present instance it is working in the dark because no one has yet been able to advance a convincing explanation for the decline of the market. The war threat obviously existed chiefly in the columns of papers which were interested in boosting sales and, if real, should have been a factor in raising rather than lowering stock prices. Conservative papers have tried valiantly to show that the decline was the result of the restrictive policies adopted by the New Deal, but their case is considerably weakened by the fact that the recent Congress failed to pass any of the measures which were particularly frightening to business. The truth is that a slight slackening in business activity has taken place and this, with the war scare, gave the speculators a bad case of jitters. While there is some evidence that the natural forces of recovery have about run their course, we find no justification for hysteria.

*

THE ONLY NEW ATTRACTION AT NURNBERG this year was the presence of the diplomats of the principal democratic countries. They were displayed in a private car which had been graciously provided by the Führer; and seventeen military scouting planes welcomed them by flying over in the form of a swastika. As a prelude to their appearance, which was limited to one day, Propaganda Minister Goebbels made an unrestrained attack on democracy, and Otto Dietrich, Nazi press chief, carried on with taunts at "the powerless governments of democracy." Dr. Dietrich also paid his respects to the gentlemen of the press, particularly those representing New York papers, whose duty he said it was to "tell lies and bow down in the temple of Mammon." For the rest there were parades and more parades, in which a nation of slaves walked past their master, cheering wildly his threats of war abroad and of hunger at home. That any diplomat of a democratic country should have been allowed, let alone instructed, to witness such a spectacle and thereby passively condone it almost merits the sneer

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

of Dr. Alfred Rosenberg, who also spoke. Democracies, he said, are "piteously shortsighted and as terrified as a rabbit before a rattlesnake." Which reminds us that of all the name-calling that went on at Nürnberg, Dr. Rosenberg's designation of his leader as a rattlesnake strikes us as the neatest. The Völkische Beobachter please copy.

*

THE NEWSPAPER GUILD MEMBERSHIP, IN THE referendum just ended, upheld with one exception the actions of the St. Louis convention which led to a demand for a rank-and-file vote. Affiliation with the Committee for Industrial Organization was voted two to one, the vote being 3,392 to 1,691. The decision to broaden the jurisdiction of the Guild to include other editorial employees was also upheld by a large majority. The one decision which was reversed was a resolution condemning fascism in Spain, and here the vote was close—2,592 to 2,409. In general the votes on questions having political implications were relatively close. Indorsement of independent political action was upheld by a vote of 2,774 to 2,202, the resolution for increased WPA appropriations by 2,815 to 2,178, and indorsement of the President's Supreme Court proposal by 2,685 to 2,271. These figures show that a majority of the membership approves of the resolutions adopted in St. Louis; they also indicate that opinion was sufficiently divided to have made a referendum essential.

War—East and West

The New Face of War

THE world is witnessing the collapse of the structure of international law and morality which had begun to crumble before the Great War. What the powers at that time began, fascist cynicism and ruthlessness are now completing. The ethic of political conduct is a common one today among the fascist powers of Europe and Asia: anything goes if you can get away with it; act first and explain afterward; assemble vast armaments in the name of peace and send armies of invasion in the name of non-intervention; destroy cities and blame the carnage on the victims; torpedo merchant vessels without warning and deny that your submarines are responsible; trample on treaties in the name of international order and wipe out populations in the name of international good-will. Use a stentorian voice and keep a straight face while indulging in the most cynical and outrageous lies.

"Will there be war?" is the question all people are asking. One answer is that there is war today—undeclared war in Spain, in the Mediterranean, in the Far East. Undeclared war has its advantages. It allows you to strike without warning. It gives you, as in the case of Italy and Germany in Spain, the effectiveness of a belligerent along with the status of a neutral. It enables you to stir up civil war under cover of diplomatic protection. But, above all, it enables you to escape the onus of having started the war. For except in imperialist conquest of obscure and "backward" tribes, we still cling to the notion that to begin a war requires some moral justification. And the experience of Germany shows that, even in dollars and cents, it does not pay to be labeled as having started a war.

War has become trans-national. Not since the European wars of religion have national boundaries meant so little. The struggle is now in its largest aspects one between fascism and democracy, with cross-currents of national and economic interest to confuse the issue. Whoever has a stake in either camp feels a strong urge to reach out across boundary lines and take a hand in the conflict. Thus far the fascist powers have combined to take the aggressive, using as auxiliary techniques civil war and the puppet state or the puppet military commander. They have encountered stiff opposition in the form of a people's front of anti-fascist forces both in Spain and in China.

To break this resistance has been the object of the unspeakable massacre of noncombatants carried out on a scale that marks a new chapter in the history of warfare. The bombing of defenseless cities in Spain and China and the machine-gunning of fleeing populations have served no direct military purpose. Their only object can have been to terrify the population and destroy morale. The dictators make use of their own mass populations and the mass populations on the other side in the same coldly instrumental way. The individual life has become terribly cheap. Even we in America, who watch in press and newsreels the progress of the horrible slaughter, who see mangled children and the decaying and distended bodies of noncombatants floating down a stream, are becoming more and more callous to destruction and terror. We require continually increased increments of horror to capture our attention or stir our indignation.

But the measure of this imperviousness is the measure also of isolationist sentiment in America, England, France. The growth of pacifist isolationism is the outstanding development of recent years. It is, to our mind, an unrealistic sentiment, which runs the danger of releasing the very wars it seeks to inhibit. But it is none the less strong and tenacious—a fact to be reckoned with. It is significant in that it runs counter to the economic interests of the Western powers in the East as well as to the dictates of collective security.

The Mediterranean Front

All hope of collective action in support of peace and in opposition to aggression has been abandoned in Europe. In its place the powers have erected a system of pretense and concealment; a technique of manipulating realities with unrealities. The method is complicated as well as devious, but the idea behind it is essentially simple and essentially British. It is based on Great Britain's desire for peace with the dictators at almost any price—even the price of democracy and the territorial integrity of the lesser nations. At the end of the present struggle in the West—which has spread from Spain into the Mediterranean—Britain would like to see Spain under an orderly, perhaps monarchist, preferably not openly fascist, government; Italy placated with recognition of its African empire and bound by a gentlemen's agreement to respectful behavior in the Mediterranean; Germany purged of all westward ambitions and endowed somehow with a measure of diplomatic finesse; France freed from leftism and its Soviet connection and securely tied to British Continental purposes; and Russia left to its fate at the hands of Germany and Japan.

Such in broad outline is British "ideology" in the present struggle on the Western front. It explains the "non-intervention" which has cloaked armed intervention, the patrol which failed to detect continual large-scale violations of non-intervention, the attempt to stage at Nyon a parley which would end piracy in the Mediterranean and at the same time prevent the detection and exposure of the pirate.

But occasionally the cat jumps out of the bag, either of its own accord or through the help of an interested onlooker. Mussolini torpedoed the strategy of pretense when he openly claimed for Italy the honor of the capture of Santander. The Soviet Union pretty well completed the job when it charged Italy with piracy and the sinking of two Russian ships. And Spain is contributing to the cause of realism by thrusting before the League Assembly this week its own complete bill of particulars against the fascist powers. We might deplore this break in the smooth front of fake and suppression if we believed, as so many of our contemporaries insist, that honesty meant general European war. We are convinced, on the contrary, that the price of capitulation to aggression is not peace but more aggression. The European fascist powers and Japan are not moved by the spectacle of weakness. Ethiopia was the direct result of Manchuria; the occupation of the Rhineland followed logically upon the Ethiopian conquest; the fascist invasion of Spain and every outrage that has accompanied it are the end results of the whole shameful record of surrender, evasion, hypocritical pretense.

To British statesmen Russia's open accusation of Italy was a shocking breach of what has come to seem normal diplomatic procedure, committed just when Great Britain had arranged everything with an eye to soothing, while also checking, the presumptive pirate. But despite British annoyance, the Soviet Union obviously achieved a substantial victory by its outburst of honesty. Italy and Germany stayed away from the conference—in itself a help since their presence would have insured a polite evasion of the real facts. And Britain was forced to take a stronger stand than it wished in order to prevent Russia from acting alone. The Russian threat was timed exactly to take advantage of a situation in which British prestige and British property were for the first time so clearly involved that some action was inevitable. But without the Russian pressure the action might well have been an agreement with Italy which would have operated to the complete disadvantage of the Soviet Union—and Spain. Such an agreement would almost certainly have more clearly granted belligerent rights to Franco, drawn Italy closer to Britain, and pushed Russia farther away. But if certain major objectives were achieved, the details of the Nyon arrangement leave much to be desired. The exact status of the Spanish government is still in doubt, and Mussolini is let down gently with an invitation to patrol the waters adjacent to Italy. The British and French will carry the greater share of the police work, and Russia's beat will be limited to the Black Sea. It is expected that both the Soviet and Spanish delegates at Geneva will protest certain unsatisfactory provisions of the agreement, but no serious opposition is looked for from any source.

For Spain the success of the patrol is a matter of life or death. Dispatches from Valencia indicate that acts of piracy had succeeded in stopping essential supplies—especially oil—from reaching Loyalist ports. Some vessels were sunk; many more were frightened off the sea. Without supplies from Russia, the Loyalists cannot win, while Franco can continue to get supplies as long as Italian pirate submarines rule the Mediterranean. The agreement at Nyon should result in partly opening the sea lanes again.

THE FAR EASTERN FRONT

In many respects the Far Eastern struggle represents an advanced phase of the conflict in the West. The fascist elements of Japan have precipitated the invasion of China not only out of a desire for raw materials and markets but in order to maintain their prestige and dominance at home. The invasion also seems to have been planned to forestall an agreement between Nanking and the Chinese Communists.

The Japanese militarists completely miscalculated the strength of Chinese resistance. At first it was believed that a mere show of force would bring China to terms. If worst came to worst and resistance were attempted, it was felt that the Chinese would be so disunited as to offer only feeble opposition to the highly mechanized Japanese army. In fact, however, at no time in Chinese history has there been anything as closely approaching national unity as at the present moment. War lords like Yen Hsi-shan, Li Tsung-jen, and Pai Chung-hsi, who in the past have consistently opposed the government, have placed their armies directly under Chiang's command. Even more significant is the settlement of the ten-year war between Nanking and the Chinese soviets. The red army, known as the most efficient military force in China, has been rechristened the Chinese Eighth Route Army and has moved into Suiyuan and Shansi, where it may shortly come into actual conflict with the Japanese. A further indication of the abandonment of Nanking's anti-Communist campaign may be seen in the release of Mr. and Mrs. Ruegg, who had been serving a long sentence at Nanking for Communist activities.

The Far Eastern conflict differs from that in Spain in that no attempt has so far been made to insulate the world from its effects. A non-intervention agreement such as has been applied in the Spanish struggle is unthinkable in China because it would involve the surrender of Western interests to the Japanese. And the stake of the Western powers, particularly Great Britain and the United States, is too great for such a move. The situation is complicated, however, not only by the threatening situation in the Mediterranean but by the considerable body of influential Tory opinion in England which would look upon a Japanese victory as a welcome alternative to communism in China. That the Soviet Union, facing the threat of a Japanese invasion of Siberia, will extend material assistance to China is to be taken for granted. In spite of Japan's control of important lines of communication, supplies can be sent through. It may also be assumed that this assistance has been promised in return for political concessions such as have already been granted in the rapprochement between Nanking and the Chinese soviets. But what British conservatives have been slow to see in China, as in Spain, is that a vast difference exists between Communist participation in a popular front dominated by moderate groups and actual Communist rule.

Despite the division of Tory opinion, the chance of a strong British policy in the East is considerably better than in Spain. The whole question of British prestige, which was not at stake in Spain until the recent attacks on British shipping, has already been raised by the attack on the British ambassador. Moreover, as the Japanese move south, the threat to material British interests will become increasingly direct. Alone, Britain can do little to stop Japanese aggression. But with the cooperation of France, the United States, and the Soviet Union it would be possible, as in 1895 and 1922, to force Japan to give up its immediate territorial ambitions in China. Under present circumstances this can only be achieved through American leadership.

AMERICAN POLICY

American policy in the present crisis will of necessity be forged by conflicting pressures—economic, sentimental, and traditional. There is no large country in the world, save possibly China, where isolationist sentiment is as strong as in the United States. Yet, paradoxically, there are few countries which possess such an overwhelming passion to make the world over according to their own pattern. American missionaries greatly outnumber those of Communist Russia or Nazi Germany and are as a group fully as confident of the universal applicability of America's social and political philosophy. The foreign policy of the United States is also influenced by deep-seated national prejudices, many of which have been carried over from the Old World.

It is scarcely surprising that these conflicts in interest and sentiment should result in contradictory policies. The Neutrality Act, for example, is a direct outgrowth of isolationist sentiment, while the Nine-Power Pact, the Open Door policy in China, and the Monroe Doctrine are reflections of expansionist economic policies which have equally deep roots. The surrender of the Philippines and the withdrawal of American citizens from China stand in sharp contrast to the Administration's new naval program.

The Mediterranean piracy crisis, however, dramatically demonstrates the limitations of the isolationist theory that the United States should never seek to protect its overseas interests lest it become involved in war. Modern civilization is dependent very largely upon the freedom of the seas. While the world accepts certain limitations on that freedom in time of war, irresponsible attacks on peace-time shipping threaten the existence of world trade. Fortunately, the United States has not been called upon to send ships to the Mediterranean. It is probable that the immediate situation can be handled by Great Britain and France with only moral support from the United States. But what if Japan tears a leaf from Mussolini's notebook and inaugurates an "unofficial" blockade against foreign shipping destined for China? Should the United States withdraw its ships from the infested areas and allow piracy to obtain de facto recognition, or should it combine with the other powers in an effort to restore safety to the seas? The issues raised by Italian piracy in the Mediterranean differ only in geographic location from those involved in Japan's illegal invasion of China. What violation of law could be worse than making an unprovoked attack on a peaceful, law-abiding neighbor, laying waste its cities, murdering tens of thousands of its citizens, and seizing its meager economic resources?

Thus far the Administration has pursued a simple opportunist policy in the Far Eastern crisis. It has played up to isolationist sentiment by arranging for the evacuation of several thousand Americans from the war zones and by asserting that those who remain do so at their own risk. But it has delayed application of the Neutrality Act and has taken steps to protect American interests in China. It has made no effort, either individually or in concert with the other powers, to check Japanese aggression or to devise measures for protection against future aggressors.

Such a policy may represent a skilful middle course between conflicting domestic pressures, but it involves serious dangers. It affords neither the limited safety of a wholly isolationist policy nor the more adequate protection which would be provided by a system of collective security. Any attempt to protect national interests in the East is dangerous if it is undertaken unilaterally. Until recently there has been no natural channel for collective action. The Nine-Power Pact carries no obligation for action and provides no machinery for the enforcement of its terms. This mechanism has now been provided by China's appeal to the League under Article XVII of the Covenant. The United States is a member of the Far Eastern Advisory Committee of the League and is in a position not only to cooperate but to take the initiative in proposing collective penalties against the aggressor. It should also be possible for the League, with the aid of the United States, to provide a channel whereby the powers may give active economic support to the victim of aggression. Left to itself, the League is most unlikely to take steps to curb Japan. But given American leadership, the necessity of defending Western interests may force the powers to the only action which can save the world from chaos and war.

Pirates and British Policy

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Geneva, September 13

FOR Moscow and Valencia the issue at Nyon was whether a situation could be created in the Mediterranean which would allow Soviet arms to reach Spain. The Italian submarine campaign was inaugurated on the assumption that after the fall of Bilbao and the impending fall of Santander had robbed the republic of its Biscay ports, a blockade in the Mediterranean would cut off Russian supplies and quickly bring about a Loyalist collapse. Mussolini is having trouble at home. There have recently been strikes and peasant revolts in Italy, and the cost of the Spanish war is becoming an irritating burden. Il Duce needs an early triumph, and he knows he cannot have it on the battlefield. On September 8, in the Popolo d'Italia, the Burgos correspondent, Barzini, stated: "We must not imagine an easy, rapid victory." Warning against optimism, he added that the Loyalists' "resistance can become very solid and very tenacious. . . . We must not believe the enemy to be weak and ill-prepared." The interruption of arms importations, however, would undermine Valencia's strength—and that was Mussolini's object.

London and Paris manifested alarm as soon as the first Spanish steamer was torpedoed near the Dardanelles by "an unknown submarine." (It is being said that in Rome a grave has been prepared for the unknown submarine by the side of the unknown soldier.) Soviet shipments to Spain would never have been made without the connivance, and perhaps even the good-will, of England and France. Now these powers saw the possibility of shipments ceasing.

Members of the French General Staff have informed their government that the army could not accept responsibility for the defense of France if the Spanish rebels won. The French know that Germany lost the World War because it had two fronts. Franco's success would give France three. The French nationalists are more perturbed than they were before. Last week a well-founded rumor circulated in Paris that the French government had intended immediately to open the frontier to Valencia-controlled territory but that Eden wore out the wires urging caution upon Chautemps and Delbos.

The British are too worried about the Mediterranean to look on with equanimity while Italy shows it can do as it pleases there—to the length even of enforcing a blockade against commercial shipping, British included. The Admiralty could hardly have enjoyed such a picture. British men-of-war received orders to shoot to kill. And Britain may be indisposed to see Valencia lose to Franco. Some Englishmen still nourish the illusion that after Mussolini and Hitler have shed the blood of tens of thousands of their nationals and spent hundreds of millions of dollars in order that Franco may win, they will gallantly step aside and say to the British: "We did all this for you. Please come in and take our places." More realistic and more Machiavellian British politicians maintain that the prolongation of the civil war will so preoccupy the fascist powers that England will have a peaceful respite for rearmament, and they hope that the struggle will leave both belligerents so exhausted that England may step into the role of mediator. Hence London's interest in the continuation of Russian aid. To gain time Neville Chamberlain also proposes a four-power pact with France, Germany, and Italy, and Eden makes pro-Italian gestures at Nyon. In any case the British want no immediate peace—and the Nyon decisions serve their purpose. They may not finish Italian piracy but they will prevent a tight blockade.

At Nyon Litvinov alone championed the Spanish republic's cause. That is all that is left of the League of Nations anti-aggression covenant. The Russians feel their international position improved by Japan's involvement in China. Japan cannot now attack Russia. Therefore, and for other reasons too, Germany cannot attack. Moscow can now do more to check world fascism in Spain.

Meanwhile a sorry spectacle is being enacted on the windy shores of Lake Leman. Spain has been invaded. The League could at least give moral comfort; it could reelect Spain to the council seat which it has occupied since 1928. Spain's failure to be reelected would bring joy to the fascists inside and outside Spain and constitute a blow to the League patriots and to the whole pacifist movement. What good is a League which does not refrain from spitting into the face of a victim of aggression? But the Duke of Alba has been here to interview the Latin American delegates and persuade them to vote against Spain in the council. This Spanish "nationalist" may have met with some success.

The Nyon resolutions would still permit submarines to sink steamers in gentlemanly fashion, but most definite assurances have been given to certain powers that Italy will hereafter refrain from torpedoing ships. The British and French will have some eighty war units in the Mediterranean, and Mussolini knows they mean business. The Spaniards, however, are not so sure that submarines or destroyers which Italy can "sell" to Franco won't operate in Valencia's territorial waters, where patrol vessels—this at the moment is uncertain—may not enter. The fact that the British today foiled an Italian attempt through the Greek delegate Politis to exclude Ethiopia from the League would seem to indicate that London thinks it desirable to show a kid-gloved but firm hand before the fascist dictators meet in Germany.

Neutrality—a Dangerous Myth

BY GEOFFREY STONE

I HATE fascism. My heart is with the Spanish Loyalists. Yet if it were possible to insulate the United States from the world, to retire into our shell, to plow our fields and write our books and raise our children untouched by quarrels across the sea, if I felt we should be uninfected by a victory for reaction abroad, I would be for isolationist neutrality legislation. America was not born to set the universe aright. War is nightmare. Europe, unable to organize itself, despite the common heritage and the economic blood vessels that link its nations, may be doomed. Why should we risk sharing its fate?

But I do not believe insulation and isolation possible. I believe that we have taken the world for better or worse, and that there is no Reno in which we can cut the nuptial bonds welded by modern industrialism. I think that neutrality legislation of any sort is no more than a breeder of delusions, that it will break down in the event of another world war, that another world war is coming, that we shall ultimately be drawn in; that it would be better for us, by boldly taking our stand with the League or a League or some other form of collective action, to throw our weight on the side of peace and against aggression. I see no other possible way of averting war. I see no way to keep out of another world war, once it starts.

Must we play nursemaid to the world? I am afraid so. Two hundred years ago scattered agricultural communities along our Atlantic Coast might have been little affected by European preparations for war or the tread of marching men, though even in the simpler world of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries every major European war had its repercussions on this continent. Had the Armada been victorious, the Pilgrim Fathers would have been Spanish grandees; and North American institutions would have drawn their characteristics from a transplanted feudalism, not from an emerging middle class's desire for greater freedom. If Louis XIV had not been so anxious to place a Bourbon on the throne of Spain, Canada might still be French. If the English had not pressed Napoleon so hard, the tricolor might still fly over the plains between the Mississippi and the Rockies. Europe's conflicts seemed remote because others, principally the British, fought our battles, decided our destinies.

It has been assumed that to maintain the peace we need only pass a law. I think the time has come to examine that assumption. The last war showed that trade with belligerents soon becomes trade with one side, the side that gains control of the seas, that in the long run this trade can only be financed by loans, that the loans create a vested interest in the victory of the debtor, that creditor interests will use their economic power to make propaganda for intervention lest the debtor be defeated and the loans be lost. This is an oversimplification. But it is nevertheless the oversimplification on which neutrality legislation rests.

The advocates of neutrality legislation and of isolation believe that we must avoid the economic entanglements that draw us into diplomatic entanglements, thence into war. This policy, to be successful, must be thoroughgoing. In the event of another world war it would necessitate embargos not only on munitions but on the cotton, wheat, coal, iron, and oil that are as necessary to the warring nations as bullets. It would mean keeping our ships out of the war zone, selling nothing to either side, making no loans to either. Cash-and-carry is a loophole that would only whet the appetite for war orders, without providing enough business to cushion the impact of embargos on our economy; a device to remain neutral in a world war yet help Britain.

The advocates of neutrality legislation—with all respect for their sincerity and their ardent desire to keep us out of war—apparently fail to realize the economic consequences. The chemical lobby has hammered home the fact that less than a tenth of our total production is sold abroad, and the over-all figure has lulled us into complacence. Break the figure down, and the devastating effects of isolation on whole areas of our economy and our country rise to view. In normal times we sell about half our cotton abroad, a fifth of our wheat, a third of our oil. It is estimated that 2,000,000 Americans are directly dependent on foreign trade for their bread and butter. Many industries would lose their profit margins if they could no longer—thanks to our tariffs—dump their surpluses abroad at less than the price they charge for their products at home. Texas, which produces 90 per cent of its cotton for export; the California valleys, which must sell a large portion of their fruit abroad; the Middle Western wheat and corn country, which depends on the export margin for a profitable price; the business section of our great ports—these would be struck, as though by a plague, by isolation. What are we to do about the bread lines, the unemployment, the falling prices, the panicky markets, the bankruptcies, the dispossessed croppers, that would follow in the wake of the neutrality embargos required to keep us out of a world war? On political grounds what Administration would dare to face such a prospect?

Unless we have the answers ready in advance, the pressure for abandonment of neutrality legislation will be irresistible. Pro-neutrality newspapers will find their passion for peace crumbling when advertisers want war orders. Pro-neutrality legislators will begin to fear the effects of five-cent cotton and fifty-cent wheat. The emotions generated by the conflict will provide the energy for a change in policy; the ideas in which these emotions embody themselves will provide the necessary excuse. We shall sell again, lend again, fight again—in a war that might have been prevented had we thrown our influence on the side of peace. We run the risk of repeating Britain's mistake of 1914. The failure of the English openly to commit themselves to France, the consequent German illusion that England would not intervene if Austria attacked Serbia and Germany marched across Belgium, helped loose the hounds of war. There would have been hesitation, there might have been peace, if "all authoritative quarters" in the Reich—I refer to the July 12, 1914, dispatch of the Austrian ambassador at Berlin to his home government—had not been sure that the time was favorable for strong measures because Britain would not intervene. A neutrality program that fails to prepare in advance for an economic crisis deludes people into the comfortable assurance that we need to take no measures to prevent war; we can merely stay out of a war. Neutrality would almost certainly be abandoned soon after the outbreak of a world war unless a program were immediately available to fill the gap created in our economy by the sudden loss of foreign markets.

Is a program of this kind possible? I doubt it. What would it involve? One envisages a general staff for peace, as we have a general staff for war. One outlines a mobilization plan for peace, as we have a mobilization plan for war. One pictures a central government bureau with all the facts at its disposal: the extent to which virtual loss of foreign trade would affect prices, jobs, and values, the amount of lending needed to bolster markets and provide employment, the possibility of new markets at home in the shape of new uses for our basic products and higher living standards for our people. Carried away by the possibilities, one imagines an America geared to fight a peace rather than a war, pouring out millions for construction, clearing slums, ending floods, halting the deserts encroaching on our Western plains, building a new America, a richer, happier America, while the Old World, in a frenzy, spills its blood and treasure.

The prospect is inspiring, but is it possible? I doubt it. It can be reduced to blueprints. It is as simple as arithmetic. It is sane and it is sensible. But it won't work. True, we mobilize for war. Why not for peace? But we make a profit on war. There are dividends in war. Our whole economic machine is geared to profits, and war means profits—at least in the immediate sense. But peace with isolation means a loss, and our boards of directors are not convened to pass altruistic resolutions. A war between two powers, even a war among a few powers, is not a problem. We can keep out, neutrality embargos or not. But another world war, a war that might last from three to six years, would require thoroughgoing socialization if we were to remain isolated and yet support a passable standard of living. We should have to squeeze the water out of our industries; we could no longer afford to pay a return on the fantastic value the elder Morgan placed on United States Steel. We could no longer afford to permit the Mellon heirs to monopolize aluminum; or the Guggenheims, copper. The du Ponts would have to dissolve. We should have to operate first a few, later more industries on a non-profit basis. The process of plowing under crops and keeping men at boondoggles so as not to disturb profit-making would be too expensive. A policy of this kind reduces real wealth in terms of goods produced and human labor used; increases real debt in terms of obligations assumed and bonds issued by the government. On top of the debt piled up in fighting depression we could not afford another AAA, another NRA, another WPA, especially since all of them would have to be on a larger scale than we have known during the Roosevelt period. The problem would be to produce more, to distribute it better, and to do this quickly. That spells socialism of one variety or another. Would we give up profit for peace? I doubt it.

Even assuming that business interests would not force the country to abandon isolation, it is likely that Congress, instead of moving toward socialism, would, under the pressure of big property, lay the basis for a more repressive and less democratic system than this country has ever seen, even in time of war—complete government control of labor unions, abolition of the right to strike, machinery for cutting wages, forceful methods for removing dispossessed croppers and tenant farmers to new areas, makeshift boondoggles and Spartan rations for the unemployed. Consider the ugly mood that would be engendered among Southern planters, among strong-arm industrialists, by the economic crisis in the wake of isolationist embargos; consider the turbulent and revolutionary mood of the workers. Here would be the makings of a vigilante, a fascist America, an America that would use neutrality as a demagogic cover-up for its attack on liberty and finally plunge the more eagerly into war as a way out of difficulties at home.

We cannot be isolated. We shall pay higher telephone rates for a generation because a man named Hitler started an arms race in Europe and copper is a war necessity. We shall pay higher prices for steel because we have been drained of a generation's accumulation of scrap metal by war preparations abroad. We are faced even now by the necessity for profound changes in our national policy and national temper because of what is already happening across the Atlantic and across the Pacific. Shall we creep into the isolationist shell? Democracy will never be the same if we do. Shall we arm to the teeth, match ship for ship, cannon for cannon, with the aggressor powers? A militaristic, regimented, goose-step influence hitherto absent from our national life would make its appearance. Shall we support the League or some other agency of collective action? This too requires a wrench in our traditional way of thinking. Why must we choose? Because we are no longer free, because we are not isolated, because forces beyond our control are forcing us to choose. In the context of our time isolation is an unreal, a classroom solution.

I think the road that offers the least change, the best chance of peace, the greatest possibility of preserving

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

the free institutions that, with all their frequent lapses from the ideal, remain our proud possession, is the path of international cooperation. Democracy depends in large part on the freedom of the market, and the market is international. The international market is being destroyed by fear of war, the haste of nations to make themselves self-sufficient. Political security is necessary for economic security, for the revival of international trade, for the easing of nationalistic hatreds; it can come only through international cooperation. The weight of our power might turn the trick, halt the aggressor nations, prevent war. Nothing else can.

The Aggressive Good Neighbor

BY G. ARBAIZA

NOT long ago American diplomacy posted at the gates of Pan-America a sign reading: "American obsolete destroyers leased for a nominal charge to good neighbors on application." Official Latin America was amazed as it had not been since President Roosevelt announced his non-intervention policy in 1933. Shrewd dictators arched their eyebrows, then smiled unbelievingly. Was it really possible to get antiquated small craft of the American armada for nothing? Or was there a catch? Did you need only to fill out an application for destroyers as you would for books in a circulating library? Or did the good neighbor require that you have a strategic coast line, raw materials to protect against the "desires" of foreign powers, and plans for building up a navy, such as Brazil, the first favored applicant, had? Then, too, since destroyers are hardly instruments of good neighborliness, was this offer a departure from the good-neighbor policy?

In a joint statement the governments of the United States and Brazil answered that it was only "an entirely minor phase of that policy," and when a storm of queries and objections broke out here and abroad, American diplomacy took down the sign. But the statement remains substantially correct. The proposed lease of destroyers to Brazil was apparently only a minor item in a much larger program lately undertaken in the name of the good-neighbor policy. Washington has abandoned its suave tactics and plunged into direct action.

It has gone into action to fight for a position of vantage on the South American commercial battleground, where the great trading powers have been competing since the turn of the century. The deal recently closed with Brazil is not mainly concerned with the leasing of destroyers. Those much-discussed vessels play a comparatively trifling part in it. The fire of comments the leasing proposal drew from the press has hidden from public view the real story. The deal marks the first move in Washington's campaign to defeat European influence in the southern continent; to check the gains made by America's trade rivals, particularly Germany, in the Brazilian market, the second largest in South America; to secure a continued supply of the Brazilian raw materials essential to American industry; and to obtain through cooperation with Brazil a strategic advantage that will permit the United States to protect American interests on the eastern coast of South America in the event of world hostilities.

Frustrated in Buenos Aires last December in its plans for the organization of a bicontinental bloc that would have meant a solid Latin America behind the United States in the present world emergency, American diplomacy seems determined now to obtain by individual treatment what could not be accomplished by collective persuasion. The logical country to start with was Brazil. In contrast to the attitude of Argentina, which balked the plan for a bicontinental bloc at Buenos Aires, that of the Brazilian delegation under Oswaldo Aranha, "chief exponent of Monroeism in Latin America," was out-and-out pro-American. Although Brazilian policy, following the vicissitudes of coffee and the changing sources of financial help abroad, has fluctuated, influenced by developments in Europe and the United States, it has invariably backed American policy in matters affecting the Western Hemisphere as a whole. Brazil supported the Wilson Administration and declared war on Germany in 1917 when the British blockade cut off its trade with the Central Powers, while President Irigoyen of Argentina refused to be "dragged into the war by the United States." And again, in the early twenties, when relations between the United States and the British-Japanese alliance took an ugly turn, arrangements were made by the American and Brazilian governments for an American naval mission to Brazil.

With the inflow of American capital into Brazil in the period of economic expansion that followed the war, relations between the United States and Brazil developed into a tremendous business partnership. Between 1919 and 1930 American investors lent Brazil, in government, state, and municipal bonds, about $420,000,000. The stake of American industrial interests in that country now is estimated at about $500,000,000, invested mainly in public utilities, mining, meat packing, shipping, rubber, oil, branch and assembling plants, and manufacturing. American capital probably makes up more than one-fourth of the total foreign investments in Brazil, largely supplied by the power trust and international banks, United States Steel, Ford, du Pont, Standard Oil, General Electric, Diamond Match, General Motors, and the packing triumvirate—Wilson, Swift, and Armour.

With the recession in American trade and investments after the 1929 crash, American influence in Brazil ebbed. A commerce that had climbed from $150,000,000 in 1913 to more than $300,000,000 in the golden years of dollar diplomacy, financed in large measure by American loans, shrank to $100,000,000 at the beginning of the depression, when the United States closed its purse to Latin America. Whereupon the trade rivals of the United States, old and new, appeared in the field, Germany among them.

One of the main difficulties of American trade was the lack of exchange. Like many other non-industrial countries, Brazil had established exchange control in order to preserve its scanty gold stock and retaliate against the deflation of the prices of its raw materials and foodstuffs forced by the despotic centers of world industry. Taking advantage of this situation in a masterly stroke, Dr. Schacht proposed to Brazil to do away with exchange worries and adopt the barter system. That clever tactical device, the "compensation" mark, made this possible. By this system German importers of Brazilian products paid the Reichsbank for them in marks that were kept in Germany for the purchase of German goods by Brazil. By piling up trade balances in favor of Brazil in blocked marks, Germany induced Brazil to buy more and more, for balances could only be thawed by purchases. Thus Dr. Schacht outgeneraled the traders of gold-glutted countries, who had to wait for the liquidation of their drafts while German traders were able to liquidate immediately.

Soon the Hamburg-bound stream of Brazilian coffee, cotton, tobacco, hides, vegetable oils, grains, cacao beans, fruit, rubber, and other products became tremendous, and Germany was shipping a proportional quantity of manufactured goods, without using an ounce of gold. Moreover, German diligence and the elasticity that the dictatorship was able to give wages and prices enabled Germany to undersell other nations in Brazil, including the United States. As for dividends on German investments, Brazil had to pay them in foreign exchange derived from its trade with other countries. The barter strategy carried the victorious German trade forces even farther. Acquiring more Brazilian products than it consumed, Germany resold the surplus abroad, collecting in open exchange and bringing international free currencies into the Reichsbank. In this way, while it traded with Brazil without using gold, the Reich obtained gold by selling surplus Brazilian products. Thus it gradually became more and more of a factor in marketing Brazilian products, and at the same time, through investments and concessions in Brazilian mines, including iron ore, steadily increased its share in the country's mineral wealth. By 1936, after three years of hard campaigning, General Schacht's commercial forces in Brazil had outstripped British and American exporters and captured first place in Brazilian import trade with a share of 23 per cent. Germany had become the largest seller of manufactured goods to Brazil and the second largest buyer of Brazilian products. An American counter-move, the 1935 reciprocity treaty with Brazil, although it probably helped to maintain the American share at only a slightly lower level, failed to bring about a recovery.

While American diplomacy in December, 1936, was trying to persuade South America to put up a common front before the European war threat, Dr. Schacht was reaping the benefits of the greatest year for German trade in Brazil. At the same time, however, the Brazilian government was supporting the American proposal at the Buenos Aires conference with an eagerness that seemed to betray some expectation. The fact is that at the height of Dr. Schacht's success the recently revealed American-Brazilian deal was in the making. Negotiations that had started before the Buenos Aires conference were hastened upon its failure. American diplomacy called Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau and the Navy Department to its assistance, and the result was a threefold deal—monetary, commercial, and naval. Utilizing a small fraction of its enormous and troublesome stock of "sterilized" gold, the United States Treasury last July signed with Arturo de Souza Costa, Finance Minister of Brazil, an agreement granting Brazil a $60,000,000 gold credit to maintain "monetary equilibrium" between the two countries and "to facilitate the establishment by Brazil of a central reserve bank," with "technical assistance" from the United States. Brazil, in return, undertook to remove from its tariff laws provisions operating against United States commerce and to protect its markets "against outside competition that is directly subsidized by governments"—a pledge that would obviously stop the expansion of German trade. The gold made available to Brazil, in dollar exchange, will remain in the United States.

This broadside of American gold inflicts on German trade in Brazil its most serious setback since the World War. American trade will have plenty of exchange, the inducement will be to buy American goods, and Dr. Schacht's new lieutenant in Brazil, Dr. Karl Ritter one of the Reich's ablest foreign-trade specialists, will have a hard time to save the barter system from total destruction. There are, however, two factors still in Germany's favor—its ability to underquote the United States by a wide margin in many lines, and the insistence of some Brazilian producers, especially the São Paulo cotton growers, to continue the barter trade with Germany. The Reich, which formerly bought cotton in the United States, is now the second largest consumer of the Brazilian product and is partly responsible for raising Brazil to fifth place among the world's producers of cotton.

But the new American gold strategy has a larger aim than checking Dr. Schacht's schemes in South America. It is intended to ward off not only German but all competition. Germany happened to be leading the competitors of the United States, but it is only one of the powers that have been jockeying for economic, political, and strategic positions in South America in anticipation of a vast conflict. Among Brazil's most valued raw materials—and one which the United States has now made sure of getting—is ferromanganese. Absolutely vital to industry in war time and just as valuable in peace, this precious ingredient in the making of steel now comes chiefly from Russia, India, and Brazil, which possesses the most extensive reserve in the world. Brazil now furnishes 25 per cent of the product consumed in the United States, and in case of war it would offer the most important accessible source of supply—particularly since United States Steel, through a subsidiary, the Companhia Meridional de Mineração, already owns vast deposits there. But "accessible" means that American economic sway in Brazil must be preserved, and that the American navy must be ready to protect the transportation of this mineral in war time, unless the United States accumulates beforehand reserves sufficiently large for any emergency.

As for Brazil's gain from the deal, the gold-credit agreement comes to steady not only the milreis but also Dictator-President Vargas, and it lends a hand to the Brazilian and American coffee interests at a moment when Brazil's coffee-export trade, the chief source of foreign exchange and purchasing power for Brazil abroad, is going through a most critical period. It is estimated that for the present crop year Brazil's share in the coffee taken by world trading centers will not exceed 50 per cent, whereas formerly it amounted to as much as 70 per cent. In a desperate effort to keep up the price Brazil is now burning its oversupply at the rate of 100,000 bags a day. Since 1931, when the elimination of the surplus began, it has destroyed nearly 50,000,000 bags, and it plans to destroy 15,000,000 more during the first half of the present crop year—about 60 per cent of estimated production. The National Coffee Department owes the Bank of Brazil more than $36,000,000, which has been used for coffee destruction. The United States is the largest consumer of Brazilian coffee, and the American speculators' control of the trade was definitely menaced when Germany began reselling purchases of the Brazilian product in competition with Brazil itself. A few days after signing the gold-credit agreement with the United States, the Brazilian government significantly canceled a German purchase of 100,000 bags of coffee for resale in the Balkans, and instead gave the National Coffee Department 100,000 more bags of coffee to burn.

The American Treasury Department's announcement of the agreement with Brazil was not explicit about the exact terms of the transaction. Has the credit been granted for a definite period of time? How is it going to be used for steadying the dollar-milreis rate? To what extent will it be applied to the establishment of a central bank in Brazil? The answers to these questions have not been revealed, but one thing at least seems clear. The United States is to have a hand in the reorganization of Brazil's banking and monetary structure—a big job and one that British interests in that country have sought for years—and it is entering on the task with the aim of restoring and maintaining American commercial supremacy and protecting American investments.

Two joint American-Brazilian committees, "composed of representatives of the trade interests of both countries," will sit at Rio de Janeiro and at New York or Washington to secure "within the commitments mutually entered into by the government of Brazil and the government of the United States . . . the most appropriate solutions in order to overcome the obstacles which might hinder the natural development of trade between the two countries." If—as the quoted announcement seems to imply—the mixed committees are to see that the American-Brazilian quid pro quo will be carried out, then it means that Brazil is going to have American commercial supervision.

The present monetary credit is not a loan in the sense that a bond flotation is. Nevertheless, it is a credit operation. But what is more significant is that the extension of monetary facilities to Latin America should have been induced, as in the post-war period, by a plethora of gold, this time government-controlled gold. The United States government, which has already invaded the field of banking in this country, appears now in a game which used to be played chiefly by international bankers. The pecuniary help given to the Latin American governments in the twenties, when American experts were assisting fifteen of them to place their fiscal systems on a "sound" basis, consisted of bond flotations sold in the market by Wall Street international banks. We know what was done with the money, and what is happening to the bonds. The money, loaned in a saturnalia of bribes and fat commissions, was in large measure either privately absorbed or publicly squandered by the cliques in power, with the same irresponsibility with which it was gathered by the bankers from American investors. Of the total amount outstanding on December 31, 1936—$1,917,000,000—about 77 per cent was and still remains in default. Brazil's unpaid debt to American investors aggregates nearly $370,000,000. The present transaction may prevent further manipulations by the international bankers, but all the same it is a very generous accommodation in the light of preceding events.

American trade has been experiencing exchange difficulties in other Latin American countries as well as in Brazil; the German government has signed compensation-mark agreements with other southern republics. More of our "sterilized" gold stock could be used to stabilize Latin American exchange in these states and to open new outlets for American trade. Latin American governments may even be willing to pay their debts to American investors provided the United States lends them the money to do it. And the question suggests itself: Will facilities of this sort lead to another period of expansion in our trade with Latin America, financed by American gold as it was in the twenties? "But America," said President Roosevelt in a speech at St. Paul last October, "has learned her lesson once and for all about that kind of frenzied finance." Whatever the outcome, the good-neighbor policy has taken on an aggressive aspect. It is being turned to the rescue of American business in the southern latitudes, and in its first real battle it has some $60,000,000 in gold to use for ammunition.

D. A. R. in the Schoolroom

BY M. B. SCHNAPPER

IF THE Daughters of the American Revolution had their way about our educational system, young America would be taught only D. A. R. views of history, economics, foreign affairs, and political doctrines. To the Daughters the educational ideal is a process of memorizing platitudes, reciting patriotic poetry, rejecting everything new and accepting everything old, going through incessant flag salutes and military drills, and learning to render unthinking obedience. Their efforts to achieve that ideal are far more extensive and intensive than those of any other group of professional patriots, excepting only the ubiquitous American Legion. Their influence upon our schoolchildren is perhaps even greater than the combined efforts of such groups as the National Civic Federation, the Sons of the American Revolution, the American Coalition. These groups influence the school only occasionally and incidentally, whereas the D. A. R. has ceaselessly made the school the center of a score of highly ramified pressures and activities.

Because the teacher is obviously the most vital link in American education, he, or she, is the central target. Let the teacher voice an opinion not altogether in keeping with D. A. R. tenets and he is open to a barrage of criticism. Even in communities where the D. A. R. is only moderately snoopy, it is a foolhardy teacher who dares express an idea which could be misinterpreted or who even broaches such topics as internationalism, social planning, or Soviet Russia. Every Daughter is advised not only to "become acquainted with the sentiments of the teachers and their methods of instructing the children in the part the United States has taken in history," but to see to it "that the great men and women who have carried the banner of patriotism and loyalty to the country and the high ideals upon which this nation was founded and has prospered be presented to the youth in their true colors." "Put none but Americans on guard!" is the warning of a president general of the D. A. R., and "put loyal American men and women on our school boards, whom you can trust to get only good teachers who are also loyal Americans, about whose patriotism there can be no question."

In the spring of 1936 the D. A. R. decided to intensify its efforts to oust teachers opposed to its conception of American government. Announcing but not proving that it possessed evidence that many educators were selling themselves to the Comintern, it went on record as favoring the immediate dismissal of any and all who, in its opinion, revealed Moscow connections through aversion to D. A. R. loyalty oaths. Objections by the National Education Association and other groups that the oaths curtailed academic freedom and unfairly implied subversive activities in the teaching profession were cursorily dismissed by President General Becker. "No patriotic teacher should object to taking the oath of allegiance," she said. "It is an honor, not a reflection upon character. It does not carry with it interference with the right of educators to determine courses of study. Courses of study will be safe in the hands of loyal teachers." And as a logical follow-up, Dr. Felix Forte, a lawyer of repute, urged a constitutional amendment giving the courts power to take away rights of citizenship from those "who are Americans according to the definition of the Constitution and yet are unworthy of the name."

Any teacher who believes that democratic education should pave the way toward peace has much to unlearn. There is a common feeling among the Daughters that anything suggestive of pacifism is in truth radicalism, a feeling succinctly expressed by Mrs. Anthony Wayne Cook, one-time president general:

> We should see that our school boards are not allowing our public-school system to be used for the dissemination of propaganda which, in the guise of so-called peace literature, is in reality dangerous and insidious pacifist dogma. As a matter of fact, too much of this sort of thing has already been disseminated. It has been cleverly prepared so that it might insidiously stir up unrest and discontent in the minds of both pupils and teachers concerning our time-tested American governmental institutions.

Even more foolish is the teacher who thinks such questions should be considered from all points of view. "We want no teachers," warn the Daughters, "who say there are two sides to every question . . . who care more for their academic freedom of speech than for their country . . . academic freedom of speech has no place in school, where the youth of our country are taught and their unformed minds developed."

The D. A. R. has never shown reluctance about placing educators and institutions of note on the black lists which it freely distributes. Among the more prominent institutions so honored are Barnard College, Berkeley Divinity School, Boston School of Social Sciences, Bryn Mawr Summer School, Smith College, and the New School for Social Research. Blacklisted college organizations include the Barnard Social Science Club, the Bryn Mawr Liberal Club, the Dartmouth Round Table, the Harvard Student Liberal Club, the Union Theological Contemporary Club, the University of Chicago Liberal Club, the University of Colorado Forum, the Wellesley College Forum, the Vassar College Political Association, and the Yale Liberal Club.

Forthright criticism of these lists almost cost Dr. Clarence Cook Little his job as president of the University of Michigan and the university itself a large benefaction when Mrs. Alfred J. Brousseau, a former president general of the D. A. R., took offense at an expression of his views on the matter. This was something which neither he nor his university could afford since Mrs. Brousseau and her husband, the president of Mack Trucks, had just established a $115,000 scholarship and student-loan fund. On the assumption that her money entitled her to handle him in her own fashion, Mrs. Brousseau wrote to Dr. Little:

> Through a newspaper report I learn of a recent diatribe of yours against the D. A. R., part of the attack being based upon an "alleged black list." . . . Frankly, I would say that the policies of the D. A. R. are not any of your particular concern. You are supposed to be an educator and not a censor of organization methods, other than the particular organization with which you are concerned. . . . You state that some of the qualities of the D. A. R. are un-American. Will you pardon me if I remind you of the fact that in certain quarters during the past two years criticism along similar lines has been leveled at you? The D. A. R. has not attacked you. Why should you go out of your way to needlessly criticize it? . . . Last but not least, the national society, D. A. R., does not issue any such list as you condemn, which fact you might have learned had you shown me the courtesy of an inquiry. That would have been quite logical, considering our mutual interests in the University of Michigan, of which you happen at the moment to be president.

Despite Mrs. Brousseau's protestations, there was no doubt that the D. A. R. was responsible for the black lists, and Dr. Little courageously announced his refusal to be controlled "by inside secret deliberations and decisions of an inner and privileged council of any organization."

Perhaps the most active concern of the D. A. R. as a whole is the protection of young America from school textbooks which the Daughters consider un-American. Gestated during the hysterical red-baiting days of the early twenties, their campaign in this field has suckled upon the Bolshevik menace ever since. In the loquacious person of Mrs. M. R. Jacobs, the D. A. R. was one of the active forces in the opera-bouffe investigation of New York City's history textbooks in 1920-22. Later, united with other professional patriots, the D. A. R. of New Jersey sponsored a bill designed to legalize the censorship of history in that state. And shortly thereafter D. A. R. chapters everywhere showered praise and publicity upon an interminable series of articles syndicated by the Hearst newspapers to show parents that "school histories now being taught their children have been revised and in some instances wholly rewritten in a new and propitiatory spirit toward England."

Some of the nation's most distinguished scholars have fared sadly at the hands of the D. A. R. in the course of its drive on textbooks. Professor David S. Muzzey's "American History" has been frequently denounced by the Daughters because, according to a study of the American Historical Association, they feel "it gives to military history insufficient emphasis to make good soldiers out of children." In the District of Columbia the Daughters have been especially active in a campaign to remove Muzzey's history from the schools, and in North Carolina, because they felt that he had slighted their state and unjustly called slavery the chief cause of the Civil War, they have had his book removed from the state's official textbook list. That landmark of American scholarship "The Rise of American Civilization," by Charles and Mary Beard, and other noted histories have enjoyed similar treatment. Let any text view America's past at all realistically and its author is immediately accused of everything but treason, and sometimes even that.

The tune is always the same. In one year a president general reveals that the insidious purpose is "to intentionally distort the traditions of American heroism and patriotism; to make mockery and derision of the high motives and purposes of the patriots, thereby to destroy the natural instinct of veneration in every youthful American for the ideals and principles of the Republic and its institutions." In another year there is a traitorous movement afoot "to delete our school histories of the heroism of battles and the honor rolls of our valiant fighters; to substitute for our patriotic expressions radical pacifist slogans calculated to stress internationalism in place of nationalism; to ban recognition of our warrior patriots who have fought and died for the life of the nation, and to exalt in their stead so-called 'heroes of permanent service' and civilian and scientific heroes."

Of the hundreds of American histories only two seem to meet D. A. R. prejudices: "The American Government Today," by Frederick J. Haskin, and "The Story of the American People," by Charles F. Horne. The former is a mediocre work by a journalist on the staff of the Washington Evening Star, one of the most conservative papers in the country. In 1935 alone some 12,000 free copies of this book were sent by the D. A. R. to schools, libraries, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. reading-rooms, Federal Emergency Relief Administration schools, and CCC camps. The Horne work is a bombastic affair published by the American Legion in cooperation with the D. A. R. and thirty-two other super-patriotic organizations. In recognition of its "commendable purpose" the D. A. R. has recommended that its members "bring this history to the attention of the school boards in all communities and urge that it be adopted as a textbook in United States history." In announcing plans for the publication of Horne's unique history, the American Legion frankly stated that its object was to "inspire the children with patriotism," to "preach a vivid love of America," to "be careful to tell the truth optimistically," and to "speak chiefly of success." All this the book does remarkably well. It tells its young readers that America is "a kind of paradise . . . where work brings its best reward, the one region where peace seems assured, the land of Opportunity." The D. A. R. heartily agrees with Mr. Horne that the Spanish-American War was "a people's war" and the World War a supreme test of our democracy, and it exults in his revelation that America has a "divine purpose," realizable when and if "civilization should prove worthy of it."

Swiss Democracy in Retreat

BY PETER BROWN

Geneva, September 1

THE shadow of fascism today lies dark and long over this supposed ancient cradle of democratic liberties. Called in referendum upon laws proposed to them by their legislative authorities, the sovereign people of the Canton of Geneva last spring voted three to two to outlaw subversive political organizations, more specifically the Communist Party. The real issue went much deeper. Should the reactionary bourgeois alliance now in power, combining fascist and Catholic groups of the far right with liberal and radical groups of the center, be granted a free hand in acting against militant Socialists and trade unionists, against active friends of the Soviet Union and the Spanish republic, against outspoken enemies of the German and Italian dictatorships?

These laws were not enacted in the hysteria of threatened civil war, nor yet in the heat of revolutionary labor unrest. They were passed against a background of perfect calm, political and economic. Their formal thrust is against a party of microscopic membership and of infinitesimal activity. Their unconcealed inspiration comes from a small fascist-Catholic bloc in the bourgeois united front which displaced the Socialist administration of Nicole at the cantonal elections last year. In short, these laws represent the technique of the cold pogrom assuming the forms of constitutional procedure. In reasoned deliberation and with frigid malice, the upper and middle classes of Geneva are determined to wipe out the left wing of the local labor movement. In doing so they are ready to reject all their country's traditions of political freedom and to advance firmly along the road which leads to the totalitarian state.

Such developments at the foot of Lake Leman may shock sentimental Americans who still think of Switzerland in a haze of tender-minded sentiment as the country of William Tell and the revolt against Austrian tyranny, the land of primitive agrarian democracy, where the initiative and referendum are brought to their highest perfection, the asylum for religious and political refugees from time out of mind. Actually the enactment of anti-Communist laws by the Canton of Geneva is by no means an isolated event. It is only one phase in a process of evolution by which, in the gradual division of Europe into two opposed ideologies, Switzerland is moving toward the far right to take its stand along the axis which runs from Berlin to Rome.

To give the devil his due, Switzerland is still very far from being a totalitarian state. Trade unions are still an active force, parliamentary institutions continue to function, newspapers and public speakers are free to criticize the public authorities. In terms of fascism very simply defined—the suppression of trade unions and the abolition of civil liberties and parliamentary procedure—Switzerland is still to be counted as a democratic country. But bit by bit and step by step the institutions of bourgeois democracy are breaking down. They are breaking down economically in violent reaction against the leftward drift of France, and politically as a gesture of accommodation to the armed ruthlessness of Germany and Italy.

Geneva was not the first Swiss canton to outlaw the Communist Party. Neuchâtel had set the precedent a few weeks earlier, although its only application of the law so far has been the promulgation of a decree to deprive a mildly socialistic high-school teacher at La Chaux-de-Fonds of his right to teach in the canton. With Geneva and Neuchâtel in line, it is reasonable to suppose that Vaud will soon follow suit.

No mystery surrounds the peculiarly violent animus of the three French-speaking cantons toward left-wing groups of all shades. These cantons lie along the French border; they are the next-door neighbors of the Confédération Générale du Travail. France, during the course of the last year, has undergone a rather complete revolution on the labor front. As a result of sitdown strikes joined to political action, the workers of France have gained the forty-hour week, wage increases, holidays with pay, legal recognition of trade unions. Peering across the frontier at this nation-wide drama of employers in forced retreat, the collective bankers, industrialists, merchants, and hotel and restaurant keepers of Suisse Romande have alternated between green fear and purple fury. Their own Swiss wage-slaves must be immunized against this Gallic pestilence; the impulses which set the French labor movement going in 1936 must be sternly checked at the source. To accomplish these ends under respectable camouflage what simpler or more efficacious method could be found than to declare a crusade against Moscow? The technique is dependable, its usage worldwide.

But the economics of fascism in Switzerland are not peculiar to the French-speaking cantons. Popular fallacies to the contrary notwithstanding, Switzerland is a highly industrialized country which gets its living not only from tourists and cows but also, and more significantly, from the manufacture of textiles, chemicals, watches, electrical machinery, transportation equipment, and armaments. Economic control over the major industries, including the admittedly vital hotel trade, is concentrated in the hands of the big banks at Zurich and Basel. As for the peasantry, beautifully organized for pressure politics, a very large part of it is Roman Catholic—fervently so—and thus in the grasp of a religious body which everywhere works hand in hand with the economic reactionaries.

There are perfectly sound reasons why the bankers and industrialists who run the economic system of Switzerland should be turning their attention to the techniques by which the employers of Germany and Italy have relieved themselves of their labor troubles. True, the Swiss workers have not yet got out of hand. No strikes of any consequence, sitdown or otherwise, have occurred during the past year; no sweeping wage increases have had to be granted. But the set-up which might awaken the Swiss trade unions from their present lethargy is undeniably present. Since the devaluation of the franc last autumn economic recovery has been advancing vigorously to the accompaniment of a rapid rise in the cost of living. At any moment the Swiss trade unions might follow the example of their French brothers across the border by committing the indiscretion of pressing forcefully for higher wages and shorter hours. To crusade against Moscow under circumstances such as these is merely to recognize that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

In this good work the industrial masters of Switzerland have enjoyed the enthusiastic assistance of the federal authorities. At the height of the French labor unrest last June, for example, the federal authorities refused to permit Léon Jouhaux to address the workers of Geneva on the forty-hour week, although Jouhaux was then discoursing daily on that subject at the sessions of the International Labor Conference. And since last summer the postal department has been banning a longer and longer list of foreign newspapers and journals, mostly Communist, such as Humanité and the Daily Worker, both British and American. A climax to this sort of repression was reached when the World Peace Congress of 1936 had to meet in Brussels instead of Geneva, as originally intended, because of the impossibly severe restrictions which the Swiss federal government decided to impose upon the admission and activity of the left-wing delegates.

It is in the realm of politics, however, that the Swiss federal government has seen fit to reveal itself most glaringly as the supine creature of Mussolini and Hitler. Almost alone among the countries of the world Switzerland voted to refuse the Soviet Union membership in the League of Nations in 1934. (Switzerland is still one of those rare countries which refuse to recognize officially that the U. S. S. R. exists.) Relying on its special status as a neutral state, Switzerland refrained from applying full economic sanctions against Italy when the Ethiopian crisis arose, and after Ethiopia had been subdued, Switzerland hastened to be among the first to recognize Italian de jure sovereignty over the conquered territory. When the administration of Geneva, then Socialist, expelled the hooligan Italian journalists who booed and catcalled the Negus at a meeting of the League Assembly, the federal authorities at Berne brought them right back again. Before any other democratic government had joined in the tragic farce of "non-intervention" in Spain, the Swiss federal government was issuing decrees to stop meetings and demonstrations in favor of the Spanish republic and to prohibit the raising of funds for Valencia.

Significantly the outburst of anti-Communist cantonal laws was, in its origins, inspired by abortive federal efforts along the same lines. For a year Berne has been seeking a grant of emergency powers which would permit it to outlaw all radical activities by executive fiat. The project was withdrawn only a few days before Geneva held its referendum. Fortunately for the country's political liberties its legislators are becoming violently jealous of an executive which never ceases its encroachments upon parliamentary prerogatives. Given the first favorable opportunity, however, Berne will no doubt return to the attack.

Why this complete subordination of Swiss foreign and domestic policy to the whims of Rome and Berlin? Is it because the Swiss national character, as some pretend, instinctively revolts at the idea of bolshevism? Is it because, as others allege, M. Motta, the Swiss President, is from the Italian-speaking part of the country and dreams of allying his family to Mussolini's? The truth is much simpler, much more direct. In a military sense Switzerland has everything to fear from the territorial ambitions of Germany and Italy. It has nothing to fear from the side of a surfeited France, dreaming only of European peace. Nazi propaganda in favor of the pan-Germanic ideal is actively carried on in the German-speaking cantons; Italian propaganda is similarly at work in the Tessin. Although this is all unofficial work on behalf of totalitarian nationalism, the Berne authorities well know that Germany and Italy would grasp at a chance to cut large chunks away from the territory of the confederation. Switzerland's national interests thus demand, as an elementary proposition in Realpolitik, that Germany and Italy be placated, won over to friendship, however overbearing. This may at times humiliate Swiss national pride, but humility is well worth the price if it serves to divert Italian and German lust for expansion.

Thus if the federal authorities are doing all in their power to place Switzerland securely on the German-Italian axis, it is because they are political realists. They know that if you join the enemy he may be persuaded to refrain from swallowing you up; at least his combative attentions may be diverted elsewhere. But Swiss political realism goes farther than this. Like all other countries Switzerland is now heaving in the financial agonies of an enormous program of rearmament and national defense. By far the largest part, if not all, of this expenditure is going to fortify the defenses along the Italian and German frontiers, for those are the directions from which danger is known to threaten. Turn by turn each of the larger Swiss towns goes through its air-raid drills. It is an open secret that these drills are being carried out with an eye to the possible tender ministrations, in the not-too-distant future, of Italian and German bombers. If Switzerland is moving as fast as it can along the path which ends in totalitarianism, it is nevertheless sparing no effort to defend itself against its fascist neighbors.

These are sad reflections, no doubt, at the seat of the League of Nations and the International Labor Office; they form a discordant accompaniment to the daily oratory of peace, good-will, and social justice. But it is economic and political realities, not Alps, which form the strongest barriers against the plague of fascism. And why, after all, should we expect Swiss democracy to stand firm when the British, French, and American democracies daily permit the totalitarian dictatorships to stretch their inches into yards, their yards into miles?

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

FREQUENTLY of late I have been asked two questions: "What would you do in regard to Japan and China if you were President?" and "Does not the plight of China end all thought of pacifism?" I should be flattered by the implication of the first question that I am competent to attempt to answer it if I did not believe that it often emanates from a desire to put me in a hole. Well, I'll rush in where angels might well fear to tread, and do my best. Here is what my program would be:

1. Issue a proclamation forthwith putting the neutrality law into effect, refusing to be deterred therefrom by statements that to do so is to deprive China of the opportunity to purchase supplies while Japan can avail itself of the "cash-and-carry" provision. Without our enforcement of this law Japan is able to blockade China and to prevent contraband from reaching it. Its enforcement will help China by preventing arms from going to Japan and by preventing loans to both belligerents, thus making Japan's trading position more nearly equal to China's.

2. Notify China that all American ships and soldiers are being withdrawn from China permanently, and promise never to reestablish the American garrisons in Tientsin, Peiping, or Shanghai.

3. Repatriate all our nationals by a given date, using warships if necessary for that purpose, and notify all Americans who remain thereafter, precisely as we notified them in Spain and Ethiopia, that they do so at their own risk and responsibility and that their injuries or deaths will not be a casus belli—this policy has already been adopted by the President.

4. Endeavor to induce England, Russia, France, Holland, Belgium, Czecho-Slovakia, and the Scandinavian countries to join the United States in a statement denouncing the violation by Japan of the Kellogg pact, the Nine-Power treaty, and other agreements. Concerted action of this kind is absolutely necessary to uphold the sanctity of treaties. The statement should renew the demand for the territorial integrity of China, and the cooperation of the League of Nations should be invited.

5. Announce approval of a boycott of Japan by the American public and possibly later ask Congress for a non-intercourse law to stop our trade with Japan until Chinese territory is evacuated.

6. In any event withdraw our American ambassador promptly from Japan as a moral protest, precisely as Italy once withdrew its minister, Baron Fava, from the United States because of our failure to offer compensation for the murder of Italian citizens in New Orleans.

Now if it is asserted that this would (a) invite war with Japan and (b) make us virtually the ally of China, my reply is that war with Japan is only possible if we start it; with China on its hands and Russia in the background, there would be no danger of any attack by Japan on the United States, since under any circumstances that would mean national suicide. This policy would not be taking sides with China or passing judgment upon all its relations with Japan, but would merely register a protest against wholesale violation of treaties and give expression to decent world opinion. If we cannot build up a respect for international obligations by condemning the violators of them, then the world ought to apologize to Germany for having denounced it in 1914 for making a scrap of paper out of its treaty with Belgium. The United States has here a magnificent opportunity for moral leadership—provided we make it clear that we are withdrawing from China and have not the slightest intention of engaging in war.

It would of course be difficult to get other nations to go along; I have not forgotten how we were let down by England on the Manchurian issue. But this Shanghai adventure is something else; it endangers British property worth $900,000,000; if Japan holds Shanghai, England and all other nations will be shut off from the vast Yangtze River territory. The British Cabinet might well discover, suddenly, moral issues in the present war on China which it could not perceive in Manchuria. But the fact that others might refuse to follow is no reason why we should not lead. Throughout our entire history, especially when we were weak, our government has freely expressed adverse opinions upon the acts of other countries, and yet we have usually remained at peace with them—even in the Venezuela imbroglio with England. Should we not speak out now when the case is clear?

As to the plight of China proving the impossibility of pacifism, every war is always declared to prove exactly that; yet the pacifist sentiment in the world is far more intelligent and widespread than it has ever been since the death of the Prince of Peace. Pacifists are no longer under the obligation to prove that their position is ethically sound, or that peace is the highest dictate of Christianity, or even that it is the safest and sanest policy for all humanity. The burden of proof is upon the war-makers to show that any war results in good, or fails to bring more evils in its train than good. If China must yield to Japan at present, it will rise above Japan in the future, as in so many other interludes in its history when it has absorbed its conquerors. The seeds of decline are in Japan today, its feudalism, its militarism, its domination by war lords, its economic distress—but not in China the resurgent, the renascent, the nation that has loved peace so long. Military victory for Japan in China will prove far worse for it than defeat.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
ne, Cal.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF GARCIA LORCA

BY ROLFE HUMPHRIES

FEDERICO GARCIA LORCA was a man in his middle thirties when the fascists killed him at Granada a year ago. His life, though it began and ended in the same geographical area, was by no means parochial. He had studied and traveled widely; his art, while basically Andalusian, was remarkable for its sensitive assimilation of influences and moved freely in many directions. He knew how to write both simply and subtly at the same time, and it is on this account that minority and masses are united in his praise.

He was born in 1899. Even in his early student days he seems to have been extremely popular with his contemporaries. At the university he studied philosophy under Spain's present ambassador to the United States, Dr. Fernando de los Rios, who persuaded him to continue his education in Madrid. He was interested in music and painting as well as in letters, and in 1922 he collaborated with Falla and Zuloaga in developing the Cante Hondo fiesta at Granada. His first book of poems appeared in 1921, but his earliest poetry was not printed until 1935. His first published book was prose, "Impressions and Landscapes" (1918). In the late twenties he belonged to a group of writers whose orientation was distinctly toward the new poetry; their taste was sufficiently catholic to include Góngora and surrealism in the scope of their admiration. He exhibited as a painter at Barcelona in 1927, edited literary reviews and lectured on poetry in Madrid, and in 1930 came to this country for a visit which seems to have made a much more profound impression on García Lorca than on the city of New York. On his return to Spain he founded his theatrical company, la Barraca, for the performance of classical plays and wrote musical dramas whose range was from tragedy to farce. He was absent from Spain again in 1933 and 1934 traveling and lecturing in the Argentine and Uruguay, but was back in Granada completing a new dramatic work when the fascists came and got him.

Just exactly what prompted his criminal and stupid murder is not very clear; nor has any eyewitness ever been found to report the actual details of the execution. García Lorca took no part in politics, belonged to no political party, whether of the Popular Front or otherwise, and made rather a point of avoiding assemblies where political argument was rife. He seems to have thought of himself as a universal man, certainly not above the struggle but at any rate out of reach of the quarreling. A rumor that Benavente had been executed "by the reds" may have been responsible for this act of revenge; it is possible that the fascists, either through illiteracy or wilfulness, seized on the pretext of misinterpreting certain letters as meaning that the poet had declined a trip to Mexico in order to work for the revolution in Spain. The fact that his sister resided in a house owned by the Popular Front alcalde of Granada may have had something to do with it. More probably the fascists' instinct was sounder than their reasons: they recognized in him the kind of person they are eager to get rid of. He declared once in an interview affirming his Spanish character that he execrated the man who would sacrifice himself for an abstract national idea and who insisted on loving his country with a bandage over his eyes; that he preferred a good Chinese any day to a bad Spaniard. It seems impossible to doubt, however, that had he been spared he would have aligned himself with those who were employing the old ballad forms to tell, in El Mono Azul, new stories of the heroism of the Spanish people.

Little of Lorca's work has been available in English, on this side of the Atlantic at any rate. One of his plays was produced in New York in February, 1935, under the title "Bitter Oleander," and since his death perhaps a dozen of his lyric poems and one or two longer ballads have appeared in translation scattered here and there in American periodicals. Mr. Lloyd's collection* presents the first substantial body of evidence on the poet's quality. In addition to its half-dozen poems the book contains a photograph of the poet, a biographical sketch, a bibliography of major items (Mr. Lloyd does not mention the so-called guignolesque farces "La Zapatera Prodigiosa" and "Amor de Don Perlimplin con Belisa en su Jardin"), and a preface which discusses in amiable if not too incisive fashion the conflicting tendencies of the Spanish literary revival to which Lorca was a contributor. The title poem is followed by the ballads of The Faithless Wife, Preciosa and the Wind, The Spanish Civil Guard, The Arrest of Antoñito el Camborio, and The Martyrdom of St. Eulalia. Both the Spanish and the English texts appear. As a translator, Mr. Lloyd plays his cards pretty close to his vest and is content to state the meaning and hint the meter, making no effort to swing the original over into anything resembling the forms or cadences of the English ballad tradition. Consequently, as he would no doubt be the first to admit, his work suggests a high-class literary crib, a Loeb Classical Library volume with the poetic quality improved, rather than authentic and robust popular poetry.

Spanish literary tradition, as far back as the days when Spanish writers—Lucan, Seneca, Martial, Quintilian—dominated the letters of Rome, has always had a tendency to excess, to incoherence, to affectation, and to sentimental rhetoric. The cry of "invertebrate Spain!" sounds like an echo of that past when Seneca was criticized for his "mere mosaics," his patterns of "sand without lime," and Lucan was called "passionate and inspired but to be counted among orators rather than poets." García Lorca knew exactly where to go for the necessary correction and how to apply it; his interest in Andalusian folklore and gipsy song went far deeper than the contrivance of vulgarized and decadent popular effects or the exploitation of neo-primitive cultism. Moreover, in achieving a synthesis of all that he knew, from the pre-classic to the post-modern, of all that he had received from the world of dance and painting, music and theater, he abandoned nothing of value, and was able to work his erudition down into the substance of his art.

---

* "Lament for the Death of a Bullfighter, and Other Poems." By Federico García Lorca. In the Original Spanish with the English Translation by A. L. Lloyd. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

Just as modern music and antique folk song blend in the harmonies of Lorca's verse, so his experience of painting, the theater, and the dance contributes to the eye's delight in his work. He was fully aware that in much of Spain the eye must be quickened through the ear, and the visual capacity of his imagination was unusually rich. In a talk with Gerardo Diego he implied that a fundamental requirement of all poetic talent was the ability to see. "What am I going to say of poetry? What am I going to say of these clouds, of this heaven? Look, look, look at them, look at it; and nothing more. That's it, look." And this meant the ability to look inward as well as outward. Lorca had no foolish romantic illusions about the nature of inspiration. "If I cannot talk about my own poetry," he said, "it is not because I am unconscious of what I am doing. On the contrary, if it is true that I am a poet by the grace of God—or the demon—it is also true that I am one by the grace of technique and force, and of giving myself the strictest account of what a poem is." Scrupulous insight, technique, and force: García Lorca was popular, deservedly, not because he had the wish, but because he had the power.

BOOKS

A Second-Empire Journal

THE GONCOURT JOURNAL: 1851-1870. Edited and Translated from the Journal of Edmond and Jules de Goncourt, with an Introduction, Notes, and a Biographical Repertory, by Lewis Galantière. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

A REVIVAL has been due the Goncourts for some time; everyone mentions them and apparently nobody reads them; and Mr. Galantière must be promptly thanked for having produced here not only one of the most delightful books of the year but one that makes it impossible to excuse, by further lip-service, an ignorance of what they actually contributed to modern literature. He introduces the brothers with no flattery, little enthusiasm, and without greatly encouraging the reader. In fact, he almost succeeds in demolishing them as men and artists. He has little but contempt for their lives, hints of neurotic disability for their temperaments, the faintest possible praise for their aesthetic tastes, and nothing but harsh words for their novels. They were "persistently womanish . . . extravagantly neurasthenic, constantly subject to megrims, thrown into frenzies of incapacity and self-pity by noises, insomnia, indigestion . . . men of morbid inquisitiveness who were fascinated by the repellent." They admired "prettiness rather than beauty." Their famous connoisseurship of art is spoken of as a "maidenly orderliness, surrounded by the delicate products of eighteenth-century craftsmanship and, later, the artful horrors of the Japanese dragon world." Their pioneer excursions in naturalistic fiction are "dismal, airless, written only for the sake of the 'scientific, clinical observation' with which the authors fancied they were scrutinizing human beings who were to them so many monstrosities."

These verdicts are perhaps unjustly extreme. One cannot be so sure that no impulse of humanitarian passion or social justice stirred the authors of "Soeur Philomène" and "Renée Mauperin"; that their discoveries in art, which were to influence a new generation of painters and craftsmen, were trivial and fruitless; that they altogether "loathed" the world of "the impoverished, the defeated, the hysterical"; that they had no profound influence on the art and content of the modern novel. Yet there can be no dispute about the claim that their masterpiece was their "Journal"; that it embodies their world and its temper unforgettably; that it contains a superb portrait gallery of the makers of a new art and literature and shows the two brothers as preeminent among those men "whose talents as commentators, or conversationalists, or animateurs were a precious leaven in the society of their time"; that, in short, it is among the world's great diaries, and that it would be hard to name a more entertaining one.

Particularly for the present-day reader. The world to which the Goncourts introduce us, with their complete entrée to its inner circles of society and art, is the one out of whose ferment and enthusiasms the social ideas and aesthetic forms of our own emerged. It is the Paris of Manet's and Renoir's early pictures, of Degas's and Daumier's satires, of Rops, Guys, and Garvarni, and it is conveyed with equal graphic brilliance: a city emerging, to the brothers' painful distress, from its romantic aura and Balzacian disorder toward "new boulevards that go straight on, without meandering, without the adventures of perspective, implacably a straight line, without any of the atmosphere of Balzac's world, making one think of some American Babylon of the future." In its cafes and studios, garrets, drawing-rooms, and theaters the romantic was "not yet regimented in a flawlessly civilized society in which he loses complete possession of himself," and social justice was still a matter to torment the fastidious conscience. Within its sanctum the Goncourts held their court, attended the "princess," presided at the Magny dinners with Gautier, Sainte-Beuve, Flaubert, Renan, Taine, and Turgenev, and gleaned the details of their panorama of life —high and low—in the Second Empire.

The "Journal" has the properties of the greatest diaries: avidity, sensory keenness and dramatic understatement, a constant integrity of interest, a deft interplay of egoism and detachment, a zest for the trivial, and a sustained confidence in the historic moment. It has also, it is true, the exaggerated personal emphasis that Wilfrid Blunt considered the defect of diarists since Rousseau. The brothers insist on themselves as "emotional, nervous, unhealthily impressionable that this is the most horrifying detective story of the season

EVIDENCE

"Miss Calkins' book is better than a detective story and challenges the Lords of Creation besides."—Charles A. Beard.

"A serious, startling, and important study of the revelations that have recently been spilled into the lap of the La Follette Committee."
—New Yorker.

"Reads like a detective story . . . Miss Calkins happens to have an interpretative mind that throws off sparks. She makes you see things in a brilliant glare."—Harry Hansen.

"I think this book will stand out in any reader's mind, as it has in this reviewer's, as the most absorbing and the most disturbing volume of the new season. It is not opinion but evidence; It is not propaganda but history. . . . It is the manner of presentation that gives this extremely important body of facts its eminent readability. Indeed, it has that quality of breathless interest that is obtained by writers of mystery stories who let their facts come out at the trial."—Ted Robinson, Cleveland Plain Dealer.

"There is no fantasy in Miss Calkins' account. It is based upon data that is only too true." — Ralph Thompson, New York Times.

•

HARCOURT,
BRACE & CO.,
383 Madison Avenue
New York

Spy Overhead

THE STORY OF INDUSTRIAL ESPIONAGE

by Clinch Calkins

author of "Some Folks Won't Work"

This is the story of the American industrial worker caught in a trap of commercialized espionage and violence. The mass of evidence uncovered by the La Follette Committee tells an appallingly true story. The reader sees first-hand the testimony of industrialists, of labor organizers, detectives, union men turned traitors, labor pimps, munition makers, sluggers, ex-convicts. Truly a detective story—but the victim of this tale is neither a nonentity nor a felon—he is the worker, the chief character in American life. 363 pages, $2.50

OTHER NEW PUBLICATIONS

EDGE OF TAOS DESERT

by Mabel Dodge Luhan

How Mabel Dodge, cosmopolitan hostess to the "Movers and Shakers" of two continents, discovered Taos and the Southwest, broke off from her former life, found a new and rewarding sense of values. Here, too, is the intensely personal and happy story of Tony Luhan, whose wife Mabel Dodge was to become. Illustrated with photographs, $3.00

ONE MORE MANHATTAN

by Phyllis McGinley

Eighty poems by one of the nimblest writers of verse that ever rounded the corner of a quatrain. $2.00

LITTLE CHILDREN

by William Saroyan

"The best of the amazing Saroyan's amazing books."—Los Angeles Times. "His third and best volume."—Sterling North, Chicago Daily News. $2.50 creatures, and therefore at times unjust"; they quote with approval Gautier's remark that they are "sick men, and that what distinguishes us from the rest is exoticism." But it was their nervous sensibility that kept their perceptions quick, just as it was their exoticism that gave them, as it gave Flaubert in "Bouvard et Pécuchet," their special vantage in seizing the casual, the tedious, and the commonplace. Their agonizing discipline as naturalists served here to lift them out of the flaccid luxury of their aesthetic tastes and gave them the ear and eye with which they caught the tone and complexion of a century. However much they failed at plays and novels, they set down their daily paragraphs with perfect felicity. They arrived at their ambition—"to show meandering humanity in its momentary reality"; and that is the diarist's final merit. What may surprise the reader is that he will find here not only the vital elements—caustic, passionate, pathetic, and humane—of a past moment but pronouncements on art, society, civilization, and human nature that are as valid now as they were eighty years ago.

Mr. Galantière has selected, from the nine published French volumes, entries from twenty of the Journal's forty-five years—the two crowded decades that end with the death of Jules in 1870. He has provided a biographical repertory that is one of the book's most valuable features—too laboriously smartened up with impious Rascoeisms, perhaps, but an admirable index to the characters and anecdotes of the memoirs. And he has produced a translation so fresh and fluent that it pays the Goncourts the inadvertent tribute of making it difficult to believe that outside their Journal they could possibly have been as precious and neurotic, or as prosaic and dismal, as his preface pictures them.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

The Latest Shudder

THE SEVEN WHO FLED. By Frederic Prokosch. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

IN "The Seven Who Fled," Frederic Prokosch's Harper prize novel, we find "The Asiatics" elaborated into frozen symmetry. The subject matter, though more rationalized in the second novel, is essentially the same. Asia is Mr. Prokosch's Magic Mountain. To Asia Mr. Prokosch's contemporary Europeans come, not, as one might think, to escape from reality but, as he thinks, to live cheek by jowl with it. On the hot, barren plains and the terrible mountains of Asia life achieves a super-real incandescence; burning as in a tubercular fever it transforms itself more rapidly than in Europe to its ultimate ashes. Decomposition of the flesh and degeneration of the character are in Asia accelerated; yet flesh and character, in their brief lifetime, are more intensely, extremely themselves than in the padded world of the West. For Mr. Prokosch's characters a trip through the interior of Asia automatically becomes a voyage of self-exploration, an excursion into self-consciousness. In "The Asiatics" one introspective globe-trotter, a young American, shoulders the burden of discovery and definition; in "The Seven Who Fled" the weight is distributed among seven Europeans—an Englishman, a Belgian, a Russian, a German, an Austrian, a Spanish lady, and a Frenchman.

To warrant this division of responsibility one would expect a rather sharp and meaningful differentiation of experience. Yet one finds the reverse. The outlines of personality, feeling, and behavior are blurred until the characters seem to dissolve into one another. Even the physical adventures do not differ notably from one character to the next—cold, privation, disease, and compulsive sexual erraticism are the common lot; while on the spiritual plane each person finds in Asia but one thing—heightened sensibility, which is reached via physical hardship, death or its contemplation, and memory. Searching out the meaning of life Mr. Prokosch's people come upon it in the very molecules of existence, in the assaults of natural objects and forces upon the nervous system, or, at second-hand, in the memory of former assaults made in childhood and adolescence, when the receiving apparatus was most highly tuned. Since Mr. Prokosch's characters are mere borderline cases, minor decorative personalities from the fringes of Western society, not actors but sufferers on the Western stage, they have no validity as symbols of either Europe or its respective states; and the novel breaks down into a simple catalogue of sensations, a confession of the meaninglessness of meaning. The characters, indeed, have so little personal identity, so little individual clearness of tone, that the novel in the end reduces itself to a catalogue of the author's sensations, the author's private confession.

The range of the author's sensations is narrow, and for all his admiration of intensity the sensations themselves are not very vigorous. His book is full of "little spasms," "little plans," "little gardens," "little moments." He is a connoisseur of the gentle, the tender, the delicate, the pure, the simple, the sweet, the hesitant; and an academician of the tremor. "Touching" is his favorite designation for the people he likes and the situations he relishes; and the "viciousness" and "corruption" which so much enchant him must always coexist with the gentler qualities. Thus in Mr. Prokosch's novel, for all its cosmic aspirations, its League of Nations personnel, its dedication to violence and the doctrine of extremes, the Magic Mountain becomes a dwarf flower garden, and the terror of the super-real expresses itself in an elegant frisson.

MARY MCCARTHY

A "Comic Conscience"

LABBY—THE LIFE OF HENRY LABOUCHERE. By Hesketh Pearson. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

HESKETH PEARSON, in this lively study, likens his subject to Sydney Smith and Samuel Butler. Like them, he says, Henry Labouchère was a genius who saw through the establishment and whom the establishment therefore could not afford to take seriously. "Labby" might also in some ways be likened to Bernard Shaw. His wit and impudence were somewhat Shavian in quality, as were his irreverence toward the sacred cows of the upper classes and the habit, rather disconcerting even to his constituents, of refusing to sentimentalize in behalf of causes he championed.

No idealist, Labouchère played the game of politics coolly, astutely, and resourcefully for ends that were wholly disinterested and socially decent, was clear-sighted in controversy, and under a mask of irresponsible cynicism fought implacably against hypocrisy and cruelty. He shared the constituency of Northampton with Bradlaugh and was careful to refer to himself, with his tongue in his cheek, as "the Christian member from Northampton," but his first important speech in the House was made in behalf of Bradlaugh's right to affirm rather than take a religious oath that was repugnant to him. He fought the intrenched privilege of the established church, but he also hated the bigotry of the nonconformist conscience and stood resolutely against blue laws.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

I, Yahweh

A NOVEL IN THE FORM OF AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY

by ROBERT MUNSON GREY

"My unbounded enthusiasm for Mr. Grey's novel is mixed with envy. I would rather have written I, YAHWEH than any book I have read in many years." Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor The Christian Century

THE audacity and magnificence of Mr. Grey's conception is measured by the fact that his novel is the autobiography of no less a personage than the God of the Western world, who was given to our civilization by the Jews of the Old Testament.

This God, Yahweh, is a very human God. He reflects man's moral insights and also man's compromises with evil and the lesser good. Molded by man, he rises only so high as man himself will let him—he goes up and down in history with human aspiration or the lack of it. The vast sweep of history, from the days of Abraham down to Hitler and the coronation of George VI of England in 1937, is portrayed as seen by Yahweh himself, the chief Actor in the dramatic episodes that have shaped the modern world. Each event is told, each character is presented, not [illegible] it appeared to men, but in the light of its effect upon Yahweh, the God of Western civilization.

The reader will see the contemporary world situation in [illegible] wholly new perspective. The book will provoke controversy as to its meaning for the nations, for religion, for human progress. It is a powerful drama of the spiritual history of the West and of the fate toward which modern civilization is rushing.

The author's style is lighted up with a humor now gentle, now cutting. His dramatic power is held under full control, leaving the reader haunted with cryptic meanings and never overwhelmed with gratuitous interpretation or moralizing. A true work of art, I, YAHWEH thrills the emotions and kindles the imagination.

Excerpts from Pre-publication Reviews

JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, Episcopal Clergyman.—"I, YAHWEH took [illegible] day and half the night; there was no laying it down. It is superbly written, luminous in its insight and perfectly devastating in its implications. The story of Yahweh, and his final conversion to the Christian religion, is an epic. Thrilling [illegible] too mild [illegible] word; it is searching, subduing, awesome—the more [illegible] the nearer it comes to our own tangled, tormented times. Not in many a day have I read [illegible] book that stirred [illegible] so deeply, and gave [illegible] more furiously to think; it made me want to be a Christian for three whole days. Nay, it will haunt me for many a day ahead."

L. O. HARTMAN, Editor Zion's Herald.—"This book will shake up the Christian world. The conservatives will regard it as atheistic and even blasphemous. The sponsors of the 'Finite God' will hail it with satisfaction [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ally. Discerning men and women, however, will [illegible] in this daring novel something deeper."

GUY EMERY SHIPLER, Editor The Churchman.—"Done with artistry and alluring insight. Here is a story of religion, dramatic and potent, which blasts away vast areas of rock with which [illegible] has overlaid truth."

NORMAN THOMAS, Socialist Leader.—"Interesting, original, powerful."

ALBERT C. DIEFFENBACH, The Boston Transcript.—"It baffles, antagonizes, inspires and stimulates. . . . An extraordinary style. . . . Yahweh reflects shockingly the kind of people we actually are. . . . Before the simple Galilean who talks of [illegible] 'Father' stands Yahweh, your god and mine, discredited, embarrassed, yet always conscious that there is something higher to which he does not attain. . . . This remarkable story of mankind will be called sacrilegious by some p[illegible] who have not caught up with the truth about themselves and their god."

KIRTLEY F. MATHER, Harvard University.—"No wonder the publishers were, as they confess, 'excited' by this manuscript. It is an amazing piece of work. Mr. Grey has produced a masterpiece which will undoubtedly have a deep and beneficial impact upon contemporary thought."

GAIUS GLENN ATKINS, Auburn Theological Seminary.—"I think it is by any test [illegible] remarkable piece of work. . . . The technique [illegible] difficult and daring but it is entirely permissible and defensible. . . . A book which is bound to start a long line of comment and discussion."

EDWIN McNEILL POTEAT, Baptist Clergyman.—"Enthusiastic! I, YAHWEH will win warm admiration and provoke stout protest."

VIDA D. SCUDDER, Wellesley College.—"Some readers may feel that the author is skating [illegible] thin ice, but to [illegible] he seems entirely reverent. I wonder whether he was inspired by the old Gnostic heresy which identified Jehovah with Satan? That has always been to me [illegible] tempting thought. The ironical passages in the book seem to me the best, as the delightful dealings of Hitler with Yahweh, and the irresistible account of the formulation of the Trinitarian doctrine."

RAYMOND ROBINS, Social Economist.—"A book of extraordinary daring, originality, power and timeliness. The most challenging book on the religious conception of Hebrews and Christians."

CARL S. PATTON, Pacific School of Religion.—"A great book! It illustrates the old truth that the gods are made in the image of [illegible] and gives a hint that there is a God who is not so made. The extent of the author's biblical, historical and philosophical learning and his use of all this learning in a story that holds the interest throughout—all this is unique. I [illegible] greatly taken with the book."

HARRY ELMER BARNES, Historian and Journalist.—"The book is [illegible] admirable combination of scholarly knowledge and popular exposition. The conception is audacious but thoroughly sound."

At All Bookstores—$2.50

WILLETT, CLARK & COMPANY NEW YORK CHICAGO

Now MILLIONS of People Are Wealthy

THERE were only seven automobiles in John Brown's home town 30 years ago, when John was born. A few rich men owned them, and the cars—such as they were—cost well over $2000.

Today, for much less than $1000, John has a car that is far better than anyone owned even a decade ago. In fact, for what a leading car cost in 1907, John can now have, besides a better car, other things—automatic house heating, a radio, golf clubs. Mrs. Brown can have an electric refrigerator, a fur coat, and a lot of new dresses.

Today in America three out of four families have cars better than the best a few years ago. Their homes are more cheerful with improved electric light, which also costs less. Their house furnishings are more attractive and comfortable, yet less expensive.

They have many servants at little cost, for electricity does the tedious tasks about the house.

This real wealth has come to millions of people because industry has learned to build products that are worth more but cost less. Engineers and scientists have found ways to give the public more for its money—more goods for more people at less cost.

In this progress G-E research and engineering have ever been in the forefront. And still, in the Research Laboratory, in Schenectady, General Electric scientists continue the search for new knowledge—from which come savings, new industries, increased employment, benefits which bring to millions of John Browns real wealth unknown a generation ago.

G-E research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric

90-1N

GENERAL ELECTRIC

LISTEN TO THE HOUR OF CHARM, MONDAY EVENINGS, N B C RED NETWORK

Labby at one period of his career had been a stage-manager, and he always put on a good show. Even his enemies must at times laugh with him and at themselves. They frequently took refuge in the belief that they could laugh him off, and in a sense they could. Actually he accomplished little enough. For all his political astuteness he was too honest, too individual, too indifferent to the spoils to become really influential in British politics. He was, in Mr. Pearson's happy phrase, a "comic conscience," and the easiest course for his contemporaries was to enjoy the comedy and ignore the conscience. Labby understood and accepted this as imperturbably as he did everything else. He even fostered this attitude and traded on it to help Gladstone and Parnell behind the scenes in the fight for Irish home rule. It is not the smallest merit of Mr. Pearson's delightful biography that while it in no way slights the anecdotal side of its subject, it also presents his sound and serious core.

MARTHA GRUENING

Behind Tomorrow's Headlines

THE PRESS AND WORLD AFFAIRS. By Robert W. Desmond. With an Introduction by Harold J. Laski. D. Appleton-Century Company. $4.

A NEW YORK newspaper in 1937 is about as different from a New York newspaper of Horace Greeley's or even of James Gordon Bennett's day as a 1937 streamlined automobile is from the old-fashioned buggy. A history of that change and an account of how today's news is handled—roughly comparable to the manuals for car owners issued by the motor manufacturers—are given in Dr. Desmond's comprehensive book. For such a critical judgment of newspapers as the Consumers' Union offers about cars, however, the reader will have to look elsewhere.

News capital by news capital—London, Paris, Tokyo, Moscow, Buenos Aires—Dr. Desmond tells precisely how news is handled: where the correspondent gets his news, how he assesses it, how he races to transmit it, what he pays for transmission, and how it is handled in the home offices. He reports upon the state of censorship in various countries and, with a certain disciplined discretion, observes the control of news in "free" countries like England, where the press, though "uncensored," is "disciplined." He quotes instructions to the muzzled and chained Italian press, reports upon indirect censorship through the cable companies in Argentina, and describes the forthright methods of the Russian Foreign Office. The attentive reader will find the book, especially its plummy footnotes, a mine of significant facts.

"Newspapers," Dr. Desmond, who is an academician with practical newspaper experience behind him, comments in an all too brief summary, "are the products of three autocratic groups—the persons who own them, the persons who make them, and the persons who read them. . . . The reader, however, has the last word. . . . It is the audience-response, very largely, that makes so many newspapers dull, standardized, heavy-witted, and elemental in their handling of everything that matters." Whereupon Dr. Desmond hopefully suggests that public education will help.

Mr. Laski in his introduction cuts deeper. "Our news system," he recognizes, "is a reflection of our social system; there will be no vital change in the one unless there is also a vital change in the other." The newspaper is a part of a big-business world. In Horace Greeley's day an enterprising idealist might found a newspaper and make it count. Today

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

a metropolitan newspaper is no longer a mere million-dollar affair; it calls for tens of millions. It cannot afford risks; it depends not upon class—not on any class—circulation but upon mass circulation, which means that it cannot afford seriously to offend any effectively literate and articulate group of the population. It is almost as standardized as radio, more so than the movies.

"One of the most heartening things in the post-war world," Mr. Laski remarks, "is the number of foreign correspondents who have genuinely tried to keep the public honestly informed." That is true; the record of the American newshawks under the dictatorships (Dr. Desmond properly notes that the American newspapers today have the best-informed, most alert, and most independent corps of foreign correspondents in newspaper history) has often been heroic; the continuity of the gallant record seems almost miraculous. Perhaps one reason for the miracle is that the foreign reporters are farther removed from the influence of the home office, an influence far subtler and more refined, yet perhaps more pervasive, than the simple-minded Upton Sinclairs used to make out. But now that dictatorial governments, through politically controlled shipping lines and other enterprises, advertise, some of this independence may be lost.

Into the subtler influences Dr. Desmond seldom goes. His book is as thorough a piece of research, and almost as free from dangerous wonderings, [illegible] any foundation report.

LEWIS GANNETT

An Anti-Slavery Saint

THE GREATEST AMERICAN WOMAN: LUCRETIA MOTT. By Lloyd C. M. Hare. The American Historical Society, New York. $3.

LUCRETIA MOTT would have been the first to protest against her designation as America's greatest woman. No one can deny that she was a rare and saint-like person with an unusual mind; that in a day when it was considered intolerable that women should take part in any political movement or unsex themselves by even attending a public meeting, she was an unusually advanced thinker. More than that, she was an excellent Quaker preacher, being one of the Hicksite leaders who caused the schism in the Quaker church. As a campaigner for freedom in slavery days she was perhaps unsurpassed among the women leaders in her ability to make converts because of the charm, the modesty, and the simplicity of her bearing. Like Garrison, to whose wing of the Abolition movement she belonged, she soon found that she could not confine herself merely to advocating freedom for the slave, and so she bravely bore her testimony in the cause of peace, temperance, and the emancipation of women; indeed, there were few good causes which this group did not espouse. Nevertheless, Mr. Hare has not justified the title of his book. It would have been kinder not to raise this question about Lucretia Mott when there was so much else of interest to be said about her. Her work and her mind, so unusually open to new ideas, speak for themselves.

Unfortunately, Mr. Hare has given us a pedestrian volume, without literary quality or any dramatic portrayal of Lucretia Mott's manifold activities. The main facts of her life and her husband's life are here sincerely and correctly stated. They were almost lifelong residents of Philadelphia, where their home was the center of Abolition activities, to which they gave more of their devotion than to anything else save their church. Being devout followers of Garrison, they were never

BARGAINS in BOOKS
UP TO 75% OFF FORMER PRICES
Offered by America's Oldest Mail Order Book House
LIMITED QUANTITIES of EACH TITLE

1. SEXUAL LIFE IN ANCIENT ROME. By Otto Kiefer. Illustrated with 16 full-page plates. Acute portraits of the sexual life of leading Roman men and women, the sadism of the masses, the causes of the Empire's decay. ($5.00) $1.98

2. THE ART OF MARRIAGE. By J. F. Hayden, B.Sc. Extensive, frank, complete, this book includes notable chapters on unequalized sexuality, frigidity of wives, sexual satiety, prematurity, lack of art in procedure, impotence, prudery, etc. Also contains the fullest treatise on Frigidity that can be found today, as well as one on Reservatus. ILLUSTRATED, Revised, enlarged. Our Special Price, $1.98

3. [illegible] MASTERPIECES OF MODERN ART
Magnificent Full-Color Hand-Mounted Reproductions
Superb reproductions in full color by one of the World's foremost color printers, [illegible] a fine art paper, and mounted by hand [illegible] mats. SIZE: 11¼ x 14 inches. The paintings are: RENOIR'S Bathing in the Seine, Young Girls in Black; CEZANNE'S Self-Portrait, Pierrot and Harlequin, The Man with a Pipe; MATISSE'S Family Portrait, In the Studio; MANET'S The Wine Shop; UTRILLO'S Montmatre; DE VLAMINCK'S Street in Auvers; MONET'S Boulevard des Capucines, Haystack Near Givernie, Village of Vetheuil; PISARRO'S Avenue de l'Opera; SISLEY'S Village on the Seine; GAUGUIN'S Self-Portrait; ROUSSEAU'S The Poet and the Muse; MARQUET'S Port of Honfleur; DERAIN'S Sabbath, Pine Trees; PICASSO'S Lady with [illegible] Fan, Guitar and Violin, Circus Girl; VAN GOGH'S Portrait of Dr. Rey, The Prisoners' Morning Walk.
ANY 6 PICTURES FOR $1.79
The 25 Pictures for Only $6.88

4. ARTHUR TRAIN'S FAMOUS DISTRICT ATTORNEY SERIES. Tut, Tut, Mr. Tutt—The Butler's Story—Mortmain—The Goldfish—By Advice of Counsel. Illustrated. Artcraft binding ($15.00) The 5-volume set, $4.88

5. MASTERS IN ART SERIES: Goya; Holbein; Bellini; Giotto; Watteau; Vermeer; Turner; Ruisdael; Rossetti; Raeburn; Nattier; Dou; Metsu; Mantegna; Constable, Lippi; Jan Steen; Ghirlandajo; Francia; Duccio; de Hooch; David; Chardin; Lotto. Twenty-four long-out-of-print, paper-covered books in the famous Masters in Art Series. 7⅛" x 10". Containing 240 beautiful full-page plates. The 24 books, $2.98 Any 6 books, 88c

6. CHINESE LOVE TALES. Eastern Shame Girl and Other Chinese Love Tales. Illustrated by Valenti Angelo. Bound in genuine silk. Boxed. "These stories have no equal in any language." $1.49

7. A HISTORY OF PROSTITUTION. From Antiquity to the Present Day. By G. R. Scott. An epic study of the world's oldest profession from its beginnings in the guise of sacred harlotry to its ramifications under present civilization. $1.98

8. DIEGO RIVERA'S MOST FAMOUS FRESCOES. Twelve prints in full color. Size, 9 x 12 inches. Diego Rivera is universally recognized as the world's foremost fresco painter. When these prints were first issued, they were sold FROM $5.00 TO $10.00 PER PRINT. ($7.50) 98c

9. MARK TWAIN'S "1601." This much suppressed masterpiece now available after 25 years. "Brilliant satire, spine-shaking humor." Conversation as it was in the time of the Tudors, and sketches Old and New. ($3.00) $1.58

10. Complete and Unexpurgated MEMOIRS OF CASANOVA. (12 volumes bound in 6.) This is the rare unabridged edition to which have been added the Chapters discovered by Arthur Symons. Edition limited to 500 sets on Louvain laid antique paper. Privately printed. ($50.00) The complete set, $14.88

11. BEVERIDGE'S LINCOLN. In 4 illustrated volumes. Abraham Lincoln, 1809-1858. By Albert J. Beveridge. Boxed. "The author has traced to its source every fact, incident, tradition or statement bearing [illegible] the life of Lincoln." ($20.00) The 4 volume set, only $3.98

12. THE THEATRE: 3,000 Years of The Theatre. By Sheldon Cheney. Profusely illustrated with 204 interesting illustrations. 558 pages. "A thoroughly readable, well-documented and beautifully illustrated history of man's whole adventure in the theatre."—Outlook. Chautauqua Edition. ($10.00) Our Special Price, only 98c

13. GEORGE WASHINGTON'S COMPLETE DIARIES. The first complete issue. From his first expedition [illegible] youth of 16 to the days of his final illness. Illustrated from old prints, engravings and facsimiles. "The material contained in these handsome volumes constitutes beyond question, ONE OF THE MOST IMPORTANT HUMAN DOCUMENTS THAT HAS BEEN LATELY ADDED TO THE LITERATURE OF AMERICAN HISTORY."—Sat. Review of Literature. ($25.00) The 4-vol. set, only $3.98

Satisfaction Guaranteed or Your Money Back

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION N-22
Established 1884
367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.
Gentlemen: I enclose $............ for which please send me the books I have circled below; delivery charges prepaid.
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13
(Mark circle around books desired)
☐ Please send me FREE Catalog No. 286-N, just off press!
Name ....
Address ....
City .... State ....

READ

G. B. SHAW—ON FASCISM

(Exclusive in America)

in the OCTOBER issue of

STORY

Now enlarged, this issue also contains:

- Short Stories of unusual interest
- College Prize-winning Story
- An Exciting Novella
- Behind the Books—Written by Lewis Gannett, Noted Critic
- Story in Faces—A Picture Portfolio, by Manuel Komroff
- A Visit to the Wounded in Spain, By Martha Gellhorn
- Survey of Reviews
- End Pages, by Whit Burnett

ALL in the OCTOBER issue of

STORY

NOW on sale—per copy 40c

Yearly Subscription Price $3.00

STORY, 432 Fourth Ave., New York

THE Nation ANNOUNCES . . .

Mr. Justice Black

Paul Y. Anderson presents an intimate personality sketch of Mr. Roosevelt's first appointment to the Supreme Court and an account of his record that suggests what he may do as a member of the court. An article of great political significance.

Who Is Fighting Spain?

Eliot Janeway asserts that Franco, Mussolini, and Hitler are merely fronts for "the most powerful and respected group of men in the world today"—the Sofina. Don't miss the astonishing story of this Capitalist International and the explanation of its stake in a Franco victory!

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year for $5. ☐ two years for $8. ☐ three years for $11. ☐ I enclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name____________________

Address____________________

Extra Postage per year; Foreign, $1; Canadian 50c

9-18-37

repelled by the heat of his language or by his attacks upon the recreant churches. Lucretia Mott herself said that the worst of the anti-slavery struggle "is that we should hear this institution claimed as sanctioned by the Bible. It is the grossest perversion of the Bible, and many ministers have thus turned over its pages unworthily, to find testimonies in favor of slavery. 'Woe unto him that useth his neighbor's service without wages, and giveth him naught for his work.' This is what we should quote." In her forty-seventh year Mrs. Mott went to London as a delegate to the first World Anti-Slavery Convention, only to be refused a seat as a delegate because of her sex. But she made a great impression none the less. The Dublin Weekly Herald spoke of her thus:

> Opinions differ materially as to whether Clarkson, Buxton, O'Connell, Garrison, Thompson, Sturge, or Birney were the greatest men, but nobody doubted that Lucretia Mott was the lioness of the convention. She is a thin, petite, dark-complexioned woman, about fifty years of age. She has striking intellectual features and bright, vivacious eyes. This lady has the enviable celebrity of being one of the most undaunted, insistent, able, and indefatigable friends of the slaves, being paramount even amongst the female Abolitionists of America.

Mrs. Mott was a difficult antagonist, and not only because of the charm of her presence, which moved Thomas Wentworth Higginson to exclaim: "Such a face and such a regal erectness! Nobody else ever stood upright before. She said but little in the meeting, but that so clear and sagacious and wise; and there was such an instinct of her superiority, that she rules like a queen on the platform. . . ." She had a quiet humor that often turned the laugh upon her antagonists, and by her earnestness and dignity she easily silenced ridicule and sneers.

The freeing of the slaves did not bring an end to her crusading activities. She survived her husband thirteen years; and until she died, in 1880, continued to fight for free and natural religion, for woman suffrage and social emancipation, for peace and against war, for the freed men and for her own Quaker faith. She never lost her interest in the progress of the world and was always ready to adapt her ideas to changing standards and social attitudes. Some day these things will be set forth about her in a more inspiring and moving volume than Mr. Hare's; and they should be, for whether she was the greatest American woman or not, Mrs. Mott was beyond doubt unsurpassed in her fineness and devotion.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Spoon River Again

THE TIDE OF TIME. By Edgar Lee Masters. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

THIS book, Mr. Masters's fourth within the year, is a chronicle of Ferrisburg, Illinois, and of its first family from the time of the town's foundation in 1822 under the land grants of the War of 1812 through the tumultuous century of American life which followed. It is concerned chiefly with the story of Leonard Westerfield Atterberry, one of Jefferson's natural aristocrats, whose liberalism came into conflict with the stubborn mediocrity of his Illinois village and whose promise was defeated by his environment. It is the tale of just one of the lives wasted by the tide of time, many of them potentially richer than this of a near-genius who had the determination of a U. S. Grant but lacked the favor of the "world spirit."

Mr. Masters had a more ambitious project in mind than the story of a liberal lawyer in a small town when he set about the writing of this book, but he has not realized his larger scheme. There are indications that he hoped to reveal the ways of history by studying the life of a small community through years of struggle and change; that he intended his panorama of a century of American life to show cause and effect at work in the ways of small lives. In short, he hoped to find out what made the people of the "Spoon River Anthology" what they were. But the task proved too much for him, and his would-be profundities wreck the whole scheme.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

The book, then, is something less than a prosy "Spoon River." The sprawling, formless narrative stumbles through nearly seven hundred closely printed pages with only a few vivid passages to redeem its tonelessness. There are too many inept attempts to connect the course of small lives with the great events that were taking place at the same time. Mr. Masters does not handle historical material with ease, and the book only comes to life when he is dealing with the Middle Western psychology which he has already made familiar. It is an ambitious failure, swamped by careless writing and irrelevant detail, and when at its close Mr. Masters asks, "What does all this mean as an ultimate thing?" and answers, "It may mean nothing," the reader is only too inclined to agree.

MASON WADE

MUSIC

Salzburg, 1937

THERE was more to be heard in Salzburg than I can discuss here; and I shall speak chiefly of opera, which was chiefly what led me there this summer. Consider merely what operas were offered. Of the ten, seven were great classics—by which I mean works that contain some of the most effective and affecting dramatic music ever written: Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice," Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," "Don Juan," "Magic Flute," Beethoven's "Fidelio," Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nürnberg," Verdi's "Falstaff." In addition there were two notable works of this century: Strauss's "Elektra" and "Rosenkavalier." And finally there was an opportunity to hear Weber's seldom given "Euryanthe." Of all these only one—"The Mastersingers"—was given at the Metropolitan last year.

Consider also that the seven great classics were presented in a way that is beyond the conception of anyone who knows opera only as it is given at the Metropolitan. This way meant, for one thing, scenery, lighting, and costumes contrived with imagination and taste, and action carefully coordinated with words and music. Sachs exclaimed at the sight of Eva—not, as he does at the Metropolitan, at the sight of the conductor; he exclaimed when she appeared at his window—not before; and she appeared from the left, where her home is in relation to Sachs's—not from the right. Such precision, which achieved possibly its most triumphant result in "Figaro," was only one manifestation of a stagecraft that solved other problems as triumphantly. On a stage so small as to create an insoluble problem in the last scene of "The Mastersingers," the counterpoint of action in the washbasket scene of "Falstaff" must be considered a triumph.

THE SEASON'S LEADING BIOGRAPHY

A ROLL OF HONOR

"This is a swell book. . . . Easy to read and well worth reading . . . a noble tale well told." WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE in The Saturday Review of Literature.

"A history of the liberal achievements in American history during the past generation." CARL VAN DOREN in The Boston Herald.

"A sincere and honest life of a sincere and honest man." HENRY PRINGLE in Books (N. Y. Herald Tribune).

"The biography of the month." HARRY HANSEN in Harper's Magazine.

"His life has been full of struggle, color and drama, and his biographers have missed none of it." SILAS BENT in The New Republic.

"A contribution that should not be overlooked." FRANCIS BROWN in The New York Times Book Review.

"It tells what is perhaps the most dramatic and encouraging story in modern American politics." LEWIS GANNETT in The New York Herald Tribune.

"This record is the story of the progressive movement in the United States during that period." OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD in The Nation.

"A magnificent job . . . it should be required reading." CHARLES W. HOLMBURG in The Progressive.

"The history itself is so vivid, the character of the man so inspiring and the position of the authors so sound, you can't put it down." SELDEN RODMAN in Common Sense.

"Clear, entertaining, choked full of information." WILLIAM POOLE in The Book-of-the-Month Club News.

"As fascinating as any novel—often more so, for it deals with facts and politics that are not remote but part and parcel of our day." Wings (Literary Guild).

"Always interesting." Current History.

"A testament of liberalism in this country." Washington Herald.

Readers of the Nation: This is YOUR Book!

INTEGRITY

THE LIFE OF GEORGE W. NORRIS

By Richard L. Neuberger and Stephen B. Kahn

$3.00 At All Bookstores

With Illustrations from Contemporary Cartoons

THE VANGUARD PRESS ▪ 424 Madison Avenue ▪ New York City

Now at the air-cooled
SQUIRE THEATRE, 44th St., at 8th Ave.
25c to 1 P. M. weekdays
A TRIUMPH! 4TH CAPACITY WEEK!

"The most powerful and moving documentary film ever screened . . . a motion picture of compelling artistry!"
—Herald Tribune

"Eloquent . . . admirable . . . Hemingway's narrative is superb . . . the film [illegible] a violent outcry against fascism!"
—N. Y. Times

"A beautiful piece of work . . . fine, sensitive and meaningful . . . altogether an extraordinary achievement!"
—Post

JORIS IVENS' magnificent screen drama
The SPANISH EARTH
COMMENTARY AND NARRATION BY ERNEST HEMINGWAY
Music by Marc Blitzstein and Virgil Thompson

WORKERS SCHOOL
Fall Term Registration
COURSES IN:
Science and Dialectics
Economics
Dialectical Materialism
Marxism-Leninism
Literature
American History
Spanish
Labor History
Current Events
China and the Far East in World Affairs
Psychology
Labor Journalism
Russian, and many other [illegible]
For Descriptive Catalogue D write to the School Office, 35 E. 12th St., N. Y. C.

FREE Correspondence Course in
Fundamental Economics and Social Philosophy
Write for descriptive booklet N
HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
Chartered by University of State of New York
JOHN DEWEY, Honorary President
211 West 79th St., New York City

The U. S. Constitution
150 years later

●

A brilliant and exhaustive historical analysis of the legal framework of the American commonwealth, showing its treatment at the hands of the Supreme Court and various chief justices at critical periods in American history.

●

By Louis B. Boudin, LL.B., LL.M.

●

Mr. Boudin is recognized everywhere as an outstanding authority on U. S. constitutional law. He is a frequent contributor to the Harvard, Yale, Columbia, and other Law Reviews, and is the author of the two-volume work Government by Judiciary, a study of the Supreme Court.

●

THE NEW MASSES

now on sale contains this searching historical study. Make sure of your copy by filling out the attached coupon now!

NEW MASSES, 31 East 27th Street, N. Y. C.
Please send me a 15-week trial subscription for $1.00 (enclose cash, check, or money order) beginning with the current issue containing Louis B. Boudin's article.

Name ....

Address ....

Occupation ....N

But in opera the drama proceeds in the music at the same time as on the stage; and in "Fidelio," "The Magic Flute," "The Mastersingers," and "Falstaff" the beauty and perfection for the eye created by stage designers (Holzmeister, Kautsky, Wildermann) and directors (Graf, Salvini, Wallerstein) were paralleled by the beauty and perfection created for the ear by Toscanini. As a conductor Toscanini reveals the same feeling for the medium of music that Mozart does as a composer; in this respect Mozart surpasses all his fellows; and it is in Mozart's music therefore that this quality of Toscanini's work is revealed most strikingly. A Toscanini performance ravishes our ears with its aural textures; and no composer has ever remotely approached Mozart in his ability to combine in ravishing textures the sounds of strings, winds, and voices. It was therefore in Toscanini's performance of "The Magic Flute"—in the ensembles, above all, employing the orchestra and the voices of the Three Ladies, Tamino, and Papageno—that the most miraculous manifestations were heard of a skill that accomplished such miracles in the other operas—for example, the distinctness of every melodic strand in the densely woven texture of "The Mastersingers."

Toscanini's feeling for the medium reveals itself also in the extraordinary plastic quality of music as he plays it—in the sharply defined contour of a note, a phrase; and in the unfailing organic coherence of the musical continuum, a tonal and rhythmic coherence that is inflexible in its flexibility. Each sound, in a succession that is suppleness itself, falls inevitably but easily into exactly the right place in time with exactly the right weight and color of tone—right, that is, in relation to what precedes and follows. It is this that is largely responsible for the precision of execution in his orchestral performances; and in the performances of opera this summer the precision extended beyond the orchestra pit to the stage: there were no discrepancies between orchestra and singers to make one physically uncomfortable, but always a unanimity that occasionally seemed beyond the humanly possible—for example, the pause, followed by a staccato "No!" of Falstaff and the orchestra as sharp as a needle point.

The difference between these productions and those of "Figaro," "Don Juan," "Orpheus," and "Euryanthe" conducted by Bruno Walter was the difference between Toscanini and Walter as musicians and, ultimately, as persons. "When Walter comes to something beautiful," one person remarked, "he melts; Toscanini suffers." In "Figaro" Walter melted only over Cherubino's "No so più cosa son"; for the rest a delightful performance of the score provided, with the perfect staging, one of the finest productions of the festival. He also did an excellent job with "Don Juan"; but the beautiful production of "Orpheus" was spoiled by a performance of the music that was often emotionally, and at times even technically, sloppy; and I did not like his treatment of "Euryanthe."

All that remains to say is that the perfection in ensemble offered by the best Salzburg productions was achieved with an excellent orchestra and chorus—from the Vienna State Opera—and by artists of whom only a few were in one way or another outstanding: in "Fidelio" Lotte Lehmann, Roswaenge, and Kipnis; in "Figaro" Pinza and Novotna; in "Don Juan" Pinza and Dino Borgioli; in "Magic Flute" Domgraf-Fassbänder and Kipnis; in "Orpheus" and "Euryanthe" Thorborg; in "Falstaff" Stabile.

One of the orchestral concerts was conducted by Artur Rodzinski, whose excellent work with the New York Philharmonic last season made the treatment he received from the orchestra's management scandalous. In Salzburg, instead of choosing works suited to the acoustic conditions of the small Mozarteum, he undertook to show what he could do with Brahms's Fourth and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," and almost blew the roof off with the noise he made. He also undertook to show what an American composer could do with the symphony; but the example he chose—Samuel Barber's Symphony—is a work that testifies only to the fluency which, understandably, leads judges to award Pulitzer prizes and Prix de Rome. Barber is able to produce sounds in great profusion; as yet he has nothing that gives these sounds meaning, organic relation, direction.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

And in the closing days of the festival Furtwängler conducted a performance of Beethoven's Ninth—a defacement of the work by a technically brilliant but musically tasteless effect-monger. Worse still was the fact that his last rehearsal, on the day of a performance of "Fidelio," left the horn-players with weakened lips, with the result that Toscanini's performance of the opera was marred by false notes from the horns.

Other concerts were conducted by Toscanini and Walter; Lehmann gave her annual lieder recital with Walter at the piano; there was the annual performance on two pianos by Robert and Heinz Scholz of Bach's "Art of Fugue," which Bach intended, I believe, as a work not to be played through but to be known from study, and which I do not think can be apprehended from a performance. For the rest, Salzburg offered more than one person could hear, and some things that could be missed—among them the concerts and operas conducted by Knappertsbusch.

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama: 1776 and All That

LAWRENCE STALLINGS is credited with the book for "Virginia" (Center Theater), and Mr. Stallings is known to be interested in American history. Unfortunately, however, few evidences of the fact are to be found in the plot he has put together along the lines consecrated by a thousand romantic operettas, and he seems, like everyone else concerned in the production, to have had chiefly in mind some simple excuse for filling the stage with marching men or dancing girls. Even Lee Simonson's settings, though beautiful in their way, are as literal as a postcard, and no one has done anything calculated to give an unpleasant surprise to the hordes who will get what they expect—a big show unusually lavish in the most usual way. One assumes that only something very big can even begin to fill so huge a stage or reach out across so huge an auditorium, and I wonder if those responsible for the production were as surprised as I was to realize that a Punch and Judy show of approximately conventional dimensions did, in the few moments allotted to it, not only fill the stage but capture the attention of the whole audience about as well as anything in the proceedings. Perhaps that means that anything really fundamental in its appeal would do as much, and that what one requires is not several hundred persons but two or three that are really vivid. Costumes are unusually good and so is the show—of its kind.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

[The French film version of Maxim Gorki's "The Lower Depths," which was awarded the French Critics' Prize, will be reviewed next week by Mark Van Doren.]

MAKE THE RAND SCHOOL
YOUR EDUCATIONAL CENTER
FALL TERM OPENS SEPTEMBER 20th
A FEW OF OUR COURSES

Juvenile Delinquency: Causes, Prevention, Treatment—Tuesdays, 7:00 P.M.—Commissioner Austin H. MacCormick, Dr. Leonard Covello, Dr. Angelo Patri, Magistrate Jeannette G. Brill, Dr. William H. Dooley, Magistrate Anna Kross, Dr. Sanford Bates, Deputy Police Commissioner Byrnes McDonald, Dr. A. A. Brill, Elizabeth R. Pendry, Algernon D. Black, Dr. Robert W. Searle, Rabbi Sidney Goldstein, Joseph H. McCoy, John Slawson, Dr. Frank O'Brien, Dr. Charles M. Smith, Dr. Sidonie M. Gruenberg, Judge Jacob Panken, Prof. Frederick M. Thrasher.
Social Psychology. Dr. Ernst Harms. Mondays, 7:00 P.M.
Administration of City, State and National Government. Dr. Harvey Pinney. Mondays, 7:00 P.M.
Books and American Life. Dr. Edw. Richard. Mondays, 8:30 P.M.
A Social History of Philosophy. Dr. Mordecai Grossman. Mondays, 8:30 P.M.
Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms. Adele T. Katz. Tuesdays, 7:30 P.M.
Psychology: The Science of Ourselves. George B. Vetter. Wednesdays, 7:00 P.M.
Wages and the Economic System. Dr. Emanuel Stein. Wednesdays, 8:30 P.M.
From Revolution to Social Technology. Joseph K. Hart. Wednesdays, 8:30 P.M.
The History of Russia—Peter the Great to Stalin. Elias L. Tartak, Tuesdays, 8:30 P.M.
Creative Leadership of Youth Groups. Jack Afros, Frederick Shulman, Wednesdays, 7:00 and 8:30 P.M.

Many other classes and lectures. Term fee, $4.50 per course
Single adm., 50c. Write, phone or call for complete bulletin

RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
7 East 15th Street ALgonquin 4-3094

A "Must" Book in the Drive Against Syphilis

Surgeon-General Parran's recent publicity campaign on syphilis—its undreamed-of prevalence, the necessity for early treatment, the possibility of its complete eradication—demanded a book like this! Here it is, full of hard-hitting, reliable, non-technical information that every man, woman, and child should have!

10,000,000 AMERICANS HAVE IT!

By S. WILLIAM BECKER, M.D.

The regular price of this book is $1.35, but we recognize that it will serve best if distributed through clubs, churches, clinics, schools, libraries, and social service agencies. We are therefore offering special discounts for quantity purchases. If you believe your organization may be interested in 10,000,000 AMERICANS HAVE IT!, write us on your business stationery for a free sample copy and discount schedule.

THE J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY
Washington Square Philadelphia

Letters to the Editors

Wheeler Looks Ahead

Dear Sirs: Mr. Neuberger's study of Senator Wheeler's problems in his home state which appeared in The Nation of August 28 shares the wishful thinking of a good many embittered liberals who have consigned shrewd "B. K." to an untimely political death. The state's senior Senator has more than three years in which to repair his political fences, and he is riding those fences now with a vigor which confounds prophets of his demise.

Wheeler is conducting a virtual election campaign in Montana in September, staging a whirlwind auto-and-plane tour which will carry him to picnics, Labor Day celebrations, "farmer-labor" conferences, anywhere that a crowd will assemble. One of the things he will stress in those appearances, and one thing Mr. Neuberger did not mention, is his leadership in labor's fight for publicly owned power at Fort Peck. It is not the "patronage" of Fort Peck that is important to the state or to Wheeler; that is negligible. It is power. Wheeler has worked whole-heartedly for such a project, and he forced a Fort Peck power bill through the Senate in the closing days of Congress. The measure died in the House adjournment stampede, but that was not his fault. Labor wants that power and knows that Wheeler worked for it.

Unquestionably Wheeler's court fight hurt him tremendously, though many in the labor movement, recalling past favors, hesitated to pass judgment. And counterbalancing his "fighting against God" phrase, to which Mr. Neuberger says many took exception, there was that other phrase spoken by Vice-President Garner: "Burt, write your own ticket!" Montana loves a winner, even if he's wrong!

Mr. Neuberger is right in minimizing the influence of Montana's negligible middle class; but I don't think the court issue has sufficient imaginative appeal to Wheeler's worker and farmer supporters to become a major factor in the election campaign three years hence. Wheeler can think of too many other issues in the meantime. It was personal loyalty to the President, moreover, not support for the court plan, which aroused those who most bitterly denounced Wheeler during the first flush of reaction against him. This Mr. Neuberger recognized of course.

Vengeful liberals, come not to bury Wheeler—yet! KINSEY HOWARD

Great Falls, Mont., September 8

Psychiatry Too Exclusive

Dear Sirs: Apparently Dr. Karl A. Menninger, who reviewed Albert Deutsch's "The Mentally Ill in America" in The Nation of August 28, resents the fact that Deutsch does not give more space to the private psychiatric hospital, such as he himself maintains in Topeka, Kansas. I wish to remind Dr. Menninger that while the average private psychiatric hospital is doing good work, it is available to but a few because of the almost prohibitive rates. On an average they have a fixed rate of $50 per week.

Since the vast majority of people cannot afford such fees, it is well that Mr. Deutsch's book is largely devoted to state institutions. More publicity should be given them. The patients confined in these state mental hospitals are indeed the "forgotten men" of America. Since patients in the state mental hospitals of the United States outnumber the patients in all other types of hospital combined, it is high time that more is known about these institutions—especially since in thirty states they still use such medieval methods as the strait-jacket, the lockbelt, and the lockroom.

Dr. Menninger finds it "rather amusing" to recall that the recommendation for raising the wage scale of attendants in state hospitals was made 134 years ago by Benjamin Rush. I fail to see the humor in such a situation; to me it is a sad and tragic thing that people in direct attendance upon our mentally ill are so poorly prepared to care for them; in most cases they know absolutely nothing about mental illness. Patients in many of the state institutions for the mentally ill become incurable because of the methods employed. Certainly many of these patients could be restored to mental health and happiness in a comparatively short time under the proper treatment.

Will the time ever come when the methods of modern psychiatry can be made available to the average person? How long must we wait for the methods used in such splendid mental hospitals as Phipps and Bellevue to be duplicated in all our state mental hospitals? I feel angry whenever I say "mental hospital." Let's call them by their right names, insane asylums, and let's get rid of them.

DELLA PEREA

Waxahachie, Tex., September 3

Awakening the Mass Mind

Dear Sirs: Max Lerner's suggestion that there be a cheap edition of "Selected Supreme Court Decisions" is all right, but cheap editions will not suffice today for the education of the masses. If civilization can only be saved from catastrophe by education, it would be well for those who desire to perpetuate democratic principles to find out whether it is possible to awaken the mass mind to an appreciation of sound ideas and methods of procedure. Cheap editions of scholarly works will not turn the trick in a time like this, for the simple reason that the masses have little time to read, and besides it is all a lot of us can do to provide bread and butter.

In one of your book reviews the statement is made that "every force evolves a form." The question is, Is liberalism a force or a fizzle? If liberalism is a force, it will have to evolve a pedagogical form for the masses of our day. If we had a national radio hour called the "Voice of Criticism" to clarify issues, puncture conceits, expose falsity and corruption, and present to the masses the cream of analytical thought in an intelligible form, with an offering of five- and ten-cent tracts, there might be some hope of teaching people to think cautiously. Of course there would have to be a voice at the mike competent to match those of the crackpots and demagogues in appeal. ROBERT W. DUEL

St. Paul, Minn., September 7

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 145 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 25, 1937 NUMBER 13

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 305

EDITORIALS:

BIGGER THAN BLACK 308
EMBARGO AGAINST CHINA 309
VICTORY AND INSULT 309
NAZI CHALLENGE TO AMERICAN LABOR 310

WHO "EXPOSED" BLACK? by Robert S. Allen 311
THE CAPITALIST INTERNATIONAL by Eliot Janeway 312
SCANDINAVIA'S "NEW DEMOCRACY" by Ludwig Lore 315
SEX CRIMES AND THE LAW by Sheldon Glueck 318
GIPSY LABOR by William Gropper 321
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 322

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

BLUE LIKE AN ORANGE by Meyer Schapiro 323
MISS PEDDER'S GOVERNESS by Louise Bogan 324
MUSIC OF THE STRATOSPHERES by Philip Blair Rice 325
ONE OUT OF TEN HAS IT by David Beres 325
GOLDEN CALVES by Philip Rahv 326
MRS. LUHAN'S ALL by Eda Lou Walton 326
AFTER ADONAIS by Ben Belitt 327
HISTORY WITHOUT TEARS by David Krinkin 327
SHORTER NOTICES 328
FILMS: WHERE NOTHING HAPPENS by Mark Van Doren 330
LIEBESTOD by Ben Belitt 330

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editor MAXWELL S. STEWART
Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

* * *

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

* * *

TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND LEGIONNAIRES can't be wrong, and whatever city they happen to pick for their annual convention has come to accept stoically the prospect of a week of howling bedlam during which a mob of patriotic middle-aged adolescents of good-will paint the town red, white, and alcoholic blue. There is one important compensation: though the hotel owner may have to put up with horses in his elevators, his hostelry will be full, for the Legion is expected to leave from five to ten million dollars in New York City. While the rank and file turn the chosen city upside down, the conservative gentlemen who run the Legion and know its potential power—in the words of its outgoing national commander it "blankets 11,382 towns"—have serious business which they attend to seriously.

* * *

THE LEGION IS THE MOST COMPREHENSIVE —and the most confused—middle-class organization in this country, cutting as it does across every group from worker to business to professional man. Its leaders, who hail from its more prosperous ranks, take care to reiterate that the Legion must remain neutral in industrial and labor disputes; but the part legionnaires have played in strike-breaking "law-and-order" groups in the past year indicates what that neutrality means, and National Commander Colmery's opening speech made it doubly clear. Between two protestations of the Legion's neutrality he sandwiched a justification of vigilante activities, a denial that participants could be described as "obnoxious vigilantes," and a warning that legionnaires must not wear Legion uniforms or insignia "in such instances." The Legion's exploit at Baltimore in helping to prevent Arthur Garfield Hays from making a mild though effective speech on the Constitution is symbolic of its attitude, as is the fact that in New York City men wearing Legion insignia snatched placards from pickets and called them "paid agitators." For the rest, Mr. Colmery denounced the New Deal without naming it and attacked in the usual obscurantist terms all "isms." He also spoke at length of peace, one of the most important issues before the convention. It goes without saying that the peace the Legion leadership has in mind is that based upon isolation with "adequate defense." The most persistent demand is for a universal-service law providing for a confiscatory tax on the profits of war. The danger is that the genuine desire of the rank and file for peace will be turned into support of such a measure as the Sheppard-Hill bill, which would presumably take the profits out of the next war but would certainly be much more automatic and efficient in conscripting labor on M-day.

*

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT IS FULFILLING HIS function as the nation's greatest mass-educator. His Constitution Day speech was aimed at wresting from the reactionaries the monopoly they have so long claimed in the Constitution. All that he left them were its "misinterpreters"—the Supreme Court and the corporation lawyers. A fine feature of Mr. Roosevelt's speech was his effort to make the common man see that the Constitution is his precious possession, which its interpreters on bar and bench have sought to pervert to the uses of their wealthy allies; that the Constitution itself is not "a lawyer's contract" but a "layman's document," a living instrument of government drafted by laymen to serve the purposes of an evolving social system; that the conservatives have consistently tried to block the path of constitutional adaptation; and that where the popular will has finally triumphed, it has always been at the cost of a generation's delay. What distinguishes the President's analysis above all else from the writings of the "liberals" who have fought his program of court reform is its sense that time is of the essence of the matter. "We can no longer afford the luxury of twenty-year lags. Desperate people in other lands surrendered their liberties when freedom came merely to mean humiliation and starvation." We are glad to have this distinguished and mature statement of the problem of judicial reform. And we are glad the President has abandoned some of the technical legalism of his own Supreme Court proposal and taken his stand on ground broad enough and strong enough to hold all believers in democratic progress.

*

THE LEAGUE ASSEMBLY'S FAILURE TO REELECT Spain to its seat on the Council is a sad commentary on the low estate to which that international body has fallen. Its action was particularly inexcusable in view of the fact that Premier Negrin had just submitted an impressive document charging Germany and Italy with invasion of Spain in violation of the League Covenant. If the League were half the body that its creators intended, its first act would have been to reelect Spain to its traditional seat as a means of assuring it that its accusations against the major powers would receive adequate consideration. Whether China's charges against Japan are to be similarly pushed into oblivion remains to be seen. Reference of the case to the League's Far Eastern Advisory Committee may be justified as a means of enlisting the cooperation of the United States, but it may also provide a neat method of sidetracking the whole affair if the United States fails to cooperate. Among the ironies of the situation is the fact that the most perplexing and complicated issue likely to be brought before the League—the British plan for the partition of Palestine—will probably be pushed through in record time, while China and Spain are left to fight single-handed against fascist invaders.

*

REPORTS FROM THE SINO-JAPANESE FRONT indicate that the Chinese are continuing to resist while falling back slowly before the Japanese forces. Although any loss of ground is discouraging to those who would like to see China overwhelm the invader, the gradual withdrawal would appear to be excellent strategy. Every mile of additional communications imposes fresh burdens on the Japanese, especially in view of the increased activity of Chinese plain-clothes fighters behind the enemy lines. As it is, Japanese progress has been confined primarily to the desolate areas of Chahar, Suiyuan, and northern Shansi, where their advance can have very little military value. South of Peiping the Chinese lines are still within forty-five miles of the former capital. Paotingfu, capital and third largest city of Hopei, seems to be still safe against Japanese attack. On the vital Shanghai front the enemy gains have been almost imperceptible. Thus far Japanese superiority in the air has meant little; the raids on Nanking and other interior cities have been chiefly for the purpose of intimidating the civilian population and have achieved no military objective. Continued Chinese resistance presupposes, however, an uninterrupted flow of munitions from abroad. This has been made difficult by President Roosevelt's partial embargo and London's increased insurance rates on Far Eastern shipments.

*

BRITAIN'S PROBLEM OF HOW TO CHECK Italian piracy in the Mediterranean without offending Italy has not been satisfactorily solved as we go to press. Although the anti-piracy patrol is actually functioning, Eden's speech at Geneva indicates that Britain has not yet given up hope of finding a formula for saving Mussolini's face. Rome has suggested that this might be achieved if Italy were given the right to participate in the patrol on an equal footing with England and France. If this is denied, the fascist powers threaten to set up their own anti-piracy patrol, presumably for the purpose of protecting their submarines. While the danger that the fascists will actually carry out this threat is remote, a real possibility exists that Britain will be intimidated to the extent of granting fundamental concessions to the government chiefly responsible for the existing piracy. Thus we may still have the ironic spectacle of policeman and thug patrolling the streets together.

*

LABOR SPIES, HATCHET GANGS, AND SWELL dinners to keep the workers happy—it all comes out in the NLRB wash, which has become a regular institution and thereby improved the sanitation of industrial relations. The Labor Board has been holding hearings in Johnstown, Pennsylvania, and we may confidently hope that the Bethlehem Steel Company's labor policy, Mayor Shields, the back-to-work movement, and the Citizens'

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame

National Committee will be thoroughly gone over and hung out to dry in the sterilizing light of publicity. Bethlehem countered the investigation with an elaborate attempt to prove that the corporation had no dirt to conceal. It contended first that Bethlehem is a holding company and in no way engaged in production or manufacture; it denied all charges of unfair labor practices; it complained with all the force of the legal talent at its command that the board's charges were not specific and that the company had been given too short notice of the hearings. Mayor Shields, meanwhile, illustrated his belief in law and order by ignoring the board's subpoena.The board, nevertheless, went on with its hearings and has already turned up significant data on the genesis of the Citizens' Committee. One witness testified, for instance, that Sidney D. Evans of Bethlehem Steel spoke at the committee's first meeting. A vigilante outfit is best judged according to the company it is kept by. The officials of the Citizens' Committee have maintained that it was able to raise the tens of thousand of dollars it spent on newspaper advertising in behalf of the right to work for Bethlehem through "small contributions" from various sources. But seeing is believing. Let the NLRB proceed.

*

GOVERNOR EARLE OF PENNSYLVANIA, WHO last spring banned the showing of the film "Spain in Flames" and blazed up when The Nation protested that ban, is now applying the heat of censorship to another picture of the Spanish war—Joris Ivens's "The Spanish Earth." The state Board of Censors, a three-man board, held up the picture for ten days before handing down a belated decision against it. The final decision was reached the day after Governor Earle's return from Europe. The official grounds given by the board were vague, but privately one of its members stated that the picture was suppressed for being pro-Loyalist. The irony of the whole matter is that "The Spanish Earth" has been acclaimed by non-political film and dramatic critics in New York and Hollywood for its restraint of statement and calmness of tone, as well as for the almost perfect artistry of its execution. Earle's objections to the earlier picture, "Spain in Flames," were that it was shrill and calculated to induce men to enlist. No such charges can possibly be made against "The Spanish Earth." It is difficult to believe that the Governor himself has seen the picture, but also difficult to believe that he could have allowed so important a decision to be made unless he had. The film exhibitors have applied for a rehearing before the board. It is Governor Earle's duty to see that the rehearing is granted, and to take on himself the final responsibility for the decision. Labor and progressive groups not only in Pennsylvania but throughout the nation await his next move.

*

LAST YEAR CONGRESS PASSED A MERCHANT Marine Act that was to assure the United States a trading fleet of some 350 new ships. Although Joseph P. Kennedy, chairman of the Maritime Commission, has not specifically abandoned the entire program, there is a good chance that most of the glorious armada will be sunk in blueprint. And it is just as well. Under the act the government was to have lent shipowners 75 per cent of the cost of constructing new vessels, with rebates as high as 50 per cent where the cost exceeded the expense of building a similar ship in foreign yards. For all this generosity, Mr. Kennedy is compelled to admit sorrowfully, "if we removed every restriction and guaranteed them [the ship operators] everything except actual profits, they still couldn't put up a dime." The shippers would like to have the government build the vessels altogether and rent them out for operation—which would reduce the risk of the shipping magnates to the zero point. It would be easy of course to go on from that point and urge complete government ownership and operation. But if the failure of the present plan proves anything at all, it proves that the United States does not need a more extensive merchant marine, that such a fleet would, in an economic sense, be as much of a white elephant for the government as it is for private lines. In a military sense it would have distinct advantages—of an aggressive sort. Finally there is everything to be said for allowing foreign nations to continue to transport our goods in their own ships. It is one of the best ways that still remain open to them of paying for American products.

*

THOMAS G. MASARYK IN DEATH MADE A LAST contribution to the cause of democracy that he served so well in life. The world has grown used to gigantic spectacles in which vast throngs pay tribute to dictators according to blueprints drawn up by ministers of propaganda. Orders go out to party functionaries all over Germany to send to Nürnberg on a given date so many men, so many women, so many children, wearing such and such uniforms, to heil Hitler in mass formation at given signals, and to yield so many decibels of noise in so doing. Similarly, Italians are massed on order to yell "Doo-chay!" at strategic moments. And these demonstrations have come to be regarded as proof of the potency of fascism, contrasted with the weak tea of democracy; as the ultimate victory of circuses over freedom. The spontaneous reaction of the people of Czecho-Slovakia to the death of President-Liberator Masaryk is an eloquent refutation of the theory. There is no all-powerful party in that country to supply flag-wavers, mourners, or demonstrators at the order of a propaganda ministry, no Gestapo to take note of those who fall below the required standard of enthusiasm. Yet the Czech government, through the press, had to beg the public to stay away from Prague because days in advance of the Masaryk funeral that city of a million had already doubled its population. Despite the requisitioning of all possible emergency quarters, thousands had to spend at least one night in the streets. And few were the windows in all Czecho-Slovakia that did not display a picture of the man who brought the American democratic tradition to the heart of Europe.

Bigger than Black

WHEN Paul Block and his associates succeeded in nailing Hugo Black to a fiery cross, they hoped to crucify with him the President of the United States and the Administration's entire program of court reform and social reconstruction. Whether or not their hopes will be fulfilled the near future will show. It will depend partly on the ability of the American people to see through to the real purpose of the maneuver, and partly on the shrewdness with which Mr. Roosevelt and his advisers, and Justice Black himself, handle the situation. At the moment of writing we are not sanguine of the outcome. The attack on Black seems to us as slick a job of political manipulation as we have witnessed in many a year. By attaching to Black the label—and libel—of bigot and political reactionary, the genuine, conscious bigots and reactionaries have succeeded in turning against him a large measure of his normal liberal following—which makes the opposition nearly unanimous. In a desperate effort to save themselves and the Administration from the same stigma, many Democratic Senators and friends of the President have showed an almost indecent haste in repudiating Black and laying upon him the responsibility for the fix in which they find themselves. And the new justice has made matters worse by maintaining a silence which is widely construed as both admission of guilt and acquiescence in his own execution. The President's attitude is still somewhat ambiguous. His one statement seemed to hint that the next move was Mr. Black's, but private advices from Washington, as well as Robert S. Allen's article in this issue of The Nation, indicate that Mr. Roosevelt will at least passively support Black's continued membership in the court.

Considering the situation as a whole, however, we feel that the best cards are still in the hands of the President's reactionary foes, and that this need not have been the case. Hindsight makes it easy to say that the incident could have been avoided altogether by a frank statement by Black at the time his former connections with the Klan were first discussed. But we believe this to be true. His eleven-year record of vigorous liberalism would then have easily outweighed the onus of past Klan support or membership, and justly so. The worst that could have been said would have been that Hugo Black had started as a typical Southern politician but had risen above his beginnings in almost unparalleled degree. His independence and his liberalism would have loomed even larger against such a background, for it takes a brave man to turn against the interests and the organization that put him into office. Senator Black lost that chance, perhaps because his Klan connections had so wholly faded into the limbo that had engulfed the Klan itself that they seemed scarcely worth discussing. But this was far from shrewd, and a bolder, more realistic strategy might have been expected from a man with as much experience in the technique of political battle as the Senator from Alabama.

This was not, however, Mr. Black's only chance. When the first newspaper stories syndicated by Mr. Block and the N. A. N. A. appeared some ten days ago, the new justice should have made a bold response. It was not too late. He could have told clearly what his past connection with the Klan had actually amounted to. He could have stated—what all honest men know to be true—that he had come to the Senate with no commitments and had steadfastly followed his own judgment in dealing with national issues; that in the years that followed his election he had earned the Klan's hostility as well as that of the utilities and other vested interests in his state and in the nation as a whole; and that he would submit his record as evidence of his integrity and independence. This Justice Black could have said in a single formal statement. It would not have silenced his enemies, but it would have heartened his friends and helped the Administration.

But even on this score the fault is divided. If Justice Black should have spoken in defense of his record, so should his friends. Where are his friends in this crisis, men who in Mr. Black's absence dare to speak out and dispel the nonsense and hysteria that have been generated by the articles "exposing" this man? Not one has done the thing which it would be hard for Black to do: listed his many courageous attacks on privilege and graft—the investigation of ocean- and air-mail subsidy frauds, of the power lobby; recalled the social legislation he has sponsored; given the names of Jews and Catholics he has backed for public office; cited his support of Smith in 1928, his opposition to Heflin in 1930; offered proof of the hostility of the Klan in recent years. With the honorable exception of a handful of Democratic Senators, we have seen no report that any of his former colleagues have come to his defense. Are they afraid for their own political futures or bamboozled by the attack itself?

And where are the liberal and Democratic newspapers in this emergency? To their shame most of the independent editorial writers and columnists have joined the rabble-rousers in shouting for Justice Black's resignation or impeachment. The gusto with which Westbrook Pegler and Hugh S. Johnson have pounced upon the victim was perhaps to be expected. But when Heywood Broun and the New York Post turned against him, the gods of things as they are must have smiled with sardonic satisfaction. Notable and vivid exceptions are Drew Pearson and Robert Allen, authors of the syndicated column Washington Merry-Go-Round, and Jay Franklin in the New York Post, all of whom have exposed the political mechanics behind the attack. The attitude of the majority seems to us either craven or naive.

In the interest not only of fairness to Justice Black but of the country's political future, liberals should refuse to be hoodwinked or silenced on this issue. To let the Blocks and Hearsts and Copelands succeed in this maneuver may mean selling out our hope of continued progress under the present Administration. Admit that Black's connection with the Klan was unfortunate, admit that his silence under attack has been a mistake, but do not be taken in by the attack itself. Look straight through it to the men who launched it, recognize them for the enemies of progress that they are, distinguish the hatred of Roosevelt and his progressive legislation that animated them, examine the legislative record of the man chosen as their victim; and then decide whether Hugo Black or Paul Block is closer to the spirit of the Ku Klux Klan.

Embargo Against China

THE joy with which Japan has received the news of the partial embargo on American munitions imposed by the President should be sufficient evidence of its unneutral character. The United States has, in effect, taken sides in the Far Eastern conflict, and aligned itself with the aggressor. Our trade with Japan is not in the least affected by the embargo. Few if any of our shipments of war supplies to Japan are carried in government-owned, or even American, vessels. The warning that privately owned American ships will carry munitions "at their own risk" does not affect our trade with Japan since no risk is involved. In the case of China the degree to which the embargo will cut off American supplies is a matter of dispute. Admittedly, the President's order has more psychological than practical importance. At most only thirteen vessels are involved, and few of these are used primarily in trade between the United States and China.

Psychologically, however, the order is unfortunate. Quite apart from its intention or ultimate effect, it is being interpreted in both China and Japan as a deliberate gesture of aid to Tokyo. Rightly or wrongly, it is looked upon as the first step in a general retreat before the isolationist forces. In any case the United States has imposed a serious obstacle in the way of collective action against Japanese aggression. By far the most realistic hope of joint action lay in the possibility of a general illegal blockade. While the present action is less of a retreat from our traditional policy than the iron-clad embargo which would be imposed by the Neutrality Act, it weakens the chances of a concerted demand by the powers that the channels of ordinary commerce be kept open.

The case against an isolationist embargo goes far beyond the issues presented in the immediate Far Eastern situation, but many of its most objectionable features would be removed if it did not actively aid aggression. If an embargo is imposed against China, the least that should be demanded is equivalent action directed against Japan. Cotton, scrap iron, and oil are as essential to Japan as airplanes and munitions to China. If the peace groups which are clamoring for the invocation of the Neutrality Act are sincere in desiring to avoid American entanglement in the Far Eastern conflict, they should make it clear that they do not desire to see the act invoked unless these secondary war materials are included among the prohibited articles.

Meanwhile, China's appeal to the League of Nations has been referred to the Far Eastern Advisory Committee. This move presents the United States with a somewhat unexpected opportunity for positive action. It is easy to take a defeatist attitude toward the League and say that we should be only wasting our time if we sent delegates to the sessions of the committee. But the fact remains that most of the smaller nations represented on the committee, together with the leading anti-fascist powers, would like nothing better than to see the League spurred into last-minute action. And the one hope of achieving that result lies in American leadership. The failure of the United States to act decisively in the early months of the Manchurian invasion was largely responsible for the fiasco at Geneva in 1932. This makes it especially imperative that it take the helm in what is probably the last opportunity to escape a world cataclysm.

Victory and Insult

LAST week's primaries in New York City were like a dream come true for good government. Senator Copeland, running in both the Republican and Democratic primaries, got a bad thrashing in the Republican by Mayor LaGuardia, and in the Democratic by Jeremiah Mahoney. His defeat marks the end of one phase of Tammany Hall—the phase in which it sought, from its Manhattan stronghold, to dominate the other four boroughs as well, and to rule with a cynical disregard of the changes and chances of political life. Whether the Hall can reconstruct itself under the new Farley-Kelly-Flynn triumvirate which supported Mahoney is something that remains for the long-run future to decide. As far as the mayoralty election on November 2 is concerned, it is almost a certainty that the patched-up alliance between the Hall and the Mahoney forces will not be adequate to defeat Mayor LaGuardia and the fusion of labor and progressive forces behind him.

Meanwhile there are other and accessory triumphs to take delight in. Copeland's defeat is less a personal one than a defeat of his tactics and his support. The attempt to make the city campaign a forum for anti-Roosevelt politics, the attempt to feed the New York voters intravenously with the Ku Klux Klan issue, the thrice-told tales of a hack politician—all these were repudiated. But even more important was the repudiation of Al Smith and his Liberty League comrades, who stood behind Copeland with unknown sums of money and incredibly stupid advice, and who manipulated the puppet doctor with both.

Affirmatively, of course, the result was a triumph for LaGuardia's administration of the city's affairs. For that reason the Mayor's action, two days after the primaries, in indorsing George U. Harvey for another term as Borough President of Queens, and even promising to campaign for him, was an unexpected and gratuitous insult to the Mayor's supporters. This Harvey, let it be remembered, is the Harvey who has opposed every progressive move of the Mayor at the Board of Estimate meetings, he is the Harvey who is probably the most fanatical red-baiter in New York City officialdom; he is the Harvey who has been consistently anti-labor and has attacked the American Labor Party; he is, finally, the Harvey who only five months ago stood up on the platform at the New York Hippodrome and said that if he were Mayor of New York and had the problem of labor radicals to handle, his injunction to the police would be simple: "I wouldn't need any fancy orders. I'd just say, 'Boys, get about three feet of rubber hose, and don't bring any of them back to the station house.' "

It is possible, from the standpoint of political opportunism to understand why the Mayor has come out in support of this Harvey. Perhaps there was an understanding that if Harvey would deliver the Queens vote in the Republican primaries, he would in turn get the Mayor's support. Or, if there was no such deal, the Mayor may still want to make doubly sure of his election even at the expense of aligning himself with so primitive a reactionary as the bombastic Führer of Queens. But if these were the Mayor's motives, they are unworthy of a man whom all the progressive forces are supporting. The Mayor himself told a meeting of Republican women before the primaries that he would not "beg votes." The Mayor said at the same meeting that the only question in the coming campaign was whether the people wanted to return to machine rule. Truckling to the Harvey machine is no higher in human dignity or civic virtue than taking orders from a Tammany boss. The fact that the boss is a Republican does not sweeten the act.

The truth is that the Mayor is riding high on a wave of success. He knows that he can count on labor's strength, and the fact that the A. F. of L. unions, in addition to the American Labor Party, have come out in his support makes him doubly sure. With labor comfortably tucked away for the duration of the campaign, the Mayor may feel he can afford to patch up his alliances with labor's enemies. We think he is tragically wrong. He will probably win the coming election, and he deserves to win on his record as an administrator. But the importance of his stand thus far has lain in his repudiation of machine politics and in the shift to the politics of the mass base. His indorsement of Harvey destroys the whole logic of his former position. It may seem strategic in the heat of the campaign, but it will return to plague him in the future.

Nazi Challenge to American Labor

NAZI activities in the United States are beginning to follow the historic pattern laid down in other countries. Affirming a Communist menace, the Nazi leaders offer their services in defense of the established order. As Herr Kuhn, the American Führer, recently put it, "Our organization is just waiting until the Communists get ready to seize control, which will be sooner than you think. Then, if the government—the legal, elected government—needs our help, we will step in and fight for our country, the United States." This statement bears a strange resemblance to the reports published by the official German news service early in 1933 announcing the discovery of Communist plans to take over the government, burn public buildings, and shoot women and children. Der Tag was ushered in under the pretense that the Communists were ready to "seize control."

No one, not even Herr Kuhn, believes that the Communists are about to take power in the United States, but the Nazis know that the country is moving into a period of intense industrial struggle. The lines are forming—and the Nazis are preparing to cash in on a situation they believe is made to their order.

They know that they cannot command mass support—even the support of the German-American masses. A recent study made by the Chicago daily Times bears out this conclusion. Two Times reporters spent several months gathering material among the American Nazis. Perhaps the most important fact revealed in the Times stories is that the Nazi Volksbund numbers about 20,000 members, instead of some 200,000 as Kuhn likes to boast. The best the Nazi leaders can hope for is to induce the officials of the big German social organizations to back them and their programs. During the recent New York City primary fight the officials of the Steuben Society and some other Landsmannschaften indorsed Herr Copeland. He carried Yorkville but lost the other German districts.

But if the Nazis cannot gain mass support, they have at least developed gangs with considerable skill and experience in methods of terror; and these gangs will be offered to the employers in coming labor disputes. The Nazis in America are dangerous not because they represent the German-American population but because they have financial and diplomatic support from the Nazi government in Berlin and because they have formed close connections with practically all the other fascist and vigilante groups and citizens' committees in the United States. Asked by a reporter what role the Nazis had played during the steel strike in Johnstown, Kuhn answered "Oh, we left that up to the local offices."

At the beginning of July the Nazis held a convention at the Hotel Biltmore in New York. Most of the committee meetings were secret; especially the one at which the labor question was dealt with. At this session delegates of the American Nazi organization, together with special agents sent from Berlin, adopted a definite program of action against the C. I. O. and the trade-union movement generally. Nazi leaders have good reason to fear the upswing in the American labor movement. They know that workers cannot be militant unionists and Nazi sympathizers at the same time. The plans are laid for Nazi intervention in the coming struggle with Henry Ford, and agents are already at work in the plants. It is a matter of life and death for the Nazis in the United States to fight the unions and to fight them with all methods—even terror and provocation. It is equally a matter of life and death for American labor to keep the Nazi blight from spreading in the United States until it is strong enough to crush all unionism.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingam

Who "Exposed" Black?

BY ROBERT S. ALLEN

Washington, September 19

THE exposé of Justice Hugo Black's one-time membership in the Ku Klux Klan was a deliberate conspiracy to destroy the crusading New Dealer's usefulness on the bench and to force President Roosevelt to abandon his fight to liberalize the reaction-ridden federal judiciary. Parties to the conspiracy were the Hearst stooge Paul Block, the North American Newspaper Alliance, and certain not definitely identified Administration-hating business interests. The last-named supplied the information and alleged documents, and Block and the North American Newspaper Alliance furnished the newspaper columns and scare-headlines to blazon the "dope" to the world. The sensational stories carried the by-line of a Block reporter, but their real author was Frank Prince, one-time Hearst reporter and now operator of a private detective agency with offices on Fifth Avenue in New York City. It was Prince who dug up the material on which the Black-Klan articles were based.

Who employed him for this important service is still a matter of unconfirmed clues and reports. One points to the independent steel companies which successfully resisted C. I. O. unionization last spring and whose tactics are now being aired by the National Labor Relations Board; another to certain financial interests in Pittsburgh. How far all or some of these corporations are implicated in the affair probably will have to await disclosure by a Senate investigating committee—a committee practically certain to be appointed. In the meantime, however, certain facts about Prince's activities are known.

A week or so before the Black-Klan exposé he spent several days in Pittsburgh, where Block publishes the Post-Gazette, which carried the copyright on the stories. Prince handles public relations for the University of Pittsburgh, Mellon-supported institution of anti-labor fame. He is now engaged in a gumshoe job on John L. Lewis for the same interests that hired him to investigate Black. Two of Prince's agents are ferreting around in Indianapolis, where Lewis lived when the national offices of the United Mine Workers were located there, in an effort to uncover information about his past that could be used to discredit or embarrass him.

Prince is one of the ablest and smoothest operators in his line. He is tall, handsome, a good dresser, and a ready mixer; there is nothing of the "dick" or "flatfoot" about him. In appearance and speech he gives the impression of an intelligent business executive. He has the highest business and publisher connections. In addition, as a one-time reporter, he knows the news game and talks reporters' language. He never attempts to plant a "bum" story on them. When he offers a tip, they know from experience it is dependable. In the last few years Prince has done a number of undercover jobs with political angles. He supplied the McCormack-Dickstein Nazi-investigating committee with most of its important disclosures.

What the final outcome of the attack on Black will be is unpredictable at this writing. Administration strategists believe the matter will blow over. At least they hope so. But certain positive forecasts can be made: (1) Black will not resign; (2) Mr. Roosevelt will not ask him to resign. The new justice has no thought of resigning, for he considers himself guilty of no misconduct or misbehavior either in act or thought. He stands on his twelve-year senatorial record as a steadfast liberal and friend of labor and the farmer. That record includes a vigorous opposition to the attempt of Tom Heflin, Number One Catholic-baiter, to hold on to his Senate seat through an election contest after being defeated at the polls. The President will make no request or suggestion to Black, holding that the latter is a full-fledged Justice of the United States Supreme Court and under the Constitution removed from any interference or pressure by anyone in or out of the government. The President holds that it would be no more fitting or legal for him to call on Black to quit because of his one-time membership in the Klan than it would be to make such a demand on Justice McReynolds because of certain well-known facts about his private life or on Justice Butler because he violated his word of honor that he would not participate in cases involving railroads he once represented as a corporation lawyer. Mr. Roosevelt would not have appointed Black had he known of his past Klan affiliation. But having appointed him, the President takes the position that Black now is the sole judge of his conduct.

It can also be positively predicted that there will be no impeachment proceedings against Black—despite all the labored "dope" stories from Washington and the threatening mutters from Senators Wheeler and Burke and other renegade liberals and reactionary Democrats. There will be no move to impeach because there are no grounds for impeachment. The breast-beaters are fully aware of that. Their outpourings of righteous indignation are sham maneuvers to make political capital for themselves. It is highly significant that the real liberals in both the House and the Senate, men who fought shoulder to shoulder with Black in scores of battles for reform legislation, have not uttered a word of condemnation against him.

That the White House was stunned by the exposé is putting it mildly. From the President down, the inner circle was astounded and frightened. The first reaction very definitely was panicky. Some felt that the President would have to modify his plan to launch a new attack on the Supreme Court in the speech he was then in the process of writing. They did not see how he could blast the court in the face of the Klan explosion. The affair was discussed at length at a Cabinet meeting. At least one member urged strongly that the President issue a statement declaring that he would not have named Black had he known of his Klan connection. Roosevelt rejected this counsel. He agreed that it was advisable to say something, but held that it should be merely a statement to spar for time until public reaction could be gauged more accurately. And that was what he did.

Whether the President seriously considered soft-pedaling the court issue in his speech is not known. But the "I-told-you-so" chortles of glee from Wheeler, Burke, and Copeland unquestionably had a lot to do with stiffening his backbone. Under the spur of his deep hatred of them, and on the very sound theory that the best course was a bold and unconcerned front, he went through with his original intention to open a new offensive against the judiciary. His speech, incidentally, was the most effective fighting argument he has made in the court battle. Had he opened with such an attack last February, instead of with the stupid and unsupportable grounds of age and overcrowded calendars that Attorney General Cummings sold him, he would have saved himself much grief and embarrassment. It is significant that Cummings was not consulted on this last address. The President intends to harp on his anti-court theme in at least one of his prepared speeches during his coming trip across the continent.

While they have regained their composure and now confidently believe that the President has not suffered a loss of popular support, some of his advisers privately are worried about what the Supreme Court may do with the Black-Klan matter. There are pending before the court two petitions seeking its permission to challenge Black's right to sit on the bench. The petitions were filed long before the Klan exposé. They are based on two legalistic contentions advanced during the confirmation debate in the Senate; first, that since Van Devanter retired and did not resign, no vacancy exists on the court; and, second, that by voting for the retirement act Black barred himself from appointment to the vacancy. Until the Klan exposé government lawyers considered the petitions of no consequence. There is nothing in the Constitution that gives the court the power to unseat its members. But they are now wondering whether Chief Justice Hughes, who played such a controlling role in scuttling the President's six-judge bill, may not seize the opportunity presented by the press hullabaloo to allow arguments to be heard on the petitions. Nothing would be said, of course, about the Klan. Everything would be on a lofty legal plane. But the President's appointee, and the President's crusade against the judiciary, would be put on the griddle in sensational front-page proceedings. Mr. Hughes, as his long record proves, is not above such tactics.

The Capitalist International

BY ELIOT JANEWAY

WHEN the Holy City of Guernica was bombed into a heap of rubble and corpses, millions of people knew that the perpetrators of that act were Hitler and Mussolini, not their Spanish puppet Franco. Hitler and Mussolini have so long been castigated as the mad-dog outcasts of Europe that this new horror added merely the weight of a straw to their list of crimes. But the cynical defiance of their intervention in Spain, which has made them the Satan and Beelzebub of the story, has been a little two obvious.

The role is too big for them to play—and in reality it is not being played by them. They are the agents without whose troops and munitions Franco's rebellion would collapse. But far from being alone in their fight against the Spanish government, they have behind them what is probably the most powerful and respected group of men in the world today—the international of world capitalism.

Many of the men in this group, of course, are English, and their stakes in Spain raise the basic question: Which way are Britain's financial and imperial interests inclining it? The blunt fact is that an international combination of capitalists is pushing Britain into a union with fascism, and in this group are not only the owners of the choicest properties in the Empire but even those who demand an alliance with the France of the Popular Front.

We can best investigate this body by tracing the incredibly numerous interests of one of its principal units, through which work most of the corporations and magnates that comprise our capitalist international. This organization is the Société Financière de Transports et d'Entreprises Industrielles, better known as "Sofina." It is the international public-utility and electrical-engineering trust. Sofina, it has been said, has so many banks behind it that it is independent of all banks, and it is in possession of many of the basic resources of almost every country in the world. Its presiding genius, a virtually unknown South Carolina engineer named Heineman, who speaks to the business world once a year from his Brussels headquarters, is said to have been in good part responsible for a number of the earlier triumphs of Herbert Hoover.

The importance of Sofina arises from its stake in undeveloped countries—like Spain and Mexico and China—where the system of free private enterprise is under severest pressure. Nothing is more natural, therefore, than that Sofina should use its great influence in London, Paris, Berlin, and Rome to bring back the halcyon days when capital could move freely and securely from London and Paris to Madrid and Mexico City. And this happens to be a demand which in 1937 dovetails neatly with the fascists' "crusade against bolshevism."

In England the Sofina circle includes a dazzling list of the greatest powers of British industry and finance: Associated Electrical Industries, the General Electric of England; Vickers; Baldwin's, the steel combine originally owned by the present Lord Baldwin's father; Midland Bank, the world's largest; Shell Oil, itself a large and influential shareholder in the notorious Mannesmann Tube Company of Düsseldorf, which has been angling for Spain's iron since the first Moroccan crisis and which has been named repeatedly as one of the instigators of Franco's insurrection; the London Times; the British metal trust; certain British steel companies which own Spanish iron mines in partnership with Krupp; the International Sleeping Car trust, to which all independent European railroad interests of whatever nationality must pay tribute; and, finally, a circle of ten private banks in the City of London, whose spokesman is Montagu Norman, governor of the Bank of England, whose pro-German sympathies are no secret.

The vast importance of this network in international politics is apparent from the activities of its members. One of the banking houses, for instance, that of Helbert Wagg, which operates principally through England's greatest insurance company, the Prudential, conducts joint ventures all over Europe with two gentlemen who have been receiving considerable publicity lately in connection with Germany's part in the Spanish insurrection. They are Dr. Otto Jeidels, member of the inner circle of the Thyssen steel trust, and Gustav Schlieper, of both the German metal trust and the chemical trust. These three German firms, it is widely believed, made the rebel insurrection possible. Another Sofina bank connecnection is with Guinness, Mahon, the Anglo-Irish bank which grew out of the famous river brewery. Arthur Guinness, in the interest of his German friends, recently made a spirited attack on our Kentucky gold hoard, declaring to the recent Berlin congress of the International Chamber of Commerce that "a large gold loan at a reasonable rate [should] be granted by the United States and Britain to Germany." The Guinness, Mahon interests in Spain are the Great Southern Railroad, the Zafra and Huelva Railroad, and the Seville Electric Company. But the bank which is most completely Sofina's is Thomas Cook and Son, which, together with Helbert Wagg and Guinness, Mahon, operates an international network of investment syndicates.

Of great importance in the Sofina circle is Erlanger's, the African railroad bank par excellence. In this world of "haves" and "have nots," the strength of the British Empire lies no longer in the playing fields of Eton but in the raw-material resources of the overseas empire and particularly of Africa. The nineteenth-century trader has long since been overshadowed. The land and its wealth are owned and dominated by holding companies in London, and the key holding companies are those which operate the mines and railroads of the Dark Continent.

Intimately related to the group of Erlanger-financed African railroads is the pyramid of mining companies which exploit the continent's reservoirs of base and precious metals. The pyramid is financed from top to bottom, diamonds to copper, by the most celebrated of all British banks—the House of Rothschild. It is now known that the famous Rio Tinto copper mine in Spain is likewise financed by the Rothschilds. Far from being independent, Rio Tinto is an integral part of the centrally owned and centrally financed African copper and gold empire. It is also known that Rio Tinto maintains intimate relations with the German metal trust, and that it has in no way regarded the German "confiscation" of its Spanish ores as an unfriendly act.

Thus when Sir Auckland Geddes, former ambassador to the United States, and head of Rio Tinto, expresses the company's indorsement of the Franco regime, he speaks not merely for a British concessionaire in Spain but for that imperial interest which is thought to be threatened in the Meriterranean by fascism's expansion. What is left of imperial fears in the face of the official report from which the following is an excerpt?

> In reply to the rising led by General Franco a general strike throughout the country was declared by the unions, and arms were issued to the workmen by the civil authorities. . . . On July 28 the port of Huelva was taken by General Franco's forces; work in the Huelva department began on the following day. The mines area was occupied by a column of General Franco's army on August 25-26. . . . On the last day of August 5,400 men were reemployed. This figure compares with 8,500 men employed on May 31. It is interesting to note that with 6,000 men employed in December, 1936, we were able to export 143,000 tons of ore, 30,000 tons more than we were able to export in the month of May with 8,500 men employed. This is a measure of the economic waste forced on the companies by the decrees of the "Popular Front." Since General Franco's forces occupied the mines area, there has been no labor unrest. During the period of disturbances in that area there were some atrocities perpetrated by drunken mobs. The perpetrators and others, dealt with by court martial, were found guilty and shot.

Sir Auckland went farther. Rio Tinto's principal customer is Germany, and Germany pays no cash for the products Rio Tinto sells it, a clearing agreement being in force. "Remember," Sir Auckland told his directors, "that these clearing arrangements have got nothing to do in origin with the civil war in Spain." In other words, Franco or no Franco, Rio Tinto would give Germany its ores under the same compensation arrangements that several of the London banks in the Sofina circle have made with the Third Reich.

The parent holding company of the African group to which Rio Tinto belongs is the British South Africa Company. In 1935 one of its affiliates, the Southwest Africa Company, a large concessionaire in Damaraland, acquired a sizable block of stock in Ludwig Loewe, one of the most important German industrial concerns, with a large interest in German General Electric. After a year's negotiation the Southwest Africa Company won the rare privilege of drawing foreign exchange out of Germany for the money owed it. Accordingly, the chairman of this company, who is also the head of the parent holding company, was able to announce at the 1936 meeting that "our relations with the German authorities and our friends in Germany have always been of a very satisfactory nature." Here, in the British South Africa Company, speaks the voice of imperial Britain.

This African railroad and mining monopoly has other bonds with Sofina. Members of the Sofina family share control in certain of its enterprises, and it has a similar share in some of theirs. The most notable instance of this reciprocal arrangement is Sofina's interest in Ludwig Loewe, which with its affiliate, German General Electric, controls the principal Sofina property in Germany. Loewe's directors participate in the ownership of both Krupp and the steel trust. Thus in fact as well as in purpose Sofina binds together on an international scale the colonial mining trusts of the "have" powers and the mineral-consuming industrial trusts of the "have nots."

It is in this international fashion that the English and German units of Sofina hold Spain in their grasp. The principal utility properties in Spain are Sofina's. The most important, the Barcelona Traction, Light, and Power Company, once exercised a monopoly over Catalonia's power and other utility services, and its Bilbao Company was equally powerful. What is at least as important as Spain itself, however, is the fact that Madrid and Barcelona have served Sofina as bridges on the way to the New World. For out of Spain radiate its corporate ties with the utility monopolies in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Uruguay, Mexico. A cross-section of its Madrid-South American holding company, the Compañia Hispano-Americana de Electricidad, or "Chade," is revealing. Among the Spanish members of the board are the Duke of Berwick and Alba, premier grandee of Spain and official representative in London of General Franco, and the Marquis de Urquijo y Ussia of the Bank of Urquijo, Spain's leading private bank. Of the two British directors, one is the chairman of Thomas Cook and Son, as well as a director of the Suez Canal Company and thus one of the pillars of the French alliance; the other is a director of the Bank of England and one of the Sofina representatives in the British South Africa Company's group of railway properties. The two German directors represent Ludwig Loewe and the German General Electric.

Chade has a French director too—and here arises the issue which cuts across the relationship of England and France, the two democracies, in this international movement. We have seen that the "threat to the Empire" does not deter reputable British firms from backing Franco. The other supposed tie of England to the Loyalists is the French alliance. There is indeed a French alliance—but it is not with the French people. It is with the famous 200 families, who want to maintain the English alliance but also to expand it into a four-power pact that would include Germany and Italy.

The French director of Chade is a director of the principal financial agency by which the Schneider munitions trust operates its foreign investments. He is also a prominent figure in Sofina's French engineering enterprises. By far the most important of these center around the famous Mercier group of electrical-engineering and utility properties. M. Mercier himself has long been prominent in Croix de Feu circles. One of Sofina's many bonds with the Mercier group is the president of the executive board of the French section of Sofina's railway-coach monopoly, who is also a colleague of the French Baron Robert de Rothschild and of the Marquis de Urquijo in the management of the Madrid-Saragossa-Alicante railroad. These same French interests, fortified by one of the De Wendels, also control Spain's important Penarroya mines. Thus Sofina has penetrated so deeply into the Spanish interests of France that it is hardly distinguishable from them.

